START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

JANUARY 1994

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER: BSO-56-012

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copyright law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: (IA) IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATION: 12X

FILM STOCK:

REEL 12

Volume 24-25

BSO
1906-1907 to BSO
1907-1908

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 24

BSO

1906 - 1907

7

SHIPMAN'S
Invoice & Scrap BOOK

BLANK PAGE

From GERMAN HERALD
Address NEW YORK CITY.
Date SEP 6 - 1906

Herr Muck erkrankt.

E. Walter vom Bostoner Symphonie Orchester erklärt, er habe nichts davon gehört, daß Karl Muck, der berühmte Musiker, der die Leitung des Orchesters übernehmen soll, erkrankt sei. Muck, der wenigstens eine Saison in Boston weilen soll, hat sich angeblich einer Operation unterziehen müssen.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From VOGUE.
Address
Date

DR. MUCK AND THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The opening pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, under the leadership of Dr. Muck, are scheduled to take place an Thursday and Saturday, 8 and 10 November. During the coming season this orchestra will give in New York, altogether, ten concerts, of which the final pair will occur 21 and 23 March.

Dr. Muck, who sails for this country 25 September, has divided his time this summer between Bayreuth, where he directed four performances of Parsifal, and Salzburg, where he was one of the conductors at the Mozart festival. During Dr. Muck's absence in America his position as leader of the Berlin Opera will be filled by Leo Blech of Prague.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau
From
Address
Date SEP 7 - 1906

Dr. Karl Muck Not Sick.

Boston, Sept. 6.—The manager of the symphony orchestra here has received no word from Dr. Karl Muck as to any operation or any illness. So far as is known, he will sail for America on Sept. 24 to enter upon his work here as conductor of the orchestra.

From
Address
Date

It is not generally known that Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was considered for this position thirteen years ago. After the departure of Mr. Nikisch in the spring of 1893 a contract was signed with Hans Richter whereby that distinguished conductor bound himself to come to Boston for five years. At the last moment he begged off, pleading that he did not dare cross the Atlantic, although it is probable that the extra inducements offered him in Vienna were the real cause of his not coming. In the correspondence which followed Richter most urgently recommended for the place young Muck of Berlin, who, he said, was one of the coming men of Germany. On the strength of this, inquiries were made to find out whether Dr. Muck would consider an offer. He was just beginning his third year in Berlin, where he had had great success from the start, and he let it be known that he would not consider any offer from America. Thus it was that the choice fell on Emil Paur, who had succeeded Nikisch as conductor of the Municipal Opera of Leipsic.

Prof. Willy Hess, concert-master of the Boston organization and leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, will bring a new violin concerto to New York next winter. It is by Frederic d'Erlanger, the French composer.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From NEW YORK SUN
Address
Date SEP 7 1906

DR. KARL MUCK NOT ILL.

Boston Symphony Managers Have No Word of an Operation on Conductor.

BOSTON, Sept. 6.—The management of the Symphony Orchestra here has received no word from Dr. Karl Muck as to any operation or any illness.

As is known, he will sail for America September 24 to enter upon his work according to the arrangements made earlier.

It is natural to suppose that if sickness or other circumstances had modified his plans he would at once notify the orchestra management. No reply has been received to letters of inquiry sent to Berlin.

From NEW YORK STAATSZEITUNG
Address
Date SEP 9-1906

Muck nicht krank.

Boston, 8. September. Ein Kabelgramm, welches heute dem Major Hh. L. Higginson, dem Organisator des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, aus Berlin zugekommen ist, bezeichnet die in einem vor einigen Tagen in einem in New York eingelaufenen Kabelgramm enthaltene Angabe, Dr. Karl Muck, der neue Dirigent des Orchesters, sei krank, als unrichtig. Wie Higginson sagt, weilt Muck ruhig und gesund auf dem Lande und trifft seine Vorbereitungen zur Fahrt nach Amerika.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From New York Tribune
Address SEP 9
Date

Dr. Karl Muck Not Ill.

BOSTON, Sept. 8.—A cablegram received from Berlin at the office of Major Henry L. Higginson, the organizer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, states that Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Orchestra, is not ill, as stated in cablegrams received in New York recently. Dr. Muck is resting in the country in preparation for his season in America.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From RECORD
Address
Date

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to make another short trip to the Middle West next winter. Owing to the fact that the orchestra has been engaged for the Worcester Festival, which comes in the first week of October this year, the Western trip has been postponed until the end of January. The total number of concerts scheduled for next season is in the neighborhood of 12[illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date SEP 8 1906

MUSICAL COMMENT.

The Mozart Festival at Salzburg—Programme of Worcester Festival.

There is a promise of good music at the next festival of the Worcester County (Mass.) Musical Association on October 2, 3, 4 and 5, in Mechanics' Hall, Worcester. The festival chorus will be augmented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the following solo performers, namely: Miss Elizabeth Parkina, Miss Louise Ormsby, Mrs. Margaret C. Rabold, sopranos; Mme. Louise Homer, Mme. Isabelle Bouton and Miss Grace Munson, contraltos; Paul Dufault and Daniel Beddoe, tenors; Emile De Gogorza and Frederick Martin, basses; Mr. Timothée Adamowski and Miss Bessie Bell Collier, violinists, and Mme. Samaroff, pianist. The choral numbers are to be Handel's "Israel in Egypt," on October 3; Verdi's "Requiem" and Brahms's "Song of Destiny," on October 4. These works will be conducted by Wallace Goodrich, of Boston. The orchestral conductor will be Franz Kneisel. The orchestral pieces will be Goldmark's overture "In the Spring," Schumann's symphony in D minor, Schubert's symphony in C (generally known as No. 9), the overture to "Euryanthe," by Weber; a set of symphonic variations by Frederick A. Stock; "Lovely Alda" and "The Saracens," by MacDowell; Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, and "Chanson de Matin," by Elgar. Mr. Adamowski will play Saint-Saëns's violin concerto in B minor on Thursday afternoon, and Miss Collier the same composer's "Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso" on Friday evening. Novelties in the Worcester festival schemes are Brahms's exquisite cantata and the orchestral variations by Mr. Stock, conductor of the Thomas Orchestra, in Chicago. On Friday afternoon Mme. Samaroff will play Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto in D minor.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From NEW YORK SUN
Address
Date SEP 13 1906

Boston Symphony's New Leader to Sail Sept. 25.

BOSTON, Sept. 12.—Representatives of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to-night announced that a cable despatch had been received from Dr. Karl Muck, the new [illegible] saying he had recovered from an [illegible] and that he would sail for the country [illegible]

[3]

From NEW YORK STAATSZEITUNG
Address
Date SEP 13 1906

Genesung gemeldet.

Dr. Muck reist am 25. September nach den Ver. Staaten ab.

Boston, 12. Sept. Charles A. Ellis, Geschäftsführer des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, gab heute Abend bekannt, daß er ein Kabelgramm von Dr. Muck empfangen habe. Dr. Muck kündigt in diesem an, daß er genesen sei und am 25. September von Deutschland nach den Ver. Staaten abzureisen gedenke. (Unser Berliner Spezialkabel meldete am 4. September, daß der gediegene Musiker sich einer Operation habe unterziehen müssen.)

Newspaper Cutting Bureau
From GERMAN HERALD
Address NEW YORK CITY.
Date SEP 13

Dr. Muck kommt.

Hat sich von seiner Erkrankung gut erholt.

Conried 51 Jahre alt.

Viele Glückwünsche aus aller Welt. — Der Opernkrieg. — Neuestes aus der Theaterwelt.

Boston, 13. September. Charles A. Ellis, der Geschäftsführer des Boston Symphony Orchesters, machte gestern Abend bekannt, daß er gerade eine Kabelnachricht von Dr. Karl Muck, dem Leiter des Boston Symphony Orchesters für die nächste Saison, erhalten habe, worin ihm Dr. Muck mittheilt, daß er sich auf dem Wege der Besserung befinde und am 25. September von Deutschland nach Amerika abzureisen gedenke.

Dr. Muck war in dem Badeort Tobelbad bei Gratz, wo er Erholung suchte, an einer Laryngitis erkrankt und mußte sich einer Operation unterziehen. Man hatte befürchtet, daß diese Erkrankung ihm eine Amerikareise, unmöglich machen würde. Dies ist erfreulichenweise nicht

New York Times
From
Address
Date SEP 13 1906

Conductor Muck Again Reported Ill.

Special to The New York Times.

BERLIN, Sept. 12.—Dr. Carl Muck, conductor of the Royal Opera, who has been spending his holidays at Tobelbad, near Gratz, Austria-Hungary, is seriously ill of laryngitis and has been obliged to submit to an operation. It is doubtful if he will be able to fulfill his engagement to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, Sept. 12.—Manager Charles A. Ellis of the Boston Symphony Orchestra informed THE NEW YORK TIMES correspondent this evening that he was in receipt of a cable from Dr. Muck, in which the doctor says that he is in good health, and will sail for America on Sept. 25 as arranged. Mr. Ellis is curious to know who circulates these reports of the doctor's illness.

NEW YORK HERALD
From
Address
Date SEP 13

MAY NOT CONDUCT BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Dr. Carl Muck, of the Royal Opera at Berlin, Is Stricken with Laryngitis.

BERLIN, Wednesday.—Dr. Carl Muck, conductor of the Royal Opera, who has been spending his holidays at Tobelbad, near Gratz, Austria-Hungary, is seriously ill of laryngitis and has been obliged to submit to an operation. It is doubtful if he will be able to fulfil his engagement to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Word Is Received in Boston That Dr. Muck Is Recovering.

BOSTON, Mass., Wednesday.—Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stated to-night that he had received a cable message from Dr. Muck announcing that the conductor had recovered and that he expected to leave Germany September 25 for this country.

From N. Y. EVG. STAATSZEIT
Address
Date

Kommt Muck oder nicht?

Eine Kabeldepesche aus Berlin besagt: „Dr. Carl Muck, der Dirigent der königlichen Oper, der in Tobelbad, in der Nähe von Graz, seine Ferien zubringt, leidet schwer an einer Entzündung der Lungen und mußte sich einer Operation unterziehen. Es ist sehr zweifelhaft, ob er im Stande sein wird, seinem Vertrag gemäß das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester zu dirigiren." Und am selben Tage wird in Boston berichtet: „Vertreter des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters empfingen heute ein Kabel von Dr. Carl Muck, demzufolge derselbe völlig wiederhergestellt ist und am 25. September seine Reise nach Amerika antreten wird." Hoffentlich hat die letzte Meldung recht.

From GROSS N. Y. ZEIT
Address
Date SEP 13 1906

Dr. Muck erkrankt.

Wird vielleicht nicht nach Boston gehen können.

Operation war nothwendig.

Leidet an Kehlkopf-Entzündung. — Die amerikanischen Offiziere abermals vom Kaiser ausgezeichnet. — Verschiedenes.

Berlin, 12. September. Dr. Carl Muck, Orchesterdirigent an der hiesigen Königlichen Oper, der sich zur Zeit in dem Badeort Tobelbad nicht weit von Graz, Steiermark, aufhält, ist an Laryngitis (Kehlkopfentzündung) schwer erkrankt und war gezwungen, sich einer Operation zu unterziehen. Es ist zweifelhaft, ob er in der Lage sein wird, sein Engagement als Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters anzutreten.

From N. Y. EVG SUN
Address
Date SEP 13 1906

DR. MUCK ILL.

May Not Be Able to Conduct Boston Symphony Concerts.

BERLIN, Sept. 13.—It is reported that Dr. Muck, conductor of the Royal Opera, Berlin, is suffering from an affection of the throat of such a serious nature as is likely to prevent him from fulfilling his engagement to conduct the Symphony concerts in Boston. His malady is attributed to excessive indulgence in cigarettes.

The illness of Dr. Muck is denied in Boston. The manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra says that Dr. Muck has cabled him that he is in good health and will sail for America on Sept. 25.

From CITIZEN
Address [illegible], N. Y.
Date SEP 13 1906

DR. CARL MUCK ILL.

Berlin Royal Opera Conductor May Not Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Word has been received from Berlin that Dr. Carl Muck, conductor of the Royal Opera, who has been spending his holidays at Tobelbad, near Gratz, Austria-Hungary, is seriously ill of laryngitis and has been obliged to submit to an operation. It is doubtful if he will be able to fulfil his engagement to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date SEP 13 1906

DR. KARL MUCK NOT ILL.

Boston Symphony Managers Have No Word of an Operation on Conductor.

BOSTON, Sept. 6.—The management of the Symphony Orchestra here has received no word from Dr. Karl Muck as to any operation or any illness.

As is known, he will sail for America September 24 to enter upon his work here according to the arrangements made earlier.

It is natural to suppose that if sickness or other circumstances had modified his plans he would at once notify the orchestra management. No reply has been received to letters of inquiry sent to Berlin.

Establish[illegible] 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Herr Muck erkrankt.

W. E. Walter vom Bostoner Symphonie Orchester erklärt, er habe nichts davon gehört, daß Karl Muck, der berühmte Musiker, der die Leitung des Orchesters übernehmen soll, erkrankt sei. Herr Muck, der wenigstens eine Saison in Boston weilen soll, hat sich angeblich einer Operation unterziehen müssen.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

DR. MUCK AND THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The opening pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, under the leadership of Dr. Muck, are scheduled to take place an Thursday and Saturday, 8 and 10 November. During the coming season this orchestra will give in New York, altogether, ten concerts, of which the final pair will occur 21 and 23 March.

Dr. Muck, who sails for this country 25 September, has divided his time this summer between Bayreuth, where he directed four performances of Parsifal, and Salzburg, where he was one of the conductors at the Mozart festival. During Dr. Muck's absence in America his position as leader of the Berlin Opera will be filled by Leo Blech of Prague.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Dr. Karl Muck Not Sick.

Boston, Sept. 6.—The manager of the symphony orchestra here has received no word from Dr. Karl Muck as to any operation or any illness. So far as is known, he will sail for America on Sept. 24 to enter upon his work here as conductor of the orchestra.

From

Address

Date

It is not generally known that Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was considered for this position thirteen years ago. After the departure of Mr. Nikisch in the spring of 1893 a contract was signed with Hans Richter whereby that distinguished conductor bound himself to come to Boston for five years. At the last moment he begged off, pleading that he did not dare cross the Atlantic, although it is probable that the extra inducements offered him in Vienna were the real cause of his not coming. In the correspondence which followed Richter most urgently recommended for the place young Muck of Berlin, who, he said, was one of the coming men of Germany. On the strength of this, inquiries were made to find out whether Dr. Muck would consider an offer. He was just beginning his third year in Berlin, where he had had great success from the start, and he let it be known that he would not consider any offer from America. Thus it was that the choice fell on Emil Paur, who had succeeded Nikisch as conductor of the Municipal Opera of Leipsic.

Prof. Willy Hess, concert-master of the Boston organization and leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, will bring a new violin concerto to New York next winter. It is by Frederic d'Erlanger, the French composer.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date SEP

DR. KARL MUCK NOT ILL.

Boston Symphony Managers Have No Word of an Operation on Conductor.

BOSTON, Sept. 6.—The management of the Symphony Orchestra here has received no word from Dr. Karl Muck as to any operation or any illness.

So far as is known, he will sail for America on September 24 to enter upon his work here, according to the arrangements made last summer.

It is natural to suppose that if sickness or any other circumstances had modified his plans he would at once notify the orchestra management. No reply has been received to cables of inquiry sent to Berlin.

From

Address

Date

Muck nicht krank.

Boston, 8. September. Ein Kabelgramm, welches heute dem Major Hy. L. Higginson, dem Organisator des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, aus Berlin zugekommen ist, bezeichnet die in einem vor einigen Tagen in einem in New York eingelaufenen Kabelgramm enthaltene Angabe, Dr. Karl Muck, der neue Dirigent des Orchesters, sei krank, als unrichtig. Wie Higginson sagt, weilt Muck ruhig und gesund auf dem Lande und trifft seine Vorbereitungen zur Fahrt nach Amerika.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Dr. Karl Muck Not Ill.

BOSTON, Sept. 8.—A cablegram received from Berlin at the office of Major Henry L. Higginson, the organizer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, states that Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Orchestra, is not ill, as stated in cablegrams received in New York recently. Dr. Muck is resting in the country in preparation for his season in America.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to make another short trip to the Middle West next winter. Owing to the fact that the orchestra has been engaged for the Worcester Festival, which comes in the first week of October this year, the Western trip has been postponed until the end of January. The total number of concerts scheduled for next season is in the neighborhood of 125.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

MUSICAL COMMENT.

The Mozart Festival at Salzburg—Programme of Worcester Festival.

There is a promise of good music at the next festival of the Worcester County (Mass.) Musical Association on October 2, 3, 4 and 5, in Mechanics' Hall, Worcester. The festival chorus will be augmented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the following solo performers, namely: Miss Elizabeth Parkina, Miss Louise Ormsby, Mrs. Margaret C. Rabold, sopranos; Mme. Louise Homer, Mme. Isabelle Bouton and Miss Grace Munson, contraltos; Paul Dufault and Daniel Beddoe, tenors; Emile De Gogorza and Frederick Martin, basses; Mr. Timothée Adamowski and Miss Bessie Bell Collier, violinists, and Mme. Samaroff, pianist. The choral numbers are to be Handel's "Israel in Egypt," on October 3; Verdi's "Requiem" and Brahms's "Song of Destiny," on October 4. These works will be conducted by Wallace Goodrich, of Boston. The orchestral conductor will be Franz Kneisel. The orchestral pieces will be Goldmark's overture "In the Spring," Schumann's symphony in D minor, Schubert's symphony in C (generally known as No. 9), the overture to "Euryanthe," by Weber; a set of symphonic variations by Frederick A. Stock; "Lovely Alda" and "The Saracens," by MacDowell; Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, and "Chanson de Matin," by Elgar. Mr. Adamowski will play Saint-Saëns's violin concerto in B minor on Thursday afternoon, and Miss Collier the same composer's "Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso" on Friday evening. Novelties in the Worcester festival schemes are Brahms's exquisite cantata and the orchestral variations by Mr. Stock, conductor of the Thomas Orchestra, in Chicago. On Friday afternoon Mme. Samaroff will play Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto in D minor.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Boston Symphony's New Leader to Sail Sept. 25.

BOSTON, Sept. 12.—Representatives of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to-night announced that a cable despatch had been received from Dr. Karl Muck, the new leader, saying he had recovered from an illness and that he would sail for this country on September 25.

Genesung gemeldet.

Dr. Muck reist am 25. September nach den Ver. Staaten ab.

Boston, 12. Sept. Charles A. Ellis, Geschäftsführer des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, gab heute Abend bekannt, daß er ein Kabelgramm von Dr. Muck empfangen habe. Dr. Muck kündigt in diesem an, daß er genesen sei und am 25. September von Deutschland nach den Ver. Staaten abzureisen gedenke. (Unser Berliner Spezialkabel meldete am 4. September, daß der gediegene Musiker sich einer Operation habe unterziehen müssen.)

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Dr. Muck kommt.

Hat sich von seiner Erkrankung gut erholt.

Couried 51 Jahre alt.

Viele Glückwünsche aus aller Welt. — Der Opernkrieg. — Neuestes aus der Theaterwelt.

Boston, 13. September. Charles A. Ellis, der Geschäftsführer des Boston Symphony Orchesters, machte gestern Abend bekannt, daß er gerade eine Kabelnachricht von Dr. Karl Muck, dem Leiter des Boston Symphony Orchesters für die nächste Saison, erhalten habe, worin ihm Dr. Muck mittheilt, daß er sich auf dem Wege der Besserung befinde und am 25. September von Deutschland nach Amerika abzureisen gedenke.

Dr. Muck war in dem Badeort Tobelbad bei Gratz, wo er Erholung suchte, an einer Laryngitis erkrankt und mußte sich einer Operation unterziehen. Man hatte befürchtet, daß diese Erkrankung ihm eine Amerikareise, unmöglich machen würde. Dies ist erfreulichenweise nicht

New York Times

Conductor Muck Again Reported Ill.

Special to The New York Times.

BERLIN, Sept. 12.—Dr. Carl Muck, conductor of the Royal Opera, who has been spending his holidays at Tobelbad, near Gratz, Austria-Hungary, is seriously ill of laryngitis and has been obliged to submit to an operation. It is doubtful if he will be able to fulfill his engagement to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, Sept. 12.—Manager Charles A. Ellis of the Boston Symphony Orchestra informed THE NEW YORK TIMES correspondent this evening that he was in receipt of a cable from Dr. Muck, in which the doctor says that he is in good health, and will sail for America on Sept. 25 as arranged. Mr. Ellis is curious to know who circulates these reports of the doctor's illness.

SEP 13

MAY NOT CONDUCT BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Dr. Carl Muck, of the Royal Opera at Berlin, Is Stricken with Laryngitis.

BERLIN, Wednesday.—Dr. Carl Muck, conductor of the Royal Opera, who has been spending his holidays at Tobelbad, near Gratz, Austria-Hungary, is seriously ill of laryngitis and has been obliged to submit to an operation. It is doubtful if he will be able to fulfil his engagement to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Word Is Received in Boston That Dr. Muck Is Recovering.

BOSTON, Mass., Wednesday.—Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stated to-night that he had received a cable message from Dr. Muck announcing that the conductor had recovered and that he expected to leave Germany September 25 for this country.

Kommt Muck oder nicht?

Eine Kabeldepesche aus Berlin besagt: „Dr. Carl Muck, der Dirigent der königlichen Oper, der in Tobelbad, in der Nähe von Graz, seine Ferien zubringt, leidet schwer an einer Entzündung der Larynx und mußte sich einer Operation unterwerfen. Es ist sehr zweifelhaft, ob er im Stande sein wird, seinem Vertrag gemäß das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester zu dirigiren." Und am selben Tage wird in Boston berichtet: „Vertreter des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters empfingen heute ein Kabel von Dr. Carl Muck, demzufolge derselbe völlig wiederhergestellt ist und am 25. September seine Reise nach Amerika antreten wird." Hoffentlich hat die letzte Meldung recht.

Dr. Muck erkrankt.

Wird vielleicht nicht nach Boston gehen können.

Operation war nothwendig.

Leidet an Kehlkopf-Entzündung. — Die amerikanischen Offiziere abermals vom Kaiser ausgezeichnet. — Verschiedenes.

Berlin, 12. September. Dr. Carl Muck, Orchesterdirigent an der hiesigen Königlichen Oper, der sich zur Zeit in dem Badeort Tobelbad nicht weit von Graz, Steiermark, aufhält, ist an Laryngitis (Kehlkopfentzündung) schwer erkrankt und war gezwungen, sich einer Operation zu unterziehen. Es ist zweifelhaft, ob er in der Lage sein wird, sein Engagement als Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters anzutreten.

DR. MUCK ILL.

May Not Be Able to Conduct Boston Symphony Concerts.

BERLIN, Sept. 13.—It is reported that Dr. Muck, conductor of the Royal Opera, Berlin, is suffering from an affection of the throat of such a serious nature as is likely to prevent him from fulfilling his engagement to conduct the Symphony concerts in Boston. His malady is attributed to excessive indulgence in cigarettes.

The illness of Dr. Muck is denied in Boston. The manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra says that Dr. Muck has cabled him that he is in good health and will sail for America on Sept. 25.

SEP 1906

DR. CARL MUCK ILL.

Berlin Royal Opera Conductor May Not Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Word has been received from Berlin that Dr. Carl Muck, conductor of the Royal Opera, who has been spending his holidays at Tobelbad, near Gratz, Austria-Hungary, is seriously ill of laryngitis and has been obliged to submit to an operation. It is doubtful if he will be able to fulfil his engagement to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[3]

...BIBUNE
Dr.
...SEP 16 1906
...ss

The philharmonic concerts of Vienna will this season be conducted by Richard Strauss and Felix Mottl. The employment of visiting conductors at these concerts seems to be an established custom. Dr. Muck's Boston engagement took him out of the list in which he has figured of late.

...NING TELEGRAM
...YORK CITY.
SEP 16 1906

Muck Not Ill.

The last vestige of uncertainty concerning the illness of Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was removed on Tuesday by a cablegram from Dr. Muck himself which was received by Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In it Dr. Muck said that he was quite well and had never had any other idea than to sail on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse from Bremen on Tuesday, Sept. 25. It is unknown how the report of his illness arose in Germany. Immediately after the conclusion of the "Parsifal" performance in Bayreuth Dr. Muck went to a little watering place in Styria, near Graz, and there he will remain until just before he sails for this country.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau
...REVUE.
NEW YORK CITY
...ess
SEP 16 19...

Charles A. Ellis, der Geschäftsführer des Boston Symphony Orchesters, machte bekannt, daß er eine Kabelnachricht von Dr. Karl Muck, dem Leiter des Boston Symphony Orchesters für die nächste Saison, erhalten habe, worin ihm Dr. Muck mittheilt, daß er sich auf dem Wege der Besserung befinde und am 25. September von Deutschland nach Amerika abzureisen gedenke.

Dr. Muck war in dem Badeort Tobelbad bei Graz, wo er Erholung suchte, an einer Laryngitis erkrankt und mußte sich einer Operation unterziehen. Man hatte gefürchtet, daß diese Erkrankung ihm seine Amerikareise unmöglich machen würde. Dies ist erfreulicherweise nicht der Fall.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau
...N. Y. TRIBUNE
...ddress
...ate
SEP 16 1906

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, late conductor of the Boston Orchestra, has taken up a residence permanently in Vienna at VI. Höstlergasse, 5. With his family he spent the summer in Switzerland and at his native place, Schwanberg, in the Tyrol. Concerning the appointment of Dr. Muck, he writes to a friend: "I am greatly rejoiced that after so long a search the question of who should be my successor was so happily solved. Dr. Muck is a capable musician and a fine conductor."

NEW YORK STAATSZEITU...
...ss
SEP 16 1906

Dr. Muck Rekonvaleszent.

Das Befinden des Dirigenten der kgl. Oper, Dr. Karl Muck, hat sich besser gestaltet. Er wurde zweimal erfolgreich operirt. Jetzt ist Dr. Muck Rekonvaleszent. Er wird im Laufe der nächsten Woche von Steiermark nach Berlin zurückkehren, um dann seine Vorbereitungen für die Uebernahme der Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters zu treffen.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau
GLOBE
...ss
SEP 15 1906

The members of the Boston Symphony Quartet since the first of the month have been at the summer home of Prof. Willy Hess in Ogunquit, Me., rehearsing for the coming season. They will remain there until the first of October, when they start on a week's tour in the middle west. As last year, three concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Quartet in Mendelssohn Hall. The dates are: Friday afternoons, Nov. 9, Jan. 11, and March 22. The assisting artists and the works to be performed will be announced later. Prof. Hess, the leader of the quartet, has some interesting novelties which will be performed in New York.

...m NEW YORK SUN
...dress
...te SEP 16 1906

The last vestige of uncertainty concerning the illness of Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was removed on Tuesday by a cablegram from Dr. Muck himself, which was received by C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In it Dr. Muck said that he was quite well and had never had any other idea than to sail on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse from Bremen on Tuesday, September 25. It is unknown how the report of his illness arose in Germany. Immediately after the conclusion of the "Parsifal" performance in Bayreuth Dr. Muck went to a little watering place in Styria near Gratz, and there he will remain until just before he sails for this country.

THE BOSTON HERALD

TUESDAY,
SEPTEMBER 18, 1906.

CAN'T HAVE DR. MUCK.

Vienna Philharmonic Forced to Select Substitute for Boston Conductor.

It has been learned that the conductors of the Vienna Philharmonic concerts for the coming year will be Mottl of Munich and Richard Strauss of Berlin.

This is of particular interest to Boston, because Dr. Muck, before he had decided to come to Boston, had agreed to conduct all of these concerts next winter, and when he asked for his release there was much agitation in musical circles in Vienna. Everything possible was done to dissuade him from coming to America, the argument being that it would be impossible for them to find a man or men who would satisfactorily fill his place. When, however, it was finally decided that he was coming to Boston, Vienna undertook to make the best of it, and finally settled on Mottl and Strauss to act as his substitutes.

This conductorship of the Vienna Philharmonic is the most honorable musical post in all Europe, and that the directors of the orchestra were so keen to have Dr. Muck in preference to all the other conductors of Europe is a handsome tribute to his vlaue.

First Established and Largest Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...EVG. STAATSZEITUNG
SEP 21 1906

Neugierig bin ich nur, ob Dr. Karl Muck, der nun definitiv nächste Woche von drüben abreist, um die Direktion des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters zu übernehmen, auch seine Ansicht über die „Salome" äußern wird. Muck und Strauß sind engere Kollegen in Berlin, was ihn vielleicht an einer Meinungsäußerung verhindert; andererseits hat Dr. Muck noch nie seinem Kollegen Strauß den Rang als Komponisten streitig gemacht, wohingegen Strauß als Dirigent mit seinem Kollegen Muck niemals in engere Konkurrenz treten konnte. Leute, die den Dr. Muck von drüben kennen, sind der festen Ueberzeugung, daß seiner hier ein gewaltiger Erfolg harrt. Felix Mottl, dem ebenfalls ein bedeutender Ruf voraus ging, hat hier nie den Erfolg erzielt, den man erwartete, und der Grund dieses Versagens ist nicht recht aufgeklärt worden; erst seine letzte Leistung, die er mit „Tristan und Isolde" schuf, brachte den Triumph, den er die ganze Saison hindurch schuldig geblieben. Mit Dr. Muck dürften die Erfahrungen ganz anderer Natur sein, er hat jedenfalls von Anfang an den guten Willen und die begeisterte Unterstützung seiner Muster für sich. Einer der hervorragendsten Symphoniker schreibt: „Wir sind alle froh, daß wir wieder einen deutschen Kapellmeister bekommen. Dr. Karl Muck soll ja ein sehr gebildeter Mann sein; Doktor der Philosophie, das ist ein gutes Zeichen. Ein feingebildeter Geist ist immer gerecht und unparteiisch, was bei uns sehr in's Gewicht fällt. Es sind bei uns viele Speichellecker, so daß ein Kapellmeister wirklich einen festen Charakter haben muß, um unparteiisch zu bleiben!"

Von einflußreicher Seite wird man versuchen den Herrn Dr. Muck zu einem einmaligen Gastspiel in unserer Oper zu bewegen; man hofft, daß er irgend eine Wagner-Oper dirigen wird. Es soll dieses Gastspiel nicht dazu dienen, die großen Verdienste unseres ersten Kapellmeisters Alfred Hertz zu verkleinern, sondern man geht von der Ansicht aus, daß man Herrn Dr. Muck ehrt und uns einen speziellen Genuß bereitet, wenn man diesem Meister Gelegenheit giebt in einer Vorstellung sich als Opernleiter zu zeigen. Es würde sicherlich ein interessanter Abend werden und das Deutschthum würde den hervorragenden Gast in gebührender Weise feiern können. H. M. H.

From
N. Y. EVG. TELEG...
Address

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will sail from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse on next Tuesday, September 25, and is due to reach New York on the Tuesday following, October 2. He will go directly to Boston, where he will have the rest of the week in which to get used to his new surroundings.

...mplete the World
COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
GLOBE
SEP 21 1906

DR. KARL MUCK, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who sails from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse next Tuesday, has already sent over his programme for the first public rehearsal and concert of the orchestra in Boston on Oct. 12 and 13. Dr. Muck has chosen for his first appearance Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," "Faust Overture," and prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The preponderance of Wagner in this list recalls a remark recently attributed to Dr. Muck, whose experience as a conductor has been almost wholly in opera houses, that the concert possibilities of excerpts from Wagner's operas have by no means been exhausted. Although only one of the three Wagner numbers on Dr. Muck's first programme is from an opera, it may be that before long he will follow the illustrious example of Henry Wood of London, who once wrenched from its context a portion of the dialogue between Isolde and Brangäne in the first act of "Tristan" and included it in a concert programme. This attitude toward the Wagner operas seems quite unnecessary now, when their music is familiar to the public the world over, and most of them are continually presented at all important opera houses. The majority of musicians, indeed, favor drawing on them less and less for concert purposes.

THE Boston Symphony Quartet is to make its first trip to the west next week. It will give concerts in Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, and several other cities, returning to Boston in time for the first rehearsal of the orchestra, which is called for Monday, Oct. 8. Despite the early season there has been a considerable demand for the quartet, and had its duties with the orchestra allowed it, it would have been as easy for it to make a trip of three weeks as of one.

...m
NEW YORK EVG. POST
...ress
...te SEP 22 1906

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will sail for this country on Tuesday and on his arrival will go direct to Boston to begin rehearsals for the first concerts on October 12 and 13. The programme for the opening of the season will be Beethoven's C minor symphony, and Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," "A Faust Overture," and the prelude to "The Meistersinger."

...n
...ress
...e SEP 22 1906

The members of the Boston Symphony Quartet are spending September in Ogunquit, Me., busily rehearsing for the short tour which they will make in the first week of October. Ogunquit is the summer home of Prof. Willy Hess, the leader of the quartet, and Messrs. Roth, Ferir and Warnke, the other members of the quartet, returned from Europe the end of August in order to put in a month of solid rehearsals before the season began.

Everett Republican
Sept. 22, 1906.

Symphony Orchestra Season Sales

The time is near at hand for the annual auction sale of seats for the Symphony concerts in Symphony hall, Boston. This is of utmost importance to residents of the section surrounding Boston, for it is estimated that not less than 60 per cent of the subscribers for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals come from the towns in the neighborhood of the city. The dates of the sales are Monday and Tuesday, October 1st and 2d, when the seats for the public rehearsals will be sold, beginning at 10 o'clock in the morning, and Thursday and Friday, October 4th and 5th, when the seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold. The coming season should be the most brilliant in the history of the Orchestra. In the list of soloists for the coming year are the names of such artists as Melba, Fremstad, Paderewski, Rosenthal, Gabrilowitsch, Cesar Thomson, Petschnikoff, to say nothing of representative men from the Orchestra like Hess, Adamowski, and Warnke and other musicians of only less brilliancy.

...om
...Brooklyn, N. Y
...dress
...to SEP 22 1906

It appears that there is absolutely no foundation in the various reports published in this country concerning the illness of Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Word has been received directly from Dr. Muck saying that he is quite well and expects to sail as originally planned, on September 25, from Bremen. Dr. Muck, after the end of the Wagner festival in Bayreuth, where he was the conductor of the "Parsifal" performances, decided to do no more work this summer, and went to a little watering place in Styria, in order to get complete rest before sailing. To this fact, probably, is due the report that he was dangerously ill, for no other explanation of it can be found. Dr. Muck is due to reach New York on October 2, and immediately he will begin his rehearsing for the coming season.

...aper Cutting Bureau in the World
...N. Y.
SEP 22 1906

PLANS FOR WINTER SEASON OF MUSIC, WELL ARRANGED

Dr. Muck Expected for Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HE WILL ARRIVE ON OCTOBER 2.

Saint Saens to Make His First American Appearance With New York Orchestra.

Brooklyn's offering of music under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, as outlined earlier in the week, repeats the symphony engagements and concerts from time to time by world-famous artists more or less familiar to concert-goers.

Word has been received directly from Dr. Karl Muck saying that he is quite well and expects to sail, as originally planned, on September 25 from Bremen. Dr. Muck, after the end of the Wagner festival in Bayreuth, where he was the conductor of the "Parsifal" performances, decided to do no more work this summer, and went to a little watering place in Syria in order to get complete rest before sailing. To this fact probably is due the report that he was dangerously ill, for no other explanation of it can be found. Dr. Muck is due to reach New York on October 2 and immediately he will begin his rehearsing for the coming season.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, who is to be solo pianist at the Worcester festival in the first week of October, will play there at the Friday afternoon artists' concert. The work chosen will be Rubinstein's great concerto No. 3 in D minor. Mme. Samaroff will be the only pianist at this festival, and that she was chosen is a very considerable honor for one who has been before the public less than two years.

Mme. Melba, who is coming to this country in January to be the prima donna of the Hammerstein Grand Opera Company, in New York, has been spending the summer very quietly at her country place a few miles out of London. She is busy preparing for the marriage of her son, Mr. George Armstrong, which is to occur in the early autumn, his engagement having recently been announced to one of the belles of the past season in London.

Mme. Melba, in addition to her engagement with the Hammerstein company, is to sing several times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will give a limited number of concerts as far west as Chicago.

The members of the Boston Symphony Quartet are spending September in Ogunquit, Me., busily rehearsing for the short tour which they will make in the first week of October.

[4]

The philharmonic concerts of Vienna will this season be conducted by Richard Strauss and Felix Mottl. The employment of visiting conductors at these concerts seems to be an established custom. Dr. Muck's Boston engagement took him out of the list in which he has figured of late.

Muck Not Ill.

The last vestige of uncertainty concerning the illness of Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was removed on Tuesday by a cablegram from Dr. Muck himself which was received by Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In it Dr. Muck said that he was quite well and had never had any other idea than to sail on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse from Bremen on Tuesday, Sept. 25. It is unknown how the report of his illness arose in Germany. Immediately after the conclusion of the "Parsifal" performance in Bayreuth Dr. Muck went to a little watering place in Styria, near Graz, and there he will remain until just before he sails for this country.

Charles A. Ellis, der Geschäftsführer des Boston Symphony Orchesters, machte bekannt, daß er eine Kabelnachricht von Dr. Karl Muck, dem Leiter des Boston Symphony Orchesters für die nächste Saison, erhalten habe, worin ihm Dr. Muck mittheilt, daß er sich auf dem Wege der Besserung befinde und am 25. September von Deutschland nach Amerika abzureisen gedenke.

Dr. Muck war in dem Badeort Tobelbad bei Graz, wo er Erholung suchte, an einer Laryngitis erkrankt und mußte sich einer Operation unterziehen. Man hatte gefürchtet, daß diese Erkrankung ihm seine Amerikareise unmöglich machen würde. Dies ist glücklicherweise nicht der Fall.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, late conductor of the Boston Orchestra, has taken up a residence permanently in Vienna at VI Höstlergasse, 5. With his family he spent the summer in Switzerland and at his native place, Schwanberg, in the Tyrol. Concerning the appointment of Dr. Muck, he writes to a friend: "I am greatly rejoiced that after so long a search the question of who should be my successor was so happily solved. Dr. Muck is a capable musician and a fine conductor."

NEW YORK STAATSZEITG.

Dr. Muck Rekonvaleszent.

Das Befinden des Dirigenten der kgl. Oper, Dr. Karl Muck, hat sich besser gestaltet. Er wurde zweimal erfolgreich operirt. Jetzt ist Dr. Muck Rekonvaleszent. Er wird im Laufe der nächsten Woche von Steiermark nach Berlin zurückkehren, um dann seine Vorbereitungen für die Uebernahme der Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters zu treffen.

The members of the Boston Symphony Quartet since the first of the month have been at the summer home of Prof. Willy Hess in Ogunquit, Me., rehearsing for the coming season. They will remain there until the first of October, when they start for a week's tour in the middle west. As last year, three concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Quartet in Mendelssohn Hall. The dates are: Friday afternoons, Nov. 9, Jan. 11, and March 22. The assisting artists and the works to be performed will be announced later. Prof. Hess, the leader of the quartet, has some interesting novelties which will be performed in New York.

The last vestige of uncertainty concerning the illness of Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was removed on Tuesday by a cablegram from Dr. Muck himself, which was received by C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In it Dr. Muck said that he was quite well and had never had any other idea than to sail on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse from Bremen on Tuesday, September 25. It is unknown how the report of his illness arose in Germany. Immediately after the conclusion of the "Parsifal" performance in Bayreuth Dr. Muck went to a little watering place in Styria near Gratz, and there he will remain until just before he sails for this country.

THE BOSTON HERALD

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1906.

CAN'T HAVE DR. MUCK.

Vienna Philharmonic Forced to Select Substitute for Boston Conductor.

It has been learned that the conductors of the Vienna Philharmonic concerts for the coming year will be Mottl of Munich and Richard Strauss of Berlin.

This is of particular interest to Boston, because Dr. Muck, before he had decided to come to Boston, had agreed to conduct all of these concerts next winter, and when he asked for his release there was much agitation in musical circles in Vienna. Everything possible was done to dissuade him from coming to America, the argument being that it would be impossible for them to find a man or men who would satisfactorily fill his place. When, however, it was finally decided that he was coming to Boston, Vienna undertook to make the best of it, and finally settled on Mottl and Strauss to act as his substitutes.

This conductorship of the Vienna Philharmonic is the most honorable musical post in all Europe, and that the directors of the orchestra were so keen to have Dr. Muck in preference to all the other conductors of Europe is a handsome tribute to his value.

First Established and Most Complete ... Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

Neugierig bin ich nur, ob Dr. Karl Muck, der nun definitiv nächste Woche von drüben abreist, um die Direktion des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters zu übernehmen, auch seine Ansicht über die „Salome" äußern wird. Muck und Strauß sind engere Kollegen in Berlin, was ihn vielleicht an einer Meinungsäußerung verhindert; andererseits hat Dr. Muck noch nie seinem Kollegen Strauß den Rang als Komponisten streitig gemacht, wohingegen Strauß als Dirigent mit seinem Kollegen Muck niemals in engere Konkurrenz treten konnte. Leute, die den Dr. Muck von drüben kennen, sind der festen Ueberzeugung, daß seiner hier ein gewaltiger Erfolg harrt. Felix Mottl, dem ebenfalls ein bedeutender Ruf voraus ging, hat hier nie den Erfolg erzielt, den man erwartete, und der Grund dieses Versagens ist nicht recht aufgeklärt worden; erst seine letzte Leistung, die er mit „Tristan und Isolde" schuf, brachte den Triumph, den er die ganze Saison hindurch schuldig geblieben. Mit Dr. Muck dürften die Erfahrungen ganz anderer Natur sein, er hat jedenfalls von Anfang an den guten Willen und die begeisterte Unterstützung seiner Musiker für sich. Einer der hervorragendsten Symphoniker schreibt: „Wir sind alle froh, daß wir wieder einen deutschen Kapellmeister bekommen. Dr. Karl Muck soll ja ein sehr gebildeter Mann sein; Doktor der Philosophie, das ist ein gutes Zeichen. Ein feingebildeter Geist ist immer gerecht und unparteiisch, was bei uns sehr in's Gewicht fällt. Es sind bei uns viele Speichellecker, so daß ein Kapellmeister wirklich einen festen Charakter haben muß, um unparteiisch zu bleiben!"

Von einflußreicher Seite wird man versuchen, den Herrn Dr. Muck zu einem einmaligen Gastspiel in unserer Oper zu bewegen; man hofft, daß er irgend eine Wagner-Oper dirigen wird. Es soll dieses Gastspiel nicht dazu dienen, die großen Verdienste unseres ersten Kapellmeisters Alfred Hertz zu verkleinern, sondern man geht von der Ansicht aus, daß man Herrn Dr. Muck ehrt und uns einen speziellen Genuß bereitet, wenn man diesem Meister Gelegenheit giebt in einer Vorstellung sich als Opernleiter zu zeigen. Es würde sicherlich ein interessanter Abend werden und das Deutschthum würde den hervorragenden Gast in gebührender Weise feiern können.

H. R. H.

From

Address

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will sail from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse on next Tuesday, September 25, and is due to reach New York on the Tuesday following, October 2. He will go directly to Boston, where he will have the rest of the week in which to get used to his new surroundings.

...plete ... the World

GLOBE

SEP 21 1906

DR. KARL MUCK, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who sails from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse next Tuesday, has already sent over his programme for the first public rehearsal and concert of the orchestra in Boston on Oct. 12 and 13. Dr. Muck has chosen for his first appearance Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," "Faust Overture," and prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The preponderance of Wagner in this list recalls a remark recently attributed to Dr. Muck, whose experience as a conductor has been almost wholly in opera houses, that the concert possibilities of excerpts from Wagner's operas have by no means been exhausted. Although only one of the three Wagner numbers on Dr. Muck's first programme is from an opera, it may be that before long he will follow the illustrious example of Henry Wood of London, who once wrenched from its context a portion of the dialogue between Isolde and Brangäne in the first act of "Tristan" and included it in a concert programme. This attitude toward the Wagner operas seems quite unnecessary now, when their music is familiar to the public the world over, and most of them are continually presented at all important opera houses. The majority of musicians, indeed, favor drawing on them less and less for concert purposes.

THE Boston Symphony Quartet is to make its first trip to the west next week. It will give concerts in Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, and several other cities, returning to Boston in time for the first rehearsal of the orchestra, which is called for Monday, Oct. 8. Despite the early season there has been a considerable demand for the quartet, and had its duties with the orchestra allowed it, it would have been as easy for it to make a trip of three weeks as of one.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will sail for this country on Tuesday and on his arrival will go direct to Boston to begin rehearsals for the first concerts on October 12 and 13. The programme for the opening of the season will be Beethoven's C minor symphony, and Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," "A Faust Overture," and the prelude to "The Meistersinger."

SEP 22 1906

The members of the Boston Symphony Quartet are spending September in Ogunquit, Me., busily rehearsing for the short tour which they will make in the first week of October. Ogunquit is the summer home of Prof. Willy Hess, the leader of the quartet, and Messrs. Roth, Ferir and Warnke, the other members of the quartet, returned from Europe the end of August in order to put in a month of solid rehearsals before the season began.

Everett Republican

Sept. 22, 1906.

Symphony Orchestra Season Sales

The time is near at hand for the annual auction sale of seats for the Symphony concerts in Symphony hall, Boston. This is of utmost importance to residents of the section surrounding Boston, for it is estimated that not less than 60 per cent of the subscribers for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals come from the towns in the neighborhood of the city. The dates of the sales are Monday and Tuesday, October 1st and 2d, when the seats for the public rehearsals will be sold, beginning at 10 o'clock in the morning, and Thursday and Friday, October 4th and 5th, when the seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold. The coming season should be the most brilliant in the history of the Orchestra. In the list of soloists for the coming year are the names of such artists as Melba, Fremstad, Paderewski, Rosenthal, Gabrilowitsch, Cesar Thomson, Petachnikoff, to say nothing of representative men from the Orchestra like Hess, Adamowski, and Warnke and other musicians of only less brilliancy.

om

dress

te

It appears that there is absolutely no foundation in the various reports published in this country concerning the illness of Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Word has been received directly from Dr. Muck saying that he is quite well and expects to sail as originally planned, on September 25, from Bremen. Dr. Muck, after the end of the Wagner festival in Bayreuth, where he was the conductor of the "Parsifal" performances, decided to do no more work this summer, and went to a little watering place in Styria, in order to get complete rest before sailing. To this fact, probably, is due the report that he was dangerously ill, for no other explanation of it can be found. Dr. Muck is due to reach New York on October 2, and immediately he will begin his rehearsing for the coming season.

aper Cutting Bureau in the World

PLANS FOR WINTER SEASON OF MUSIC WELL ARRANGED

Dr. Muck Expected for Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HE WILL ARRIVE ON OCTOBER 2.

Saint Saens to Make His First American Appearance With New York Orchestra.

Brooklyn's offering of music under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, as outlined earlier in the week, repeats the symphony engagements and concerts from time to time by world-famous artists more or less familiar to concert-goers.

Word has been received directly from Dr. Karl Muck saying that he is quite well and expects to sail, as originally planned, on September 25 from Bremen. Dr. Muck, after the end of the Wagner festival in Bayreuth, where he was the conductor of the "Parsifal" performances, decided to do no more work this summer, and went to a little watering place in Syria in order to get complete rest before sailing. To this fact probably is due the report that he was dangerously ill, for no other explanation of it can be found. Dr. Muck is due to reach New York on October 2 and immediately he will begin his rehearsing for the coming season.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, who is to be solo pianist at the Worcester festival in the first week of October, will play there at the Friday afternoon artists' concert. The work chosen will be Rubinstein's great concerto No. 3 in D minor. Mme. Samaroff will be the only pianist at this festival, and that she was chosen is a very considerable honor for one who has been before the public less than two years.

Mme. Melba, who is coming to this country in January to be the prima donna of the Hammerstein Grand Opera Company, in New York, has been spending the summer very quietly at her country place a few miles out of London. She is busy preparing for the marriage of her son, Mr. George Armstrong, which is to occur in the early autumn, his engagement having recently been announced to one of the belles of the past season in London.

Mme. Melba, in addition to her engagement with the Hammerstein company, is to sing several times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will give a limited number of concerts as far west as Chicago.

The members of the Boston Symphony Quartet are spending September in Ogunquit, Me., busily rehearsing for the short tour which they will make in the first week of October. Ogunquit is the summer home of Prof. Willy Hess, the leader of the quartet, and Messrs. Roth, Ferir

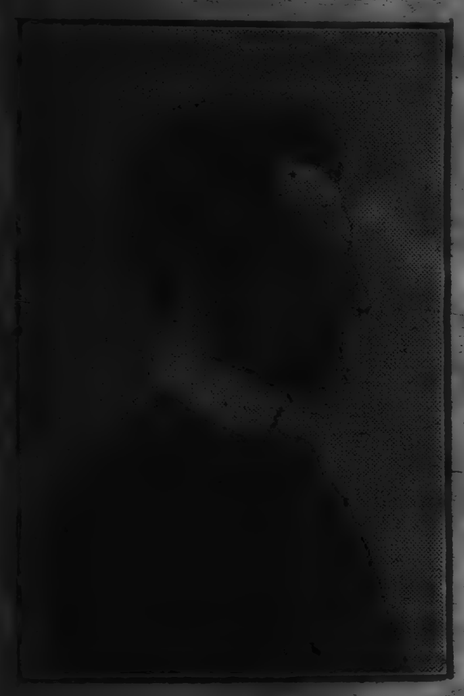
[4]

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

MERCIAL
NEW YORK CITY.
SER 22 1906

...s an important factor in the mu-...l of this country, the Boston ... Orchestra promises to be still ...daring the coming season. Dr. ...ck of Berlin has received a leave ...e from the German emperor to ... this country for one year for the ... directing the orchestra. Dr. ... one of the great conductors of ... and his coming to America has ex... an uncommon amount of interest in ... circles.

...to be the fifth conductor that the ... has had. The first one was ... Henschel, for three years; the sec... Wilhelm Gericke, for five years; the ... Arthur Nikisch, for four years; the ... Emil Paul, for five years. Mr. Ge... turned in the fall of 1898 and re... until last spring, when he retired. ... Charles A. Ellis, the manager of the or... has mapped out a busy season for ... coming year. Last season a total of ... concerts were given and in 1906-1907 this total will at least be equaled. Bos... will get its usual 24 public rehearsals ... 24 concerts. Ten concerts will be ... in New York, the dates being Thurs... evenings, Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Dec. ... Jan. 12, Feb. 23 and March 23, and ... concerts will be given in Brooklyn,



DR. KARL MUCK.

...Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, ...pectively.

The week of Jan. 27 will be spent on a ... western tour, when concerts will be ... in Rochester, Cleveland, Chicago, De... Indianapolis and Cincinnati.

A strong list of soloists has been pre... Paderewski comes to America in ... to play seven times with the or... these being his only appearances ... America during the season. Rosenthal ... Gabrilowitsch are other pianists ... among the violinists who will play ... the orchestra are Petschnikoff and ... Cesar Thomson. Among the singers is Melba, who will have a few concert appearances in addition to her work with the Hammerstein Grand Opera Company.

It is impossible at this date to give a list of novelties which will be played as Dr. Muck has not fully decided on them, but it may be taken for granted that the orchestra will be well in the front in the production of interesting works by new composers.

The coming season is looked forward to as being the most successful in the history of the organization. In Boston, all signs indicate a large increase in premiums paid for seats. A large increase in subscriptions is looked for in New York where the orchestra will give it usual double series of concerts.

Dr. Muck has had a career of well-earned success extending over 25 years. He is 47 years old, and was born at Darmstadt in 1859. Like many other musicians who have won fame, he was at first intended for a professional career; so he studied at the University of Heidelberg for the degree in philosophy. After a year he transferred his activity to the University of Leipsic, but something more than the university attracted him to the Saxon city, for besides his university studies he began work also at the Leipsic Conservatory, and soon after received the degree of Ph. D. from Heidelberg.

Later he made a public appearance in Leipsic as a pianist, in the Gewandhaus. It was a successful appearance; but instead of devoting himself to the piano, he turned conductor. Beginning with minor posts in small municipal opera houses—Zurich, Salzburg and Gratz—he finally won an important position in the opera of Prague, where he was conductor for six years, from 1886 to 1892. One of his engagements at this period was as conductor for Angelo Neumann's traveling opera company,—a post in which Anton Seidl was a predecessor.

His first appearance in Berlin was at the Lessing Theatre as visiting conductor. In 1892 he was engaged as conductor at the Royal Opera in Berlin, and has been there ever since. He has, however, frequently appeared as conductor of orchestral concerts in most of the musical capitals of Europe. One of his most important engagements of this kind was in Vienna, where he conducted the Vienna Philharmonic after that organization, having lost Hans Richter, took up the plan of having visiting conductors appear in rotation, in the manner of the New York Philharmonic.

Dr. Muck will make his first appearance in Boston at the initial concert of the 26th symphony season in October.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
SATURDAY MORNING.
SEPTEMBER 22, 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

On Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, the Symphony Orchestra, will give its first public rehearsal of the year. It will mark the beginning of the second quarter century of the orchestra, and it will be counted as the 2400th concert. The orchestra is in a higher state of discipline and efficiency than it has ever been before, but it will have as conductor Mr. Karl Muck, who is one of the most distinguished musicians of the world.

The prospectus for the season of 1906-1907 necessarily shows much that is familiar, but there are two or three innovations which will strike the eye immediately. The first is, of course, the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. The second is the absence of the orchestra from Boston six weeks during the winter, instead of the usual five and the third—more apparent than real—is the increase in the up-set prices of seats for the public rehearsals and for the concerts.

This increase was made only after long and careful consideration. Its object is to shorten and simplify the auction sales. Investigation has shown that in the last several years none of the $7.50 seats has brought a premium of less than $2.50, and that only an insignificant number of the $12 seats has brought a premium of less than $6.

For this reason the management has decided to raise the prices of the $7.50 seats to $10 and the price of the $12 seats to $18. It is needless to say that these prices are still nominal in every sense of the word. By this means, starting at a higher figure, the time of the long and tedious auction sale should be materially lessened.

The auction sales will begin a week from next Monday, Oct. 1, at 10 a.m., for the sale of the $18 seats for the public rehearsal. On Tuesday the $10 seats for the public rehearsal will be sold. On Thursday the $18 seats for the concerts and on Friday the $10 seats for the concerts, all sales beginning precisely at 10 o'clock in the morning.

NEW YORK SUN
SEP 23 1906

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will sail from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse on next Tuesday, September 25, and is due to reach New York on the Tuesday following, October 2. He will go direct to Boston, where he will have the remainder of the week in which to get used to his new surroundings. The first public rehearsal and concert in Boston will take place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 12 and 13 respectively. Dr. Muck's first Boston programme will be Beethoven's "O Minor Symphony," Wagner's "A Faust Overture," "Siegfried Idyll" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers."

NEW YORK HERALD
SEP 23 1906

Professor Wiley Hess, leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, announces three concerts by his chamber music organization, in Mendelssohn Hall. The dates are Friday afternoons November 9, January 11 and March 22.

NEW YORK CITY
SEP 23 1906

Uebermorgen verläßt Dr. Karl Muck, der neue Herr des Boston Symphony Orchesters, Europa. Für das erste Concert in Boston hat er folgende Werke angesetzt: Beethoven's 5. Symphonie, ferner „Siegfrieds Idyll", „Eine Faust Ouverture" und das Meistersinger-Vorspiel von Richard Wagner.

Prof. Willy Hess, concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, will introduce a new concerto for violin this season. It is by Frederic d'Erlanger, the distinguished French composer. It has been played with great success in Paris and Berlin, but is yet to have its first performance in America.

BOSTON EVENING
RECORD, SATURDAY,
SEPTEMBER 22, 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

On Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, the Symphony Orchestra, will give its first public rehearsal of the year. It will mark the beginning of the second quarter century of the orchestra, and it will be counted as the 2400th concert. The orchestra is in a higher state of discipline and efficiency than it has ever been before, but it will have as conductor Mr. Karl Muck, who is one of the most distinguished musicians of the world.

The prospectus for the season of 1906-1907 necessarily shows much that is familiar, but there are two or three innovations which will strike the eye immediately. The first is, of course, the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. The second is the absence of the orchestra from Boston six weeks during the winter, instead of the usual five and the third—more apparent than real—is the increase in the up-set prices of seats for the public rehearsals and for the concerts.

This increase was made only after long and careful consideration. Its object is to shorten and simplify the auction sales. Investigation has shown that in the last several years none of the $7.50 seats has brought a premium of less than $2.50, and that only an insignificant number of the $12 seats has brought a premium of less than $6.

For this reason the management has decided to raise the prices of the $7.50 seats to $10 and the price of the $12 seats to $18. It is needless to say that these prices are still nominal in every sense of the word. By this means, starting at a higher figure, the time of the long and tedious auction sale should be materially lessened.

The auction sales will begin a week from next Monday, Oct. 1, at 10 a.m., for the sale of the $18 seats for the public rehearsal. On Tuesday the $10 seats for the public rehearsal will be sold. On Thursday the $18 seats for the concerts and on Friday the $10 seats for the concerts, all sales beginning precisely at 10 o'clock in the morning.

DR. KARL MUCK.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
SEP 23 1906

—There is no foundation for reports of the illness of Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Word has been received from him that he is quite well, and that he expects to sail

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
RECORD
PHILADELPHIA,
SEP 23 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Paderewski Will Be Heard Here on January 7.

Dr. Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will sail from Bremen next Tuesday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse and is due to arrive in New York on the following Tuesday, October 2. He will go directly to Boston, where he will have the remainder of the week in which to get used to his new surroundings, the first rehearsal of the orchestra having been called for Monday, October 8.

The dates for the five concerts in Philadelphia are as follows: Monday evenings, November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18, and March 18. At the concert of January 7 the soloist will be Paderewski, and this will be his only appearance in Philadelphia this season. At the December concert the soloist will be Rosenthal.

The First Established and Most Complet
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wor
PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILA, PA.

Despite alarming reports which have been in circulation regarding Doctor Muck's illness, the official statement comes from Boston that the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will sail from Bremen next Tuesday, and is due to arrive in America on October 2. He will go direct to Boston, and commence rehearsals with the orchestra on Monday, October 8. The dates of the five concerts to be given in Philadelphia by the Boston Orchestra are the Monday evenings of November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18. The appearance of Paderewski with the orchestra at the concert in January will be the only time this artist will play in Philadelphia this year. Rosenthal will be the soloist at the December concert. The orchestra will undertake this season, in addition to many concerts in ... extensive Western tour.

NEW YORK SUN
SEP 23 1906

The Boston Symphony Quartet is to make its first trip to the West next week. It will give concerts in Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit and several other cities, returning to Boston in time for the first rehearsal of the orchestra, which is called for Monday, October 8. Despite the early season, there has been a very considerable demand for the quartet, and it would have been as easy for them to have taken a three weeks trip as one, had their duties with the orchestra allowed it.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

The dates of the Boston symphony concerts in Washington next winter are as follows: Tuesday afternoons, November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 19, the concerts beginning, as last year, at 4:30. The principal star of the soloists will be Paderewski, who will play at the January concert. This will be absolutely his only appearance in Washington this year.

Dr. Karl Muck, the great German conductor, who is to be at the head of the orchestra this year, will sail from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse next Tuesday morning, September 25, and is due to reach New York the following Tuesday, October 2. He will go directly to Boston, where he will have the remainder of the week in which to get used to his new surroundings, the first rehearsal of the orchestra being called for Monday, October 8. He will be introduced to Boston at the first public rehearsal and concert on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 12 and 13, respectively.

The Boston Symphony Quartet is to give another series of three chamber music concerts in Washington this winter. As last year, they will be given in the ball room of the New Willard Hotel, but in the afternoon instead of the evening, the time being 4 o'clock. The dates of these concerts are Wednesday afternoons, December 5, February 20 and March 20. Detailed announcement regarding these concerts will be made shortly.

[5]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
MERCIAL
NEW YORK CITY.
SEP 22 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Always an important factor in the musical world of this country, the Boston Symphony Orchestra promises to be stil more so during the coming season. Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin has received a leave of absence from the German emperor to come to this country for one year for the purpose of directing the orchestra. Dr. Muck is one of the great conductors of Europe and his coming to America has excited an uncommon amount of interest in musical circles.

He will be the fifth conductor that the orchestra has had. The first one was George Henschel, for three years; the second, Wilhelm Gericke, for five years; the third, Arthur Nikisch, for four years; the fourth, Emil Paul, for five years. Mr. Gericke returned in the fall of 1898 and remained until last spring, when he retired.

Charles A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, has mapped out a busy season for the coming year. Last season a total of 109 concerts were given and in 1906-1907 this total will at least be equalled. Boston will get its usual 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts. Ten concerts will be given in New York, the dates being Thursday evenings, Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 23 and March 23, and five concerts will be given in Brooklyn,

DR. KARL MUCK.

Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, respectively.

The week of Jan. 27 will be spent on a short western tour, when concerts will be given in Rochester, Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, Indianapolis and Cincinnati.

A strong list of soloists has been prepared. Paderewski comes to America in January to play seven times with the orchestra, these being his only appearances in America during the season. Rosenthal Samaroff, Gabrilowitsch are other pianists while among the violinists who will play with the orchestra are Petschnikoff and Cesar Thomson. Among the singers is Melba, who will have a few concert appearances in addition to her work with the Hammerstein Grand Opera Company.

It is impossible at this date to give a list of novelties which will be played as Dr. Muck has not fully decided on them, but it may be taken for granted that the orchestra will be well in the front in the production of interesting works by new composers.

The coming season is looked forward to as being the most successful in the history of the organization. In Boston, all signs indicate a large increase in premiums paid for seats. A large increase in subscriptions is looked for in New York where the orchestra will give it usual double series of concerts.

Dr. Muck has had a career of well-earned success extending over 25 years. He is 47 years old, and was born at Darmstadt in 1859. Like many other musicians who have won fame, he was at first intended for a professional career; so he studied at the University of Heidelberg for the degree in philosophy. After a year he transferred his activity to the University of Leipsic, but something more than the university attracted him to the Saxon city, for besides his university studies he began work also at the Leipsic Conservatory, and soon after received the degree of Ph. D. from Heidelberg.

Later he made a public appearance in Leipsic as a pianist, in the Gewandhaus It was a successful appearance; but instead of devoting himself to the piano, he turned conductor. Beginning with minor posts in small municipal opera houses—Zurich, Salzburg and Gratz—he finally won an important position in the opera of Prague, where he was conductor for six years, from 1886 to 1892. One of his engagements at this period was as conductor for Angelo Neumann's traveling opera company,—a post in which Anton Seidl was a predecessor.

His first appearance in Berlin was at the Lessing Theatre as visiting conductor In 1892 he was engaged as conductor at the Royal Opera in Berlin, and has been there ever since. He has, however, frequently appeared as conductor of orchestral concerts in most of the musical capitals of Europe. One of his most important engagements of this kind was in Vienna, where he conducted the Vienna Philharmonic after that organization, having lost Hans Richter, took up the plan of having visiting conductors appear in rotation, in the manner of the New York Philharmonic.

Dr. Muck will make his first appearance in Boston at the initial concert of the 26th symphony season in October.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON EVENING RECORD, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

On Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, the Symphony Orchestra, will give its first public rehearsal of the year. It will mark the beginning of the second quarter century of the orchestra, and it will be counted as the 2400th concert. The orchestra is in a higher state of discipline and efficiency than it has ever been before, but it will have as conductor Mr. Karl Muck, who is one of the most distinguished musicians of the world.

The prospectus for the season of 1906-1907 necessarily shows much that is familiar, but there are two or three innovations which will strike the eye immediately. The first is, of course, the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. The second is the absence of the orchestra from Boston six weeks during the winter, instead of the usual five and the third—more apparent than real—is the increase in the up-set prices of seats for the public rehearsals and for the concerts.

DR. KARL MUCK.

This increase was made only after long and careful consideration. Its object is to shorten and simplify the auction sales. Investigation has shown that in the last several years none of the $7.50 seats has brought a premium of less than $2.50, and that only an insignificant number of the $12 seats has brought a premium of less than $6.

For this reason the management has decided to raise the prices of the $7.50 seats to $10 and the price of the $12 seats to $18. It is needless to say that these prices are still nominal in every sense of the word. By this means, starting at a higher figure, the time of the long and tedious auction sale should be materially lessened.

The auction sales will begin a week from next Monday, Oct. 1, at 10 a.m., for the sale of the $18 seats for the public rehearsal. On Tuesday the $10 seats for the public rehearsal will be sold. On Thursday the $18 seats for the concerts and on Friday the $10 seats for the concerts, all sales beginning precisely at 10 o'clock in the morning.

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will sail from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse on next Tuesday, September 25, and is due to reach New York on the Tuesday following, October 2. He will go direct to Boston, where he will have the remainder of the week in which to get used to his new surroundings. The first public rehearsal and concert in Boston will take place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 12 and 13 respectively. Dr. Muck's first Boston programme will be Beethoven's "C Minor Symphony," Wagner's "A Faust Overture," "Siegfried Idyll" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers."

Professor Wiley Hess, leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, announces three concerts by his chamber music organization, in Mendelssohn Hall. The dates are Friday afternoons November 9, January 11 and March 22.

Prof. Willy Hess, concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, will introduce a new concerto for violin this season. It is by Frederic d'Erlanger, the distiguished French composer. It has been played with great success in Paris and Berlin, but is yet to have its first performance in America.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER SATURDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 22, 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

On Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, the Symphony Orchestra, will give its first public rehearsal of the year. It will mark the beginning of the second quarter century of the orchestra, and it will be counted as the 2400th concert. The orchestra is in a higher state of discipline and efficiency than it has ever been before, but it will have as conductor Mr. Karl Muck, who is one of the most distinguished musicians of the world.

The prospectus for the season of 1906-1907 necessarily shows much that is familiar, but there are two or three innovations which will strike the eye immediately. The first is, of course, the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. The second is the absence of the orchestra from Boston six weeks during the winter, instead of the usual five and the third—more apparent than real—is the increase in the up-set prices of seats for the public rehearsals and for the concerts.

This increase was made only after long and careful consideration. Its object is to shorten and simplify the auction sales. Investigation has shown that in the last several years none of the $7.50 seats has brought a premium of less than $2.50, and that only an insignificant number of the $12 seats has brought a premium of less than $6.

For this reason the management has decided to raise the prices of the $7.50 seats to $10 and the price of the $12 seats to $18. It is needless to say that these prices are still nominal in every sense of the word. By this means, starting at a higher figure, the time of the long and tedious auction sale should be materially lessened.

The auction sales will begin a week from next Monday, Oct. 1, at 10 a.m., for the sale of the $18 seats for the public rehearsal. On Tuesday the $10 seats for the public rehearsal will be sold. On Thursday the $18 seats for the concerts and on Friday the $10 seats for the concerts, all sales beginning precisely at 10 o'clock in the morning.

—There is no foundation for reports of the illness of Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Word has been received from him that he is quite well, and that he expects to sail

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Paderewski Will Be Heard Here on January 7.

Dr. Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will sail from Bremen next Tuesday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse and is due to arrive in New York on the following Tuesday, October 2. He will go directly to Boston, where he will have the remainder of the week in which to get used to his new surroundings, the first rehearsal of the orchestra having been called for Monday, October 8.

The dates for the five concerts in Philadelphia are as follows: Monday evenings, November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18, and March 18. At the concert of January 7 the soloist will be Paderewski, and this will be his only appearance in Philadelphia this season. At the December concert the soloist will be Rosenthal.

Despite alarming reports which have been in circulation regarding Doctor Muck's illness, the official statement comes from Boston that the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will sail from Bremen next Tuesday, and is due to arrive in America on October 2. He will go direct to Boston, and commence rehearsals with the orchestra on Monday, October 8. The dates of the five concerts to be given in Philadelphia by the Boston Orchestra are the Monday evenings of November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18. The appearance of Paderewski with the orchestra at the concert in January will be the only time this artist will play in Philadelphia this year. Rosenthal will be the soloist at the December concert. The orchestra will undertake this season, in addition to many concerts in

The Boston Symphony Quartet is to make its first trip to the West next week. It will give concerts in Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit and several other cities, returning to Boston in time for the first rehearsal of the orchestra, which is called for Monday, October 8. Despite the early season, there has been a very considerable demand for the quartet, and it would have been as easy for them to have taken a three weeks trip as one, had their duties with the orchestra allowed it.

The dates of the Boston symphony concerts in Washington next winter are as follows: Tuesday afternoons, November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 19, the concerts beginning, as last year, at 4:30. The principal star of the soloists will be Paderewski, who will play at the January concert. This will be absolutely his only appearance in Washington this year.

Dr. Karl Muck, the great German conductor, who is to be at the head of the orchestra this year, will sail from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse next Tuesday morning, September 25, and is due to reach New York the following Tuesday, October 2. He will go directly to Boston, where he will have the remainder of the week in which to get used to his new surroundings, the first rehearsal of the orchestra being called for Monday, October 8. He will be introduced to Boston at the first public rehearsal and concert on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 12 and 13, respectively.

The Boston Symphony Quartet is to give another series of three chamber music concerts in Washington this winter. As last year, they will be given in the ball room of the New Willard Hotel, but in the afternoon instead of the evening, the time being 4 o'clock. The dates of these concerts are Wednesday afternoons, December 5, February 20 and March 20. Detailed announcement regarding these concerts will be made shortly.

[5]

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&D

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

A NEW CONDUCTOR, NEW PRICES AND A NEW SEASON

Dr. Muck as Berlin and Baireuth Know Him—Four Examples of His Programme-Making—The Soloists of the Winter—The Reasons for the New Prices—Changes in Routine

A week from next Monday, the auctions of the seats for the twenty-sixth series of symphony concerts by our orchestra begins at Symphony Hall. The sales continue there through the ensuing Friday. One week from that day comes the first afternoon concert of the new season; the first evening concert follows on the next night. Thereafter, with the exception of the monthly absences of the orchestra from November to March, there will be a pair of Symphony concerts here each week through the first Saturday of next May. For the first time within recent memory there is to be a change in the price of tickets; for the first time the orchestra is to make a Western journey in the full tide of the season; for the first time, owing to unavoidable delays and difficulties, fewer assisting singers and virtuosi are announced in advance. Most important and interesting of all, for the first time in thirteen years a conductor new to Boston and to all America is to take the orchestra, and unlike any of his predecessors when they first came to Boston, he is a conductor of established eminence in Europe. Dr. Muck has been engaged for a single season. He could indeed obtain no longer leave from his regular position of chief conductor at the Royal Opera in Berlin. It is carelessly—or deliberately—insulting to him and to our orchestra to suggest that he is coming "on trial." Conductors of Dr. Muck's standing do not leave Germany for "trial" in America or anywhere else. Orchestras of the prestige of ours do not so invite them to leadership.

ROUTINE CHANGES

As heretofore, the orchestra is to give twenty-four afternoon concerts, still officially called public rehearsals, and twenty-four evening concerts in Boston. The first afternoon concert falls on Friday, Oct. 12, and they continue on each succeeding Friday through May 3, except on Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 1, Feb. 22, March 22 and March 29. On all these dates, except the last given, the orchestra will be absent on a journey to other cities. March 29 happens to be Good Friday; therefore, by one of those delicate distinctions so dear to the managerial mind and so hard for the layman to appreciate, the concert is shifted to the preceding afternoon of Holy Thursday. The evening concerts begin on Saturday, Oct. 14, and continue through May 4, except on Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 2, Feb. 23 and March 23. Presumably the afternoon concerts will begin at 2.30, and the evening at 8, as hitherto, and Dr. Muck is as prompt a man as was Mr. Gericke. Presumably, also, the orchestra will give two concerts, one near the beginning and the other toward the end of the season, for the increase of its pension fund. In other cities, the orchestra is to play each month from November through March, in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, as it has for many years. This season, too, it will repeat its successful experiment of last autumn—a journey of a week to cities of the nearer West. It will not, however, begin the little tour until the week of Jan. 28. Then it will play in succession in Rochester, Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, Indianapolis and Cincinnati. It will continue also its series of concerts in Saunders Theatre at Harvard, and its occasional visits to cities in New England and elsewhere that are within easy distance of Boston. In all, between the middle of October and the beginning of May, it will give 125 concerts, rather more than it has attempted in any previous musical year.

THE NEW PRICES

The method of the sale of seats and the prices of them vary among the chief orchestras, like the Chicago band, the Philharmonic Society and Mr. Damrosch's orchestra in New York, Mr. Scheel's in Philadelphia or Mr. Paur's in Pittsburg. Some dispose of their seats at fixed prices, usually determined, in the phrase of the railways, by what "the traffic will bear." Some make the fixed charge nominal and rely for their revenue upon the premiums of an auction. From the first our orchestra has followed the second method, and it will continue it this season. The higher priced seats for the afternoon concerts, or "public rehearsals," will be sold by auction at Symphony Hall on Monday, Oct. 1, beginning at ten o'clock. The lower priced seats for the afternoon concerts will be sold under the same conditions and at the same place and hour on Tuesday, Oct. 2. The auction for the higher priced seats for the evening concerts follows at ten o'clock on the morning of Thursday, Oct. 4, at Symphony Hall, and at the same hour and place on Friday, Oct. 5, the lower priced seats for the evening concerts will be sold. As usual, for the afternoon concerts the 505 seats in the second balcony—the "rush" seats of our local speech—will be reserved for sale at the door on each Friday, presumably at the same price that has long prevailed.

Hitherto the fixed price of the more costly seats for both the afternoon and the evening concerts has been $12; for the less costly $7.50. From these figures the bidding began and ran as high as the buyers' desires counselled and their purses permitted. For the new season, for the afternoon and for the evening concerts alike, the fixed prices are to be $18 for the more costly places and $10 for the less costly. In the one case the increase is of fifty per cent; in the other of twenty-three and a third. This advance in prices slipped into public knowledge a week ago. Straightway it fluttered many households—where daughters abound, for example—and let loose many tongues—not always with informed speeches. The simple facts in the matter as the management of the orchestra weighed them during the summer are these: $18 and $10 are no less nominal prices than were $12 and $7.50—mere bases, so to say, from which the bidding that determines the actual price begins. Very rarely in the sales of many years have the seats now to be sold from the fixed price of $18 failed to command that sum, and usually much more. None at all of the seats for which bidding will now begin from $10 has failed to sell for that sum in many seasons. The sale of some five thousand seats by auction is a slow process. With our native prudence bids advance slowly. Much time has been lost in previous sales in the raising of prices to sums, like the new charges, from which genuine bidding began. The auctions dragged out their slow length of many hours. With the new prices the selling should be more expeditious.

THE SOLOISTS

Dr. Muck is leaving Germany next Tuesday, and his ship will hardly reach New York before the following Tuesday, Oct. 2. The following Monday, he begins rehearsals for the first pair of concerts, and his own discovery of his men and his training of them to his ways and desires is likely to occupy him for some weeks to come. Since he accepted his new post, last June, he has been busy with work at Madam Cosima's Wagner theatre at Baireuth and at sundry musical festivals. A passing illness, curiously exaggerated in despatches from abroad and baseless rumor at home, persuaded him to a few weeks of rest. It is not easy to arrange programmes for twenty-four pairs of concerts by correspondence between Boston and a little Styrian village. It is no easier to choose or approve, under these conditions, the singers and the virtuosi who are to assist the orchestra at its concerts. Consequently fewer soloists than usual appear as yet in the official announcements for the new season, and the selection of the rest awaits Dr. Muck's arrival, wishes and counsel. The chief singers already engaged, each for a pair of concerts are Mme. Melba of the opera in London and Miss Fremstad of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. Mme. Melba comes to America in January for a few appearances at the new Manhattan Opera House in New York. She continues there for a month and in that time, she is to sing at a pair of our Symphony concerts. Last summer, in Covent Garden, where she was singing twice a week, the quality of her voice showed no decline in purity, roundness or delicate undulation. Her phrasing was as curving and as spontaneous as ever; her ornaments of song as sparkling. The volume of her tones may have a little abated. Their distinguishing qualities have not. Miss Fremstad, as she proved a season or two ago here, is one of the rare dramatic singers of the theatre who can carry her salient qualities of voice and imagination little diminished, to the concert room. Of singers of local note, Mrs. Child will attain the distinction her artistry deserves by appearances at a pair of concerts.

Three virtuosi of the first rank, Paderewski and Rosenthal, the pianists, and César Thomson, the Belgian violinist, come to America in the course of the new season and each is to play at the Symphony concerts. Paderewski, indeed, is practically paying a visit to the orchestra to hear it play the symphony he has lately finished. He arrives at the end of the year; he stays for only three weeks; and he plays here or elsewhere only with our band. Rosenthal, who has been long absent from America, returns in the fulness of his reputation in Europe, a reputation that now credits him with finer and larger imagination and expression and no less technical power. César Thomson, who last played her ten years or more ago, stands with Ysaye as the most eminent of the elder violinists. (Poor old Joachim is but a tuneless shadow of himself and Sarasate has always been more virtuoso than musician.) Even after so long an interval it is easy to recall the mastery, the masculinity, and the grave imagination of César Thomson's playing. Less distinguished virtuosi from Europe who are to play with the orchestra are Gabrilowitsch, the pianist of delicate intuitions and delicate expression; Petschnikoff, the young Russian violinist, whom German audiences applauded last winter: Olga von Radecki, the German pianist, who belongs almost to an elder generation of Symphony audiences, and Katherine Goodson, a young English pianist who has found favor with both the London Symphony and the Queen's Hall orchestras there. Mme. Szumowska, who plays at a pair of concerts, is a pianist of our own, and Mme. Samaroff, who is also engaged, outranks in achievement and promise any of the younger American virtuosi. From the string choir of the orchestra itself, Mr. Hess and Mr. Adamowski, the violinists, and Mr. Warnke, the 'cellist, are each to have a concerto.

THE PROGRAMMES

Early last summer, at the request of the management of the orchestra here, Dr. Muck sketched tentative programmes for the first four pairs of concerts for the new season. As yet he has sent no word altering them, though naturally they are subject to change as soon as he arrives. As they stand they are:

OCT. 12 AND 13

Beethoven: Symphony in C-minor, No. 5.
Wagner: A Faust Overture; Siegfried Idyll; Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

OCT. 19 AND 20

Bach: Suite for Flute and Strings.
Haydn: Symphony in G-minor, No. 13.
Mozart: Symphony in C-minor, "Jupiter."
(Soloist: Mr. Hess.)

OCT. 26 AND 27

Brahms: Symphony in C-minor, No. 1.
R. Strauss: Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Berlioz: Three Fragments from "The Damnation of Faust."

NOV. 2 AND 3

Schumann: Symphony in B-flat-major, No. 1.
Schubert: Symphony in B-minor, "Unfinished."
Weber: Overture to "Der Freischütz."
(Soloist: Miss Fremstad.)

What do these provisional programmes plainly signify or fairly imply? First and foremost that Dr. Muck seems to have no particular fondness for the music of his generation and ours, since out of thirteen compositions, only one, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" is distinctly of our time. This very summer in Baireuth, he lamented to one of his assistants there who was questioning him about his plans for Boston, "that he failed to find much excellence in ultra-modern music of any school"; and that "the general musical sterility since Wagner's death was deplorable." By these tokens it may not be well to expect too much of the catholicity of view, the desire to keep his audiences musically informed and the cultivation of the music of the "new" Frenchmen, the busy Russians, and the younger Germans that distinguished Mr. Gericke. Dr. Muck has sent to Boston no list of the new or unfamiliar music that he intends to put on his other twenty programmes. Presumably he will tell us when he arrives. Meantime the official prospectus hints at one new composition "of the largest dimensions?" Shall we say a symphony with choruses by Mahler or, more probably, one of Bruckner's?

Certainly the four announced programmes are reasonably "stiff." Two symphonies in a single programme have been rather unusual here, and a whole programme, except the solo number, of the music of the eighteenth century is still more strange. Is Dr. Muck seeking to give his second pair of concerts a distinctive "atmosphere," which is creditable to his imagination, or would he turn pedagogue like the makers of "historical programmes;" no great necessity in Boston after a quarter of a century of orchestral concerts? Clearly Dr. Muck would have us try him at the very start as a conductor of Wagner, but only one of the three Wagnerian numbers on the first programme is operatic. Willing, too, he seems to mount the stalking horses of many conductors—Beethoven's fifth symphony, Mozart's "Jupiter," Brahms's first and Schumann's first. Apparently he has no overmastering ardor for the tone-poem, or for the freer modern forms generally. Distinctly the four programmes are the programmes of a classicist.

DR. MUCK HIMSELF

Dr. Muck, as he sits in the orchestra pit of the Royal Opera House at Berlin, or in the semi-darkness of the Baireuth sanctuary, is a man in his forties, clean-shaven, dark-skinned, dark-haired, strong of jaw, sharply cut of feature, short-sighted to the need of glasses, but with eyes sparkling brightly through them; slim as a boy, lithe, buoyant, alert and nervous in all that he does. In his leisure he talks much (and he smokes much) with a humorous vivacity and recurring touches of sarcasm that long ago commended his society to his emperor at Berlin. Distinctly he is a man of clear and critical intellect—qualities that have a just place, along with many others of many sorts, in a conductor. At his work, either in rehearsal or in public performance, in the concert-room or at the opera house, Dr. Muck is all for the task in hand. His diligence is as unflagging, his conscientiousness as persistent, as Mr. Gericke's own. His beat is precision itself, and his sense of rhythm of the keenest. For twenty years and more he has been studying his scores and playing the music that they contain with unwearying acuteness. He knows it to the last detail; he insists that each detail shall have its due place in the whole tonal fabric; and yet he does not lose the larger proportions of the web. His ear is as acute as his mind, and he has a keen sense for beautiful, delicately graduated and entirely euphonic tone such as for years has been the characteristic virtue of our orchestra. He has studied the secrets of instruments and voices.

Birth and youth in a household of the cultivated German middle class gave Dr. Muck intellectual and artistic tastes and bent. His training at the universities of Leipsic and Heidelberg—he is a doctor of philosophy by degree earned, and not a doctor of music by honorary title—confirmed and strengthened them. He labored as a chorus master at Zurich, as a conductor at minor Austrian opera houses, with a travelling opera company, before the call to the Opera in Berlin gave him an established position. At first he was fain to be a wandering virtuoso of the piano. His father insisted upon the prosaic work at Zurich. The chance illness of the regular conductor there disclosed the young Muck's aptitude for conducting. It was Angelo Neumann, discoverer of musicians of promise, that commended him to the Berlin Opera. There he has worked for fourteen years. Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch and Paur all came first to our orchestra comparatively untried and unpractised, with their finer skill to gain, their fuller way to make. Dr. Muck comes with a career achieved, with long-standing reputation earned and with entire mastery of the technique and the routine of his art. Every orchestra that has played under him, if only for a single concert, has respected the man and the conductor. His players at Berlin have added personal devotion. His assistants at Baireuth are loyalty itself.

The duties of the chief conductor at the Berlin Opera are confining, but from time to time Dr. Muck has visited the musical capitals of Europe, in the new fashion of the "star" conductor. He has taken a Wagner "cycle" or two at Covent Garden; Paris has heard him; he has wandered as far East as Moscow; and the Philharmonic Society of Vienna—an orchestra more akin to ours than any other band in Europe—has cherished him. Why, then—not to burke the question that has been raised steadily in Boston since Dr. Muck was chosen to succeed Mr. Gericke—why then has he not attained the celebrity of Weingartner, Nikisch, Mahler or Strauss as a "virtuoso" conductor? The answer is the simplest to those that know Dr. Muck's temperament, traits, and standards. Half the stock in trade of the glorified "virtuoso" conductor is his personality. Display it he must, if he would keep his standing and his following. He cannot be impersonal, if he would. Whether he smokes a cigarette or "interprets" a huge tone-poem, whether he conducts a Wagner cycle or buys a new cravat, he must be subjective. If he unfolds a handkerchief or a principal theme, he must do it in an individual way. Of intense and unflagging subjectivity, "virtuoso" conductors, with all their great qualities, are really made. In contrast, Dr. Muck has the objective temperament, an objective mind, and objective standards. No man of his eminence is more averse to personal exploitation. No conductor of his rank is less for himself or more for the work in hand. Dr. Muck is all fidelity to the music before him, all zeal to impart fully and faithfully the form and the substance of it, the design that the composer disposed in it, the mood in which he wrote, the emotions he would summon. The conductor is but the guiding medium; his baton but the means; the rest is all the composer's. Yet this objective and intellectual temperament has some of the defects of its virtues. "If only he would calculate a little less coolly," said one of h[illegible] with this summer,

The First Established and Most Comp[lete] Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wo[rld]

om

ldress

ate

Dr. Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will sail from Bremen on next Tuesday morning, September 25, on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and is due to arrive in New York on the following Tuesday, October 2. He will go directly to Boston, where he will have the rest of the week in which to get used to his new surroundings, the first rehearsal of the orchestra having been called for Monday, October 8. All signs indicate the biggest season in the history of the orchestra. The total number of concerts will not be far from 125, which does not include the employment of the orchestra at the Worcester Festival in the first week of next month. The end of January the orchestra is to make a Western trip, giving concerts in Rochester, Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, Indianapolis and Cincinnati. The financial success of this trip is assured.

The dates of the five concerts in Philadelphia are as follows: Monday evenings, November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18. Naturally, the concerts will be of unusual interest, through the presence of Dr. Muck, but the orchestra has another offering which will mean a great deal to Philadelphia. At the concert of January 7 the soloist will be Paderewski, and this will be positively his only appearance in Philadelphia this year. At the December concert the soloist will be Rosenthal.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om

dress

te

The concert dates are filled surprisingly at this early time in the season. The Philadelphia Orchestra will be the first orchestra to be heard this season. Their first concert comes October 30. This will be followed by the Boston Symphony November 6, Moritz Rosethal November 9, Madame Nordica November 15, Miss Ellen Beach Yaw November 20, Leoncavallo with his orchestra November 30, Boston Symphony December 4, Philadelphia Orchestra December 11, Kneisel Quartet's first concert December 13, Choral Society in the Messiah December 18, Philadelphia Orchestra January 2, Boston Symphony January 8, Kneisel Quartet January 10, Philadelphia Orchestra January 29, Kneisel Quartet February 7, Boston Symphony February 19, Philadelphia Orchestra February 26, Choral Society March 6, Kneisel Quartet March 14 and Boston Symphony March 19. The Kneisels have made a slight change in their concert season here, and will give only four concerts this year instead of five, as they have done in previous years.

Boston Journal
Sept. 25, 1906.

DR. MUCK SAILS TODAY.

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, sails today from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. The ship is due in New York one week from today. Dr. Muck will come immediately to Boston, where apartments have been taken for him. He will have the rest of next week to rest after his voyage. The first rehearsal is called for Monday, Oct. 8. Next week rather more than half of the orchestra will be employed at the Worcester Festival.

Dr. Muck has cabled to the management of the Symphony Orchestra that he is sailing from Bremen today on his way to Boston. He should reach New York next Tuesday afternoon, and Boston on the same evening or the following day.

Boston Transcript
Sept. 25, 1906,

Boston Record, Tuesday
Sept. 25, 1906.

DR. MUCK SAILS TODAY.

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen today for New York on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. The ship is due in New York one week from today. He will come directly to Boston. Dr. Muck is accompanied by his wife. He speaks no English, or, at least last spring he spoke only German and French, but Mrs. Muck speaks our language very well. The new conductor will have the rest of the week in which to rest after his voyage, the first rehearsal of the season being called for Oct. 8. Next week rather more than half of the orchestra will be employed at the Worcester festival.

Musical Events

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Symphony orchestra, sailed from Bremen today for New York on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. The ship is due in New York one week from today. He will come directly to Boston, where apartments are awaiting him. Dr. Muck is accompanied by his wife. He speaks no English, or, at least, last spring he spoke only German and French, but Mrs. Muck speaks our language very well. The new conductor will have the rest of the week in which to rest after his voyage, the first rehearsal of the season being called for Monday, Oct. 8. Next week rather more than half of the orchestra will be employed at the Worcester festival.

Boston Traveler
Sept. 25, 1906.

Boston Transcript
1906.
Y, SEPTEMBER 27, 1[9]

tions ... had delicious moments of femdoubt, ... and wounded pride. At such hands Napole... ...wed his beating.

The "Sinfonia Domestica" at Last

Thanks to Dr. Muck, the Symphony Orchestra is to play next winter the one tone-poem by Richard Strauss that Boston has not yet heard and that it ought to have heard long since—the "Sinfonia Domestica." Our band was the first in America to play Strauss's "Don Quixote"; two years ago when the composer was visiting our cities he conducted himself at New York the first performance anywhere of the "Sinfonia Domestica." It was eagerly heard and warmly discussed then, and in due course it has made the round of the musical capitals of Europe. Somehow, so far as we can remember, it has not since been repeated in America. Mr. Gericke in Boston, Mr. Stock in Chicago, and Mr. Scheel in Philadelphia have all alike been shy of it. Very seldom has Boston lagged behind with new orchestral music by eminent hands. It has lagged with the "Sinfonia Domestica," and it is only just to it and to us who listen that Dr. Muck should put it at last on our programmes. In it, says Mr. Baughan, quietly and ironically, "Strauss has had the audacity to be clear in his intentions, to deal with elementary emotions, and to be beautiful. Zarathustra ... nothing to say in the 'Domestic Symphony.'

Boston Record
Sept. 27, 1906.

Among the novelties which Dr. Muck expects to present in Boston next winter is Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica." This is the huge work which had its first production in this country three years ago when Richard Strauss was over here. It has never been played in Boston. As Dr. Muck was a close friend of Strauss and has been his colleague in the Berlin opera for many years, it goes almost without

Boston Herald
Sept. 27, 1906.

Among the novelties which Dr. Muck expects to present in Boston next winter is Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica." This is the work which had its first production in this country three years ago, when Richard Strauss was over here. It had never been played in Boston. Dr. Muck was a close friend of Strauss. The "Sinfonia Domestica" is now included in the repertoires of all the great orchestras of the continent, and is generally regarded as being the greatest of Strauss' instrumental works.

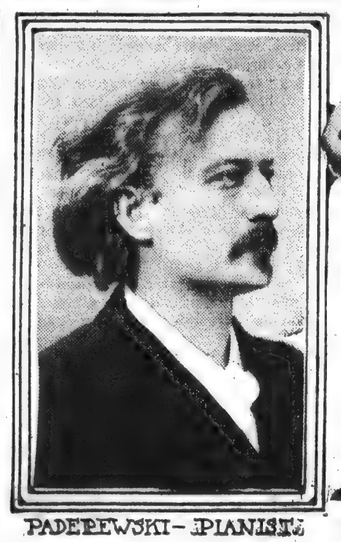
[6]

ANTOINETTE SZUMOWKA—PIANIST

DR. KARL MUCK CONDUCTOR

MORIZ ROSENTHAL PIANIST. WILLY HESS—VIOLINIST

MME. MELBA · SOPRANO



PADEREWSKI—PIANIST. OLIVE FREMSTAD—SOPRANO

Symphony's Opening Will Be 2400th Concert

Dr. Karl Muck, the Distinguished Conductor, Is Due To Arrive Oct. 2—Season Starts Ten Days Later—New Price Scale.

On Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, the Symphony Orchestra will give its first public rehearsal of the year. It will mark the beginning of the second quarter century of the orchestra, and it will be counted as the twenty-four-hundredth concert, for when the orchestra ended its season last spring it had played in public just twenty-three hundred and ninety-nine times, since its first concert on Oct. 21, 1881. It begins the second quarter of its century life with most glowing prospects, for not only is the orchestra in a higher state of discipline and efficiency than it has ever been before, but it will have as conductor Dr. Karl Muck, who is one of the most distinguished musicians in the world.

The prospectus for the season of 1906-1907 necessarily shows much that is familiar, but there are two or three innovations which will strike the eye immediately. The first is, of course, the new conductor. The second is the absence of the orchestra from Boston six weeks during the winter, instead of the usual five, and the third—more apparent than real—is the increase in the up-set prices of seats for the public rehearsals and for the concerts.

New Scale of Prices.

This increase was made only after long and careful consideration. Its object is to shorten and simplify the auction sales. Investigation has shown that in the last several years none of the $7.50 seats has brought a premium of less than $2.50, and that only an insignificant number of the $12 seats has brought a premium of less than $6. For this reason, the management has decided to raise the prices of the $7.50 seats to $10, and the price of the $12 seats to $18. It is needless to say that these prices are still nominal in every sense of the word. By this means, starting at a higher figure, the time of the long and tedious auction sale should be materially lessened.

The auction sales will begin Monday, Oct. 1, at 10 A. M., and the sale of the $18 seats for the public rehearsals. On Tuesday, the $10 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. On Thursday the $18 seats for the concerts, and on Friday the $10 seats for the concerts, all sales beginning precisely at 10 o'clock in the morning.

Annual Tour to West.

For the past twenty years the orchestra has been absent five weeks during the season, while it made its monthly visit to New York, Philadelphia and the other cities where it gives a series of concerts. Another interim of a week will be added this year, when the orchestra goes West. It will leave Boston on Sunday, Jan. 27, and give concerts in Rochester, Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, Indianapolis and Cincinnati, returning Feb. 3. This Western trip has now become an annual fixture in the schedule of the orchestra, and instead of having it the first week in October, has been placed in the middle of the season, primarily because the Worcester Festival is now given in the first week of October, and the orchestra for that event is supplied by the Symphony.

The first public rehearsal and concert will be given on Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, and Saturday evening, Oct. 13, respectively. The orchestra will not be here on Nov. 9 and 10. Dec. 7 and 8, Jan. 11 and 12, Feb. 1 and 2, Feb. 22 and 23 and March 22 and 23. There will be, as always, twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts, but the last pair will fall on May 3 and 4 instead of on April 26 and 27, as would have happened without this Western trip. As is always the custom, the public rehearsal which would fall on March 29, which is Good Friday, will be given on the afternoon of the preceding day, Thursday, March 28.

Dr. Muck Arrives Oct. 2.

Unquestionably the chief interest of the season centers in the coming of Dr. Karl Muck, who is to sail from Bremen day after tomorrow on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and will arrive in New York on Oct. 2. In a way, the engagement of Dr. Muck is a radical departure in the policy of the orchestra. He is the first conductor of established reputation it has brought to America, for all the other conductors, Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch and Paur were comparatively unknown men when they came to Boston, and, indeed, the greater part of their reputation today is based on their work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Two different applications had to be made to the Germen emperor to secure Dr. Muck. He was most unwilling to lose his favorite conductor, and that his consent was finally secured is due entirely to his kindly feelings toward this country and especially toward Boston, which is so intimately connected with Harvard University, in which, in the past, he has taken a great interest.

Melba and Fremstad.

At the head of the list of singers come Melba and Fremstad. Melba comes to America in January to be at the head of the new Hammerstein Opera Company, and while there she will have a few concert appearances of which one will be with the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Boston. Olive Fremstad, one of the most talented of the younger generation of singers, comes to America to "create" the name part in Strauss' new opera "Salome," which is announced by Mr. Conried as one of his novelties.

In the list of pianists, among the women are the names of Samaroff, Szumowska, Katherine Goodson and Olga Radecki. Samaroff is one of the most talented and popular of the younger pianists, and is more than well liked in Boston. Mme. Szumowska is a resident of this city and needs no introduction, as she has long had an admiring public here. Katherine Goodson is a young English pianist, who is coming to America for the first time, and Olga Radecki has played several times with the orchestra, but not in recent years. Among the men are the names of Paderewski, Rosenthal and Gabrilowitsch. Paderewski comes to America in January for several appearances with the orchestra and to hear his new symphony played.

He will give no recitals. Rosenthal, one of the giants of the piano, returns after an absence of several years, and his appearance should be one of the most important events of the season. Gabrilowitsch, the young Russian, whose exquisite art has so fascinated us in the past, returns this year with the name of having greatly increased his artistic stature.

Two names appear in the list of foreign violinists, those of Cesar Thomson and Petschnikoff. Thomson, it need hardly be said, is one of the great living masters of the violin. Petschnikoff, the young Russian, returns to America with an increased reputation as an artist.

Of the Boston virtuosi, there will appear Professor Willy Hess, Timothee Adamowski and Heinrich Warnke. It will be interesting to Mr. Warnke's friends to know that he has brought from Europe this year a magnificent new 'cello.

Boston Traveler
Sept. 29, 1906.

Musical Events

Next week brings the very prosaic, but very necessary, prelude to the Symphony season, the auction sales in Symphony Hall of the seats for the 24 public rehearsals and the 24 concerts. The first sale will be on Monday, when the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. On Tuesday the $10 seats for the public rehearsals; on Thursday the $18 seats for the concerts, and on Friday the $10 seats. All the sales will begin promptly at 10 o'clock.

Intending bidders should be mindful of the fact that the sales this year are likely to progress much more rapidly than they have in the past. Starting at a higher figure, it is calculated that the seats will be disposed of in very considerably less time than has been the case in the past. In former years bidders have known about what hour the seats they wanted would come up for sale, and instead of waiting from the beginning, have come at that time. Under the new system it will be well for them to make ample allowance for the increased speed in the disposal of the seats, else they may fail to get those which they want.

Dr. Muck is on the ocean and will arrive in New York some time next Tuesday. He will come directly to Boston. Practically all the members of the orchestra are back in town and have reported for duty. A few who have been abroad will not get back until the end of the week. Rather more than half of the orchestra will be in Worcester this week at the music festival in that city. It is an interesting fact that this is the first season that the festival has had the "Boston Symphony Orchestra." Heretofore they have had members of the orchestra, but the placing of the festival in October instead of September brings it into the orchestra year, and for this reason the official name of the institution is used.

The prospects for the season are very bright, not merely in Boston but everywhere the orchestra gives concerts. Naturally there is much interest in Dr. Muck's coming, and the announcement of his plans for the season, which will probably be made next Sunday, is awaited with great curiosity. It is fair to believe that he will be ready to announce his novelties shortly after his arrival.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
SATURDAY MORNING.
SEPTEMBER 29, 1906.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Next week brings the very prosaic but very necessary prelude to the symphony season, the auction sales in Symphony hall of the seats for the 24 public rehearsals and the 24 concerts. The first sale will be on Monday, when the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. On Tuesday the $10 seats for the public rehearsals; on Thursday the $18 seats for the concerts, and on Friday the $10 seats for the concerts. All the sales will begin promptly at 10 a.m.

Dr. Muck is on the ocean and will arrive in New York some time next Tuesday. He will come directly to Boston. Practically all the members of the orchestra are back in town and have reported for duty. A few who have been abroad will not get back until the end of the week. Rather more than half of the orchestra will be in Worcester this week at the music festival in that city. It is an interesting fact that this is the first season that the festival has had the "Boston Symphony Orchestra." Heretofore they have had members of the orchestra, but the placing of the festival in October instead of September brings it into the orchestra year, and for this reason the official name of the institution is used.

There seems to be little doubt that the coming sales will show a general increase. Last year's sales showed a considerable increase over those of 1904. As the general tendency of prices has been upward for several years past, it is only fair to suppose that 1906 will be no exception to the rule.

Practically no criticisms in the change in the nominal prices of seats have reached the management, the patrons generally seeming to agree that the move was a proper one.

The prospects for the season are very bright, not merely in Boston, but everywhere the orchestra gives concerts. Naturally there is much interest in Dr. Muck's coming, and the announcement of his plans for the season, which will probably be made next Sunday, is awaited with great curiosity. It is fair to believe that he will be ready to announce his novelties shortly after his arrival.

Boston Journal
Sept. 27, 1906.

New Strauss Work.

Among the novelties which Dr. Muck expects to present in Boston next winter is Richard Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica." This is the huge work which is the first production in this country of the years ago, when Richard Strauss conducted here. It has never been played in Boston, and has been his colleagues in the Berlin opera for many years, it goes without saying that his presentation of the work will be authority in every sense of the word.

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

2.5 mm

abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SOLOISTS.

Famous Singers and Instrumentalists Who Will be Heard During the Concert Season Soon to Begin.

The annual sales by auction of the seats for the coming season of Symphony concerts will begin a week from tomorrow morning in Symphony hall. There has been a change in the upset prices at which tickets for the two series are held, and the seats whose nominal value was formerly $12 are now $18, and the $7.50 seats have been raised to $10. This change is more apparent than real, its object being to shorten and simplify the auction sales. It has now been several years since any of the $7.50 seats have brought a premium of less than $2.50, and the records show that only an insignificant number of the $12 seats have sold for a premium of less than $6. Selling by auction more than 5000 is under the best conditions a long and tedious process, and by increasing the upset prices the time consumed in selling the seats ought to be shortened considerably.

The $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Monday, Oct 1; the $10 rehearsal seats Tuesday, Oct 2; the $18 seats for concerts Thursday, Oct 4, and the $10 seats Friday, all the sales beginning at 10 o'clock.

The orchestra will be out of town six weeks during the season instead of the usual five. The success of the tour in the middle west in the first week of October, 1905, was so great, that arrangements were immediately made to repeat it this year. Then came the announcement of the change in the date of the Worcester festival, from the last week of September to the first week of October, and as the orchestra for the festival is always supplied by the Boston symphony, a western trip in the first week of October was out of the question. Therefore, it was decided that the orchestra should go west in the last week of January.

Concerts will be given in Rochester, Monday evening, Cleveland, Tuesday evening, Chicago, Wednesday evening, Detroit, Thursday evening, Indianapolis, Friday evening and Cincinnati, Saturday afternoon.

In Boston the usual 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts will be given Friday afternoon and Saturday evenings, respectively. The last pair will come May 3 and 4. The first public rehearsal and concert will be given Friday afternoon, Oct 12 and Saturday evening, Oct 13. The orchestra will be away Nov 9 and 10, Dec 7 and 8, Jan 11 and 12, Feb 1 and 2, 22 and 23, and March 22 and 23.

The coming of Dr Muck of Berlin is, in a way, a radical departure in the policy of the orchestra. He is the first conductor of established reputation it has brought to America. All the others, Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch and Paur, were at the time of their coming comparatively unknown men. With Dr Muck the case is different. His long connection with the important operas of Berlin and Prague, with the Vienna philharmonic orchestra, with the Wagner festivals at Bayreuth, as well as his many "guest" appearances with the principal operas and orchestras of Europe, have made his name familiar to all those who follow the musical news of the world. Dr Muck, who has recovered from his attack of laryngitis, will sail day after tomorrow from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, reaching New York Oct 2.

When Mr Ellis went abroad in early April to get a successor to Mr Gericke, he carried with him a list of some twenty odd men. At the top were three names, the only ones which had been seriously considered, and of these Dr Muck's was one. He had not been in Germany long before he decided that Dr Muck was the man wanted.

The task of securing him was long and tedious. In the first place Dr Muck was not particularly keen to give up one of the two most desirable places on the continent to come to America. It was not with him a question of money. Finally he said he would come for a year if he could get a leave of absence for that time. Then followed the difficult task of getting the emperor to allow the conductor to leave Germany even for one winter. In the end the emperor's consent was secured, but it can be said with truth that while he was influenced in giving his consent by his very kindly feeling toward this country, no orchestra but the Boston Symphony could have got Dr Muck.

Dr Muck would not have come for any other orchestra. Although he has never been to America, it has not been for lack of opportunities. When Hans Richter broke his contract with Mr Higginson in 1893, he wrote to Dr Muck urging him to come in his place, saying that he was the only man he (Richter) could recommend. Dr Muck, who had just finished his first successful year in Berlin, would not think of it. And again, Maurice Grau tried to get him to come to New York to be the conductor at the Metropolitan opera house, offering him what is unquestionably the largest sum that has ever been given to a conductor. This offer he refused, and at least two others since then.

The coming of such a distinguished conductor does not mean that the list of soloists will be any less strong. Some engagements have been left open pending Dr Muck's arrival, but enough names can be given to show the quality. At the head of the list of singers come Melba and Fremstad. Mme Melba comes to America in January to be at the head of the new Hammerstein opera company, and while here she will have a few concert appearances of which one will be with the Symphony orchestra in Boston. Olive Fremstad, one of the most talented of the younger generation of singers, comes to America to "create" the name-part in Strauss' new opera, "Salome," which is announced by Mr Conried as one of his novelties.

In the list of pianists, among the women, are the names of Samaroff, Szumowska, Katherine Goodson and Olga Radecki. Samaroff is one of the most talented and popular of the younger pianists. Mme Szumowska, a resident of this city, needs no introduction, as she has long had an admiring public here; Katherine Goodson is a young English pianist who is coming to America for the first time, and Olga Radecki has played several times with the orchestra, although not in recent years.

Among the men are the names of Paderewski, Rosenthal and Gabrilowitsch. Paderewski comes to America in January for seven appearances with the orchestra and to hear his new symphony played. He will give no recitals. Rosenthal, one of the giants of the piano, returns after an absence of several years, and Gabrilowitsch, the young Russian, returns this year with the name of having greatly increased his artistic stature.

Two names appear in the list of foreign violinists, those of Cesar Thomson and Petschnikoff. Of our own virtuosi, those that will play to us are Willy Hess, Timothee Adamowski and Heinrich Warnke. Mr Warnke, by the way, has a new cello which is said to be a magnificent instrument.

The programs of the first four concerts are as follows:

I

Beethoven.....Symphony in C minor, No 5
Wagner.....A Faust overture
Wagner.....Siegfried Idyll
Wagner....Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"

II

Bach.....Suite for flute and strings
Haydn.....Symphony in G minor, No 13
Mozart.....Symphony in C major, "Jupiter"
Soloist, Prof Willy Hess.

III

Brahms.....Symphony in C minor, No 1
Strauss.....Tone poem "Don Juan"
Berlioz...Three movements from "The Damnation of Faust"

IV

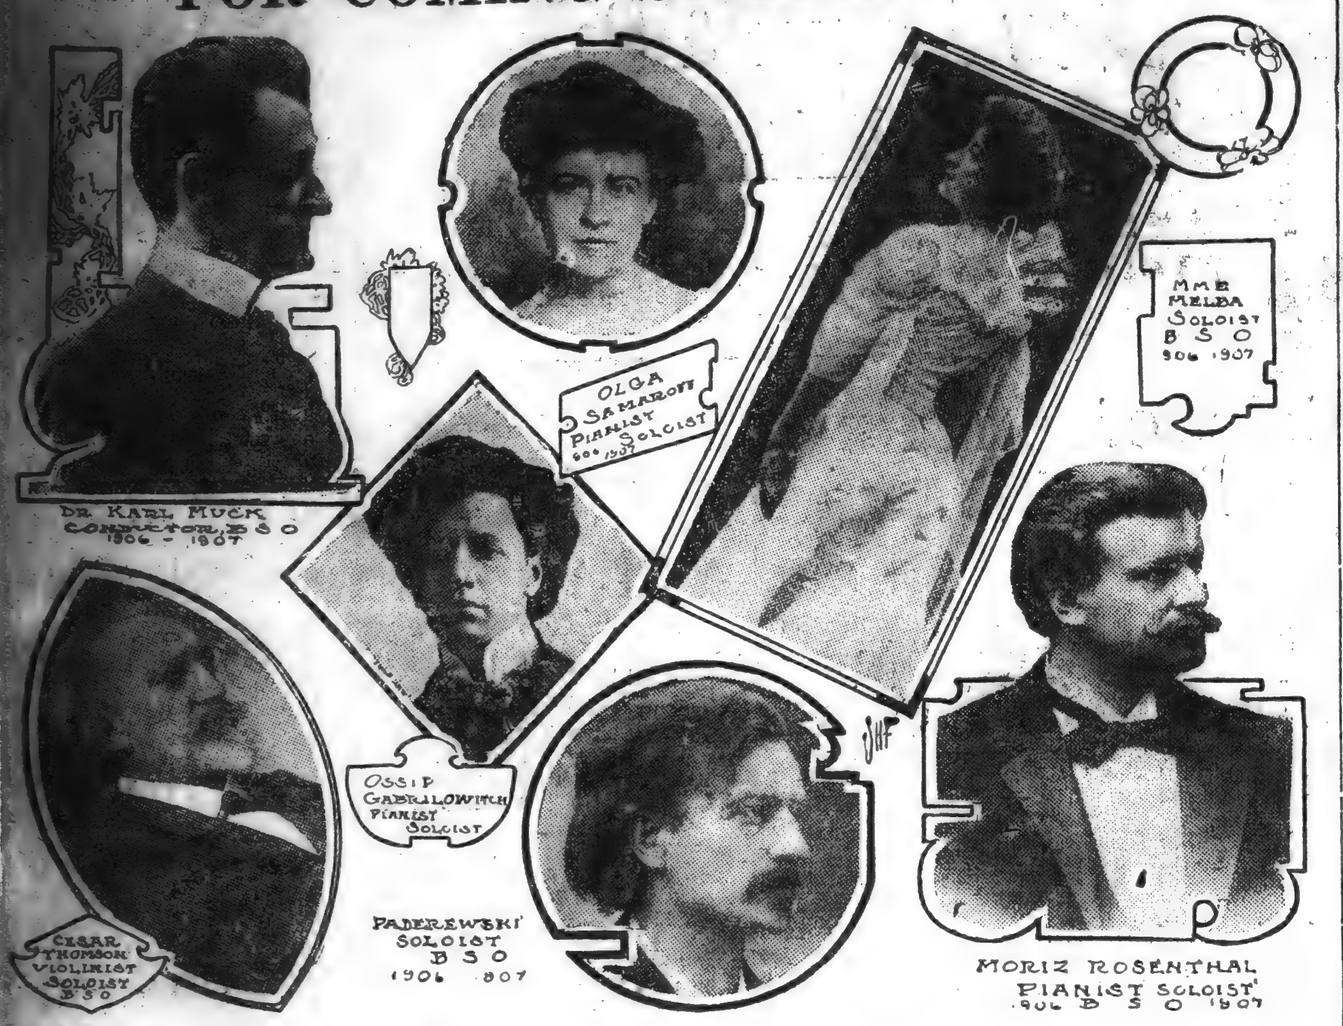
Schumann....Symphony in B-flat major, No 1
Schubert...Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished"
Weber.....Overture, "Der Freischutz"
Soloist, Mme Olive Fremstad.

As these programs were made by Dr Muck in the early summer they are naturally subject to change after his arrival. At that time, also, the solo numbers will be announced.

[8]

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, SEPTEMBER 23, 1906

NEW CONDUCTOR AND SOLOISTS FOR COMING SYMPHONY SEASON



With a new conductor, who is one of the most distinguished musicians of Europe, and with an unusually strong list of solo artists, the coming season of Symphony concerts gives promise of being the most brilliant in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The coming season is the 26th, the first of the quarter century, and with such a splendid start as it seems to have the record at the end of the next 25 years ought to be even more magnificent than the record of the 25 years just ended.

The prospectus for 1906-1907, which is just out, shows several interesting innovations. The innovations noted are first, of course, the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin; second, the absence of the orchestra from Boston six weeks during the season instead of five, as has been the rule in the past; and third—although this is more apparent than real—the raising of the upset prices of the season tickets.

New Style of Auction

The annual auction sale of seats for the coming season will begin one week from tomorrow morning, Oct. 1, in Symphony Hall. The same rule will apply this year as in the past; the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold on Monday, beginning at 10 o'clock; the $10 seats for the rehearsals on Tuesday, beginning at the same hour; the $18 seats for the concerts on Thursday and the $10 seats for the concerts on Friday. The increase in the upset prices of the $12 seats to $18 and the $7.50 seats to $10 has been made after most thorough and serious consideration. Its object is to shorten and simplify the auction sales.

It was decided that the orchestra should go West in the last week of January, leaving Boston Sunday evening, Jan. 27. Concerts will be given in Rochester on Monday evening, Cleveland on Tuesday evening, Chicago on Wednesday evening, Detroit on Thursday evening, Indianapolis on Friday evening and Cincinnati on Saturday evening, the orchestra returning to Boston on Sunday, Feb. 3.

Some Western Dates

Boston will not be the loser by this, for the usual 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts will be given on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings respectively; the last pair coming on May 3 and 4 instead of April 26 and 27, as would have happened without this Western trip. The first public rehearsal and concert will be given on Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, and Saturday evening, Oct. 13. The orchestra will be here on Nov. 9 and 10, Dec. 7 and 8, Jan. 11 and 12, Feb. 1 and 2, Feb. 22 and 23, and March 22 and 23. The public rehearsal which would ordinarily come on Friday afternoon, March 29, which is Good Friday, will be given on the afternoon of the preceding day, March 28.

Unquestionably the chief interest of the season centres in the coming of Dr. Karl Muck, who is to sail from Bremen day after tomorrow on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse and will arrive in New York on Oct. 2. In a way the engagement of Dr. Muck is a radical departure in the policy of the orchestra. He is the first conductor of established reputation it has brought to America, for all the other conductors, Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch and Paur, were comparatively unknown men when they came to Boston, and, indeed, the greater part of their reputation today is based on their work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck Pre-eminent

With this pre-eminent position in the world of European music it was not an easy task for Mr. Ellis last spring to induce Dr. Muck to come to this country, especially since the money question was of little or no consideration to the distinguished conductor. After Dr. Muck had finally consented to come for one year it was not an easy task for Mr. Ellis to secure the consent of the German Emperor to his departure from Berlin for even one season. Dr. Muck is unquestionably the most popular conductor that Berlin has ever had, and, in addition to this, he has for years enjoyed the personal friendship of the Emperor. It may be stated as an absolute truth that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only organization in this country which could have secured Dr. Muck's services.

Famous Soloists

At the head of the list of singers come Melba and Fremstad. Melba comes to America in January to be at the head of the new Hammerstein opera company, and while there she will have a few concert appearances of which one will be with the Symphony Orchestra in Boston. Olive Fremstad, one of the most talented of the younger generation of singers, comes to America to "create" the name part in Strauss' new opera, "Salome," which is announced by Mr. Conried as one of his novelties.

In the list of pianists among the women are the names of Samaroff, Szumowska, Katherine Goodson and Olga Radecki. Samaroff is one of the most talented and popular of the younger pianists, and is more than well liked in Boston. Mme. Szumowska is a resident of this city and needs no introduction, as she has long had an admiring public here. Katherine Goodson is a young English pianist who is coming to America for the first time, and Olga Radecki has played several times with the orchestra, but not in recent years. Among the men are the names of Paderewski, Rosenthal and Gabrilowitsch. Paderewski comes to America in January for seven appearances with the orchestra and to hear his new symphony played. He will give no recitals. Rosenthal, one of the giants of the piano, returns after an absence of several years, and his appearance should be one of the most important events of the season. Gabrilowitsch, the young Russian, whose exquisite art has so fascinated us in the past, returns this year with the name of having greatly increased his artistic stature.

Foreign Talent

Two names appear in the list of foreign violinists, those of Cesar Thomson and Petschnikoff. Thomson, it need hardly be said, is one of the great living masters of the violin. Petschnikoff, the young Russian, returns to America with an increased reputation as an artist. Of our own virtuosi there will appear Professor Willy Hess, Timothee Adamowski and Heinrich Warnke. It will be interesting to Mr. Warnke's friends to know that he has brought from Europe this year a magnificent new 'cello.

Coming of Dr. Karl Muck

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen last Tuesday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse and is expected to land in New York on next Tuesday afternoon. His coming sets at rest all the rumors that have floated about concerning his serious illness and inability to fulfill his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Philadelphia subscribers to last year's series of Boston Symphony concerts may now renew their subscriptions and secure the seats they had last year by sending applications to Miss Harris' ticket office in Heppe's music store. This privilege will last until Wednesday, October 10, and on Monday, October 15, the season sale for the coming series will begin.

DR. KARL MUCK

New Director of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BY BERENICE THOMPSON.

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is on his way to America, and will arrive this week. He has already planned out the first four programmes the orchestra is to give in Boston, beginning October 12 and 13. Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony," Mozart's "Jupiter," Haydn's "Symphony in G Minor," Brahms' in C, Schumann's in B flat, and Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, three Wagner numbers, and the Strauss symphonic poem "Don Juan" are among the selections. The second programme contains a Bach suite, a Haydn and a Mozart symphony. Schumann's "Symphony No. 1," Schubert's in B minor, and the overture to "Der Freischuetz" make up the instrumental part of the fourth concert. After Dr. Muck arrives he may alter the programme. He may decide to perform only one symphony on his fourth programme, instead of two. German and English audiences will listen to three, four, five works in the large, classical forms at a single session. Not so an American audience.

Academic Boston should have no objection to two symphonies at a stretch, if there be no concerto added. There will be no soloist at the first Boston concert, and it is Dr. Muck's desire that there shall be none at the first of any series of concerts in the outside cities. At the second Boston concert solo honors will go to Willy Hess, and at the fourth to Mme. Fremstad, who has been engaged by Mr. Conried for the title role in the Metropolitan Opera production of "Salome." Soloists announced for Boston Symphony concerts in Washington this season are Paderewski, Olga Samaroff, and Timothee Adamowski.

Outside of the new Paderewski symphony which has been promised, we can only surmise what music Washington will hear from these players. Not even the hint of a suggestion has emanated from Boston, and there is not a thread of evidence out of which to make knit conclusions. The fate of the Capital, together with that of Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York and several other cities, is yet uncertain. Gericke was formerly criticised for his too apparent leaning toward classicism and the earlier school of composition—his fondness for Bach and Beethoven, in contradistinction to the modern movement in music—and now some Boston writers are holding him up as the apostle of the ultra-moderns. Even Philip Hale recalls that the performances of Strauss' tone poems under Gericke were among the most important events of his administration.

Washington has never heard even one of these great Strauss works. Neither the Boston Symphony nor the Philadelphia Symphony orchestras, both of which visited the town last winter, played a single one of these modern world-famous works. It is to be hoped that Dr. Muck may intercede for us and bring to the city this season one or more of the later tone poems of the mighty man of Munich—not the "Scenes from Italy," but the "Death and Transfiguration," "Till Eulenspiegel," or "Ein Heldenleben."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Boston Symphony Concerts.

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen last Tuesday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and is expected to land in New York next Tuesday afternoon. His coming sets at rest all rumors concerning his inability to fulfill his engagement with the Boston Orchestra.

Philadelphia subscribers to last year's series of concerts may now renew their subscriptions at Heppe's music store. This privilege will continue until Wednesday, October 10, and on Monday, October 15, the public sale for the series will begin.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PHILADELPHIA subscribers to last year's series of Boston Symphony concerts may now renew their subscriptions and secure the same seats they had last year by application to Miss Harris, at Heppe's music store. This privilege will last until Wednesday, October 10, and on Monday, October 15, the regular season sale for the coming series will be opened. The orchestra will open its season at Boston on October 12, and Doctor Muck, the new conductor, has announced this interesting programme for his first concert in America: Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," "Faust Overture" and prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Bostonians are to pay a little more for their music this season than heretofore, seats in Symphony Hall which were formerly sold for $12 and $7.50 for the season now costing $18 and $10.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In response to the many inquiries that have been addressed to the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston by their partons in Baltimore, the management announces that subscribers of last year's series of concerts may now renew their subscription and secure the seats they had last year by sending their applications to Albaugh's ticket office. This privilege will expire on Thursday, October 18, and on the following Monday the sale of season tickets to new subscribers will begin.

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor, sailed from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse last Tuesday, and will arrive in New York on October 2. This puts at rest finally the many reports and rumors concerning the illness of Dr. Muck and his inability to fulfil his engagement with the orchestra.

DR. MUCK COMING OVER

Boston Symphony Series Now Arranged For Season.

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse last Tuesday, and will arrive in New York next Tuesday. This puts at rest finally the many reports and rumors concerning the illness of Dr. Muck and his inability to fulfill his engagement with the orchestra.

The management of the orchestra announces that subscribers of last year's series of concerts may now renew their subscriptions and secure the seats they had last year by sending their applications to Albaugh's ticket office. This privilege will expire October 18

SYMPHONY SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Applications For Boston Orchestra Season The Coming Winter.

In response to the many inquiries that have been addressed to the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston by its patrons in Baltimore, the management announces that subscribers to last year's series of concerts may now renew their subscriptions and secure the seats they had last year by sending their applications to Albaugh's ticket office. This privilege will expire on Thursday, October 18, and on the following Monday the sale of season tickets to new subscribers will begin.

The management of the Orchestra will retain the right of increasing the prices of single tickets when Mme. Melba and Mr. Paderewski are the soloists. The extra expense of these two concerts demands such measures. Therefore, the holders of season tickets will be all the more fortunate.

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor, sailed from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse last Tuesday, and will arrive in New York on October 2. This puts at rest finally the many reports and rumors concerning the illness of Dr. Muck and his inability to fulfill his engagement with the Orchestra.

Boston Symphony Concerts.

Last year the New National Theater was nearly sold out by subscription, and unless something very unexpected happens, it will be entirely sold out this year. Nearly all of last year's subscribers have filed applications to renew their subscriptions, and the number of new applicants is very large. Last year's subscribers have until Saturday, October 13, in which to renew their subscriptions and secure the seats they had last year. The sale of season tickets to new subscribers will begin on the following Tuesday, October 16. All applications should be addressed to Mrs. Katie Wilson Greene, 1214 F street.

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse last Tuesday morning and will arrive in New York next Tuesday. This puts at rest for good the various reports and rumors of his illness and of his inability to fulfill his engagement in America.

[9]

REDUCTION RATIO 13x

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
2.5 mm 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
2.0 mm abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
1.5 mm abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

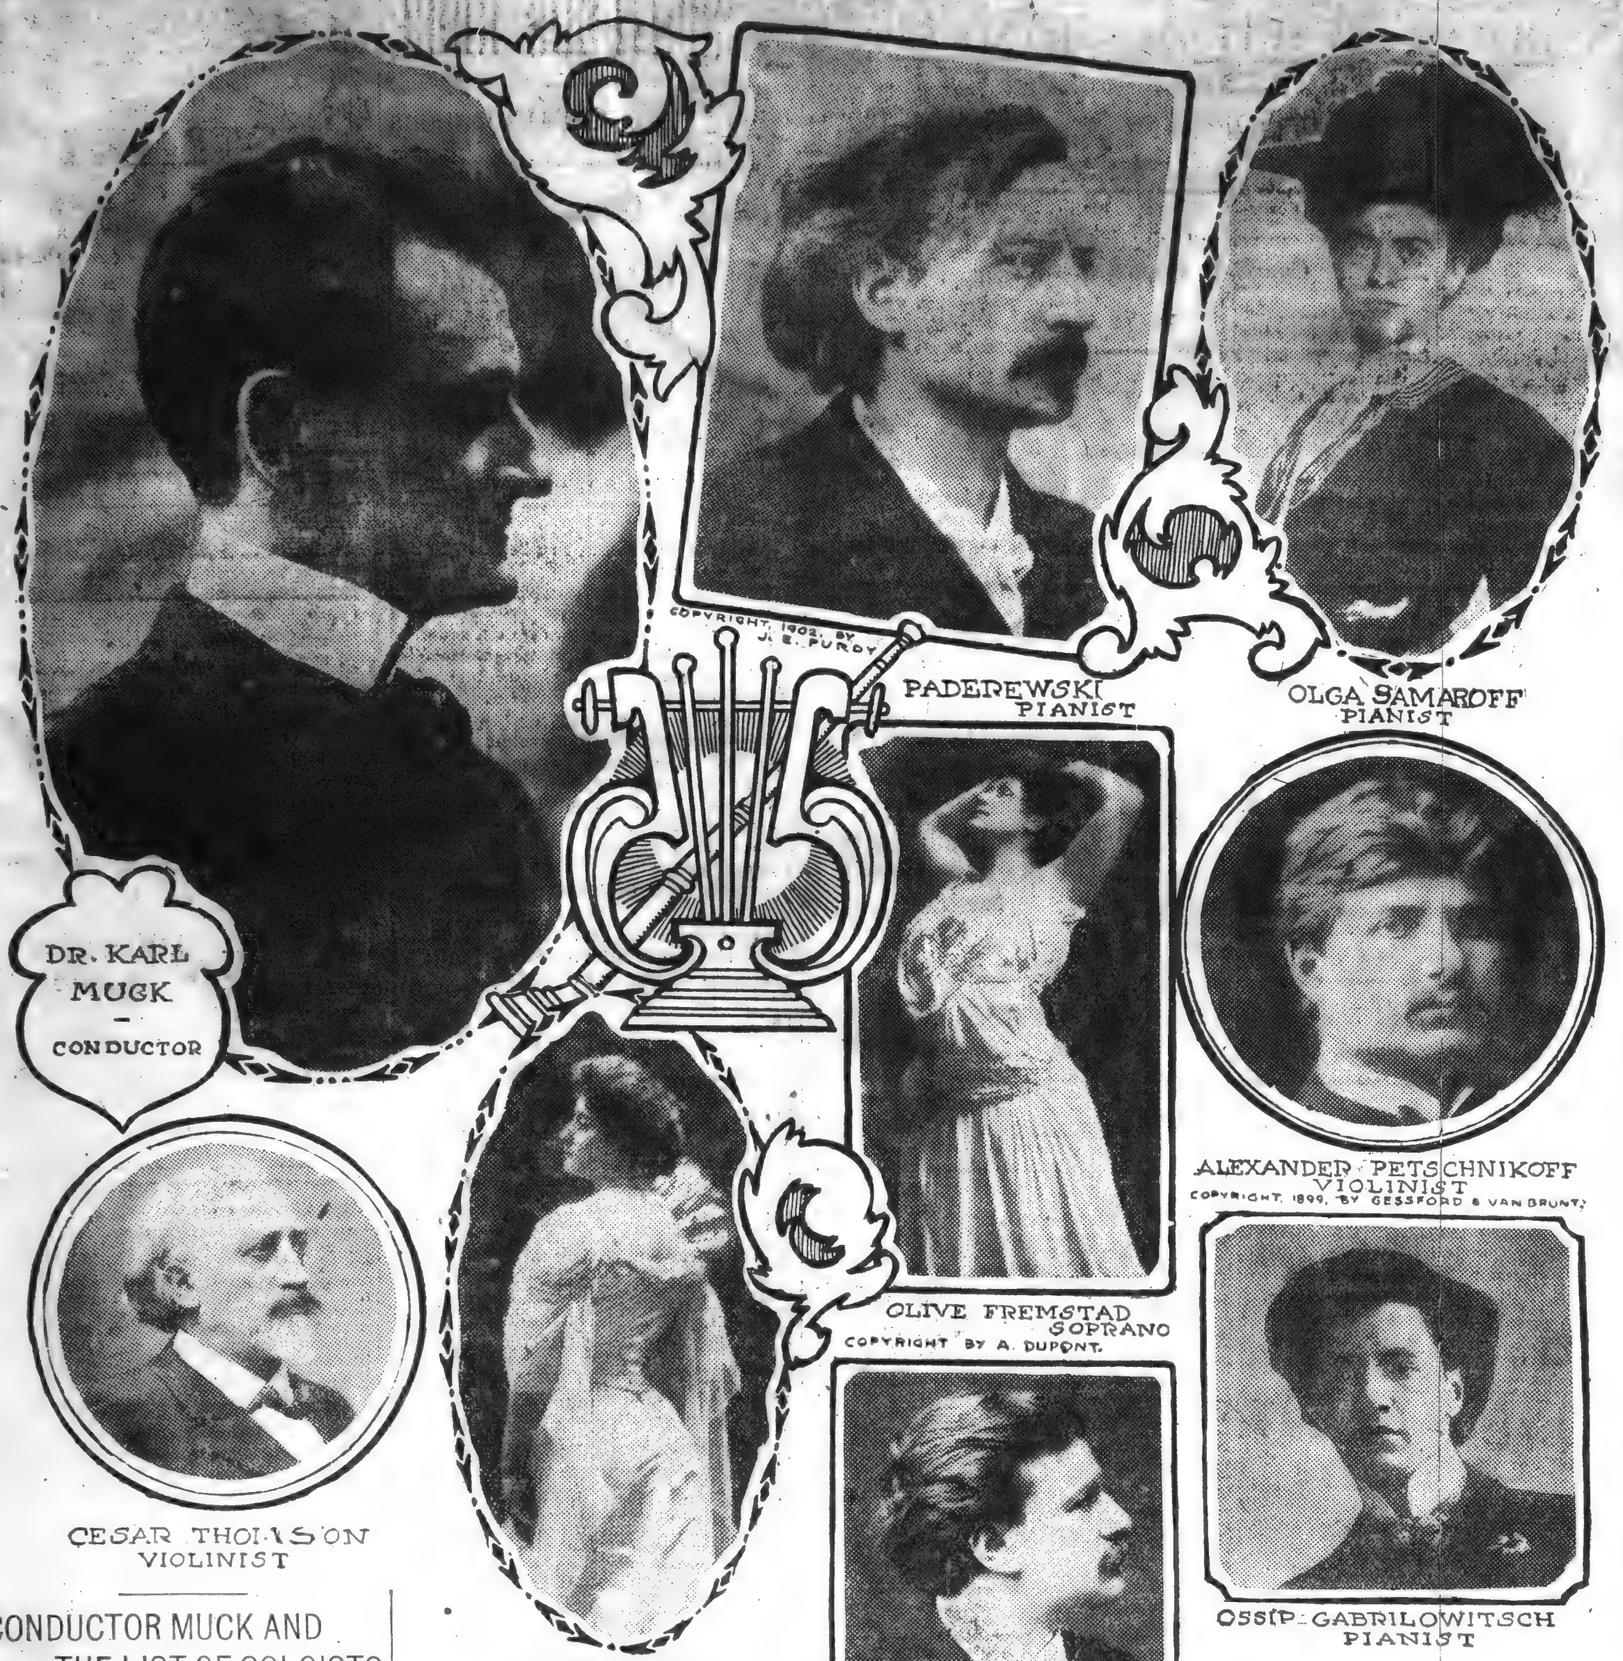
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
4.5 mm 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
3.5 mm abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
3.0 mm abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

FIRST FOUR PROGRAMMES OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA



CONDUCTOR MUCK AND THE LIST OF SOLOISTS

The Twenty-Sixth Season Promises to Be One of Unusual Interest.

The 26th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will open Oct. 12, 13, promises to be one of unusual interest. First of all there is the engagement of a new conductor. The engagement of Dr. Karl Muck is a radical departure from the traditions. He is the first conductor of an established, widely recognized reputation who has been engaged to conduct the concerts of the Symphony orchestra. The others, Messrs. Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch and Paur, were at the time of their assuming the leadership comparatively unknown men as concert conductors. Mr. Henschel was known only as a singer, pianist, composer; Mr. Gericke was one of the conductors of the Vienna Court Opera; Mr. Nikisch was the first conductor at the Leipsic Stadt Theatre, and Mr. Paur, after serving as opera conductor in Cassel, Koenigsberg and Mannheim, succeeded Mr. Nikisch at Leipsic and then at Boston. Only one of these four conductors had had much experience as a conductor of symphony concerts: Mr. Paur had led the subscription concerts at Mannheim. No one of them was then ranked among the great virtuoso conductors. They all had their reputation to make, and much of their reputation today is founded on their work with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Nor should the respective service of each one in turn to the orchestra and to the community be forgotten. Mr. Henschel, as the first in order, had an unenviable task, but the catholicity of his programmes and the fine taste displayed in making them broadened the knowledge of the public and raised its level of appreciation. Mr. Gericke made the orchestra a virtuoso instrument, on which Mr. Nikisch played romantically and poetically. Memorable performances were given by Mr. Henschel's successors: Performances of Schumann's symphony in D minor and Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" under Mr. Nikisch; of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and the entr'acte from Chabrier's "Gwendoline" under Mr. Paur; of symphonies by d'Indy, Franck and Mahler, and of Strauss' "Don Juan" and "Don Quixote" under Mr. Gericke—we name at random, for the history of the orchestra is full of brilliant, glorious deeds.

But the connection of Dr. Muck with [illegible] and Prague, with the Vienna Philharmonic orchestra, with the Wagner festivals at Bayreuth, and his many appearances as a "guest" in the opera houses and concert halls of Europe have made his name familiar to all who follow the news of the musical world. They know him as a virtuoso conductor, one of the "stars" who now rival famous prima donnas, tenors, violinists and pianists in exciting attention, applause, and hot and long-continued discussion.

Natural Curiosity.

No matter how greatly the departure of any conductor may be deplored, as soon as he is gone there is great curiosity concerning his successor. Nor should the sensitive regret this attitude of the public, the willingness, the desire to welcome a new man and a new order of things. As soon as The Herald made the announcement last spring of Mr. Gericke's departure—news that was announced authoritatively for the first time by The Herald—the question was immediately asked even by Mr. Gericke's warmest admirers: "Who will be his successor?" During the three months in which Mr. Ellis was carrying on his negotiations in Berlin, the rumor-monger was indefatigable. Hardly a man who wields a baton from Land's End to the Golden Horn, from the White Sea to the Boot of Italy escaped him. One after another was engaged at a salary incredible even in these days of extravagant incomes. Yet the problem had been solved for some time so far as Dr. Muck and Mr. Ellis were concerned. The question of his coming rested wholly with the Emperor of Germany, who was loath to lose his conductor at the Royal Opera House. At last Dr. Muck received a leave of absence from his duties in Berlin for one year. It is not too much to say that only the Boston Symphony orchestra, with its reputation in Europe could have brought about this result.

Even then the rumor-monger was not discouraged. The contract was signed and sealed; Dr. Muck was at work on his programmes and making preparations for his departure; lo, the rumormonger magnified an attack of laryngitis into a mortal sickness, long after the patient had recovered.

Dr. Muck will sail for New York from Bremen the day after tomorrow on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. He will arrive in Boston at the end of 10 days, and will have some little time to acquaint himself with his surroundings before he begins rehearsals for the first concerts.

Nature of 26th Season.

The orchestra will be away from Boston six weeks instead of five in the course of its 26th season. The change is due to the placing of the western tour of one week in the middle of the season instead of at the beginning, as it was last year. The artistic and financial success of the tour in the middle West the first week of October, 1905, was so great that arrangements were at once in the making for a repetition of an early October tour this year, but the date of the Worcester festival was changed to the first week of next month, and as the orchestra, or at least a large part of it, will play in this festival, the western trip at this time is out of the question.

It has therefore been decided that the orchestra should go West in the last week of January. It will leave Boston on Sunday evening, Jan. 27. Concerts will be given as follows: Rochester on the following Monday evening, Cleveland on Tuesday evening, Detroit on Thursday evening, Indianapolis on Friday evening, Cincinnati on Saturday afternoon. The orchestra will return to Boston on Sunday, Feb. 3.

Boston will not lose by this. The 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts will be given as in past years on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings respectively, but the last pair will come on May 3, 4 instead of on April 26, 27.

The first public rehearsal will be given on Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, and the first concert on Saturday evening, Oct. 13. Until May 3 the public rehearsals and concerts will be given on successive Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings except Nov. 9-10, Dec. 8-9, Jan. 11-12, Feb. 1-2, Feb. 22-23 and March 22-23. According to the established custom the public rehearsal which would come ordinarily on Friday afternoon, March 29, Good Friday, will be given on the afternoon of the preceding day, Thursday, the 28th.

Auction Sale of Seats.

There will be an advance, but one more apparent than real, in the required prices of seats; an advance from $1.50 to $2, and from $12 to $18.

The purpose of this change in the nominal prices of the seats is to shorten and to simplify the auction sale. Several years have passed since any seats, either for the public rehearsals or for the concerts, have sold for less than a premium of $2.50 on the $7.50 seats, and records show that in the past few seasons only an insignificant number of seats brought a premium of less than $6. The sale by auction of over 5000 seats is at its best a long and tedious process. By increasing the required price to a figure which is still most reasonable, viewed in any light whatever, the time consumed in selling the seats should be much shortened.

The auction sale of seats will begin on Monday, Oct. 1, at 10 o'clock, when the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. The $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday morning, at 10 o'clock. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday morning, Oct. 4, at 10 o'clock, and the $10 seats for the concerts at the same hour on Friday morning.

Who Dr. Muck Is.

And now a few words about the new conductor, the soloists, and the programmes.

Dr. Muck has been described as "a man of medium height, of slender and graceful build, who wears his clothes with distinction. His pictures show a well-shaped head, covered with short, black hair, which is brushed back from a high forehead, strongly limned by finely cut features; his eyes are dark, yet bright. An attractive face, decidedly the face of a cultured gentleman, keen, alert and with markings of a sense of humor."

He comes of good stock. His father, Dr. J. Muck, was a Bavarian councillor, who lived in Wuerzburg, where the son was born on Oct. 22, 1859. The father, a lawyer, and a gifted amateur musician, planned that his son should follow in his footsteps, but the latter decided at an early age to subordinate law to music and he finally devoted his life to the preferred art.

His musical education began with lessons on the piano and the violin and in counterpoint. These lessons were given by his father, and they continued while he was in the gymnasium at Wuerzburg. His first appearance in public was at the age of 11, as a pianist. In the succeeding years he played often, usually in chamber music. He also played the violin in a symphony orchestra. In 1876 he went to the University of Heidelberg, where he remained a year. He then went to Leipsic, where he worked for his degree in the university in philosophy, classical philology and the history of music. At the same time he studied in the Leipsic Conservatory, under E. F. Richter and Karl Reinecke. In 1880 he received his degree of Ph. D. from the university and he made his début in the Gewandhaus as a pianist.

Although he was successful as a pianist, he had long determined to be a conductor. He therefore left Leipsic to act as chorus master of the Zurich opera (1880-81). He conducted at Salzburg (1881-82), and for two years (1882-84) he led the opera at Bruenn. As opera conductor at Graz (1884-86), he led the first performance in Austria of "The Mastersingers" (1886). In Graz he also conducted the concerts of the Styrian Music Society, and produced, for the first time in Austria, the seventh symphony of Bruckner, in the presence of the composer. From 1886 to 1892 he led the opera in the German Theatre of Prag, under the management of Angelo Neumann, and also the Philharmonic concerts. In 1889 he conducted for Neumann in St. Petersburg and Moscow performances of the "Ring," and in 1891 he visited Berlin with Neumann's company, and at the Lessing Theatre produced for the first time in that city "Cavalleria Rusticana," Weber-Mahler's "Drei Pintos" and Cornelius' "Barber of Bagdad."

Since 1892 he has been conductor at the Berlin Royal Opera House. He has also led in Berlin the oratorio concerts of the Royal Opera chorus and concerts of the Wagner Society. He has conducted the Silesian Music festivals since 1894, and in 1901, '2, '4, '6, he conducted "Parsifal" in Bayreuth.

As a "guest" he has conducted at St. Petersburg and Moscow (Philharmonic concerts of the Imperial orchestra); at Bremen (1895, eight stage performances of Rubinstein's "Christus"), Copenhagen (Philharmonic concerts); Madrid (concerts of the Royal court orchestra); Paris (Philharmonic concerts), Budapest (concerts of the Court orchestra), London (Philharmonic concerts and German opera).

Facts and Rumors.

Although Dr. Muck has never visited America, it has not been for lack of opportunity. As long ago as 1893 he was considered as a possible conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It will be remembered that after the sudden departure of Mr. Nikisch a contract was made with Dr. Hans Richter whereby he was to become the successor of Mr. Nikisch, but Dr. Richter, for some reason that has not been explained, broke this contract. When Mr. Ellis was in Berlin last spring Dr. Muck showed him a letter which Richter had sent him at the time, in which he urged Dr. Muck to go to Boston as his substitute. Dr. Muck, who had just completed his first season in Berlin with great success, would not listen to any proposition for him to leave the city and his position.

In the last year of Mr. Maurice Grau's direction of the Metropolitan Opera House of New York, Mr. Grau endeavored to persuade Dr. Muck to come to New York for the opera season, and he made him an offer of a salary which was unquestionably the largest that had been offered to a conductor. Dr. Muck refused to consider this offer. Since that time at least one other attempt has been made, but in vain, to induce him to come to this country.

One of the many absurd statements which have been published in this country and in Europe since Dr. Muck's engagement is that he will come to Boston "on trial." A man of his reputation does not go anywhere "on trial." His position in Berlin is one of the most desirable and the most coveted in Europe. His services are constantly demanded by leading opera houses and orchestras of the continent. And what counts even more than this in Germany—he has for years enjoyed the personal friendship of Emperor William.

That Dr. Muck has engaged himself in Boston for only one year is due to his own desire. His leave of absence from his duties had to come directly from the Emperor. His first request met with a refusal. Only when it was pointed out to the Emperor that his consent to the engagement would be accepted in America as another token of his undoubtedly kindly feeling toward this country and that the Boston Symphony orchestra was wholly an artistic and not commercial enterprise did William decide to grant a leave of absence.

List of Soloists.

Aside from the first four programmes, which are given below, little is known of Dr. Muck's plans for the season, what his general scheme will be, what unfamiliar compositions he will introduce. All this will be learned after his arrival.

In the mean time, an unusually strong list of soloists has been prepared. Several of the engagements have not yet been confirmed, pending the arrival of Dr. Muck, so that the following list is incomplete.

At the head of the list of singers stand the names of Mmes. Melba and Fremstad. Mme. Melba will come to the United States in January to be the leading lyric soprano of the new Manhattan Opera House, directed by Mr. Hammerstein. She will sing in a few concerts while in this country. One of them will be in Boston with the Symphony orchestra, and this will be her only appearance in the city. Mme. Fremstad, one of the most talented of the younger singers, will return to the Metropolitan Opera House for this season, and she will impersonate the part of Salome in Richard Strauss' opera. She, too, will sing in a few concerts.

In the list of pianists are, among the women, the names of Mmes. Samaroff, Szumowska, Katherine Goodson and Olga Radecki. Mme. Samaroff, it will be remembered, played with the orchestra last year. She is one of the best liked and most admired of the younger pianists. Mme. Szumowska needs no introduction, for she has long had an admiring audience in the city where she lives. Katherine Goodson, an Englishwoman, will make her first appearance in America with the Symphony orchestra. She is highly recommended. Olga Radecki, once well known to Symphony audiences, will return after a long absence.

Messrs. Paderewski, Rosenthal and Gabrilowitsch are in the list of the pianists. Mr. Paderewski will come to this country late in December or early in January for seven performances with the Symphony orchestra in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. His new symphony will be produced by the orchestra. Mr. Rosenthal, one of the most distinguished pianists now living, will return to America after an absence of several years. Mr. Gabrilowitsch, an excellent artist, who is said to have grown greatly in musical stature since he last visited Boston, will be warmly welcomed.

Messrs. Cesar Thomson and Alexander Petschnikoff are among the violinists announced. Mr. Thomson is reckoned as one of the greatest living masters of the violin, and Mr. Petschnikoff is said to have gained in artistry since he was in this country.

Messrs. Willy Hess, Timothee Adamowski and Heinrich Warnke, members of the orchestra, will also play as soloists. Mr. Warnke has brought with him from Europe a new violoncello which is said to be an extraordinarily fine instrument.

Other names will be announced immediately after the arrival of Dr. Muck.

First Four Programmes.

The first four programmes, as sent by Dr. Muck, are as follows:

I.

Symphony in C minor, No. 5....Beethoven
A Faust Overture....Wagner
Siegfried Idyl....Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers"....Wagner

II.

Suite for flute and strings....Bach
Symphony in G minor, No. 13....Haydn
Symphony in C major, "Jupiter"....Mozart
Soloist, Mr. Willy Hess.

III.

Symphony in C minor, No. 1....Brahms
Tone poem, "Don Juan"....Strauss
Three movements from "The Damnation of Faust"....Berlioz

IV.

Symphony in B flat major, No. 1. Schumann
Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished"....Schubert
Overture to "Der Freischuetz"....Weber
Soloist, Mme. Fremstad.

These programmes were made by Dr. Muck in the early summer. They are naturally subject to change after his arrival, when the titles of the solo numbers will be announced.

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
2.5 mm 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
4.5 mm 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Symphony Season, Which Begins Soon, Gives Promise of Great Success

MORIZ ROSENTHAL

KARL MUCK

HEINRICH WARUKE

OLGA SAMMOFF

MME MELBA

PADEREWSKI

PHOTO COPYRIGHT BY J. E. PURDY.

On Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, the Symphony Orchestra will give its first public rehearsal of the year. It will mark the beginning of the second quarter century of the orchestra, and it will be counted as the 2400th concert, for when the orchestra ended its season last spring it had played in public just 2399 times, since its first concert, on Oct. 21, 1881. It begins the second quarter of its century life with most glowing prospects, for not only is the orchestra in a higher state of discipline and efficiency than it has ever been before, but it will have as conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, who is one of the most distinguished musicians of the world.

The prospectus for the season of 1906-1907 necessarily shows much that is familiar, but there are two or three innovations which will strike the eye immediately. The first is, of course, the new conductor. The second is the absence of the orchestra from Boston six weeks during the winter, instead of the usual five, and the third—more apparent than real—is the increase in the upset prices of seats for the public rehearsals and for the concerts.

This increase was made only after long and careful consideration. Its object is to shorten and simplify the auction sales. Investigation has shown that in the last several years none of the $7.50 seats has brought a premium of less than $2.50, and that only an insignificant number of the $12 seats has brought a premium of less than $6. For this reason, the management has decided to raise the prices of the $7.50 seats to $10 and the price of the $12 seats to $18. It is needless to say that these prices are still nominal in every sense of the word. By this means, starting at a higher figure, the time of the long and tedious auction sale should be materially lessened.

The auction sales will begin a week from next Monday, Oct. 1st, at 10 A. M. for the sale of the $18 seats for the public rehearsals. On Tuesday, the $10 seats for the public rehearsal will be sold. On Thursday the $18 seats for the concerts and on Friday the $10 seats for the concerts, all sales beginning precisely at 10 o'clock in the morning.

Year's Recitals.

The first public rehearsal and concert will be given on Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, and Saturday evening, Oct. 13, respectively. The orchestra will not be here on Nov. 9 and 10, Dec. 7 and 8, Jan. 11 and 12, Feb. 1 and 2, Feb. 22 and 23 and March 22 and 23. There will be, as always, 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts, but the last pair will fall on May 3 and 4 instead of on April 26 and 27, as would have happened without this western trip. As is always the custom, the public rehearsal which would fall on March 29, which is Good Friday, will be given on the afternoon of the preceding day, Thursday, March 28.

Popular Conductor.

Unquestionably the chief interest of the season centres in the coming of Dr. Karl Muck, who is to sail from Bremen day after tomorrow on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse and will arrive in New York on Oct. 2. In a way, the engagement of Dr. Muck is a radical departure in the policy of the orchestra. He is the first conductor of established reputation it has brought to America, for all the other conductors—Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch and Paur—were comparatively unknown men when they came to Boston, and indeed the greater part of their reputation today is based on their work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With Dr. Muck the case is different. His own connection with the important operas of Berlin and Prague, with the Philharmonic Orchestra, with the Wagner festivals at Bayreuth, as well as many "guest" appearances with the principal operas and orchestras of Europe, has made his name famous to all those who follow the musical news of the world, as a distinguished member of that little group of conductors who stand at the very front of the world of music.

Dr. Muck is unquestionable the most popular conductor that Berlin has ever had, and, in addition to this, he has for years enjoyed the personal friendship of the Emperor. It may be stated as an absolute truth that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only organization in this country which could have secured Dr. Muck's services. It is known in Europe as the one institution in this country in which the commercial element is entirely lacking, whose whole standard is artistic. It was this that influenced Dr. Muck far more than any money consideration. As a matter of fact, he has already refused offers from America which carried with them more money than he is to receive in Boston. Maurice Grau once, a few years ago, tried to get him for his chief conductor at the Metropolitan opera in New York, naming a salary which is undoubtedly the largest that has ever been offered to a conductor. Dr. Muck would not consider the proposition. Since then, at least two other offers materially splendid, have been made to him without success.

Splendid Soloists.

The coming of such a distinguished conductor does not in the least mean that the list of soloists will be any the less strong.

At the head of the list of singers come Melba and Fremstad. In the list of pianists among the women are the names of Samaroff, Szumowska, Katherine Goodson and Olga Radecki, and among the men are the names of Paderewski, Rosenthal and Gabrilowitsch.

Two names appear in the list of foreign violinists, those of Cesar Thomson and Petschnikiff. There will also appear Professor Willy Hess, Timothee Adamowski, and Heinrich Warnke.

Of Dr. Muck's plans, it is impossible to say much. It is understood that he intends to present some interesting novelties, one of them a work of large dimensions.

Among the novelties which Dr. Muck expects to present in Boston next winter is Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica." This is the huge work which had its first production in this country three years ago when Richard Strauss was over here. As Dr. Muck was a close friend of Strauss, and has been his colleague in the Berlin Opera for many years, it goes almost without saying that his presentation of the work will be authoritative in every sense of the word. The "Sinfonia Domestica" is now included in the repertoires of all the great orchestras and is generally regarded as being the greatest of Strauss's instrumental works.

Boston Traveler

Sept. 27, 1906.

Boston Transcript

Sept. 29, 1906.

The Symphony Sales

The seats for the "public rehearsals," on Friday afternoons, of the Symphony Orchestra for the new season will be sold by auction in Symphony Hall on Monday and Tuesday next beginning at ten o'clock each morning. The seats priced at $18 without the premium will be sold on Monday; those priced at $10 on Tuesday. The seats for the concerts on Saturdays will be sold in Symphony Hall on the following Thursday and Friday beginning each day at ten o'clock. The seats at the nominal price of $18 will be auctioned on Thursday, and the seats at $10 on Friday. "Intending, bidders," says a note from the management, "should be mindful of the fact that the sales this year are likely to progress much more rapidly than they have in the past. Starting at a higher figure, the seats will probably be disposed of in very considerably less time than has been the case at previous sales. In former years bidders have known at about what hour the seats they wished would come up for sale and, instead of waiting from the beginning, have come at that time. Under the new system it will be well for them to make ample allowance for the increased speed in the disposal of the seats, else they may fail to get those that they wish."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Unless the unexpected happens, Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will reach New York next Tuesday, since he sailed on the twenty-fifth from Bremen, on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. His arrival will put definitely at rest the rumors concerning his illness and inability to fulfill his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

The Boston Symphony Quartet—which is a part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—will give a few concerts in the Middle West in the first of October. It will play in Troy, Buffalo, Rochester, Geneva and Detroit and possibly in one or two other places.

Malden Mirror, Sept. 29-06

The time is near at hand for the annual auction sale of seats for the symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston. This is of the utmost importance to residents of the section surrounding Boston, for it is estimated that not less than 60 per cent of the subscribers for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals come from the towns in the neighborhood of the city. The dates of the sales are Monday and Tuesday, Oct. 1st and 2d, when the seats for the public rehearsals will be sold, beginning at 10 o'clock in the morning, and Thursday and Friday, Oct. 4th and 5th, when the seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold. The coming season should be the most brilliant in the history of the orchestra. Not only is the list of soloists unusually strong, but, more important, for the first time in thirteen years—since Mr. Paur came to Boston—the orchestra will have a new conductor. Dr. Karl Muck, who comes from Berlin to conduct the orchestra during the present season, is one of the greatest men in the world of music. For fourteen years he has been principal conductor of the royal opera in Berlin, and for several years past he has been the conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, and one of the conductors at the Barieuth Festival. He brings with him to America a reputation second to none. The esteem in which he is held in Germany may be judged from the fact that two separate applications, backed by the strongest influence, had to be made to the German emperor before a leave of absence was granted to his favorite conductor. In the list of soloists are the names of such artists as Melba, Fremstad, Paderewski, Rosenthal, Gabrilowitsch, Cesar Thomson, Petachnikoff, to say nothing of representative men from the orchestra like Hess, Adamowski, Warnke, and other musicians of only less brilliancy.

Sunday Post

Sept. 30, 1906.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The first of the series of auction sales of seats for the coming series of public rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held tomorrow in Symphony Hall, beginning at 10 o'clock. The sale tomorrow will be confined to the $18 seats for the public rehearsals. On Tuesday, beginning at the same hour, the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday and the $10 seats on Friday.

Intending bidders should be mindful of the fact that the sales this year are likely to progress much more rapidly than they have in the past. Starting at a higher figure, it is calculated that the seats will be disposed of in very considerably less time than has been the case in the past. In former years bidders have known about what hours the seats they wanted would come up for sale, and, instead of waiting from the beginning, have come at that time. Under the new system it will be well for them to make ample allowance for the increased speed in the disposal of the seats, else they may fail to get those which they want.

Dr. Muck is on the ocean and will arrive in New York some time next Tuesday. He will come directly to Boston. Practically all the members of the orchestra are back in town and have reported for duty. A few who have been abroad will not get back until the end of the week. Rather more than half of the orchestra will be in Worcester this week at the music festival in that city. It is an interesting fact that this is the first season that the festival has had the "Boston Symphony Orchestra." Heretofore they have had members of the orchestra, but the placing of the festival in October instead of September brings it into the orchestra year and for this reason the official name of the institution is used.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1906.

Next week brings the very prosaic but very necessary prelude to the symphony season, the auction sales in Symphony Hall of the seats for the twenty-four public rehearsals and the twenty-four concerts. The first sale will be on Monday, when the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. On Tuesday the $10 seats for the public rehearsals; on Thursday the $18 seats for the concerts, and on Friday the $10 seats. All the sales will begin promptly at 10 o'clock.

Intending bidders should be mindful of the fact that the sales this year are likely to progress much more rapidly than they have in the past. Starting at a higher figure, it is calculated that the seats will be disposed of in very considerably less time than has been the case in the past. In former years bidders have known about what hour the seats they wanted would come up for sale, and instead of waiting from the beginning, have come at that time. Under the new system it will be well for them to make ample allowance for the increased speed in the disposal of the seats, else they may fail to get those which they want.

Dr. Muck is on the ocean and will arrive in New York some time next Tuesday. He will come directly to Boston. Practically all the members of the orchestra are back in town and have reported for duty. A few who have been abroad will not get back until the end of the week. Rather more than half of the orchestra will be in Worcester next week at the music festival in that city. It is an interesting fact that this is the first season that the festival has had the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Heretofore it has had members of the orchestra, but the placing of the festival in October instead of September it into the orchestra year, and for this reason the official name of the institution is used.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Unless the unexpected occurs, Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will reach this city next Tuesday, since he sailed Sept. 25 from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. His arrival will put definitely at rest the many wild rumors concerning his illness and inability to fulfill his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck left Bremen in the best of health and spirits and is looking forward with great keenness to his season's work in this country. It is an interesting programme which he has arranged for his first concert in Boston. There will be no soloist, as it was his desire to have the concert purely orchestral. The first number will be Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, No. 5, and then will follow three works of Wagner: "A Faust Overture," "Siegfried Idyll," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Willy Hess, leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, which will give three concerts next season at Mendelssohn Hall, announces some novelties for the programmes. They will include a serenade for strings by Emil Jaques-Dalcroze, the Swiss composer; a quartet in A major by Glière, the young Russian composer; quartet in B flat by Suk, the Bohemian; new quintet for strings by Weingartner, a quartet in D major by Hugo Kaun, a sonata for piano, and 'cello by Martucci, and a "sinfonia da camera" for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, horn, double bass, piano, and string quartet, by Wolf-Ferrari.

Boston American

Sept. 30, 1906

Coming Music Events

The first of the series of auction sales of seats for the coming series of public rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held to-morrow in Symphony Hall, beginning at 10 o'clock. The sale to-morrow will be confined to the $18 seats for the public rehearsals. On Tuesday, beginning at the same hour, the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday and the $10 seats on Friday. Intending bidders should remember that the sales this year are likely to progress much more rapidly than they have in the past. Dr. Muck is on the ocean and will arrive in New York some time next Tuesday. He will come directly to Boston. Practically all the members of the orchestra are back in town and have reported for duty. The prospects for the season are very bright, not merely in Boston, but everywhere the orchestra gives concerts.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
N. Y. EVG SUN
SEP 29 1906

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

WHY DR. KARL MUCK DOES NOT FEAR THE MUCK RAKE.

Boston Symphony's Conductor for One Year Only, by Special Grace of the Kaiser, Is Now Approaching America's Gateway Off the Port of New York—Comes in Distinguished Company with Leoncavallo, Mlle. Parkina, Vigna and Other Migrating Musicians—Early Opening of the Musical Season Near.

When in years before has the musical Noah's Ark of the season been wirelessly reported off Nantucket in the wee small hours of bright October's first days? It is yet a little while before the Conried and the Hammerstein imported songbirds will be sailing this way. But the birds of passage already reported are enough at least to make an Indian summer. Among the celebrities on the incoming Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, due in New York next Tuesday, are Ruggiero Leoncavallo, composer of "Pagliacci";, Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Eliabeth Parkina, prima donna for the Worcester Festival, and Artura Vigna, the Metropolitan conductor for Italian operas. With other passengers like Yvette Guilbert and Albert Chevalier, it is small wonder that somebody has exclaimed: "What a constellation of stars for a ship's concert!"

Karl Muck, as the late Matthew Arnold would have put it, "is not half so bad as he is spelled. And, indeed, all spelling reform aside, it may as well be said once for all that Dr. Muck is not the inventor of the "muck rake." He never saw that Western weapon of offence, and he would neither know nor fear it if he did. With his first experience of our shame-finders and American interviewers generally before him, he has not waited to mature years for this visit because of any lack of invitations hitherto. Thirteen years ago Mr. Higginson would have engaged him. After the departure of Nikisch in 1893, a contract was signed with Hans Richter whereby that distinguished conductor bound himself for five years and then declined to cross the ocean at all. Richter, to relieve the difficulty, recommended young Muck as a coming man of Germany. Dr. Muck was beginning his third year in Berlin, he had had great success, and he let it be known that he would not consider any offer from America. Thus the choice fell on Emil Paur, who had succeeded Nikisch as conductor of the Municipal Opera of Leipsic. The policy in Boston was never that of engaging "baton prima donnas," and Gericke himself, as well as Henschel, started in the old days as comparatively an unknown man.

It is a personage of consequence in the musical world to-day who comes to take command of the orchestra in its twenty-sixth year. Dr. Muck is conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin. His temporary release, by consent of the Kaiser, was obtained only under the same entente cordiale that exists beween the German Emperor and America as a whole, whereby a bronze Frederick the Great now stands in Washington and a live Columbia professor, Dr. Burgess, gives instruction abroad to Wilhelm and his people. Dr. Muck comes fresh from Bayreuth, where he conducted the four performances of "Parsifal," and from Salzburg, where he was one of the conductors of the Mozart Festival. Early in the present month he led a few performances at the Berlin Opera. His place there will be taken by Leo Blach, of the Opera at Prague.

Going directly to Boston on arrival here, he will have a week in which to get used to his new surroundings. He will meet his orchestra for serious work on Oct. 8. At the public rehearsal and concert in Boston, a fortnight from now, Muck's first programme will be Beethoven's C minor Symphony, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," "Faust Overture" and Prelude to "Meistersinger." The annual Boston sale next week will be the usual auction, but not at a considerable advance over the old minimum or starting price of $7.50 and $12 for the twenty-four concerts and rehearsals. It has been a good many years since any of the seats has brought, with its premium, less than $10 or $18 respectively. The change to these figures has been made merely to save time in the sale.

New York's Boston Symphony sale will open at Carnegie Hall on Monday for renewals by the old subscribers. New subscribers will wait until Oct. 15. The first concerts are Nov. 8 and 10, and the star of the season is the January soloist and symphony composer, Paderewski.

Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
COMMERCIAL GLOBE
SEP 29 1906

NOTES OF THE MUSICAL WORLD

THE following biographical data concerning Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, season 1906-1907, has been supplied by Dr. Muck himself:

He was born on Oct. 22, 1859, in Würzburg, Germany, the son of Dr. J. Muck, a councillor of the kingdom of Bavaria. He began the study of the violin, piano and counterpoint under his father, who was a talented musician, continuing it later in the Gymnasium. At the age of eleven he began to appear in public as a pianist, generally in chamber music, and later played the violin in a symphony orchestra.

The year of 1876 he spent at the University of Heidelberg, whence he went to Leipsic, where he stayed two years working for his degree in philosophy, classical philology and musical history, at the same time working in the Leipsic Conservatory under Ernst Friedrich Richter and Karl Reinecke. He made his debut as a pianist in the Leipsic Gewandhaus in 1880, the same year receiving his degree of Ph. D.

His subsequent career has been as follows:

1880-1881—Chorus master in the Municipal Theatre, in Zürich.

1881-1882—Conductor at Salzburg, Austria.

1882-1884—Conductor of Opera at Brünn, Austria.

1884-1886—Conductor of Opera at Graz, Austria, where he gave the first unabridged performance in Austria of "Die Meistersinger." At the same time he was the conductor of the Styrian Musikverein, and in 1886 gave the first performance in Austria of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony.

1886-1892—Conductor of the German Opera at Prague and conductor of the Philharmonic concerts in the same city.

1889—Conductor of Angelo Neumann's company, which gave the first performances in Russia of Wagner's "Ring." In this company were Vogl, Malten, Schläger, Reichmann, and other famous artists.

1891—Conductor of Angelo Neumann's company at the Lessing Theatre, Berlin, giving the first performances in Berlin of "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mahler's revised version of Weber's "Drei Pinto's," and Cornelius's "The Barber of Bagdad."

1892-1906—Principal conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin.

In 1894 he gave the first performance in Germany of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony at the symphony concerts of the Royal Chapel. He has been the director of the oratorio concerts of the Royal Opera chorus, and since 1894 has been the conductor of the Schleswig Music Festival.

As "guest conductor" he has appeared in St. Petersburg and Moscow; at the Philharmonic concerts in Bremen, where, in 1895, he gave a scenic production of Rubinstein's "Christus"; at the Philharmonic concerts in Copenhagen; at the royal concerts in Madrid; at the Philharmonic concerts in Paris; at the royal concerts in Budapest, and at the Philharmonic concerts and Royal Opera in London.

In 1901, 1902, 1904, and 1906 he conducted all the performances of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth. For the past three seasons he has been one of the conductors of the Vienna Philharmonic concerts, and was to have conducted all of them in the winter of 1906-1907 had he not come to America.

DR. KARL MUCK,
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

LAST year's subscribers to both series of concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra may renew their subscriptions for the coming season and secure the same seats they had last year by application to the box office of Carnegie Hall on and after Monday, Oct. 1. All communications should be addressed to C. A. Ellis, manager, and all checks should be made out to his order.

EAGLE
N. Y.
1906

MUSIC NOTES.

Dr. Muck on the Ocean—Brooklyn Institute's Season to Open.

Unless the unexpected occurs, Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will reach New York next Tuesday, since he sailed on the 25th from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. His arrival will put definitely at rest the many wild rumors concerning his illness and inability to fulfill his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck left Bremen in the best of health and spirits and is looking forward with great keenness to his season's work in this country.

It is an interesting programme which he has arranged for his first concert in Boston. There will be no soloist, as it was his desire to have the concert purely orchestral. The first numbers will be Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, No. 5, and then will follow three works of Wagner, "A Faust Overture," "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

BROOKLYN MUSIC SEASON WILL BEGIN NEXT WEEK

Institute Announces an Organ Recital by S... Wheeler.

MR. SURETTE'S RECITALS.

Scarano and His Band at the Hippodrome. Concert Plans of Musical Stars.

Unless the unexpected occurs, Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will reach New York next Tuesday, since he sailed on Sept. 25 from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. His arrival will put definitely at rest the many wild rumors concerning his illness and inability to fulfill his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck left Bremen in the best of health and spirits and is looking forward with great keenness to his season's work in this country.

It is an interest programme which he has arranged for his first concert in Boston. There will be no solist, as it was his desire to have the concert purely orchestral. The first number will be Beethoven's Symphony in C Minor, No. 5, and then will follow three works of Wagner: "A Faust Overture," "Siegfried Idyll" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From TOWN & COUNTRY NEW YORK CITY.
Address
Date SEP 29 1906

Town & Country has pleasure in presenting to its readers the first really satisfactory portrait of Dr. Karl Muck that has appeared in this country. Dr. Muck is to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1906-1907. The following biographical data is authoritative, being supplied by himself:

He was born on October 22, 1859, in Würzburg, Germany, the son of Dr. J. Muck, a Councillor of the Kingdom of Bavaria. He began the study of the violin, piano and counterpoint under his father, who was a talented musician, continuing it later in the Gymnasium. At the age of eleven he began to appear in public as a pianist, generally in chamber music, and later played the violin in a symphony orchestra. The year 1876 he spent at the University of Heidelberg, whence he went to Leipsic where he stayed two years working for his degree in philosophy, classical philology and musical history, at the same time working in the Leipsic Conservatory under Ernst Friedrich Richter and Karl Reinecke. He made his debut as a pianist in the Leipsic Gewandhaus in 1880, the same year receiving his degree of Ph. D.

His subsequent career has been as follows: 1880-1881, Chorus Master in the Municipal Theater in Zürich; 1881-1882, Conductor

Photograph by Lundt, Berlin

DR. KARL MUCK

Who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1906—1907

at Salzsburg, Austria; 1882-1884, Conductor of Opera at Brünn, Austria; 1884-1886, Conductor of Opera at Graz, Austria, where he gave the first unabridged performance in Austria of "Die Meistersinger." At the same time he was the conductor of the Styrian Musikverein and in 1886 gave the first performance in Austria of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony.

From 1886 to 1892, he was Conductor of the German Opera at Prague and conductor of the Philharmonic Concerts in the same city. In 1889 he was Conductor of Angelo Neumann's company which gave the first performances in Russia of Wagner's "Ring." In this company were Vogl, Malten, Schläger, Reichmann and other famous artists. In 1891 he was Conductor of Angelo Neumann's company at the Lessing Theater, Berlin, giving the first performances in Berlin of "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mahler's revised version of Weber's "Drei Pinto's" and Cornelius's "The Barber of Bagdad."

In 1892-1906, he was principal conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin, and in 1894 he gave the first performance in Germany of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony at the symphony concerts of the Royal Chapel. He has been the director of the oratorio concerts of the Royal Opera Chorus, and, since 1894, has been the conductor of the Schleswig Music Festival.

As "Guest Conductor" he has appeared in St. Petersburg and Moscow; at the Philharmonic concerts in Bremen, where in 1895 he gave a scenic production of Rubinstein's "Christus"; at the Philharmonic concerts in Copenhagen; at the Royal concerts in Madrid; at the Philharmonic concerts in Paris; at the Royal concerts in Budapest; and at the Philharmonic concerts and Royal Opera in London. In 1901, 1902, 1904 and 1906 he conducted all the performances of "Parsifal" at Beyreuth. For the past three seasons he has been one of the conductors of the Vienna Philharmonic concerts and was to have conducted all of them in the winter of 1906-1907 had he not come to America.

[12]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
N. Y. EVG SUN
YORK
Most Complete
Bureau in the World

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

WHY DR. KARL MUCK DOES NOT FEAR THE MUCK RAKE.

Boston Symphony's Conductor for One Year Only, by Special Grace of the Kaiser, Is Now Approaching America's Gateway Off the Port of New York—Comes in Distinguished Company with Leoncavallo, Mlle. Parkina, Vigna and Other Migrating Musicians—Early Opening of the Musical Season Near.

When in years before has the musical Noah's Ark of the season been wirelessly reported off Nantucket in the wee small hours of bright October's first days? It is yet a little while before the Conried and the Hammerstein imported songbirds will be sailing this way. But the birds of passage already reported are enough at least to make an Indian summer. Among the celebrities on the incoming Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, due in New York next Tuesday, are Ruggiero Leoncavallo, composer of "Pagliacci";, Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Eliabeth Parkina, prima donna for the Worcester Festival, and Artura Vigna, the Metropolitan conductor for Italian operas. With other passengers like Yvette Guilbert and Albert Chevalier, it is small wonder that somebody has exclaimed: "What a constellation of stars for a ship's concert!"

Karl Muck; as the late Matthew Arnold would have put it, "is not half so bad as he is spelled. And, indeed, all spelling reform aside, it may as well be said once for all that Dr. Muck is not the inventor of the "muck rake." He never saw that Western weapon of offence, and he would neither know nor fear it if he did. With his first experience of our shame-finders and American interviewers generally before him, he has not waited to mature years for this visit because of any lack of invitations hitherto. Thirteen years ago Mr. Higginson would have engaged him. After the departure of Nikisch in 1893, a contract was signed with Hans Richter whereby that distinguished conductor bound himself for five years and then declined to cross the ocean at all. Richter, to relieve the difficulty, recommended young Muck as a coming man of Germany. Dr. Muck was beginning his third year in Berlin, he had had great success, and he let it be known that he would not consider any offer from America. Thus the choice fell on Emil Paur, who had succeeded Nikisch as conductor of the Municipal Opera of Leipsic. The policy in Boston was never that of engaging "baton prima donnas," and Gericke himself, as well as Henschel, started in the old days as comparatively an unknown man.

It is a personage of consequence in the musical world to-day who comes to take command of the orchestra in its twenty-sixth year. Dr. Muck is conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin. His temporary release, by consent of the Kaiser, was obtained only under the same entente cordiale that exists beween the German Emperor and America as a whole, whereby a bronze Frederick the Great now stands in Washington and a live Columbia professor, Dr. Burgess, gives instruction abroad to Wilhelm and his people. Dr. Muck comes fresh from Bayreuth, where he conducted the four performances of "Parsifal," and from Salzburg, where he was one of the conductors of the Mozart Festival. Early in the present month he led a few performances at the Berlin Opera. His place there will be taken by Leo Blach, of the Opera at Prague.

Going directly to Boston on arrival here, he will have a week in which to get used to his new surroundings. He will meet his orchestra for serious work on Oct. 8. At the public rehearsal and concert in Boston, a fortnight from now, Muck's first programme will be Beethoven's C minor Symphony, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," "Faust Overture" and Prelude to "Meistersinger." The annual Boston sale next week will be the usual auction, but not at a considerable advance over the old minimum or starting price of $7.50 and $12 for the twenty-four concerts and rehearsals. It has been a good many years since any of the seats has brought, with its premium, less than $10 or $18 respectively. The change to these figures has been made merely to save time in the sale.

New York's Boston Symphony sale will open at Carnegie Hall on Monday for renewals by the old subscribers. New subscribers will wait until Oct. 15. The first concerts are Nov. 8 and 10, and the star of the season is the January soloist and symphony composer, Paderewski.

NOTES OF THE MUSICAL WORLD

THE following biographical data concerning Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, season 1906-1907, has been supplied by Dr. Muck himself:

He was born on Oct. 22, 1859, in Würzburg, Germany, the son of Dr. J. Muck, a councillor of the kingdom of Bavaria. He began the study of the violin, piano, and counterpoint under his father, who was a talented musician, continuing it later in the Gymnasium. At the age of eleven he began to appear in public as a pianist, generally in chamber music, and later played the violin in a symphony orchestra.

The year of 1876 he spent at the University of Heidelberg, whence he went to Leipsic, where he stayed two years working for his degree in philosophy, classical philology, and musical history, at the same time working in the Leipsic Conservatory under Ernst Friedrich Richter and Karl Reinecke. He made his début as a pianist in the Leipsic Gewandhaus in 1880, the same year receiving his degree of Ph. D.

His subsequent career has been as follows:

1880-1881—Chorus master in the Municipal Theatre, in Zürich.

1881-1882—Conductor at Salzburg, Austria.

1882-1884—Conductor of Opera at Brünn, Austria.

1884-1886—Conductor of Opera at Graz, Austria, where he gave the first unabridged performance in Austria of "Die Meistersinger." At the same time he was the conductor of the Styrian Musikverein, and in 1886 gave the first performance in Austria of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony.

1886-1892—Conductor of the German Opera at Prague and conductor of the Philharmonic concerts in the same city.

1889—Conductor of Angelo Neumann's company, which gave the first performances in Russia of Wagner's "Ring." In this company were Vogl, Malten, Schläger, Reichmann, and other famous artists.

1891—Conductor of Angelo Neumann's company at the Lessing Theatre, Berlin, giving the first performances in Berlin of "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mahler's revised version of Weber's "Drei Pinto's," and Cornelius's "The Barber of Bagdad."

1892-1906—Principal conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin.

In 1894 he gave the first performance in Germany of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony at the symphony concerts of the Royal Chapel. He has been the director of the oratorio concerts of the Royal Opera chorus, and since 1894 has been the conductor of the Schleswig Music Festival.

As "guest conductor" he has appeared in St. Petersburg and Moscow; at the Philharmonic concerts in Bremen, where, in 1895, he gave a scenic production of Rubinstein's "Christus"; at the Philharmonic concerts in Copenhagen; at the royal concerts in Madrid; at the Philharmonic concerts in Paris; at the royal concerts in Budapest, and at the Philharmonic concerts and Royal Opera in London.

In 1901, 1902, 1904, and 1906 he conducted all the performances of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth. For the past three seasons he has been one of the conductors of the Vienna Philharmonic concerts, and was to have conducted all of them in the winter of 1906-1907 had he not come to America.

DR. KARL MUCK,
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

LAST year's subscribers to both series of concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra may renew their subscriptions for the coming season and secure the same seats they had last year by application to the box office of Carnegie Hall on and after Monday, Oct. 1. All communications should be addressed to C. A. Ellis, manager, and all checks should be made out to his order.

MUSIC NOTES.

Dr. Muck on the Ocean—Brooklyn Institute's Season to Open.

Unless the unexpected occurs, Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will reach New York next Tuesday, since he sailed on the 25th from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. His arrival will put definitely at rest the many wild rumors concerning his illness and inability to fulfill his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck left Bremen in the best of health and spirits and is looking forward with great keenness to his season's work in this country.

It is an interesting programme which he has arranged for his first concert in Boston. There will be no soloist, as it was his desire to have the concert purely orchestral. The first numbers will be Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, No. 5, and then will follow three works of Wagner, "A Faust Overture," "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

BROOKLYN MUSIC SEASON WILL BEGIN NEXT WEEK

Institute Announces an Organ Recital by S... Wheeler.

MR. SURETTE'S RECITALS.

Scarano and his Band at the Hippodrome. Concert Plans of Musical Stars.

Unless the unexpected occurs, Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will reach New York next Tuesday, since he sailed on Sept. 25 from Bremen on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. His arrival will put definitely at rest the many wild rumors concerning his illness and inability to fulfill his engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck left Bremen in the best of health and spirits and is looking forward with great keenness to his season's work in this country.

It is an interest programme which he has arranged for his first concert in Boston. There will be no solist, as it was his desire to have the concert purely orchestral. The first number will be Beethoven's Symphony in C Minor, No. 5, and then will follow three works of Wagner; "A Faust Overture," "Siegfried Idyll" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The First Established
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From TOWN & COUNTRY
Address
Date

Established: London

Town & Country has pleasure in presenting to its readers the first really satisfactory portrait of Dr. Karl Muck that has appeared in this country. Dr. Muck is to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1906-1907. The following biographical data is authoritative, being supplied by himself:

He was born on October 22, 1859, in Würzburg, Germany, the son of Dr. J. Muck, a Councillor of the Kingdom of Bavaria. He began the study of the violin, piano and counterpoint under his father, who was a talented musician, continuing it later in the Gymnasium. At the age of eleven he began to appear in public as a pianist, generally in chamber music, and later played the violin in a symphony orchestra. The year 1876 he spent at the University of Heidelberg, whence he went to Leipsic where he stayed two years working for his degree in philosophy, classical philology and musical history, at the same time working in the Leipsic Conservatory under Ernst Friedrich Richter and Karl Reinecke. He made his debut as a pianist in the Leipsic Gewandhaus in 1880, the same year receiving his degree of Ph. D.

His subsequent career has been as follows: 1880-1881, Chorus Master in the Municipal Theater in Zürich; 1881-1882, Conductor

Photograph by Lundt, Berlin

DR. KARL MUCK

Who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1906—1907

at Salzsburg, Austria; 1882-1884, Conductor of Opera at Brünn, Austria; 1884-1886, Conductor of Opera at Graz, Austria, where he gave the first unabridged performance in Austria of "Die Meistersinger." At the same time he was the conductor of the Styrian Musikverein and in 1886 gave the first performance in Austria of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony.

From 1886 to 1892, he was Conductor of the German Opera at Prague and conductor of the Philharmonic Concerts in the same city. In 1889 he was Conductor of Angelo Neumann's company which gave the first performances in Russia of Wagner's "Ring." In this company were Vogl, Malten, Schläger, Reichmann and other famous artists. In 1891 he was Conductor of Angelo Neumann's company at the Lessing Theater, Berlin, giving the first performances in Berlin of "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mahler's revised version of Weber's "Drei Pinto's" and Cornelius's "The Barber of Bagdad."

In 1892-1906, he was principal conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin, and in 1894 he gave the first performance in Germany of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony at the symphony concerts of the Royal Chapel. He has been the director of the oratorio concerts of the Royal Opera Chorus, and, since 1894, has been the conductor of the Schleswig Music Festival.

As "Guest Conductor" he has appeared in St. Petersburg and Moscow; at the Philharmonic concerts in Bremen, where in 1895 he gave a scenic production of Rubinstein's "Christus"; at the Philharmonic concerts in Copenhagen; at the Royal concerts in Madrid; at the Philharmonic concerts in Paris; at the Royal concerts in Budapest; and at the Philharmonic concerts and Royal Opera in London. In 1901, 1902, 1904 and 1906 he conducted all the performances of "Parsifal" at Beyreuth. For the past three seasons he has been one of the conductors of the Vienna Philharmonic concerts and was to have conducted all of them in the winter of 1906-1907 had he not come to America.

N. Y. EVG. WORLD

Karl Muck, New Leader Of Boston Orchestra

DR. KARL MUCK, who this season succeeds William Gericke as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has filled many places with credit. He was born in Wurzburg, Germany, in 1859. Educated at Heidelberg and Leipsic, he made his debut as a pianist in the Leipsic Gewandhaus in 1880. Subsequently he led choruses or conducted opera in Zurich, Salzburg, Brunn, Graz and Prague. From 1892 to 1906 he was the principal conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin.

As "Guest" conductor he has directed concerts in St. Petersburg, Moscow, Bremen, Copenhagen, Madrid, Paris, Budapest and London. For four years he conducted all the "Parsifal" performances at Bayreuth and for the last three seasons he has been one of the conductors of the Vienna Philharmonic concerts.

Mr. Gericke, well beloved in New York, has been spending the summer in Switzerland and now is settled in Vienna. Of his successor he writes:

"I am greatly rejoiced that, after so long a search, the question of who should be my successor was so happily solved. Dr. Muck is a capable musician and a fine conductor."

Sunday Globe
Sept. 30, 1906.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first of the series of auction sales of seats for the coming series of public rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be held tomorrow in Symphony hall, beginning at 10 o'clock. The sale tomorrow will be confined to the $18 seats for the public rehearsals. Tuesday, beginning at the same hour, the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold Thursday and the $10 seats Friday.

Last year's sales showed a considerable increase over those of 1904. As the general tendency of prices has been upward for several years past, it is only fair to suppose that 1906 will be no exception to the rule. Practically no criticisms of the change in the nominal price of seats have reached the management. Naturally there is much interest in Dr Muck's coming, and the announcement of his plans for the season, which will probably be made next Sunday, is awaited with great curiosity.

Starting at a higher figure it is calculated that the seats will be disposed of in considerably less time than has been the case in the past. In former years bidders have known about what hour the seats they wanted would come up for sale and, instead of waiting from the beginning, have come at that time. Under the new system, it will be well for them to make ample allowance for the increased speed in the disposal of the seats.

Dr Muck will arrive in New York some time next Tuesday. He will come directly to Boston. Practically all the members of the orchestra are back in town, and have reported for duty. A few who have been abroad will not get back until the end of the week. Rather more than half of the orchestra will be in Worcester this week at the festival in that city. It is an interesting fact that this is the first season that the festival has had the Boston Symphony orchestra. Heretofore they have had members of the orchestra, but the placing of the festival in October instead of September brings it into the orchestra year, and for this reason the official name of the institution is used.

Boston Evening Record
Sept. 29, 1906.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Next week brings the very prosaic but very necessary prelude to the symphony season, the auction sales in Symphony hall of the seats for the 24 public rehearsals and the 24 concerts. The first sale will be on Monday, when the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. On Tuesday the $10 seats for the public rehearsals; on Thursday the $18 seats for the concerts, and on Friday the $10 seats. All the sales will begin promptly at 10 a.m.

Dr. Muck is on the ocean and will arrive in New York some time next Tuesday. He will come directly to Boston. Practically all the members of the orchestra are back in town and have reported for duty. A few who have been abroad will not get back until the end of the week. Rather more than half of the orchestra will be in Worcester this week at the music festival in that city.

It is an interesting fact that this is the first season that the festival has had the "Boston Symphony Orchestra." Heretofore they have had members of the orchestra, but the placing of the festival in October instead of September brings it into the orchestra year, and for this reason the official name of the institution is used.

There seems to be little doubt that the coming sales will show a general increase. Last year's sales showed a considerable increase over those of 1904. As the general tendency of prices has been upward for several years past, it is only fair to suppose that 1906 will be no exception to the rule.

Practically no criticisms in the change in the nominal prices of seats have reached the management, the patrons generally seeming to agree that the move was a proper one.

The prospects for the season are very bright, not merely in Boston, but everywhere the orchestra gives concerts. Naturally there is much interest in Dr. Muck's coming, and the announcement of his plans for the season, which will probably be made next Sunday, is awaited with great curiosity. It is fair to believe that he will be ready to announce his novelties shortly after his arrival.

Sunday Herald
Sept. 30, 1906.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first of the series of auction sales of seats for the coming series of public rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be held tomorrow in Symphony Hall, beginning at 10 o'clock. The sale tomorrow will be confined to the $18 seats for the public rehearsals. On Tuesday, beginning at the same hour, the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday and the $10 seats on Friday.

Intending bidders should be mindful of the fact that the sales this year are likely to progress much more rapidly than they have in the past. Starting at a higher figure, it is calculated that the seats will be disposed of in very considerably less time than has heretofore been the case. In former years bidders have known about what hour the seats they wanted would come up for sale and, instead of waiting from the beginning, have come at that time. Under the new system it will be well for them to make ample allowance for the increased speed in the disposal of the seats, else they may fail to get those which they want.

Dr. Muck is on the ocean and will arrive in New York some time next Tuesday. He will come direct to Boston. Practically all the members of the orchestra are back in town and have reported for duty. A few who have been abroad will not get back until the end of the week.

There seems to be little doubt that the coming sales will show a general increase. Last year's sales showed a considerable increase over those of 1904. As the general tendency of prices has been upward for several years past, it is only fair to suppose that 1906 will be no exception to the rule.

The prospects for the season are very bright, not merely in Boston, but everywhere the orchestra gives concerts. Naturally there is much interest in Dr. Muck's coming and the announcement of his plans for the season, which will probably be made next Sunday, is awaited with great curiosity. It is fair to believe that he will be ready to announce his novelties shortly after his arrival.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess

Unter den Passagieren des Dampfers „Kaiser Wilhelm der Große", der übermorgen, am 2. Oktober, hier eintrifft, befinden sich Leoncavallo, Dr. Carl Muck, der zukünftige Leiter des Boston Symphony Orchesters, die Primadonna Parkina, Yvette Guilbert und Albert Chevalier. Das erste Concert des Boston Symphony Orchesters unter Dr. Muck's Leitung wird folgende Tonwerke umfassen: Beethoven's C-moll Symphonie, Wagner's „Siegfried's Idyll", „Eine Faust-Ouverture" und das Vorspiel zu den „Meistersingern".

ess

Last year's subscribers to both series of concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra may renew their subscriptions for the coming season and secure the same seats they had last year by application to the box office of Carnegie Hall on and after to-morrow, Monday, October 1. All communications should be addressed to C. A. Ellis, manager. The concerts will be given on Thursday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21 and March 21; and on Saturday afternoons, November 10, December 8, January 12, February 22 and March 22. The regular sale of season tickets will begin at the box office of Carnegie Hall on Monday morning, October 15.

Professor Willy Hess, the leader of the Boston Symphony Quartette, which will give three concerts in Mendelssohn Hall next Winter, has announced an interesting list of novelties which he will present during the season. Among them are Emil Jaques-Dalcroze, a quartet by Gliere, a young Russian composer; a quartet by Suk, a new quintet by Felix Weingartner, and a quartet in D major by Hugo Kaun. The Italian Martucci is represented in the list by a sonata for piano and violincello and, lastly, there is a "sinfonia da camera" for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, horn double base, piano and string quartet by Wolf-Ferrari. To find these works, Professor Hess examined over forty musical scores, most of which he found were written by men whom he applies terms "decomposers" of music.

ess

1906

Dates for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts thus far announced are as follows: Thursday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10, February 22 and March 22. There will be also the usual number of matinees on Saturdays succeeding these dates.

Dr. Karl Muck.

(Siehe: „Musikalische Angelegenheiten.")

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

rom

ddress

ess

ate

Several novelties which invite interest are announced for performance by the Boston Symphony Quartet at the three concerts of chamber music in Mendelssohn Hall this season. They are a serenade for strings, by Emil Jacques Dalcroze; a quartet in A, by Glière; a quartet in B flat, by Suk; a new quintet for strings, by Weingartner; a quartet in D, by Hugo Kaun; a sonata for pianoforte and violoncello, by Martucci, and a sinfonia da camera for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, horn, double bass strings and pianoforte, by Wolf-Ferrari.

Dr. Karl Muck, who will conduct the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, has signed a contract with the authorities of the Royal Opera House, Berlin, as chapel master of that institution till 1912.

NOTES OF MUSIC EVENTS.

The Adele Margulies Trio will give three concerts [illegible] day, November 22, and Tuesdays, January [illegible] and February 19, at 8:15 P. M.

Last year's subscribers to both series of concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra may renew their subscriptions for the coming season and secure the same seats they had last year by application to the box office of Carnegie Hall on and after to-morrow, Monday, October 1. All communications should be addressed to C. A. Ellis, manager, and all checks should be made out to his order. The concerts will be given as follows: On Thursday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10, December 8, January 12, February 22 and March 22. The regular sale of season tickets will begin at the box office of Carnegie Hall on Monday morning, October 15, and it is advisable that all those who desire to renew their subscriptions place their applications before that date.

Prof. Willy Hess, the leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, which is to give three concerts in Mendelssohn Hall next winter, has announced a very interesting list of novelties which he will present during the season, some of which will be on the New York programmes. He has a very charming serenade for strings by the Swiss Emil Jaques-Dalcroze, whose name first appeared on the concert programmes in this country last winter when Marteau played a violin concerto by him. There is a quartet in A major by Gliere, the young Russian composer, of whom much is being said on the otherside; a quartet in B flat by Suk, the second violin of the Bohemian Quartet, whose charming "Märchen" and interesting symphony are remembered by music lovers in this city; a new quintet for strings by Felix Weingartner; and a quartet in D major by Hugo Kaun. This last work Prof. Hess regards as one of the most important contributions to chamber music in recent years. The Italian Martucci is represented in the list by a sonata for piano and violoncello which is highly spoken of. Lastly, there is a "sinfonia da camera" for flute, obe, clarinet, bassoon, horn, double bass, piano and string quartet by Wolf-Ferrari.

[illegible]

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester kündigt für die kommende Konzert-Saison in New York zwei Serien zu je 5 Konzerten in Carnegie Hall an, und zwar an folgenden Donnerstag Abenden: 8. November, 6. Dezember, 10. Januar, 21. Februar und 21. März, sowie für die Nachmittage von Samstag: 10. November, 8. Dezember, 12. Januar, 23. Februar und 23. März. Der Verkauf von Saison-Tickets wird Montag, den 15. Oktober, in Carnegie Hall beginnen. Den vorjährigen Abonnenten stehen ihre Sitze vom 1. Oktober an zur Verfügung. Prof. Willy Heß, der Leiter des Bostoner Symphonie-Quartetts, welches im nächsten Winter in Mendelssohn Hall drei Konzerte ankündigt, wird folgende Novitäten vorführen: eine Serenade für Streichquartett vom Schweitzer Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, dessen Violinkonzert Marteau im Vorjahre hier gespielt hat, ein Quartett in A-dur von Glière, einem jungen russischen Komponisten, ein Quartett in H-moll von Suk, dem zweiten Violinisten des böhmischen Quartetts, ein neues Quintett von Felix Weingartner, ein Quartett in D-dur von Hugo Kaun, eine Sonate für Klavier und Cello von Martucci und eine „Kammer-Symphonie" für Flöte, Oboe, Klarinette, Fagott, Horn, zwei Kontrabässen, Piano und Streichquartett von Wolf-Ferrari.

New leader.

Carl Muck has been chosen to succeed William Gericke as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Of Doctor Muck, Mr. Gericke, who is highly appreciated in this city, and is now settled in Vienna, writes "Doctor Muck is a capable musician and a fine conductor."

[13]

Muck's Busy Life.

The following biographical data concerns Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, season 1906-1907:

He was born in 1859, in Wurzburg, Germany. At the age of 11 he began to appear in public as a pianist, generally in chamber music, and later played the violin in a symphony orchestra.

The year of 1876 he spent at the University of Heidelberg, where he went to Leipsic, where he stayed two years, working for his degree in philosophy, classical philology and musical history, at the same time working in the Leipsic Conservatory under Ernst Friedrich Richter and Karl Reinecke. He made his debut as a pianist in the Leipsic Gewandhaus in 1880, the same year receiving his degree of Ph. D.

His subsequent career has been as follows:

1880-1881—Chorus master in the Municipal Theatre in Zurich.

1881-1882—Conductor at Salzburg, Austria.

1882-1884—Conductor of opera at Brunn, Austria.

1884-1886—Conductor of opera at Graz, Austria, where he gave the first unabridged performance in Austria of "Die Meistersinger." At the same time he was the conductor of the Styrian Musikverein, and 1886 gave the first performance in Austria of Bruckner's "Seventh Symphony."

1886-1892—Conductor of the German opera at Prague, and conductor of the Philharmonic concerts in the same city.

1889—Conductor of Angelo Neumann's company, which gave the first performances in Russia of Wagner's "Ring."

1891—Conductor of Angolo Neumann's company at the Lessing Theatre, Berlin.

1892-1906—Principal conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin.

Since 1894 he has been the conductor of the Schleswig Music Festival.

As "guest conductor" he has appeared in St. Petersburg and Moscow; at the Philharmonic concerts in Bremen in 1895 he gave a scenic production of Rubinstein's "Christus"; at the Philharmonic concerts in Copenhagen; at the royal concerts in Madrid; at the Philharmonic concerts in Paris; at the royal concerts in Budapest, and at the Philharmonic concerts and Royal Opera in London.

In 1901, 1902, 1904 and 1906 he conducted all the performances of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth. For the past three seasons he has been one of the conductors of the Vienna Philharmonic concerts, and was to have conducted all of them in the Winter of 1906-07 had he not come to America.

Other Note and Comment.

The new conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Dr Karl Muck, will arrive in New York Tuesday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and go directly to Boston. The first rehearsal of the orchestra will be held Monday, October 8, which is a little later than usual.

Mme Olga Samaroff has never played in this country the great D minor concerto by Rubinstein, which she is to give at the Worcester music festival Friday afternoon, and it is expected to make a great sensa-

Springfield Republican
Sept. 30-06

New York wird in der kommenden Saison bekanntlich Gelegenheit haben, eine der wenigen hierzulande noch unbekannten genialen deutschen Orchesterdirigenten bewundern zu dürfen: Dr. Karl Muck von der Berliner Hofoper, der in der Saison 1906—7 das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester leiten wird. Dr. Muck, dessen Bild wir in dieser Nummer bringen, wurde am 22. Oktober 1859 in Würzburg geboren als Sohn von Dr. J. Muck. Unter der Leitung seines Vaters, der ein talentirter Musiker war, betrieb der Knabe Klavier-, Violine- und Kontrapunkt-Studien. Schon mit elf Jahren konnte er als Pianist in Kammermusik-Produktionen öffentlich auftreten, später spielte er die Violine in Symphonie-Konzerten. 1876 bezog er nach absolvirtem Gymnasium die Universität Heidelberg und begab sich nach einem Jahr nach Leipzig, woselbst er philosophischen und musikgeschichtlichen Studien oblag und daneben im Leipziger Konservatorium unter Ernst Friedrich Richter und Karl Reinecke seine musikalische Bildung vervollständigte. 1880 debütirte er als Pianist im Leipziger Gewandhaus, in welchem Jahre er auch das Doktorat der Philosophie erwarb. Von 1880 bis 1884 fungirte er als Kapellmeister in Zürich, Salzburg, Brünn und Graz, in welch letzterer Stadt er die erste unverkürzte österreichische Vorstellung der „Meistersinger" dirigirte. Bis 1892 wirkte er sodann am deutschen Theater in Prag und leitete auch die dortigen philharmonischen Konzerte. 1889 war er mit Angelo Neumann's „Ring des Nibelungen"-Gesellschaft auf Reisen gegangen und hatte den „Ring" zum erstenmal in Rußland zu Gehör gebracht. In der genannten Gesellschaft befanden sich hervorragende Künstler wie Vogl, die Malten, die Schläger, Reichmann u. A. Als Kapellmeister des Angelo Neumann-Ensemble's in Berlin brachte er die erste Berliner Vorstellung von Mascagni's „Cavalleria Rusticana" heraus, ferner Mahler's revidirte Ausgabe der „Drei Pinto's" von Weber und den genialen „Barbier von Bagdad" von Peter Cornelius. Von 1902 bis 1906 wirkte er bekanntlich als Kapellmeister an der Hofoper in Berlin, wo er sich eine große Position schaffte. Dr. Muck gehört zu den beliebten „Gastdirigenten" Europa's und hat als solcher in St. Petersburg und Moskau, in Bremen, Kopenhagen, Madrid, in den philharmonischen Konzerten in Paris, Budapest und London mit dem größten, mitunter enthusiastischem Erfolg seine Meisterschaft bewiesen. Während der letzten drei Jahre war er wiederholt als Dirigent der Wiener philharmonischen Konzerte erschienen und es war der Ruf an ihn ergangen, in der kommenden Saison sämmtliche Konzerte dieser berühmten Musikvereinigung zu dirigiren, was durch die Annahme des Engagements in Boston unmöglich geworden ist. 1901, 1902, 1904 und 1906 hat Dr. Muck sämmtliche Vorstellungen des „Parsifal" in Bayreuth geleitet.

Boston Traveler
Oct. 1, 1906.

SYMPHONY SEAT SALE

Prices Are Averaging Higher Than Last Year

Up to noon Auctioneer Jackson had disposed of only the first 10 rows of seats for the Friday afternoon Symphony rehearsals. Commencing with row D, bidding became more animated, and premiums were noticeably higher than those paid for the first three rows.

The high price paid during the morning was $83 premium for I—19. This premium compares with $81, for which seats in center N and O were sold last year.

It would seem that receipts from the sale would average higher than a year ago. Brokers were the most active bidders.

Boston Record
Oct. 2, 1906.

PROF. MUCK AT NEW YORK

New York, Oct. 2.—Prof. Karl Muck, who comes to America to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here on the steamer Kaiser Wilhelm Der Grosse.

Of the plans of the Boston symphony orchestra for the coming season the Post of that city says:—

The prospectus for 1906-1907, which is just out, shows several interesting innovations. The innovations noted are: First, the new conductor, Dr Karl Muck of Berlin; second, the absence of the orchestra from Boston six weeks during the season instead of five, as has been the rule in the past; and third—although this is more apparent than real—the raising of the upset prices of the season tickets.

The annual auction sale of seats for the comming season will begin October 1, in Symphony hall. The same rule will apply this year as in the past; the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold on Monday, beginning at 10 o'clock; the $10 seats for the rehearsals on Tuesday, beginning at the same hour; the $18 seats for the concerts on Thursday and the $10 seats for the concerts on Friday. The increase in the upset prices of the $12 seats to $18 and the $7.50 seats to $10 has been made after most thorough and serious consideration. Its object is to shorten and simplify the auction sales. It was decided that the orchestra should go West in the last week of January, leaving Boston Sunday evening, January 27. Concerts will be given in Rochester on Monday evening, Cleveland on Tuesday evening, Chicago on Wednesday evening, Detroit on Thursday evening, Indianapolis on Friday evening and Cincinnati on Saturday evening, the orchestra returning to Boston on Sunday, February 3.

In a way the engagement of Dr Muck is a radical departure in the policy of the orchestra. He is the first conductor of established reputation it has brought to America, for all the other conductors, Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch and Paur, were comparatively unknown men when they came to Boston, and, indeed, the greater part of their reputation to-day is based on their work with the Boston symphony orchestra. With this pre-eminent position in the world of European music it was not an easy task for Mr Ellis last spring to induce Dr Muck to come to this country, especially since the money question was of little or no consideration to the distinguished conductor. After Dr Muck had finally consented to come for one year it was not an easy task for Mr Ellis to secure the consent of the German emperor to his departure from Berlin for even one season. Dr Muck is unquestionably the most popular conductor that Berlin has ever had, and, in addition to this, he has for years enjoyed the personal friendship of the emperor. It may be stated as an absolute truth that the Boston symphony orchestra is the only organization in this country which could have secured Dr Muck's services.

At the head of the list of singers come Melba and Fremstad. Melba comes to America in January to be at the head of the new Hammerstein opera company, and while there she will have a few concert appearances of which she will be with the symphony orchestra in Boston. Olive Fremstad, one of the most talented of the younger generation of singers, comes to America to "create" the name part in Strauss's new opera, "Salome," which is announced by Mr Conreid as one of his novelties.

In the list of pianists among the women are the names of Samaroff, Szumowska, Katherine Goodson and Olga Radecki. Samaroff is one of the most talented and popular of the younger pianists, and is more than well liked in Boston. Mme Szumowska is a resident of this city and needs no introduction, as she has long had an admiring public here. Katherine Goodson is a young English pianist who is coming to America for the first time, and Olga Radecki has played several times with the orchestra, but not in recent years. Among the men are the names of Paderewski, Rosenthal and Gabrilowitsch. Paderewski comes to America in January for seven appearances with the orchestra and to hear his new symphony played. He will give no recitals. Rosenthal, one of the giants of the piano, returns after an absence of several years, and his appearance should be one of the most important events of the season. Gabrilo-

Springfield Republican
Sept. 30-06.

PAYS $89 FOR ONE SYMPHONY SEAT

Prices at Auction for Rehearsals About Same as Last Year.

Except for the first few rows on which the bidding was slow because of the increase in the price for Friday afternoon rehearsals, the annual sale of seats for the Symphony concerts ran at about the same prices as last year.

The seats sold today were for the public rehearsals. The highest bid made up to 12 o'clock was $89, and the seats went as fast as they were put up.

The $10 seats for rehearsals will be auctioned tomorrow and Thursday and Friday will be devoted to the sale of seats for the concerts, when, it is expected, bids will run very high.

There was a good attendance, but the early bidding was quiet. Seats in row A ranged from $25.50 to $10, this comparing with $26 to $13 last year. Centre seats brought on an average $20. As the end of the row was reached, bidding immediately got from $15 to $5.

Seats in row B ranged from $22.50 to $10, against $28 to $10 last year. In row C the range was from $30 to $12, com-

Boston Traveler
Oct. 2, 1906.

CONCERT SEATS SOLD

Chairs in Rear of Symphony Hall Disposed of at Auction.

Today the seats in the rear of the auditorium were auctioned off at Symphony Hall for the rehearsals. As these seats are considered poorer than those in the first balcony less interest was shown in the bidding. The sales were, however, the same in most respects as last year.

Thursday, when the best seats will be auctioned off for the concert, some sensational bidding is expected. On Friday the $10 seats for the concerts will be auc-

Boston Post
Oct. 2, 1906

$83 FOR SEAT AT SYMPHONY

From the very beginning of the auction sale of the $18 seats for the rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday, the bidding was lively from the several hundreds who were present, principally women.

Only the $18 seats were sold yesterday.

The rehearsals will number 24, and will be held on every Friday afternoon beginning Oct. 12, and continuing to May 3, 1907, omitting Nov. 9 and Dec. 7, this year, Jan. 11, Feb. 1 and 22, and March 22, 1907.

$83 for a Seat

The highest bid made was $83 for seat 19 in row I, while seat 20, in the same row, sold for $75. No premium, however, was as high as last year, when $91 was paid for a single seat.

All along the centre seats, 19 and 20, either side of the aisle, from row G to I, sold for from $63 to $60. From row J to row W the centre seats brought between $50 and $60, while the side seats brought between $30 and $40. The prices for seats from row X to row JJ will be lower.

The $10 seats for the public rehearsals, which include all those on the floor back of row JJ and in the centre of the balcony back of row D, will be auctioned off today.

The $18 seats for the concerts will be auctioned off on Thursday morning at 10 o'clock, and the $10 seats for the concerts will be bid on on Friday morning at the same hour.

[14]

Boston Herald,
Oct. 1, 1906.

MONDAY EVENING

$83 PREMIUM ON $18 SEAT

od Prices Realized at the Sale for Rehearsals of Symphony Players.

GHEST LAST YEAR WAS $91 FOR SINGLE CHAIR

Average Premium About That of 1905, Despite Higher Scheduled Prices.

The auction sale of the $18 seats for the rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra began at 10 o'clock in Symphony Hall, with Walter Jackson as auctioneer, and from the very start the bidding was lively by the several hundreds present, principally women, the few men in the hall being ticket agents and others delegated to secure seats for patrons who did not wish to bid themselves.

Only the $18 seats for the rehearsals were sold today, which included all those on the floor as far back as row JJ inclusive, the three rows on both sides of the balcony and the four rows in the centre of the balcony.

The rehearsals will number 24, and will be held on every Friday afternoon beginning Oct. 12 and continuing to May 3, 1907, omitting Nov. 9 and Dec. 7, this year, Jan. 11, Feb. 1 and 22, and March 22, 1907.

The highest bid made was $83 for seat 19 in row I, while seat 20, in the same row, sold for $75. No premium, however, was as high as last year, when $91 was paid for a single seat.

All along the centre seats, 19 and 20, either side of the aisle, from row G to I, sold for from $63 to $60. From row J to row W the centre seats brought between $50 and $60, while the side seats brought between $30 and $40. The prices for seats from row X to row JJ will be lower.

Sharp at 10 A. M.

It was exactly 10 o'clock when Mr. Jackson mounted the stage and faced the large crowd seated on the floor. A large diagram of thes floor and balcony stood behind him, and as the seats were auctioned an attendant marked them off on the diagram. The names of the bidders were not given out by the management. It was stated that at least 70 or 75 per cent. of the seats were sold to ticket agents who cater to prominent society Bostonians.

The bidding started with seat No. 1 in row A and continued until all the seats in the row had been sold. This order continued with each row. The first bid was $5 for seat 1 in A, but the clever manipulation of Mr. Jackson and the apparent readiness of people on the floor to secure front seats moved this price up considerably. It was finally sold to Herrick with three others at a premium of $13.50. Not more than four seats were sold to one bidder, but it seemed as though only the ticket agents went the limit in purchasing.

This is the first year that the price of the seats for public rehearsals has been placed at $18, the former figure being $12.

The $10 seats for these rehearsals, the auction of which will begin tomorrow morning, in previous years cost $7.50. From the bids this morning, however, the increase in the upset price did not seem to make any apparent difference, for the average premiums bid were just the same as a year ago.

Sold for $46 Each.

The highest bid made for seats in the first five rows was $46 apiece for seats 14 and 15 in row E. These were directly in the centre, between the two centre aisles. From this figure the prices ranged to as low as $10 for end seats in the several rows under the balconies. In row A, seats 12, 13, 14 and 15 went to Herrick for a premium of $25.50 apiece, these seats being directly in the centre. Ticket Agent Connolly secured seats 16 and 17, which were a little to the right of the centre for a premium of $18.50 apiece. The highest bids made for seats in row B were $22.50, five going at this figure, in two lots. The prices ranged from this down to $12.

A little amusement was afforded the crowd when one woman, after much spirited bidding, was granted two good seats for $12.50 apiece, and then refused to take them, saying that she had made a mistake and wanted the seats on the other side, as she did "not want to be under the piano." Auctioneer Jackson began all over again, and sold the two seats with a third one for $1 more than the previous bid.

In row C, seats 21 and 22 in left centre, and seats 29 and 30, still more removed from the centre, but on the aisle, brought $30 apiece. This was the highest paid for any seat in the row. A number went for $27.50, $27, $26.50, $25 and $22.50. Of course, centre seats were in best demand, but when two parties had some special desire to secure certain end seats the bidding was rather lively and resulted in better prices.

The average bids on seats in row D were higher than those in the first three rows. Seats 17 and 18, two nearest the right of the centre aisle, went for a bid of $39.50 each. It was said that these were purchased by an agent of Maj. Henry L. Higginson. One seat, No. 9, in the same row, brought $30.50. This was the aisle seat on the side. Herrick and Connolly did most of the buying of more than one seat on this row. Premiums were $29.50, $27.25, $24, $23.50, and so on down to $13, the lowest premium paid. Row E seats brought larger bids, starts being made with $25. The highest premium, $46, was paid for seats 14 and 15. Aisle seats 9 and 10 brought $40, seat 20 in the centre brought $41.50, and four numbered 16, 17, 18 and 19 brought $35 apiece. The lowest premium received was for the very end seat on the left under the balcony, $16.

The $10 seats for the public rehearsals, which include all those on the floor back of row JJ and in the centre of the balcony back of row D, will be auctioned off tomorrow.

The $18 seats for the concerts will be auctioned off on Thursday morning at 10 o'clock, and the $10 seats for the concerts will be bid on on Friday morning at the same hour.

Boston Journal
Oct. 2.,1906

PAYS $83 FOR SEAT AT SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Eighty-three dollars was the highest bid for a seat for the rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which were sold at auction yesterday in Symphony Hall. Only the $18 seats were placed on sale, these seats having been listed at $12 in previous years. The $10 seats, formerly $7.50, will be auctioned off today.

The seat which brought $83 was No. 19 in row I. Seat 20 in the same row brought $75. The $18 seats included all as far back as row JJ inclusive, the three rows on each side of the balcony and the four rows in the center of the balcony

About 75 per cent. of the seats were sold to ticket agents who cater to prominent society folks. Walter Jackson acted as auctioneer.

Boston Advertiser
October 2, 1906

SYMPHONY SEAT SALE

Prices Are Averaging Somewhat Higher Than Last Year.

The auction sale for the $18 seats for the Friday Symphony rehearsals brought out some very spirited bidding yesterday. The auction was conducted by Walter Jackson, and several hundred people were present, mostly women.

Only the $18 seats were sold yesterday, which included all those on the floor as far back as row JJ, inclusive.

The highest price paid during the day was $83 premium for I—19. This premium compares with $91, for which seats in centre N and O were sold last year.

It would seem that receipts from the sale would average higher than a year ago. Brokers were the most active bidders.

The highest bid made for many seats in the first five rows was $46 apiece for seat 14 and 15 in row E. These were directly in the centre, between the two centre aisles. From this figure the prices ranged to as low as $10 for end seats in the several rows under the balconies.

In row A, seats 12, 13, 14 and 15, went to an agent for a premium of $25.50 apiece, these seats being directly in the centre. Another agent secured seats 16 and 17, which were a little to the right of the centre, for a premium of $18.50 apiece. The highest bids made for seats in row B were $22.50, five going at this figure, in two lots. The prices ranged from this down to $12.

In row C, seats 21 and 22 in left centre, and seats 29 and 30, still more removed from the centre, but on the aisle, brought $30 apiece. This was the highest paid for any seat in the row. A number went for $27.50, $27, $26.50, $25 and $22.50.

The average bids on seats in row D were higher than those in the first three rows. Seats 17 and 18, two nearest the right of the centre aisle, went for a bid of $39.50 each.

It was said that these were purchased by an agent of Maj. Higginson. One seat, No. 9, in the same row, brought $30.50. This was the aisle seat on the side. Row E seats brought larger bids, starts being made with $25. The highest premium, $46, was paid for seats 14 and 15. Aisle seats 9 and 10 brought $40, seat 20 in the centre brought $41.50, and four numbered 16, 17, 18 and 19 brought $35 apiece.

Boston Journal
Oct. 3,1906.

PAYS $26.50 FOR $10 SEATS AT SYMPHONY REHEARSALS

The $10 seats for the rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were sold at auction yesterday. The majority of those who attended the sale were women. Only four tickets were sold to any one person. The highest premium paid was $26.50, which seats twenty-five and twenty-six in Row KK and seat nineteen in Row LL brought. There will be twenty-four rehearsals this season, on Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 12 and continuing to May 3, omitting Nov. 9 and Dec. 7, 1906, and Jan. 11, Feb. 1 and 22 and March 22, 1907. The $18 seats for the Saturday night concerts will be sold at auction Thursday morning and the auction of the $10 seats for the Saturday night concerts will be held Friday morning at 10 o'clock.

Boston American
October 2,1906.

PAYS $83 FOR $18 SEAT AT SYMPHONY SALE

Eighty-three dollars was paid for a seat for the rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sold at auction yesterday in Symphony Hall. Only $18 seats were placed on sale, these seats having been listed at $12 in previous years. The $10 seats, formerly $7.50, will be auctioned off to-day. The seat which brought $83 was No. 19 in row I. Seat 20 in the same row brought $75.

October 1, 1906.
NSCRIPT, MONDA

HIGHEST PREMIUM $83

At Opening Sale Today of Seats for Symphony Orchestra Rehearsals Excellent Prices Were Paid

Advance in the regular prices for seats for the public rehearsals and concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this season, the twenty-sixth in the history of this organization, did not lessen the interest in these performances nor the eagerness which people showed, as in past seasons, to purchase seats.

This morning at Symphony Hall the opening auction sale for the coming season took place, to be continued tomorrow and also on Thursday and Friday. Today's sale was of seats for the series of twenty-four public rehearsals, to take place as usual on Friday afternoons, except on stated dates which the management have announced, when the orchestra is engaged to appear in other cities. As in other seasons, there are two regular prices for seats, according to location. Heretofore the corresponding prices have been $12 and $7.50 for the series of twenty-four concerts and like number of public rehearsals.

It has been found in past years that when seats have been sold at auction, following the adopted custom, the opening bids above the stated price of $12 have been such as to make the rate equal to at least $18, and usually more; so it was felt that much time could be saved by making this the fixed or minimum price from which premiums should start this season.

This plan worked with success this morning, yet the sale did not progress as rapidly as it has in some other years and by noon time not as many seats had been sold as at that hour last year, in comparison. Bidding was fully as brisk as ever, and to just what the loss in time was due would be difficult to say. The attendance was large, ladies predominating among those present.

The highest premium paid this morning was $83, which was for No. 19, a centre end seat, in Row I. Competition on this began at $25 and was quickly run up by dollar bids to $60, ticket brokers in the front seats being the bidders. Then one of these jumped his bid from $60 to $71, from which the price rapidly rose to $83. Added to the regular price of $18, the seat stands at a cost of $101. This, for twenty-four rehearsals, figures the holder at a fraction of a cent less than $4.21 for each performance. Yet the owner of the ticket, even at this comparatively high price, will be enabled to hear to good advantage such world-famous soloists as Paderewski, Melba, Rosenthal, César Thomson, Olive Fremstad, Olga Radecki, Gabrilowitsch, Petschnikoff and other artists. Last year, it is recalled, the highest premium paid was $91.

The sale opened with bids for seat 1 in row A and the next seats in regular order were then disposed of, and this plan was followed as usual, with row after row. There was no skipping about with selection of seats at will. The opening bid of the sale was $5 and the first sale was at a premium of $13.50 for four seats, the limit that one buyer could take on a single bid. Other seats in this row sold at $14, $10.50, $11.50, then $25.50 and back to $17, and down to $10. In row B the opening and lowest premium paid was $10 and the highest $22.50. Row C ranged all the way from premiums of $10.50 to $30, ticket brokers buying several. In D, as high as $39.50 was obtained, falling back to $18.

When row E was reached there were spirited starts at $25, with sharp competition for centre end seats. Prices ranged in this row at from $15.50 to $46 for two seats in the middle, yet not on the end. The row behind F brought on the whole less premiums than did E, and $33 was the highest premium. When G was reached there was a lively spurt among brokers, some of whom paid as high as $63 for desirable end seats. Mr. Herrick of Copley square was active about this time and secured many fine seats hereabout at from $34 up. He was one of the largest buyers of the sale and the seats he secured would be viewed as perhaps among the very choicest in the hall. It is known that he acts for many prominent people just now abroad or still at their country places and not able personally to attend the sale.

There was another lively effort to secure seats when row H was put up. Around $30 was the lowest premium paid here, and in the middle of the row, when the bid had reached $55, someone jumped from that figure up to $70 and the seats were sold at $71 premium. Next adjoining seats, practically as good yet not on the end, sold for $37. Then in row I, in which the record price of the morning, $83 was reached, prices were high all through, ranging up from $27. Some other premiums were $44, $51, $60, $71, and $75. In the next row, J, the rates paid ranged from $29.50 up to $61, and fell back to $25. In K $61 was again reached.

The ladies present were quick with their bids, so much so that frequently the auctioneer failed to see them, if seated ten or fifteen rows back, and in several instances while seats were knocked down to bidders directly in front, some woman would be standing and waving frantically from another part of the hall and offering a dollar more than the price at which the bid was closed. One woman, who finally bought excellent seats at about $60 premium, had this experience at least twice. Other ladies who failed to make themselves seen or heard later moved toward the front to receive recognition from the auctioneer.

A little amusement was afforded the crowd when one woman, after much spirited bidding, was granted two good seats in Row B for $12.50 apiece, and then refused to take them, saying that she had made a mistake and wanted the seats on the other side, as she wanted "to sit on the piano side." Auctioneer Walter Jackson began all over again, and sold the two seats with a third one for $1 more than the previous bids.

Taken all in all, the opening sale brought higher premiums than those paid last season, and the readiness with which people paid good prices indicates as deep, if not deeper, interest in these performances as in other years. On Tuesday the $10 seats for public rehearsals go on sale.

Boston Transcript
Oct. 2, 1906.

SYMPHONY PRICES STILL HIGH

Record Price Today for Rehearsals Was $26.50, Against $23.50 Last Year

There were many disappointed persons at the auction sale of Symphony Rehearsal tickets this morning, due to the fact that those who had come prepared to purchase seats at approximately the same premiums they paid last year, found desirable places, even to the very last seats sold, soaring above their limit. This practically was the same story told yesterday, and if the same thing holds good for the two remaining auction sales for the Saturday evening concerts the ultimate financial returns will be considerably in excess of last year. Incidentally it should be borne in mind in figuring out results that the basic price was $10 against $7.50 last year, which helps to swell the total returns.

The highest price of the morning was for two seats in row KK, which brought $26.50. Last year places in this same row, the front one in the $10 section on the floor, brought $23.50, and the year before $20. A number of seats in the second row brought $26, and this price gradually descended until any number of seats towards the rear of the floor weer disposed of at an average of $15. As the last row of the floor was reached, prospective purchasers, those, perhaps, who had sat on the floor for years, became uneasy. This augured well for prices ,and the bidding advanced several dollars. Following some seats disposed of at $14 there were several single places which brought $17.

For the $10 section of the first balcony there was spirited bidding. The end seats at the right of the first row brought $19.50; others in the same line brought first $20.50, and later $23.50, at which price thre seats toward the centre were sold. Those who anticipated that that would be the highest price of the morning for balcony places were disappointed, for while the next seats went for $23, and still others for $22.50 and $21.50, other seats off toward the left in this same row brought $24.50.

In the second row the first seat at the right brought $20.50, but better than that price was obtained for other seats, one aisle seat selling for $23.50. Between this price and $20 a number of seats were disposed of. In the last full row the lowest price obtained was $17.50 and in the broken row the places were disposed of for $17, $16, $15.50 and $16.50, these being for the six seats at the extreme right back. The seats in the corresponding place at the left brought $16.50 and $16, at which figure the last seat in the hal was sold. Thus the premiums of the morning ran from $26.50 to $16, as against $23.50 to $15.50 last year.

The auction sale of the $18 seats for the Saturday night concerts will take place on Thursday morning; that of the $10 seats on Friday morning.

Wie Cavallo kommt sein Berliner Freund Dr. Karl Muck, der seit den Tagen des „Roland von Berlin" für den von höchster Stelle befohlenen Komponisten einen „Schwarm" hegt, der beinahe an Raserei grenzt. Muck ist nämlich von den Vorzügen des „Roland" keineswegs so überzeugt, wie Majestät, und da die Meinungen der Musiker über diese Oper weit auseinandergehen, darf man wohl annehmen, daß einer von Beiden, Muck oder Majestät, von Musik nicht so viel versteht, als er sich einbildet. Hoffentlich ist Muck in der Musik besser beschlagen als in der Geographie, in dieser Hinsicht dürfte ihm eine gewaltige Enttäuschung bevorstehen . . . er scheint sich nämlich bezüglich der Distanz von Boston nach Süd-Amerika in einem großen Irrthum zu finden. Als Herr Ellis, der Vertreter des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, dem Berliner Kapellmeister die Offerte machte, nach Boston zu kommen, verhielt sich Dr. Muck zuerst völlig ablehnend. Herr Ellis versuchte seine ganze Ueberredungskunst, aber er machte gar keinen Eindruck; plötzlich sagte Dr. Muck: „Eins könnte mich zur Annahme bewegen; es ist schon lange mein Wunsch, nach Süd-Amerika zu gehen und Boston ist gewiß nicht weit von Süd-Amerika entfernt." Herr Ellis that, als ob er die Bemerkung nicht gehört habe und antwortete nicht; selbst als Dr. Muck seine Frau in's Zimmer rief und ihr erklärte, daß es von Boston nach Süd-Amerika nicht weit sei, schwieg sich Herr Ellis aus. Der Umstand, daß ein Engagement nach Boston ihm die Erfüllung seines Herzenswunsches ermögliche, dieser Umstand bewog Muck sehr wesentlich, den Antrag des Herrn Ellis anzunehmen, und der Herr Ellis wird jetzt dem Dr. Muck klar machen müssen, daß es nicht gut möglich ist, über Sonntag von Boston nach Buenos Ayres zu reisen! H. R. H.

[15]

Boston Herald
Oct. 2, 1906.

TOP PREMIUM, $83, ON SYMPHONY SEAT

Auction of Chairs for Rehearsals Held—Average Is Maintained.

SALE LARGELY ATTENDED BY WOMEN AND AGENTS

Latter Bid Briskly in Behalf of Prominent Boston Society People.

From 10 o'clock A. M. until nearly 7 o'clock last evening, with only an intermission of one-half hour for luncheon, the auction of the $18 seats for the rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was carried on yesterday in Symphony Hall. Walter Jackson was auctioneer up to lunch time and John Leonard in the afternoon.

From the start the bidding was lively. Several hundred men and women, the later in the majority, attended. The men were principally ticket agents and others delegated to secure seats. The public rehearsals of the orchestra on Friday afternoon are mainly attended by women.

Only the $18 seats for the rehearsals were sold yesterday, which included all those on the floor as far back as row JJ inclusive, the three rows on both sides of the balcony and the first four rows in the centre of the balcony.

The rehearsals will number 24, and will be held on every Friday afternoon beginning Oct. 12 and continuing to May 3, 1907, omitting Nov. 9 and Dec. 7, this year, Jan. 11, Feb. 1 and 22, and March 22, 1907.

The highest bid made was $83 for seat 19 in row I, while seat 20, in the same row, sold for $75. No premium paid yesterday, however, was as high as as last year, when $91 was paid for a single seat; about two dozen seats went at premiums over $80.

Next Highest Was $76.

The next highest premium to the $83 seat was $76, for seats 23 and 24 in row A in the right-hand balcony. Floor seat 20 in row I brought $75.

The names of the bidders would not be given for publication, but at least from 70 to 75 per cent. of the seats were sold to ticket agents employed by prominent society Bostonians.

It was exactly 10 o'clock when Mr. Jackson mounted the stage and faced the large crowd seated on the floor. A large diagram of the floor and balcony stood behind him, and as the seats were auctioned an attendant marked them off on the diagram.

The bidding started with seat No. 1 in row A and continued until all the seats in the row had been sold. This order continued with each row. The first bid was $5 for seat 1 in A, but the apparent readiness of people on the floor to secure front seats moved this price up considerably. It was finally sold to Herrick with three others at a premium of $13.50. Not more than four seats were sold to one bidder, but it seemed as though only the ticket agents went the limit in purchasing.

This is the first year that the price of the seats for public rehearsals has been placed at $18, the former figure being $12.

From the bids yesterday, however, the increase in the upset price did not make any apparent difference, for the average premiums bid were just the same as a year ago.

The first three rows on the flood did not bring the fancy premiums paid for seats farther back from the stage. The highest premium paid for a seat in the first five rows was $46, which was paid for seats 14 and 15 in row E. From this figure the prices ranged to as low as $10 for end seats under the balconies.

Refused the Seats.

A little amusement was afforded the crowd when one woman, after much spirited bidding, was granted two good seats for $12.50 apiece, and then refused to take them, saying that she had made a mistake and wanted the seats on the other side, as she did "not want to be under the piano." Auctioneer Jackson began all over again, and sold the two seats with a third one for $1 more than the previous bid.

From the fourth to the 20th row back from the stage on the floor, centre seats, and especially those nearest the aisles, brought fancy premiums, on an average, $50 to $60. Seats from the end toward the centre in these rows brought from $30 to $40 premiums.

The seats in the last three rows, divided into four sections, went a little lower, the average premium for centre and aisle seats being $45, and for seats nearer and at the end of the rows about $25 to $30 apiece. Seats in the rows up to GG were still a little lower, some in the centre going for $25 and $30, and at the end for $20. From there back to row JJ, the last row of the $18 seats, premiums were placed about $18, $17 and $16 for centre seats and $15 for seats under the balconies.

Balcony Seats.

The sale of balcony seats began about 8:30, and was not finished until very near 7 o'clock. Those on the front row brought high premius, the one of $76 mentioned above being the largest. Some of the premiums paid were $73, $52, $51, $49.50, $47, $41, $36, and from that figure down to about $28. The seats in back rows did not bring as large premiums as a rule, but some of the aisle seats went for $53, $52, $44 and $41, much larger figures than were paid for some of the centre seats on the floor.

There were many lively tilts during the bidding, but every one was good natured, and those who did not secure just the seats they had picked out sat back contented and waited for another chance.

This morning at 10 o'clock the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals, which sold at an upset price of $7.50 last year, will be auctioned off in Symphony Hall, but as the number of seats are not near as large as those sold yesterday, it is expected that all will be sold before afternoon. These will include all those on the floor back of row JJ and in the centre balcony back or row D.

Auctions Thursday and Friday.

The $18 seats for the concerts will be auctioned off on Thursday morning at 10 o'clock, and the $10 seats for the concerts will be bid on on Friday morning at the same hour.

The concerts will be held on consecutive Saturday evenings from Oct. 13 to May 4, 1907, omitting Nov. 10 and Dec. 8, this year, and Jan. 12, Feb. 2 and 23 and March 23, 1907.

There will be no auction of the 305 seats in the second balcony for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals, as the general public will be afforded an opportunity to buy these seats on the afternoon of the rehearsals for 25 cents apiece, and to avoid the possibility of speculators buying them up in advance, they will be sold only individually as the people pass into the hall.

NEW YORK PRESS
OCT 1 1906

SONGS AND SINGERS.

More praise of Dr. Muck, in whose success as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra New York will feel almost as much interest as the Hub will have, comes from the pen of Dr. Otto Neitzel in an article concerning the season in Bayreuth. Dr. Neitzel, who is to give a series of lectures on musical subjects during the coming season in New York, is one of the foremost critics in Germany. His opinions, therefore, are worthy of respect even if they should not coincide with the thoughts Muck will draw out in Boston and New York. Dr. Muck conducted "Parsifal" in Bayreuth. For that task he was specially fitted, as was Mottl for the interpretation of "Tristan und Isolde." "'Parsifal,'" says the German critic, "requires in all the portions which are devoted to the Grail-cult a strict rhythmical line, something of the 'slow, measured step' which we feel in the dramas of the Greek tragedians. Undoubtedly Wagner strengthened and supported these catholicizing elements of culture, which he won for the stage and made immortal in 'Parsifal,' by solemn, noble rhythms, ancient Greek in character, and thereby attained something—a sort of artistic freemasonry—which brings together religious people of all confessions and all nations. Dr. Muck's rhythmical decisiveness, which, however, was more like an inner pulsebeat than an exact devision of small portions of time, was wholly comptaible with elasticity of tempo and did not prevent the display of the most supple choreographic skill in Klingsor's magic garden. Never before had I heard the choruses of the flower maidens sung with such elegance and pliancy, with such expressive phrasing in the high voices, so free of all artificiality in the ensemble." The conductor was assisted ably in the choral scenes, Neitzel goes on to say, by the choral conductor, Ruedel, from Berlin. "Supported by this amanuensis, Dr. Muck succeeded in attaining an ease of movement in all choral portions which concealed all the ropes and threads of the preparatory work," runs the report. "In all the other parts of the opera he revealed himself as a faithful interpreter of the score, as the experienced pilot at the conductor's desk for which he has long since been appreciated in the old world and soon will be in the new." All this sounds most propitious for the approaching season with the Boston orchestra. Muck's special characteristics would seem to fit him eminently as a conductor for that band and as a successor for the precise and exacting Gericke.

BOSTON JOURNAL. OCTOBER 2, 1906.

DR. CARL MUCK, CONDUCTOR OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, ARRIVES

DR. CARL MUCK AND WIFE ARRIVE IN BOSTON

New Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Says He Comes Without Plans—Must Learn First What People Demand.

Accompanied by his wife, Dr. Carl Muck of Berlin, the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived from New York late last night and immediately drove to the Hotel Empire on Commonwealth avenue, where they will be temporarily located. Both were met in Providence by Mr. Walters of Symphony Hall.

The doctor and his wife were very tired, having landed in New York from Europe about noon, and refused to give any extended interviews. To newspa[illegible]ever, at [illegible]station when the party [illegible]ved, through an interpreter, Dr. [illegible]uck stated that he came to Boston [illegible]terly without any plans and should [illegible]ot form any regarding the musical [illegible]ogram to be undertaken by the or[illegible]hestra the coming year until he had a [illegible]hance to find out what the orchestra had done and what the taste of the Boston public demanded.

Intellectual Countenance.

Dr. Muck has a highly intellectual stamp of countenance. He is smooth shaven, with dark hair and eyes, and of medium height. His face lights up wonderfully when he talks, and a distinguishing characteristic of the famous German composer and conductor is the manner in which he betrays his affection for his wife. He unconsciously defers to her invariably.

Though Mrs. Muck speaks English, her husband does not, which, he stated, was a matter of regret to him. "It is quite impossible," said Dr. Muck, "to give out any statement what I shall attempt. I have formed nothing in the line of plans. I shall first consult the library of the orchestra, have many conferences with Charles A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, and naturally in many ways will be guided by the advice of the latter.

"Both my wife and myself are extremely glad to be here in Boston, for you know it is the first time either of us has been in this country. Later, when I have looked around a bit, I may be ready to say something more definite."

Dr. Muck and his wife said they had a most enjoyable trip across the Atlantic aboard the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, their traveling companions being Leon Cavallo, the Italian composer, Arturo Vigna, the Italian conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House and Yvette Guilbert. On Monday night Dr. Muck took charge of the steamer's orchestra for the usual final concert, and the doctor incidentally paid a compliment to the musical ability of that particular North German Lloyd band.

Mrs. Muck Literary.

Mrs. Muck, who is a woman of much literary reputation in Germany, stated to the reporters that she saw time to see very little of New York as they came through and had not yet seen anything of Boston. She did say, however, that she saw far less difference between Berlin and New York than between Berlin and London. Mrs. Muck is considerably younger than her distinguished husband, being apparently not a day over 30. She has light hair and eyes and in appearance is in every way a direct contrast to the doctor.

Mrs. Muck said she was sure she would be charmed with Boston when she and her husband became acquainted. This will not be long, undoubtedly, as in accordance with plans already made, society women will take her in hand today and make her one of themselves.

Boston Globe October 3, 1906

NEW LEADER OF SYMPHONY

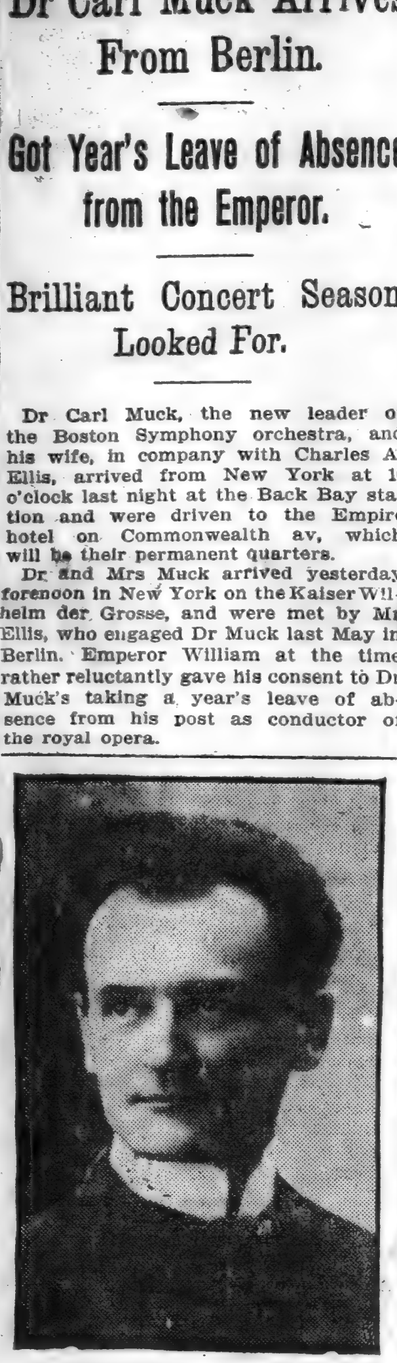
Dr Carl Muck Arrives From Berlin.

Got Year's Leave of Absence from the Emperor.

Brilliant Concert Season Looked For.

Dr Carl Muck, the new leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and his wife, in company with Charles A. Ellis, arrived from New York at 10 o'clock last night at the Back Bay station and were driven to the Empire hotel on Commonwealth av, which will be their permanent quarters.

Dr and Mrs Muck arrived yesterday forenoon in New York on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and were met by Mr Ellis, who engaged Dr Muck last May in Berlin. Emperor William at the time rather reluctantly gave his consent to Dr Muck's taking a year's leave of absence from his post as conductor of the royal opera.



PROF CARL MUCK,
New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr Muck, it is understood, will at once begin rehearsals.

In recent years Dr Muck has conducted symphony concerts in London, Paris, St Petersburg, Moscow, Brussels and Madrid, while last winter he shared with Felix Motti the honor of conducting the philharmonic concerts in Vienna.

The task of securing Dr Muck as leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra was no easy one. When Charles A. Ellis went abroad in early April to secure a successor to Mr Gericke he carried with him a list of some 20 men. Very near the top of this list was Dr Muck, and Mr Ellis had not been in Germany very long before he decided that Dr Muck was the man for Boston. But Dr Muck was not particularly anxious to give up one of the two most desirable places on the continent to come to America. It was not with him a question of money. Finally, however, he was persuaded to come for a year, if he could get a leave of absence for that length of time.

Then followed the task of getting the emperor to allow the conductor to leave Germany, even for one winter. But in the end the emperor's consent was secured, although it is a well-known fact that no other orchestra in America than the Boston Symphony could haave got Dr Muck.

Although he has never before been in this country, it has not been for lack of opportunities. When Hans Richter broke his contract with Maj Higginson in 1893 he wrote to Dr Muck, urging him to come in his place, saying that he was the only one that he (Richter) would recommend. But Dr Muck, who had just finished his first successful year in Berlin, would not think of it.

Maurice Grau also tried to get Dr Muck to come to New York to be the conductor at the Metropolitan opera house, offering him, it is understood, the largest sum ever offered a conductor. This offer he refused, as well as two others since then.

With Dr Muck and the splendid list of soloists the Symphony concerts this season are expected to be the most brilliant [illegible]

New York Times
Oct. 3, 1906.

Other passengers on the liner were Dr. Carl Muck, who will be the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Frank van der Stucken, director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. The three conductors gave great aid to the Sailors' Fund on the voyage, for each had his own concert and conducted the [illegible] delight of the passen-

Boston Advertiser,
Oct. 3, 1906.

DR. CARL MUCK ARRIVES IN BOSTON

New Leader for Symphony Orchestra Will Not Outline Plans Until He Looks Through Musical Library.

Exceedingly amiable in appearance is Dr. Carl Muck, the great musician who has arrived to conduct the Symphony orchestra.

Dr. Muck is dark complexioned, has dark hair and eyes, and wears black rimmed eye-glasses. He has no moustache or beard. In height he is about 5 ft. 6 in., and of a build which is reminiscent of Arthur Nikisch. He looks far younger than his 46 years.

He landed in New York yesterday and with Mrs. Muck came to Boston on the fast train, arriving at 10 p.m. They were met at the Back Bay station by representatives of the orchestra and driven to the Hotel Empire on Commonwealth ave.

Dr. Muck does not speak English, but spoke with animation regarding his work when addressed in German.

"I am absolutely without plans as to the conduct of the orchestra," he said. "No plans will be made until I have looked through the library of the orchestra, learned what it has played and as to the public taste. I have come with an entirely open mind."

Mrs. Muck, who is an attractive blonde, considerably younger than her husband, is a woman of literary reputation in Germany. English is among the languages which she speaks.

"I did not find New York so strange as London," she said, "as it has a much greater resemblance to Berlin."

Dr. and Mrs. Muck came over on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and had a very pleasant trip. Leoncavallo, the composer, Conductor Vigna of the Metropolitan Opera house, and Yvette Guilbert were among the other passengers. Dr. Muck conducted the orchestra at the concert which was given on board.

Both Dr. and Mrs. Muck are enthusiastic travelers, and would like to return home to Germany next year by way of Asia, but fear that it may be too warm for such a trip.

DR. KARL MUCK IS IN BOSTON

Boston Post
October 3,1906.

Karl Muck, the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston last evening, alighting at the Back Bay station at 9:55.

He was accompanied by his wife and Mr. Walter, the latter having boarded the train at Providence.

Dr. Muck is a man of about 47 years of age, smooth shaven and of the dark complexion peculiar to the Bavarian Germans. Although apparently not over five feet six or seven inches, he is of distinguished appearance.

Mrs. Muck is evidently some years her husband's junior, and is in sharp contrast to her husband, being of the blond type.

Muck Speaks No English

All conversation with Dr. Muck had to be carried on through a third person, as he speaks no English whatever. Mrs. Muck, however, speaks English quite fluently and is a very interesting talker and has achieved no little fame in Germany as a litterateur.

Through Mr. Walter, Dr. Muck was asked if he had made any plans, to which he replied: "I am absolutely without any plans. I cannot make any until I have looked over the library of the orchestra.

"I know nothing as yet about the tastes and desires of the American public. I know only that I am to lead one of the finest orchestras in the world."

Both Dr. Muck and Mrs. Muck expressed themselves as having enjoyed greatly their ocean trip on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse.

Dr. and Mrs. Muck are stopping at the Hotel Empire on Commonwealth avenue.

PROF. WILLY HESS, the leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, which is to give three concerts in Mendelssohn Hall next winter, has announced a very interesting list of novelties, some of which will be on his New York programmes. He has a serenade for strings by the Swiss Emil Jaques-Dalcroze, whose name first appeared on concert programmes in this country last winter, when Marteau played a violin concerto by him. There is a quartet in A major by Glière, the young Russian composer, of whom so much is being said in Europe; a quartet in B-flat by Suk, the second violin of the Bohemian Quartet; a new quintet for strings by Felix Weingartner, and a quartet in D major by Hugo Kaun. This last work Prof. Hess regards as one of the most important contributions to chamber music in recent years. The Italian Martucci is represented in the list by a sonata for piano and 'cello. Lastly, there is a "sinfonia da camera" for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, horn, double bass, piano, and string quartet by Wolf-Ferrari. To get these works Prof. Hess last summer went through over forty scores, most of which turned out to be what he aptly terms "decomposers" of music.

New York Herald
Oct. 3,1906.

COMES TO CONDUCT BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Dr. Karl Muck, from Imperial Opera, in Berlin, Arrives on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse.

Dr. Karl Muck, first conductor of the Imperial Opera in Berlin, arrived yesterday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, of the North German Lloyd line, to succeed Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck is apparently between thirty-five and forty years old. He is smooth shaven, wears glasses and his black hair is somewhat long. He has a keen sense of humor.

"This is my first visit to the United States," said Dr. Muck, "I expect to conduct my first concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston about the middle of the month, and shall direct that organization in the concerts, numbering about one hundred, which will be given during the season.

"It is true that I conduct 'Parsifal' at Bayreuth every year. This year I was there for two months. Frau Cosima Wagner is still bitter over the production of 'Parsifal' in this country.

"I am not well enough informed as to the works of American composers to discuss them intelligently. I have, however, met many American singers, among them Miss Geraldine Farrar and Mr. Griswold, a bass singer, who are at the Berlin Opera."

Dr. Muck is accompanied by Frau Muck.

Mr. Arturo Vigna, one of the conductors at the Metropolitan, also [illegible] ter a holiday in Italy [illegible] with some recent American compositions whose works he will have an opportunity to interpret this winter.

New York Sun
October 3–06.

GREAT MEN LEAD SHIP'S BAND

Leoncavallo and Dr. Karl Muck Help in the Big Kaiser's Musik.

There was a good deal of musical talent on board the steamship Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, which arrived here yesterday, and the passengers had a treat at the ship's concert on Monday night.

The musicians of note were Dr. Karl Muck, who is to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of 100 concerts; Leoncavallo, the composer, who is to conduct an eight weeks concert tour; Arturo Vigna, the conductor who is to appear at the Metropolitan Opera House; Sam Franko, Yvette Guilbert, and Miss Parkina of Cincinnati, who is a protégé of Melba.

Before the concert some one went to the leader of the ship's orchestra—an organization numbering thirty-five—and asked him if he thought the musicians good enough for the famous men to lead. The leader drew himself up and replied that he had the best orchestra afloat and that he doubted if many ashore could beat it. So the band played on, and the conductors found to their delight that there were many excellent musicians in the aggregation.

"And, indeed, why should they not be, since I have all Europe to draw from?" asked the ship's orchestra leader.

Dr. Muck said that he had looked forward to his coming to America with much pleasure and he was sure he would enjoy his stay here. He had never visited America before and he hoped to meet many American composers.

Dr. Muck is a friend of Mrs. Wagner and for years has conducted Wagner concerts at Bayreuth. At the ship's concert he led the orchestra in selections from "The Merry Wives of Windsor."

The audience was treated to selections from "Il Trovatore" when Leoncavallo led the musicians.

ess _____

Berühmte hier.

Dr. Carl Muck und andere Kapizitäten.

Mit dem „Kaiser Wilhelm der Große" der Bremer-Linie, welcher heute Mittag an seinem Dock in Hoboken anlegte, sind verschiedene Sterne der musikalischen Welt angekommen. Darunter befinden sich Mme. Yvette Guilbert und Albert Chevalier, welche zusammen eine Concerttour durch die Ver. Staaten antreten werden, der italienische Tondichter Leoncavallo, welcher mit dem La Scala Orchester Concerte geben wird, Frl. Parkina, ein Schützling der Mme. Melba, und endlich Dr. Carl Muck, der neue Dirigent des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters.

New York Tribune
Oct. 3, 1906.

BRILLIANT CONCERT ABOARD SHIP.

Muck, Vigna and Leoncavallo Entertain Kaiser's Passengers.

Seldom has the programme of a ship's concert been made up of more noted musicians then those who took part Monday night in the concert aboard the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. The appearance of Dr. Karl Muck, Arturo Vigna and Leoncavallo was the talk of the ship when the Kaiser docked yesterday.

Dr. Muck, who is conductor of the Imperial Opera in Berlin, comes here to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of one hundred concerts, taking the place of Gericke. The tour will include nearly all the important cities of the United States. Dr. Muck said he looked forward with pleasure to his tour of the country. He said:

I am particularly anxious to meet the American composers. You see, this is my first trip to this country. I have had no chance at home to meet your composers. I have met some of the American singers at Bayreuth, as I go there once a year to conduct a Wagnerian opera.

Dr. Muck, at the concert, led the ship's orchestra in the overture of Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor." Then Vigna conducted the selections from Verdi's "Il Trovatore." Leoncavallo accompanied Miss Elizabeth Parkina, Melba's protégée, who sang his "Ave Maria" and "'Tis This Day."

Leoncavallo will appear here with his orchestra. His tour, which will be for eight weeks, will begin at Carnegie Hall on October 8. Vigna will conduct all the Italian and many of the French operas at the Metropolitan this season. He recently visited the composers of the new operas to be produced by Herr Conried and had them interpret their works.

Transcript—Oct. 3,1906

The new conductor for the Symphony Orchestra not having been forewarned of Mr. H. G. Wells's diagnosis of our staleness due to plethora in culture is proceeding to pack down in our musical consciousness some more very solid classical culture in his opening programmes. A resident musician of Boston who was a fellow student with Dr. Carl Muck at Leipsic, from 1878-9, where they were the devoted pupils of Professor E. F. Wenzel, one of the great appointees of Mendelssohn, tells the Listener that when they last met, it was at one of the "Abend Unterhaltingen," at the Conservatory in the spring of 1879. They played Rubinstein's Fantasie in F minor, for two pianos, before the pupils. Mr. Muck was even then a most able and interesting figure and much loved. It is most gratifying now to his contemporaries to see him embodying both the great musician and the distinguished recipient of rare royal favors. These Friday evenings were instituted by Mendelssohn as a means of accustoming students to the ordeal of public appearances. Mendelssohn's music is now smiled at in a superior way by the crazy-quilt cult of composition and its claque. It is not yet certain, however, whether the new men have as much to say that will live and interest the succeeding generation as he had.

+ + +

The auction of the seats for the concerts on Saturday evenings of the Symphony Orchestra takes place on Thursday and Friday at Symphony Hall, beginning each morning at ten o'clock. On Thursday, the seats priced at $18 will be sold; on Friday those priced at $10. Every seat for the afternoon concerts was sold at the sales of Monday and Tuesday, and the premiums with the increased prices made the total receipts larger than they were last year.

Transcript, Oct. 3,1906

MUCH PLEASED OVER OUTLOOK

Traveler Oct. 3,1906

Famous Director Sure He Will Like His Work in Boston.

Dr. Carl Muck, who has been selected to lead the Symphony Orchestra this year, arrived in this city from New York, last night, and went at once with his wife to the Empire Hotel on Commonwealth avenue.

Dr. Muck is one of the leaders of the royal opera at Berlin, and it was with difficulty that the Emperor's consent to his absence for even a single year was obtained. In recent years he has conducted symphony concerts in London, Paris, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Brussels and Madrid. Last winter, with Felix Motl, he shared the honor of conducting the Philharmonic concerts in Vienna. Dr. Muck was engaged last May by George A. Ellis, who went abroad searching for a successor to Mr. Gericke.

The new director seemed highly pleased with his work. "It is certainly too soon for me to say what my plans are," said he. "I know how great the Boston Symphony orchestra is, yet I must meet its members, look through the orchestra's library, and then decide what kind of a programme to selec[illegible]

[16]

STAR CONCERT AT SEA ON THE KAISER WILHELM.

World's Greatest Artists Combine in a Performance for Benefit of Sailors' Widows and Orphans.

DR. KARL MUCK AND VIGNA CONDUCT SHIP'S BAND.

Guilb[illegible] Leonc[illegible] Parkina, Franko and the Hageman[illegible] on the Programme.

The most remarkable concert ever heard on the sea was enjoyed by the passengers on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, which made harbor yesterday from Bremen, Southampton and Cherbourg. In the talent and renown of the conductors, accompanists, singers, instrumentalists, in conjunction with an Atlantic steamship's orchestra, composed of second-cabin stewards, the programme and the success with which it was carried through to a triumphal finish under such unusual circumstances were a farvel.

Imagine Herr Dr. Karl Muck, first conductor of the German Imperial Opera, and one of the world's most famous leaders, who has come to succeed Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the great Maestro Leoncavallo, composer of "Il Pagliacci," "Zaza" and "Chatterton"; Arturo Vigna, conductor of Italian and French operas at the Metropolitan Opera-House; Sam Franko, conductor of chamber music and violinist; Yvette Guilbert, Elisabeth Parkina, Melba's protege, and R. Hageman and Mme. Rosina Hageman-Van Dyk, of Amsterdam, all appearing in the same programme!

"I would have staked $10,000 for one night's performance of such an aggregation," exclaimed Rudolph Aronson when he was told of the concert in aid of American and German seamen's widows and orphans.

An Orchestra of Stewards.

But the most marvellous thing was that an orchestra of ship's stewards should have been able to interpret the music. When the concert was first suggested Sam Franko, Mr. Hagefan and Capt. Cueppers, working enthusiastically for it; Oskar Kirchner, director of the Kaiser Wilhelm de Grosse orchestra, acknowledged that his men—if they did wrestle between daily concerts with plates and mattresses—could play anything that was ever written on a staff from "Mother, Mother, Mother, Pin a Rose on Me," to Wagner.

"'My men, never fear!'" said Leader Kirchner to Conductor Vigna. "Why, mine Herr, they are all educated musicians. The most of them have been enlisted men in the German army bands, and as such have played in half the theatres of Germany." Conductor Kirchner's band, when the musicians are not waiting on passengers, play three times a day. They did not rehearse the music they were to be called upon to play. Some of them had never seen it before.

The concert was held on Sunday evening. The first saloon dining-room had every chair occupied and the aisles between the long tables were filled with "standees."

With German placidity Herr Kirchner's orchestra rendered whatever was placed on their racks. The numbers were encored twice, thrice and four times. The applause was hearty. All the performers entered with the greatest good will into the spirit of the concert.

Surprised Dr. Muck.

Dr. Muck, who leads the best orchestra the world can furnish, arose to lead and Herr Kirchner politely surrendered his baton, his dark, smooth, musicianly face, with its prominent, pointed chin, speaking as plainly as words: "I wish I had a better orchestra."

As the stewards responded to his verve and moods, playing with as much coolness as if standing on the promenade deck of a summer afternoon, Dr. Muck lost his doubting look and entered as heartily into the music as if leading his own orchestra in the Imperial Opera.

"What was the difference between Dr. Muck and Conductor Vigna?" was asked of Leader Kirchner, who had sat in the audience where he could see both.

"Oh, Dr. Muck was cool and steady. He never lost his nerve," said Kirchner. "Vigna is passionate. He gets excited. My men? Ah, they kept cool. They're all learned musicians and the best orchestra, not only in the North German Lloyd fleet, but on any sea."

When Vigna arose to take the stick, he was just himself, without a sign of any sort to show he was not wearing his baton above his own Metropolitan Opera House orchestra.

Expressed in F[illegible]

Although only be[illegible] $600 was raised for th[illegible] a concert would [illegible] more than [illegible] annexed to the par[illegible]es are the very lowest [illegible] the value of the services:

[illegible]estra	$150	Sam Franko....	$100
[illegible]eman ..	150	Vigna	200
[illegible]	100	Leoncavallo	700
[illegible]	1,000
[illegible]-Hageman		Total.....	$2,500
[illegible] Dyk....	100

It will be a long while before those who go down to the sea in ships will listen to another such a concert. Herr Kirchner was happy yesterday. Dr. Muck, Vigna and Leoncarvallo all gave him signed certificates that his ship's band was the only one they ever heard that was worth listening to.

STARS WHO TOOK PART IN CONCERT ON THE KAISER WILHELM, AND PROGRAMME.

STARS ON DECK.

1.-LEONCAVALLO. 2.-R HAGLMAN. 3.-Capt CUEPPERS. 4.-DR MUCK. 5.-SAM FRANKO. 6.-MME. MUCK. 7.-VIGNA. 8.-YVETTE GUILBERT. 9.-MME HAGLMAN.

A PART of S.S. BAND.

Programme

„Kaiser Friedrich Marsch" ORCHESTRA — Friedemann

2. Pantomimic-Ballad „Hänsel & Gretel" for Voice and string orchestra — Humperdinck
Mr. R. HAGEMAN and STRING-ORCHESTRA

3. „Les cloches de Nantes" Mdme. YVETTE GUILBERT

4. Overture „Merry wives of Windsor" ORCHESTRA conducted by Dr. KARL MUCK — Nicolai

5. Violin Solo „Legende" Mr. SAM FRANKO accompanied by Dr. KARL MUCK — Wieniawski

6. Bellsong „Lakmé" Mdme. ROSINA HAGEMAN—VAN DYK — Delibes

7. Fantasia „Il Trovatore" ORCHESTRA conducted by Maestro ARTURO VIGNA — Verdi

8. a) „Ave Maria" [Meditata] R. LEONCAVALLO
b) „'Tis the day" Miss ELISABETH PARKINA accompanied by the COMPOSER

9. Waltz „Artists Life" ORCHESTRA conducted by Mr. SAM FRANKO — Strauss

The "ALL STAR" PROGRAM.

From.....

Address .....

Date.....

Künstler-Gruppe vom „Kaiser Wilhelm dem Großen".

Leoncavallo, Oscar Straus, Fr. Parkina, R. Hagemann, Arturo Vigna, Yvette Guilbert, Capitän Cueppers, Dr. Muck, Sam Franko.

Boston Herald
Oct. 3, 1906.

DR. MUCK HERE TO CONDUCT ORCHESTRA

Great German Musician Looks with Pleasure to Boston Symphony Concerts.

DUE TO KAISER THAT HE CAME TO AMERICA

Reputation of Local Organization in Europe Is Second to None in World.

Herr Dr. Carl Muck, one of the conductors of the Royal Opera at Berlin, who comes to Boston to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New York yesterday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and took the "Merchants Limited" for Boston. Herr Muck, accompanied by his wife, arrived in this city shortly after 10 o'clock last evening. On arriving at the Back Bay station, C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who met him at New York, accompanied him to the Hotel Empire on Commonwealth avenue, where he will reside during his year's sojourn in Boston.

At Providence a Herald reporter boarded the train, and as the new conductor of the orchestra does not converse in English, the interview was held in the German language. Dr. Muck is of striking appearance. His dark, piercing eyes flashed as he spoke of his coming work with America's greatest orchestra, and his nervous temperament and unbounded enthusiasm was very evident as he chatted with the reporter. He is democratic and pleasant in his manner, though his bearing is dignified and somewhat reserved.

Dr. Muck had this to say: "It is certainly quite too soon for me to say what my plans are. I know how great the Boston Symphony Orchestra is. Its reputation in Germany and throughout the musical world of Europe is second to none, and I know its possibilities, yet I must first meet the members, look through the orchestra's library, and then decide what kind of a programme I shall select. You must realize that it is quite a different problem to conduct an orchestra from conducting a great chorus, yet I am looking forward with pleasure and much anticipation to the time when I shall lead the Symphony.

"I have had many offers, and good ones, too, to come to America, yet I could never manage to come, and when I first received the kind invitation of the Symphony Orchestra of Boston, it was hard to resist the temptation to say yes. So many tried to prevent me from coming, I had a personal interview with Kaiser Wilhelm, and it was through his influence that I was finally able to sign the contract. The Kaiser was very much in favor of my coming here. It was he who encouraged me to make my decision, and it was through his own personal influence that the barriers which seemed to hinder my acceptance were overcome. He knew all about the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and he was delighted that I should have the honor of receiving the invitation to come."

It was apparent that Dr. Muck was highly pleased with the prospects of the coming season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When asked if he had brought any new compositions, he said: "No, I have no new music; so little of any value or real merit is composed now, and we conductors have to rely on the old masters for really beautiful and expressive music. I have not arranged any programme. I must first see, then I will plan.

"I have always been anxious to visit Boston, I understand it is so cultured and its atmosphere is so artistic, I hope I won't be disappointed."

Further, Dr. Muck did not care to discuss his coming work, but mentioned that he had just got through conducting the great musical festival at Bayreuth, where Wagner's "Parsifal" was given. For six years he has been conductor there. From there he went to Goerlitz in Silesia where an annual music festival was held. There he conducted a chorus of 360 men and women and an orchestra of 140 musicians. Singing societies from all over that part of Germany attended. Having finished there he returned to Berlin, where he had a few days to prepare for his advent to new and what promise to be successful fields.

Conducts Ship's Orchestra.

Dr. Muck's trip over on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse was a delightful one. Among his fellow-passengers were a number of celebrities such as Parkina, Leoncavallo, Pagliacci and Yvete Guilbert, who arranged a concert in which Dr. Muck conducted the ship's orchestra to the delight of all the passengers. Dr. Muck said it was a great contrast, conducting an orchestra of 14 musicians after leaving Gorlitz, where he had 140 men to whom to swing his baton.

Through the special permission of the German Emperor, Dr. Muck has been granted a year's leave of absence from the Royal Opera at Berlin, beginning Oct. 1. He will make his first appearance in the United States as a conductor in Boston at the first public rehearsal on Oct. 12.

Dr. Muck has had a most successful career, extending over 25 years. Like many other musicians who have won fame, he was at first intended for a professional career, so he studied at the University of Heidleberg for the degree in philosophy. After a year there he transferred his activity to the University of Leipsic, after the manner of [illegible] than the university attracted him to the Saxon city, for besides his studies he began work also at the Leipsic conservatory, and soon after he got his Ph. D. from Heidleberg he made a public appearance in Leipsic as a pianist in the Gewandhaus. It was a successful appearance, but instead of devoting himself to the piano he turned conductor.

Beginning with minor posts in small municipal opera houses—Zurich, Salzburg and Gratz—he finally won an important position in the opera at Prague, where he was conductor for six years, from 1886 to 1892. One of his engagements at this period was as conductor for Anglo Neumann's travelling opera company, a post in which Anton Seidl was his predecessor. His first appearance in Berlin was at the Lessing theatre as visiting conductor. In 1892 he was engaged as conductor at the Royal Opera in Berlin and has been there ever since.

He has frequently appeared as conductor of orchestral concerts in most of the musical capitals of Europe. One of his most important engagements of this sort was in Vienna, where he conducted the famous Vienna Phil-Harmonic Society, after that organization, like its New York namesake, having lost Hans Richter, took up the plan of having visiting conductors appear in rotation.

Dr. Muck is highly esteemed as a conductor not only in Berlin, but in St. Petersburg, Moscow, Paris, London, Madrid and Vienna. He has been praised for the "phenomenal accuracy and versatility of his knowledge and his noble and objective artistry." He does not seek sensational effects, and although he has marked individuality he does not court the limelight. He is said to be an excellent disciplinarian, and a believer in thorough preparation whether the work be old or new. He enjoys a great reputation as an interpreter of Wagner's music dramas and at Byreuth, for his reading of "Parsifal," he was hailed as a successor of Levi.

Dr. Karl Muck.
der heute aus Berlin hier eingetroffene Dirigent des Boston Symphonie Orchesters.

Muck und Leoncavallo

Heute angekommen.

Leoncavallo als Vertreter des Königs von Italien.

Dr. Carl Muck, Kapellmeister an der kgl. Oper in Berlin und der neue Dirigent des Bostoner Simphonie-Orchesters, traf heute mit dem „Kaiser Wilhelm der Große" hier ein. Dr. Muck wurde am 22. Oktober 1859 in Darmstadt geboren, wo sein Vater J. Muck Kapellmeister war und dem Sohn den ersten Musikunterricht ertheilte. Carl bildete sich bei Kißner in Würzburg und auf dem Konservatorium zu Leipzig weiter aus, wandte sich aber später wissenschaftlichen Studien zu, denen er auf den Universitäten von Leipzig und Zürich oblag.

Die plötzliche Erkrankung des Theaterkapellmeisters in letzterer Stadt, für den er einsprang, entschied sein Loos. Er fand Gefallen am Dirigiren und blieb dabei. Successive bildete er sich in Salzburg, Brünn, Graz und Prag zu einem der ersten Kapellmeister aus und folgte 1892 dem Rufe nach Berlin, wo er an der kgl. Oper als Leiter der Symphoniekonzerte der kgl. Kapelle wirkte.

New Conductor Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. Karl Muck

New Boston Symphony Conductor Here

Prof. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here to-day on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse.

Das, was der Dollar Karl Muck mit sich bringt, Mister President, ist nur eine Stimmgabel, nicht eine „Muck Rake" oder gar eine Tillman'sche Heugabel.

DR. KARL MUCK ARRIVES.

Dr. Karl Muck, first conductor of the Imperial Opera in Berlin, arrived yesterday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, of the North German Lloyd Line, to succeed Wilhelm Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"This is my first visit to the United States," said Dr. Muck. "I expect to conduct my first concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston about the middle of the month, and shall direct that organization in the concerts, numbering about 100, which will be given during the season.

in the older countries. I have felt that I could write as I wished, do new things, perhaps, that would not be received on the other side, because they were new, and could get a hearing for them in America purely on their merits, without regard to traditions and prejudices.

"It is my purpose while here to get the material for at least one opera based on American life. I want to go to the theatres, to see the people and meet and talk with them, to learn their ideas and ideals, and see if I can write them into words and music. I have not studied so much of the American literature as I could wish, but I believe after all that it will be better for me to learn at first hand by meeting the people. I am seeking the realities, the things that are of today and of the real life of today. Wagner wrote of things that were far off and away from human experience. I wish to picture humanity as it is. The cry of a child, the sorrow of a woman, the great problems of life as it is appeal to me far more than the unrealities which many think necessary for opera. It is such life that I seek whenever I can, and it is a side of such real life that I hope to find in this new country, which is pulsating with it.

"For more tangible plans, I am to play here for the first time my 'Ave Maria,' here for the first time my "Ave Maria," composed for the aid of the earthquake sufferers at Calabria. Also a new march 'Vive l'Amerique,' which I have dedicated to President Roosevelt. It is built on the two melodies, 'Yankee Doodle' and 'Dixie.' Other numbers at my concerts will be excerpts from my operas 'Roland of Berlin' and 'Zaza,' as well as the whole of 'Pagliacci' in concert form. I am now working on my 'Youth of Figaro,' the first performance of which I hope may take place in this country."

Vigna and Van der Stucken apparently escaped in the confusion, and Miss Parkina, being young and comparatively obscure, also slipped out unheeded. Yvette Guilbert, however, was ready and waiting. She had come to America for the series of recitals that she is to give from city to city with Albert Chevalier. They and the journeyings they require seemed to interest her less than did her plans to act on the regular stage in full-fledged plays: "I shall close my tour here," she told the Sun, "in the latter part of November and I shall then go to Brussels, where I make my first venture in drama in the Royal Park Theatre. The play will be 'The Troubled Waters.' It was written especially for me by Edmund Guiraud, who dramatized for 'Anna Karénina,' and who several plays. I expect to country next fall to appear Dr. Paul Lindau, adapted for stage by Edward Knoblauch present called 'The Other probably act the play first English. Arthur Symons, poet, is also writing a play very poetic, but for the pres is not to be made public way, Mr. Knoblauch is ada the English novel, 'Esther ten by George Moore. Mea discovered several Englis that I shall sing at my re I do not sing a song pleasure that it gives me but on account of the mu be put into it and the histo

Out of the Musical Ark

Dr. Muck, on his way to his new post in Boston, was not the only eminent musician whom the German steamer Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse landed yesterday, in New York. The ship was indeed a sort of musical ark. Vigna, who leads the Italian operas at the Metropolitan, and Van der Stucken of the Cincinnati orchestra were also on board for conductors; Leoncavallo, making his first visit to America, was the composer, and Miss Parkina, the young soprano, who comes from Covent Garden to appear at the Worcester festival, and Yvette Guilbert, in her kind, were the singers. Only a virtuoso or two were lacking, and perhaps the ship's band filled this deficiency when Dr. Muck, the other conductors, and Leoncavallo led it in turn at a concert the night before the ship made port. Leoncavallo was voluble when the reporters encircled him at the pier, and the Times, which saw him as "a short, very plump man, alert and active, quick and enthusiastic," heard him say: "My visit to America has more significance to me than a mere tour. I had long wanted to come to America to study the life, because I believed that here I would find much material that I could not find elsewhere. I have also felt that perhaps I could make my best appeal to the American public. It is a new country, with new ideals and without the prejudices that are so apt to hamper one

Boston Transcript --- Oc

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om

dress

te

Schiff war Kunsttempel.

Dr. Muck dirigirt 100 Konzerte.

Dr. Karl Muck, der ein warmer Freund Signor Leoncavallo's ist, hat seine Gattin mit nach Amerika gebracht. Seiner Reise durch Amerika mit dem Boston Symphonie-Orchester sieht der Berliner Dirigent mit großer Spannung entgegen. Ueber Bayreuth, wo er regelmäßig mehrere der größeren Aufführungen leitet, erklärte Dr. Muck, daß Frau Wagner die Thatsache, daß „Parsifal" auch in New York aufgeführt wird, schwer überwinden kann. Im Ganzen wird das Boston Orchester unter Dr. Muck's Leitung 100 Konzerte veranstalten.

[18]

GREAT MEN LEAD SHIP'S BAND.

Leoncavallo and Dr. Karl Muck Help in the Big Kaiser's Musik.

There was a good deal of musical talent on board the steamship Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, which arrived here yesterday, and the passengers had a treat at the ship's concert on Monday night.

The musicians of note were Dr. Karl Muck, who is to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of 100 concerts; Leoncavallo, the composer, who is to conduct an eight weeks concert tour; Arturo Vigna, the conductor who is to appear at the Metropolitan Opera House; Sam Franko, Yvette Guilbert, and Miss Parkina of Cincinnati, who is a protégé of Melba.

Before the concert some one went to the leader of the ship's orchestra—an organization numbering thirty-five—and asked him if he thought the musicians good enough for the famous men to lead. The leader drew himself up and replied that he had the best orchestra afloat and that he doubted if many ashore could beat it. So the band played on, and the conductors found to their delight that there were many excellent musicians in the aggregation.

"And, indeed, why should they not be, since I have all Europe to draw from?" asked the ship's orchestra leader.

Dr. Muck said that he had looked forward to his coming to America with much pleasure and he was sure he would enjoy his stay here. He had never visited America before and he hoped to meet many American composers.

Dr. Muck is a friend of Mrs. Wagner and for years has conducted Wagner concerts at Bayreuth. At the ship's concert he led the orchestra in selections from "The Merry Wives of Windsor."

The audience was treated to selections from "Il Trovatore" when Leoncavallo led [illegible] cians.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

From THE MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address NEW YORK CITY.

Date

THE KAISER WILHELM'S MUSICAL CARGO.

LEONCAVALLO. MRS. CARL MUCK. ELIZABETH PARKINA. R. H. YV... DR. CARL MUCK. SIGNORA VIGNA. SAM FRANKO.

One of the Most Notable Gathering on One Steamship—They Came

Dr. Muck Is a Diplomatist.

Dr. Carl Muck was greeted by Otto Weil, of the Metropolitan Opera House; by Nahan Franko, Mrs. Nahan Franko and Alfred Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Muck is to conduct for a year.

Mr. Muck showed himself to be a diplomat as well as a man of the world.

"Do you think Strauss' 'Salome' will be a success over here?" he was asked point blank.

"With such splendid singers as Conried has engaged how can it fail to be?" he replied, his eyes dancing.

"You start for Boston at three, Dr. Muck," said Ellis.

"It is now one," said Dr. Muck. "I arrive in New York at one, and I leave for Boston at three. That is American."

A remarkable concert was given on the boat, at which Mme. Guilbert and Rosina Hageman Van-Dyk sang, R. Hageman played and Vigna and Muck led the ship's orchestra in elaborate selections.

Traveller

OCTOBER 3, 1906.

GREATEST ARTISTS AND SHIP BAND

Remarkable Star Concert for Benefit of Sailors' Widows and Orphans.

KARL MUCK CONDUCTS.

NEW YORK, Oct. 3.—The most remarkable concert ever heard on the sea was enjoyed by the passengers on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, which made harbor yesterday from Bremen, Southampton and Cherbourg. In the talent and renown of the conductors, accompanists, singers, instrumentalists, in conjunction with an Atlantic steamship's orchestra, composed of second-cabin stewards, the programme and the success with which it was carried through to a triumphal finish under such unusual circumstances were a marvel.

Imagine Herr Dr. Karl Muck, first conductor of the German Imperial Opera, and one of the world's most famous leaders, who has come to succeed Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra; the great Maestro Leoncavallo, composer of "Il Pagliacci," "Zaza" and "Cha terton"; Arturo Vigna, conductor of Italian and French operas at the Metropolitan Opera House; Sam Franko, conductor of chamber music and violinist; Yvette Guilbert, Elisabeth Parkina, Melba's protege, and R. Hageman and Mme. Rosina Hageman-Van Dyk of Amsterdam, all appearing in the same programme!

"I would have staked $10,000 for one night's performance of such an aggregation," exclaimed Rudolph Aronson, when he was told of the concert in aid of American and German seamen's widows and orphans.

An Orchestra of Stewards.

But the most marvellous thing was that an orchestra of ship's stewards should have been able to interpret the music. When the concert was first suggested Sam Franko, Mr. Hageman and Capt. Cueppers, working enthusiastically for it; Oskar Kirchner, director of the Kaiser Wilhelm de Grosse orchestra, acknowledged that his men—if they did wrestle between daily concerts with plates and mattresses—could play anything that was ever written on a staff, from "Mother, Mother, Mother, Pin a Rose on Me," to Wagner.

DR. KARL MUCK.

With German placidity Herr Kirchner's orchestra rendered whatever was placed on their racks. The numbers were encored twice, thrice and four times. The applause was hearty. All the performers entered with the greatest good will into the spirit of the concert.

Surprised Dr. Muck.

Dr. Muck, who leads the best orchestra the world can furnish, arose to lead and Herr Kirchner politely surrendered his baton, his dark, smooth, musicianly face, with its prominent, pointed chin, speaking as plainly as words: "I wish I had a better orchestra."

As the stewards responded to his nerve and moods, playing with as much coolness as if standing on the promenade deck of a summer afternoon, Dr. Muck lost his doubting look and entered as heartily into the music as if leading his own orchestra in the Imperial Opera.

Although only between $500 and $600 was raised for charity, such a concert here would have cost more than The figures annexed to the parents' names are the very lowest rates of the value of the services:

Extra ...	$150
Hageman ...	150
...	100
...	1000
Hageman-Van Dyk ...	100
Franko ...	100
...	200
Vallo ...	700
...	$2500

It be a long while before those ocean, to the sea in ships will ...other such a concert. Herr ...was happy yesterday. Dr. ... and Leoncavallo all gave ...certificates that his ship's ...ably one they ever heard ...ch listening to.

COMES TO CONDUCT BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Dr. Karl Muck, from Imperial Opera, in Berlin, Arrives on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse.

Dr. Karl Muck, first conductor of the Imperial Opera in Berlin, arrived yesterday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, of the North German Lloyd line, to succeed Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck is apparently between thirty-five and forty years old. He is smooth shaven, wears glasses and his black hair is somewhat long. He has a keen sense of humor.

"This is my first visit to the United States," said Dr. Muck, "I expect to conduct my first concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston about the middle of the month, and shall direct that organization in the concerts, numbering about one hundred, which will be given during the season.

"It is true that I conduct 'Parsifal' at Bayreuth every year. This year I was there for two months. Frau Cosima Wagner is still bitter over the production of 'Parsifal' in this country.

"I am not well enough informed as to the works of American composers to discuss them intelligently. I have, however, met many American singers, among them Miss Geraldine Farrar and Mr. Griswold, a bass singer, who are at the Berlin Opera."

Dr. Muck is accompanied by Frau Muck.

Mr. Arturo Vigna, one of the conductors at the Metropolitan, also arrived yesterday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, after a holiday in Italy and conferences with some of the newer composers whose works he will have an opportunity to interpret this winter.

Musikalische Berühmth

Dr. Carl Muck.

Unter den Passagieren des gestern hier eingetroffenen Dampfers „Kaiser Wilhelm der Große" befanden sich außer vielen anderen Persönlichkeiten, deren Namen einen guten Klang haben, zwei europäische Größen und zwar Dr. Carl Muck, der neue Dirigent des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, und der bekannte italienische Opern-Komponist Ruggiero Leoncavallo, der mit dem La Scala-Orchester am Montag in Carnegie Hall seine Concerttour durch die Ver. Staaten beginnt und außerdem als Vertreter des Königs von Italien am 12. Oktober bei der Enthüllung des Verdi-Monuments anwesend sein wird.

(Dr. Muck wurde am 22. Oktober 1859 in Darmstadt geboren, wo sein Vater J. Muck Kapellmeister war und dem Sohn den ersten Musikunterricht ertheilte. Letzterer bildete sich bei Kißner in Würzburg und auf dem Konservatorium zu Leipzig weiter aus, wandte sich aber später wissenschaftlichen Studien zu, denen er auf den Universitäten von Leipzig

[19]

Ostl. Zeitung
N. Y. City
Oct 3 1906

Das Künstler-Schiff.

Muck und Leoncavallo auf dem „Großen Kaiser".

Verschiedene Opern- und Theatergrößen, sowie sonstige Künstler an Bord. — Deutsche Besucher, welche Amerika kennen lernen wollen.

Unter den vielen interessanten Persönlichkeiten, die gestern Mittag an Bord des Norddeutschen Lloyd-Dampfers „Kaiser Wilhelm der Große" hier anlangten, war Hofkapellmeister Dr. Karl Muck vom königlichen Opernhause in Berlin unstreitig eine der bedeutendsten, zählt er doch mit Recht in Deutschland nicht allein, sondern in der ganzen Musikwelt zu den ersten lebenden Meistern vom Taktstock. Dr. Muck, eine schlanke, mittelgroße Erscheinung mit feinem, glattrasirtem Gesicht, das den geistigen Arbeiter auf den ersten Blick erkennen läßt, empfing den Vertreter des Blattes, der ihn am Dock begrüßte, mit gewinnender Freundlichkeit. Der Meister, der sich in Begleitung seiner Gattin befindet, geht bekanntlich mit sechsmonatlichem Urlaub nach Boston, um dort die Leitung des berühmten Symphonie-Orchesters zu übernehmen. Er wird mit der Kapelle die übliche Tournée unternehmen, die sich auf die Städte Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia und New York, wo sechs Konzerte stattfinden, beschränkt. Er kommt zum ersten Mal nach Amerika und ist naturgemäß auf das Aeußerste gespannt, das Land kennen zu lernen. Vor allen Dingen aber sprach er seine Freude darüber aus, mit einem Orchester, das einen so glänzenden Ruf genießt, arbeiten zu können. Auf die Frage nach seinem Urtheil über die neueste Strauß'sche Oper „Salome" erwiderte er sehr diplomatisch, daß das Werk hochinteressant, aber sehr schwer sei. Nach seiner Meinung hängt der Erfolg des Werkes in erster Linie von den

Dr. Karl Muck.
(Spezial-Aufnahme bei Ankunft des Dampfers.)

Solisten, die ja allerdings, wie er sagte, an unserem Opernhause sehr gut seien, ab.

Dr. Muck, der am 22. Oktober 1859 in Darmstadt als der Sohn des Kapellmeisters J. Muck geboren wurde, erhielt seine musikalische Ausbildung zuerst von seinem Vater und später auf der königlichen Musikschule in Würzburg unter Kißner und am Konservatorium in Leipzig. Nachdem er an den Universitäten Leipzig und Zürich wissenschaftlichen Studien obgelegen hatte, entschied er sich nach beendetem Studium für die musikalische Laufbahn und begann dieselbe am Theater in Zürich als Chordirektor. Nachdem er dort noch einige Zeit als Kapellmeister gewirkt hatte, ging er als solcher nach Salzburg, Brünn, Graz und Prag und schwang sich mit immer steigendem Erfolg zur Stellung eines der ersten Dirigenten empor. Im Jahre 1892 erfolgte seine Berufung an die Hofoper, wo er auch die Symphonie-Konzerte der Hofkapelle leitete. In fast allen Hauptstädten Europas ist er auf seinen vielen Gastspielreisen auf das Höchste gefeiert worden. Ohne hier Aufenthalt zu nehmen ist Dr. Muck sofort nach Boston weitergereist, um an seinem neuen Wirkungskreis mit der Arbeit zu beginnen.

In seiner allernächsten Nähe stand von einer Schaar in echt südländischem Feuer begeisterter Landsleute umgeben, der italienische Komponist Ruggiero Leoncavallo, der ebenfalls in Begleitung seiner Gattin war. Der Meister hat durch die im Auftrage des deutschen Kaisers komponirte Oper „Der Roland von Berlin" in musikalischen Kreisen viel Anfeindung gefunden. Er kommt nach Amerika, um mit der Kapelle vom Scala-Theater in Mailand, eine auf zwei Monate berechnete Konzert-Tournee durch die Vereinigten Staaten und Canada, welche etwa vierzig Konzerte umfassen soll, zu unternehmen. Das erste Konzert wird am Montag, dem 8. Oktober, in Carnegie Hall stattfinden und neben Auszü-

REDUCTION RATIO 12x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Cutting Bureau in the World

NOTABLE GROUP OF MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC STARS ON THE KAISER WILHELM DER GROSSE.

Gathered on deck during the voyage of the North German Lloyd liner which arrived here yesterday, Captain Otto Cüppers and several well known passengers posed for the accompanying photograph. In the upper row of seven, from left to right, are Signor Leoncavallo and Signor Nacchi, the composer's secretary; Mr. R. Hagemann, Captain Cüppers, Dr. Carl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and Mr. Sam Franko. Seated from left to right are Mme. Muck, Signor Arturo Vigna, of the Metropolitan; Miss Elizabeth Parkina, Mme. Yvette Guilbert, Mme. Rosina Hagemann and Mme. Vigna.

EVENING RECORD,
OCTOBER 3, 1906

DR. MUCK'S PLANS NOT YET MADE

Exceedingly amiable in appearance is Dr. Carl Muck, the great musician who has arrived to conduct the Symphony orchestra.

Dr. Muck is dark complexioned, has dark hair and eyes, and wears black rimmed eye-glasses. He has no moustache or beard. In height he is about 5 ft. 6 in., and of a build which is reminiscent of Arthur Nikisch. He looks far younger than his 46 years.

DR. CARL MUCK,
The new leader of the Symphony Orchestra.

"I am absolutely without plans as to the conduct of the orchestra," he said. "No plans will be made until I have looked through the library of the orchestra, learned what it has played and as to the public taste. I have come with an entirely open mind."

Mrs. Muck, who is an attractive blonde, considerably younger than her husband, is a woman of literary reputation in Germany. English is among the languages which she speaks.

"I did not find New York so strange as London," she said, "as it has a much greater resemblance to Berlin."

Dr. and Mrs. Muck came over on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and had a very pleasant trip. Leoncavallo, the composer, Conductor Vigna of the Metropolitan Opera house, and Yvette Guilbert were among the other passengers. Dr. Muck conducted the orchestra at the concert which was given on board.

Both Dr. and Mrs. Muck are enthusiastic travelers, and would like to return home to Germany next year by way of Asia, but fear that it may be too warm for such a trip.

ss

Ein Plauder-Stündchen.

Leoncavallo und Muck.

Was der Kapellmeister zu erzählen hat.

Sam Franko's neuer Fund.

Sterne am Musikhimmel berichten über „Salome" und „Roland von Berlin".

Und dann ein anderes Bild.

Drei Herren und eine Dame. Auch sie haben ein Rosenbouquet und auch sie wollen einen Musiker von Weltruf begrüßen. Herr und Frau Nahan Franko sind's, Otto Weil von der Oper und Alfred Ellis, der Manager des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters. Sie warten auf Dr. Karl Muck, Kgl. Preußischen Hofkapellmeister und Dirigenten der Berliner Symphonien.

Haben Sie schon einen Manager in Verzweiflung gesehen?

Nun, Alfred Ellis war in Verzweiflung, gestern auf dem Pier des Norddeutschen Lloyd. Langsam hatte der Riesendampfer schon alle seine Passagiere entladen. Immer dünner wurde der Zug, der sich über die Laufplanke ergoß. Alle die berühmten Reisenden, die der Oceanwindhung herübergebracht hatte, waren schon lange bei ihren wartenden Freunden. Yvette Guilbert, die gefeierte französische Diseuse, die auch nicht jünger geworden ist, seit dem letzten Jahre, mit ihrem Partner Albert Chevalier, Sam Franko, der Mommsen unter den Musikern, R. Hagemann, der Pianist mit seiner gesangesbegabten Gattin, Elizabeth Parkina, die talentirte Schülerin der Melba, und Signor Vigna nebst Gemahlin waren bereits vorbeidefilirt, nur von Dr. Muck war nichts zu sehen.

Wie der geängstigte Mr. Ellis da hin und her rannte und Fragen stellte, deren Beantwortung er in seiner Geschäftigkeit gar nicht abwarten konnte! So sucht eine Henne nach dem Lieblingsküchlein. Und dann steckte des Managers begreifliche Nervosität auch die Frankos an und den sonst so kühlen und reservirten Otto Weil, und sie alle betheiligten sich an der Suche, und kein Winkelchen des Riesenpiers blieb undurchforscht. Und während all der Zeit des Hangens und Bangens seiner Freunde stand Dr. Muck, der unbedrängt im Gedränge das Schiff verlassen hatte, vor seinen Koffern im Inspektions-Saale und wartete auf die Beamten.

New Yorker Spaziergänge

Der musikalische Dampfer. — Berühmtheiten an Bord. — Unterredungen im Fluge. — Muck, Leoncavallo, Yvette Guilbert, Parkina, Franko, Vigna und Hagemann's.

wahrhaftig nach Noten Wurst gemacht und doch war Alles in schönster Harmonie. Und als es in Hoboken an's Scheiden ging, da gab es in allen Sprachen nur ein au revoir, a rivederci, auf Wiedersehen! Muck, Leoncavallo, Yvette Guilbert, Frl. Parkina, Sam Franko, Arthuro Vigna, R. Hagemann, — es sind ein bischen viel auf einmal und bei Jedem von ihnen kann man nur einen Augenblick verweilen, will man Allen den Willkommengruß entbieten. Zuerst kommt mir Frau Dr. Schiller, pardon Yvette Guilbert, entgegen. Sie ist ja schon öfter bei uns gewesen, kennt Land und Leute und Sitten. Mit fröhlichem Gruße reicht mir die einst so Schlanke, nun auch schon zu frauenhafter rundlicher Fülle Neigende die Hand. Ich hatte sie zum Dampfer geleitet, der sie nach ihrem jüngsten Hiersein der Heimath zuführte. Damals hatte mir die geistvolle Yvette mit fröhlichem Augenzwinkern gesagt, daß, wenn wir uns wiedersehen, dies nur in Paris sein könne. Amerika werde sie nicht wiedersehen. Und nun ist sie wieder gekommen, um uns in ihrer Loge mit Albert Chevalier zu besuchen, ihr gekommen, zu ihr gekommen, auch eine vollendete Künstlerin. Die Gage und ihre wunderartigen Experimente sind wieder herübergekommen, die böse Künstlerin mit ihrem Kinderherzen und dem unwiderstehlichen Sirenenlachen, das ihr Jedem ein geht und einen Jeden der Frau in der Sie giebt dem Sie freut sich dessen und Ruggiero zum ersten Mal und stehen noch ersten Eindruck giebt es nicht mit nach der Landung zer Schwarm von en und ihnen bis Freunden" um sie.

Muck, der bo ston Symphony nächste Jahr diri rhin noch an, daß Zeit noch ernstlich das hindert nicht ungen auf das al pannt sind. „Ich von den musikali vernommen, di Jahrzehnt gemacht ch begierig bin, si meinte der noch er 47 Jahre aus mit den kühn ge hen und doch wie ügen. „Man ha ungen und Bemer Amerika gemach Mund gelegt, daß t nicht mehr weiß Dichtung sich schei aber getrost an Viertel davon der gemachten Aeuße cht. Wie kann ich ein Urtheil übe die ich nur von Und bei dieser ganz neuer Aus Gesicht, ein Aus kaum beschreiben ist er. Er drück n Schelmerei und

Dr. Muck's Erscheinung.

Er ist ein gar seltener Mann, der Kgl. preußische Hofkapellmeister. Amt und Würden und selbst die Jahre trägt er gar leicht auf den schmächtigen Schultern. Und in den lustigen, lebhaften Augen lauert der Schalk. Scharf geschnittene, feine Züge, ein verblüffend bewegliches Mienenspiel, — aber die klugen Augen beherrschen alles. Und man sieht es dem charakteristischen Munde mit den schmalen Lippen an, daß er gar gut zu erzählen weiß, und daß ihm Spott und Satire nicht fremd sind.

Er hat so gar nichts typisch Deutsches an sich, der Herr Doktor. Eher sieht er wie ein „Yankee" aus. Er wird mit seiner Persönlichkeit in Boston nicht auffallen. Aber um so mehr werden sie dort über das Genie des gefeierten Dirigenten staunen.

Ein warmer Händedruck begrüßt den Fremden, der gekommen ist, den berühmten Besucher „auszupumpen".

„Was ich alles mit dem Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester spielen werde? Im Frühjahr habe ich das Programm erhalten, korigirt und zurückgesandt. Wirklich, ich hatte gar keine Zeit, wieder darauf zurückzukommen."

Dr. Muck spricht mit einem prononcirten süddeutschen Accent und die klugen Augen bleiben unverwandt auf den Fragesteller gerichtet.

„Hab' ich's doch gedacht. Was ich über „Salome" denke, wollen Sie von mir wissen. Leider habe ich nie eine Gelegenheit gehabt, die Oper zu sehen. Ich war an den Abenden, an denen sie in Dresden zur Aufführung kam, stets beruflich in Berlin zurückgehalten. Aber die Musik kenne ich und was ich von ihr halte, kann ich wohl am besten in einem Satze zusammenfassen. Ich verstehe sie nicht. Ich kann dem Strauß'schen Werke vom musikalischen Standpunkte nicht näher kommen. Ich kann nicht begreifen, mit welchen musikalischen Funktionen das Opus geschrieben wurde. Vom musikalischen Standpunkt ist das Werk mir persönlich unverständlich."

„Und vom pathologischen?" warf der Interviewer ein.

Ueber die scharfen Züge Dr. Muck's huschte ein schalkhaftes Lächeln.

„Ich bin doch kein Universitätsprofessor." Und dann wurde er wieder ernst. Strauß ist es heiliger Ernst mit allen seinen Schöpfungen. Sie ist in Deutschland eine Parteifrage geworden, die Salome-Frage. Strauß kämpft die Jung-Deutsche musikalische Schule. Für sie ist er Gott und Messias. Aber er selbst steht über den Kämpfen. Er kümmert sich weder um Lob noch um Tadel. Er komponirt, wie er muß. Und trotz aller Bedenken. Seine Combinationsgabe ist genial und neben Häßlichem und Unverständlichem finden sich Stellen von berückender Schönheit."

Dr. Muck über Leoncavallo.

„Wie hat Ihnen der „Roland von Berlin" von Leoncavallo gefallen, Herr Doktor?"

„Leoncavallo!" Und die lustigen Augen sprühten nur so von Schalkhaftigkeit. „Wir haben uns vortrefflich auf der Ueberfahrt unterhalten. Er ist ein lieber, fröhlicher, guter Gesellschafter, er — —"

„Aber der „Roland von Berlin", Herr Doktor?"

„Der „Roland von Berlin"? und des Herrn Kapellmeisters ausdrucksvolles Gesicht nahm eine gar schmerzliche Miene an. „Der „Roland von Berlin", ja, lieber Freund, das ist eine ganz andere Sache!"

Dr. Muck sprach dann noch in außerordentlich anerkennender Weise von Geraldine Ferrar, der neuen Sopranistin, die Direktor Conried engagirt hat, und meinte, daß Rollen, wie die der Juliette in „Romeo et Juliette" unvergleichlich von der jungen Prima Donna gesungen würden.

Und dann plauderte der Herr Kapellmeister von seiner Reise und er hätte wohl noch viel erzählt, wenn nicht Alfred Ellis gemahnt hätte, daß die Zeit zur Abreise nach Boston, die um drei Uhr Nachmittag bereits erfolgen sollte, bedenklich nahe sei.

Noch ein herzlicher Händedruck, ein „Auf Wiedersehen!" und die besorgte Henne entführte ihr kostbares

[20]

Cutting Bureau in the World

NOTABLE GROUP OF MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC STARS ON THE KAISER WILHELM DER GROSSE.

Gathered on deck during the voyage of the North German Lloyd liner which arrived here yesterday, Captain Otto Cüppers and several well known passengers posed for the accompanying photograph. In the upper row of seven, from left to right, are Signor Leoncavallo and Signor Nacchi, the composer's secretary; Mr. R. Hagemann, Captain Cüppers, Dr. Carl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and Mr. Sam Franko. Seated from left to right are Mme. Muck, Signor Arturo Vigna, of the Metropolitan; Miss Elizabeth Parkina, Mme. Yvette Guilbert, Mme. Rosina Hagemann and Mme. Vigna.

EVENING RECORD,
OCTOBER 3, 1906

DR. MUCK'S PLANS NOT YET MADE

Exceedingly amiable in appearance is Dr. Carl Muck, the great musician who has arrived to conduct the Symphony orchestra. Dr. Muck is dark complexioned, has dark hair and eyes, and wears black rimmed eye-glasses. He has no moustache or beard. In height he is about 5 ft. 6 in., and of a build which is reminiscent of Arthur Nikisch. He looks far younger than his 46 years.

DR. CARL MUCK,
The new leader of the Symphony Orchestra.

"I am absolutely without plans as to the conduct of the orchestra," he said. "No plans will be made until I have looked through the library of the orchestra, learned what it has played and as to the public taste. I have come with an entirely open mind."

Mrs. Muck, who is an attractive blonde, considerably younger than her husband, is a woman of literary reputation in Germany. English is among the languages which she speaks.

"I did not find New York so strange as London," she said, "as it has a much greater resemblance to Berlin."

Dr. and Mrs. Muck came over on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and had a very pleasant trip. Leoncavallo, the composer, Conductor Vigna of the Metropolitan Opera house, and Yvette Guilbert were among the other passengers. Dr. Muck conducted the orchestra at the concert which was given on board.

Both Dr. and Mrs. Muck are enthusiastic travelers, and would like to return home to Germany next year by way of Asia, but fear that it may be too warm for such a trip.

Ein Plauder-Stündchen.

Leoncavallo und Muck.

Was der Kapellmeister zu erzählen hat.

Sam Franko's neuer Fund.

Sterne am Musikhimmel berichten über „Salome" und „Roland von Berlin".

Und dann ein anderes Bild.

Drei Herren und eine Dame. Auch haben ein Rosenbouquet und auch sie w len einen Musiker von Weltruf begrüß Herr und Frau Nahan Franko sind's, D Weil von der Oper und Alfred Ellis, Manager des Bostoner Symphonie-chesters. Sie warten auf Dr. Karl M Kgl. Preußischen Hofkapellmeister u Dirigenten der Berliner Symphonien.

Haben Sie schon einen Manager Verzweiflung gesehen?

Nun, Alfred Ellis war in Verzweiflu gestern auf dem Pier des Norddeutsc Lloyd. Langsam hatte der Riesendam schon alle seine Passagiere entladen. J dünner wurde der Zug, der sich übe Laufplanke ergoß. Alle die berü Reisenden, die der Oceanwindhun übergebracht hatte, waren schon lan ihren wartenden Freunden. Yvette bert, die gefeierte französische Difeu auch nicht jünger geworden ist, s letzten Jahre, mit ihrem Partner Chevalier, Sam Franko, der M unter den Musikern, R. Hagema Pianist mit seiner gesangsbegabt tin, Elizabeth Parkina, die Schülerin der Melba, und Signo nebst Gemahlin waren bereits vo lirt, nur von Dr. Muck war n haben.

Wie der geängstigte Mr. Elli und her rannte und Fragen stel Beantwortung er in seiner Gesc gar nicht abwarten konnte! So s Henne nach dem Lieblingsküchlein dann steckte des Managers begreiflic bosität auch die Frankos an und so kühlen und reservirten Otto sie alle betheiligten sich an der S kein Winkelchen des Riesenpiers durchforscht. Und während al des Hangens und Bangens sein stand Dr. Muck, der unbedräng dränge das Schiff verlassen hat nen Koffern im Inspektions-S marirte auf die Beamten.

5

M
AT 2
AND 8
—50—75c
Mats., 25c
venirs
NIGHT Week EXAS ncert mh4-tf
TRE
MS
ERUB
IC ELLI ctor
IRE
SAT.
ATRE in PLAYS
t 2.
TRE
OGUL
t 2.
OUSE
le Her
Sat. at 2.
ATRE
TT
latch
at 2.
ATRE
lle
0:30.
TRE
CITY
e at 2.
ATRE
TION EAST
d Sat.
ile

New Yorker Spaziergänge

Der musikalische Dampfer. — Berühmtheiten an Bord. — Unterredungen im Fluge. — Muck, Leoncavallo, Yvette Guilbert, Parkina, Franko, Vigna und Hagemann's.

Wahrhaftig nach Noten Beust gemacht und doch war Alles in schönster Harmonie. Und als es in Hoboken an's Scheiden ging, da gab es in allen Sprachen nur ein au revoir, a revederci, auf Wiedersehen! Muck, Leoncavallo, Yvette Guilbert, Frl. Parkina, Sam Franko, Arthuro Vigna, R. Hagemann, — es sind ein bischen viel auf einmal und bei Jedem von ihnen kann man nur einen Augenblick verweilen, will man Allen den Willkommengruß entbieten. Zuerst kommt mir Frau Dr. Schiller, pardon Yvette Guilbert, entgegen. Sie ist ja schon öfter bei uns gewesen, kennt Land und Leute und Sitten. Mit fröhlichem Gruße reicht mir die einst so Schlanke, nun auch schon zu frauenhafter rundlicher Fülle Neigende die Hand. Ich hatte sie zum Dampfer geleitet, der sie nach ihrem jüngsten Hiersein der Heimath zuführte. Damals hatte mir die geistvolle Yvette mit fröhlichem Augenblinzeln versichert, daß, wenn wir uns wieder einmal sähen, dies nur in Paris geschehen könne. Amerika werde sie nicht wiedersehen. Und nun ist sie doch wiedergekommen, um uns in blitzartiger Tournée mit Albert Chevalier, der mit ihr gekommen, zu zeigen, daß sie auch eine vollendete Schauspielerin ist. Die Gage und der Reiz dieses eigenartigen Experimentes haben sie wieder herübergebracht, die capriciöse Künstlerin mit dem echten Frauenherzen und dem süßen schelmischen Sirenenlachen, das durch Mark und Bein geht und einen jeden in den Bann der Frau in der Künstlerin schlägt. Sie giebt dem Schicksal die Schuld, daß sie wiedergekommen und sie freut sich dessen von ganzem Herzen.

Dr. Carl Muck und Ruggiero Leoncavallo sind zum ersten Male hierhergekommen und stehen noch ganz unter dem ersten Eindruck. Viel zu plaudern giebt es nicht mit ihnen, denn sofort nach der Landung bemüht sich ein ganzer Schwarm von engeren Landsleuten und ihnen bisher unbekannten „Freunden" um sie. Man sieht's Dr. Muck, der bekanntlich das Boston Symphony Orchester für das nächste Jahr dirigieren wird, immerhin noch an, daß er vor nicht langer Zeit noch ernstlich krank war. Aber das hindert nicht daß seine Erwartungen auf das allerhöchste Maß gespannt sind. „Ich habe schon soviel von den musikalischen Fortschritten vernommen, die Amerika im letzten Jahrzehnt gemacht hat, daß ich wahrlich begierig bin, sie kennen zu lernen," meinte der noch jugendlich trotz seiner 47 Jahre ausschauende Dirigent mit den kühn geschnittenen, energischen und doch wieder gutmüthigen Zügen. „Man hat mir soviele Aeußerungen und Bemerkungen, die ich über Amerika gemacht haben soll, in den Mund gelegt, daß ich wahrhaftig selbst nicht mehr weiß wo Wahrheit und Dichtung sich scheidet. Sie können aber getrost annehmen, daß drei Viertel davon der wirklich von mir gemachten Aeußerungen nicht entspricht. Wie kann ich mir denn wohl auch ein Urtheil über Dinge erlauben, die ich nur von Hörensagen kenne." Und bei diesen Worten kommt ein ganz neuer Ausdruck in Dr. Muck's Gesicht, ein Ausdruck, den man kaum beschreiben kann, so eigenartig ist er. Er drückt eine ganze Welt von Schelmerei und losem Witz aus und will sobald nicht verschwinden, als wir in der üblichen Weise „von dem ersten Eindruck Amerika's" sprechen. Die üblichen Phrasen, denn Muck giebt sich im gewöhnlichen Leben als Alltagsmensch und nicht als Künstler mit stets allzu hoch gespannter Ideenwelt. Er erzählt des Ferneren von dem glänzenden Rufe, den das Boston Symphony Orchester auch in der Musikwelt auf der anderen Seite habe, — wie stolz er darauf sei, gerade zum Leiter dieses Orchesters berufen zu sein. Und er erhofft ein ersprießliches Zusammenwirken der amerikanischen Musiker mit ihm, dem bis in die Fingerspitzen deutschen Dirigenten.

Noch ein paar nichtige Worte, dann müssen wir uns mit kräftigem deutschen Händedruck trennen. Dr. Muck ist anderweitig in Anspruch ge-

VG. STAATSZEITUNG.

Zur Unterhaltung.

(Original im Besitz von Sam Franko.)

Leoncavallo, Dr. Muck, Sam Franko, Yvette Guibert und ihre fidele Reisegesellschaft.

(Spezial-Aufnahme für das „Abendblatt".)

Dr. Muck Arm in Arm mit Leoncavallo.

6 October 5,1906.

The Boston Journal

FOUNDED 1833

SYMPHONY SEATS, $31.50.

The $18 seats for the Saturday night concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were sold at auction yesterday, the highest premium being $31.50 for seats well in front. Other prices ranged from $26.50 to $8 and $9

BOSTON HERALD

Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXX., No. 97.

FRIDAY, OCT. 5, 1906.

Mr. Adamowski's performance of Saint-Saens' concerto is well known and appreciated in Boston, and this afternoon he played with the appropriate elegance and fine sentiment. He reads the concerto in the spirit of the composer and does not attempt to give it any deep or heroic character.

It is not necessary to discuss the nature of orchestral performances at these concerts. The players are often fatigued by the necessary rehearsals and oratorio work, and it is not surprising that occasionally the lips of wind instrument players are refractory and that the strings are jaded. The wonder is that the men play as well as they do. There was a large and interested audience.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

HOW POLITICS MAKES STRANGE BANDS PLAY FOR US ALL.

Like the Famous Austrian Army Awfully Arrayed, These Bandsmen from All Over Creation Are Holding Local Platforms Down, While Orchestras and Rival Operas Bow to Public Apathy Until After Election—La Scala Orchestra and Those That Follow Later.

ers a week after.

Under Conductor Muck, another new resident of America, if perhaps a temporary one, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual ten programmes in Carnegie Hall. These fall on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, Nov. 8 and 10, Dec. 6 and 8, Jan. 10 and 12, Feb. 21 and 23, and March 21 and 23. The final appearances are a bit late, owing to a midwinter trip to Rochester, Cleveland, Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus and Cincinnati. The year's work is increased to 125 concerts this season.

As Paderewski's only public appearance will be with the Boston Orchestra in January, the old subscribers have been early with their demands at the box office. It is certain that at the sale to new applicants on Oct. 15, most of the remaining chairs will be taken for the season by persons who might pay speculators as much or more for a single concert of their pet pianist.

Boston Post

October 4-06.

DR. MUCK WILL CATER TO BOSTON TASTE

At the fashionable Commonwealth avenue apartment house, the Empire, No. 333, Dr. Carl Muck, the new leader of Boston's Symphony Orchestra who arrived here from Europe this week, is making his temporary home. His attractive wife, Mrs. Muck, is with the celebrated musician.

Dr. Muck said yesterday:

"I am without plans as to the conduct of my orchestra, and none will be made until I have looked through its library and have learned what it has played. I have come with an entirely open mind, and will cater to the taste of Boston."

Dr. Muck is only 46, and looks even younger. He is short, but not stout, and resembles Arthur Nikisch. He is of very dark complexion, and wears glasses.

Transcript

October 4,1906.

MUSIC IN BOSTON

[From the Providence Journal]

It is an impertinence for players of any kind, whether union men or not, to go to Boston. The Bostonians can furnish their own music, superior to any other in the world. Even the Symphony Orchestra, as one Alderman pointed out, is "under no necessity of importing musicians from Europe." The "best talent" may be found in the shadow of the Gilded Dome. The Musicians' Union has not yet put the Symphony Orchestra on the unfair list, but if it does the people of Boston will have the satisfaction of knowing that the Chelsea Orchestra or the South End Band can beat out Dr. Muck's men. There is every reason why intelligent Bostonians should be proud of the Musicians' Union and of the Board of Aldermen. Both are maintaining, as has been said, a great principle.

4 October 5, 1907.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813

309-311 Washington St.

SALE OF SEATS FOR SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

This morning at 10 a.m. the auction sale of the $10 seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held at Symphony hall on Massachusetts ave. In past years the premiums on the choicest of these seats has run well up in value, and the bidding this year is sure to be unusually interesting, on account of the fame preceeding the new conductor, Dr. Carl Muck.

S _____

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Dr. Muck Has Arrived And Begun Rehearsals.

The auction sale of seats for the Boston concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last week in Boston, indicates that the whole season to come, 1906-1907, will be the most prosperous that the Orchestra has ever had. The sale was a large one in the matter of prices (for every seat for both public rehearsals and concerts has been sold for years). A certain increase was to be expected under any conditions, and unquestionably the coming of Dr. Muck was an added stimulus to the bidders. Dr. Muck arrived on last Tuesday and went immediately to Boston. Rehearsals begin at once. His personality has made a favorable impression on those that have met him. The Baltimore season sale will open on Monday, October 22, at Albaugh's.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

SS _____

In Boston music lovers are glad to pay a premium for a choice of seats for the series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra, and the auction sale for this season, just held, is said to indicate greater interest than ever in the work of the orchestra. The coming of the new conductor, Dr. Carl Muck, doubtless has something to do with this. Dr. Muck arrived last Tuesday and went immediately to Boston. Monday he meets the orchestra for the first time and rehearsals will begin at once. His personality has made a favorable impression on those that have met him. There is said to be a decided charm about the man and at the same time all the needed evidence of his being a very serious artist.

BOSTON HERALD

Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXX., No. 97.

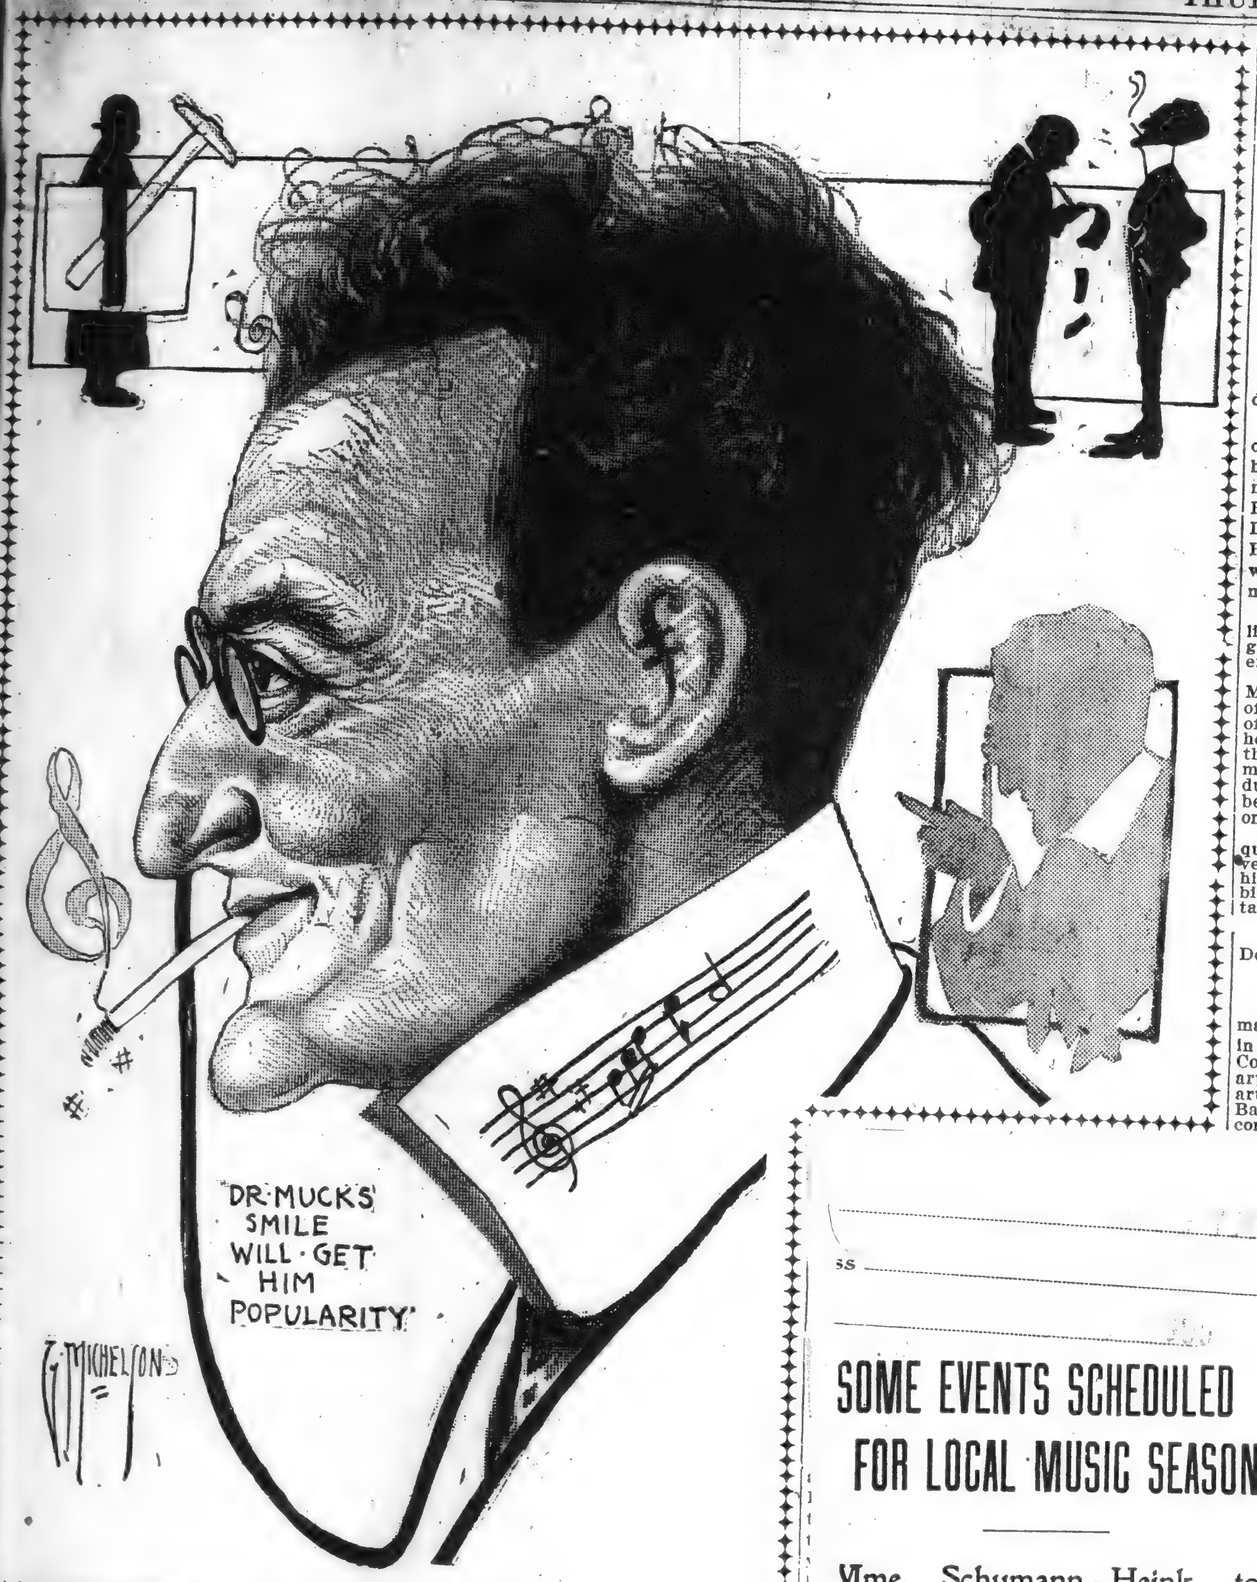
FRIDAY, OCT. 5, 1906.

SPECULATORS GET CHOICE

Many of the Best Seats for Orchestra Concerts Secured by Them.

The $18 seats for the Saturday night concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra were sold at auction at the Symphony Hall yesterday. There were no sensational bids, and according to the management the premiums were about the same as last year. The highest premium received was $31.50, while some seats were sold for prices ranging from $26.50 down to $8 and $9. Many of the choice seats were secured by ticket agents and speculators, while a few persons had their personal representatives there who did the bidding for them. In the afternoon the seats in the first balcony were sold and the highest bid received was $52, in row A on the left side.

[21]



STUDIES OF DR. MUCK, SYMPHONY LEADER.

Sketched by Boston American staff artist.

HERR MUCK SAYS BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA ONE OF FINEST

Famous German Music Director Arrives in City. Ready For Symphony Concerts.

By Morton Birge.

Der Boston Symphony Orchestra ist eines der besten in der welt.

Der Herr Conductor Doctor Karl Muck of the Boston Symphony expresses it as his Teutonic opinion that our esteemed musical body is one of the finest there is. For that reason, he argues, Der Herr Direktor Conried of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York to the contrary notwithstanding, that Boston must be a good musical town. Jah!

Dr. Muck—it seems to be pronounced like the double "O" sound in "soon," ist gekommen zu Boston, or words to that effect.

Anyhow, Dr. Muck, of Berlin, also Frau Muck, is here in town, ready to take hold of his new contract, by special dispensation of His Gracious Majesty, the Kaiser Wilhelm, to conduct the Boston Symphony through the ensuing year. The royal permit was necessary, as Dr. Muck was conductor of the Imperial Orchestra of Berlin before he came here. He is in America on a year's leave of absence.

Dr. Muck is rather distinguished looking, quite bejeweled, musical, of course, and very clean-cut and healthy appearing. By his own declaration he is fond of hunting—birds and small game in the Austrian mountains, also of horseback riding.

"Automobiling?"

"So expensive," says the Herr Conductor Doctor Muck.

Democratic and Affable.

He was a very democratic and affable man who received an artist and reporter in his suite in the Hotel Empire, No. 333 Commonwealth avenue. Fortunately the artist sprenchen sie Deustche. He, the artist? said "Herr Muck." The dark Bavarian features of the new Symphony conductor flashed into a smile and a greeting. Then there were cigarettes out of a hammered silver, turquoise-studded case. It seems that the cigarettes are of the same brand that the Sultan Abdul Hamid of Turkey gives to the Kaiser. They are of a rather delicate flavor.

Dr. Muck had been unpacking several trunks.

"There was a delay at the dock. The customs inspectors took so long."

One trunk went lost, as it were, but fortunately was recovered.

Dr. Muck was dressed in blue serge with tan shoes. Over his waistcoat a fine-link, gold watch chain flowed with abandon. In his old rose, small cravat was a jeweled scarf pin with a head shaped like a coronet. His cuff links were a pair of fleur-de-lis of gold, studded with small diamonds and with the links connected by slender gold chains, the latter bearing smaller diamonds. There were a few rings.

"Symphony Cannot Be Improved."

The new conductor is a man of medium height, slender, with sharply chiselled features, high forehead and hair worn somewhat long. He is quite filled with interest of this new country, which he has never seen before, yet slow to comment and planning no radical changes so far as his professional work goes.

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra," he says through the interpretation of the artist, "is ideal in every way. I do not plan any changes. I might use works of new composers. But, so far as the work of the orchestra goes, as I have known it, it cannot be improved in any way."

This from the man who is the Kaiser's own musical conductor and who directed the production of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth for seven years, even before the Herr Direktor Conried ventured it on Boston.

"You have met Herr Conried?"

"No."

"You have heard of him?"

"Oh, Jah!"—with a flash of white teeth.

Then the story of what Herr Conried had said of Boston and its lack of appreciation of the Conried "Parsifal," followed by the praise of Boston by Dr. Muck as a city which could support the Boston Symphony Orchestra, "eines der besten in der welt."

Two Are Whole Family.

Dr. Muck is about 47 years old or so. Mrs. Muck seems quite a bit younger. She likes music, though she does not play. She is fond of literature and literary things. There are no children, so when Dr. and Mrs. Muck are here the entire Muck household is with us.

Dr. Muck is a stranger here, too. He knows Manager Ellis of the Symphony Orchestra, of course, but has no social acquaintances in the city, not yet. Nor hardly in the country, for that matter. He is much interested in America outside of his professional duties. Already, on his first morning in Boston, he was preparing for a tour of the city under Manager Ellis's guide, that he might become acquainted with the new community in which musical pet he is to direct this season.

It hardly seemed fair to ask Dr. Muck what he thought of this country. He had been here hardly one day and his principal impression was having one thing lost.

ss _____

SOME EVENTS SCHEDULED FOR LOCAL MUSIC SEASON

Mme. Schumann-Heink to Give Opening Song Recital.

OTHER INSTITUTE OFFERINGS.

Sight-Singing Classes to Be Resumed —The Russian Symphony Concerts.

If the auction sale of seats for the Boston concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which took place last week in Boston can be accepted as a criterion of the whole season to come, 1906-'07 will be the most prosperous that the orchestra has ever had. The sale was a large one in the matter of price (for every seat for both public rehearsals and concerts has been sold for years). A certain increase was to be expected under any conditions, and unquestionably the coming of Dr. Muck was an added stimulus to the bidders. Dr. Muck arrived last Tuesday, and went immediately to Boston. On Monday he meets the orchestra for the first time, and rehearsals will begin at once. His personality has made a favorable impression on those that have met him. There is a decided charm about the man, and at the same time all the needed evidence of his being a very serious artist.

The full prospectus for the Boston Symphony season in Brooklyn will be published in next Saturday's papers, the season sale opening on Tuesday evening, Oct. 23.

Boston Journal

October 6-06.

DR. MUCK ANNOUNCES FIRST SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Beethoven and Wagner Are Represented, the Latter Largely Predominating, in Selections for the Opening Concert on Friday Next.

With Dr. Muck here and settled, with the auction sales finished, the way is now clear for the Symphony season of 1906-1907, the twenty-sixth of the Symphony Orchestra. The first public rehearsal and the first concert will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, respectively, and Boston for the first time will have the opportunity to know the new conductor. The auction sales testified to the fact that interest in the concerts this year is keener than it has ever been before, and this naturally is due largely to the curiosity which the coming of Dr. Muck has excited.

Because interest centers in Dr. Muck there will be no soloist in this first program, which Dr. Muck arranged last spring, when Mr. Ellis was in Berlin. He has chosen for his introductory work the C minor Symphony No. 5 of Beethoven, which is generally regarded as a final test of the conductor's knowledge of the traditions of the great classics. As Dr. Muck has been so closely identified with the Wagner movement for the last twenty years, it is but natural that Wagner's works should find representation in his first program; but he has chosen works which are complete in themselves, not excerpts from operas unless the Prelude to "The Mastersingers" is regarded as such. The program for the first concert is as follows:

Beethoven—Symphony in C minor No. 5.
Wagner—A Faust Overture.
Wagner—Siegfried Idyll.
Wagner—Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1906

The Worcester Festival

At the orchestral concert of the Worcester Festival, yesterday afternoon, a set of symphonic variations by Mr. Stock, the conductor of the Chicago Orchestra, were played for the first time outside that city. By all accounts they were ingenious, highly-colored, fanciful and decorative, which is nearly all that music cast in such a form can be unless some very great composer like Richard Strauss in "Don Quixote," bends it to more expressive purposes. Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," Saint-Saëns's third concerto for violin, with Mr. Adamowski to play the solo part; Schumann's fourth symphony and two vocal numbers made the rest of the programme. Mr. Kneisel conducted, and the band came from our Symphony Orchestra. In the evening at a choral concert, Brahms's "Song of Destiny" and Verdi's Requiem were sung, with Mr. Goodrich conducting and with dramatic fervor and musical discernment hand in hand.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n _____

ress _____

e _____

The orchestras are out with news of their several sets of concerts. The Boston Symphony, with its new conductor, Dr. Carl Muck, begins its Carnegie Hall series on November 8 and 10. Paderewski will make his only New York appearance this winter with this orchestra in January, when his new symphony will be played. His own number will be the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto.

ess _____

If the auction sale of seats for the Boston concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which took place last week in Boston can be accepted as a criterion of the whole season to come, 1906-1907 will be the most prosperous that the orchestra has ever had. The sale was a large one in the matter of price (for every seat for both public rehearsals and concerts has been sold for years). Dr. Muck arrived last Tuesday and went immediately to Boston. Monday he meets the orchestra for the first time and rehearsals will begin at once. His personality has made a favorable impression on those that have met him. The full prospectus for the Boston Symphony season in Brooklyn will be published next Saturday, the season sale opening on Tuesday evening, October 23.

Tschaikowsky's Quartet in E flat minor, opus 30, and the Andante from his Quartet, opus 11, will be discussed by Thomas Whitney Surette in his second lecture recital (Brooklyn Institute), at Association Hall, on Monday evening. As at the first recital he will be assisted by the Olive Mead Quartet. This is to play again for the third recital and is then to go on a concert trip to the Western coast as far as Sacramento, to be gone a month or six weeks.

[22]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813
309-311 Washington St.

OCTOBER 6, 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

With Dr. Muck here and settled, with the auction sales finished, the way is now clear for the Symphony season of 1906-1907, the 26th of the Symphony Orchestra. The first public rehearsal and the first concert will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively, and Boston for the first time will have the opportunity to know the new conductor.

Because interest centres in Dr. Muck there will be no soloist in this first programme which Dr. Muck arranged last spring when Mr. Ellis was in Berlin.

The programme for the first concert is Beethoven, Symphony in C minor No. 5; Wagner, A Faust overture; Wagner, Siegfried Idyll; Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

EVENING RECORD

OCTOBER 6, 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

With Dr. Muck here and settled, with the auction sales finished, the way is now clear for the Symphony season of 1906-1907, the 26th of the Symphony Orchestra. The first public rehearsal and the first concert will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively, and Boston for the first time will have the opportunity to know the new conductor.

Because interest centres in Dr. Muck there will be no soloist in this first programme which Dr. Muck arranged last spring when Mr. Ellis was in Berlin.

The programme for the first concert is Beethoven, Symphony in C minor No. 5; Wagner, A Faust overture; Wagner, Siegfried Idyll; Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

STUDIES OF DR. MUCK, SYMPHONY LEADER.

Sketched by Boston American staff artist.

HERR MUCK SAYS BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA ONE OF FINEST

Famous German Music Director Arrives in City. Ready For Symphony Concerts.

By Morton Birge.

Der Boston Symphony Orchestra ist eines der besten in der welt.

Der Herr Conductor Doctor Karl Muck of the Boston Symphony expresses it as his Teutonic opinion that our esteemed musical body is one of the finest there is. For that reason, he argues, Der Herr Direktor Conried of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York to the contrary notwithstanding, that Boston must be a good musical town. Jah!

Dr. Muck—it seems to be pronounced like the double "O" sound in "soon," ist gekommen zu Boston, or words to that effect.

Anyhow, Dr. Muck, of Berlin, also Frau Muck, is here in town, ready to take hold of his new contract, by special dispensation of His Gracious Majesty, the Kaiser Wilhelm, to conduct the Boston Symphony through the ensuing year. The royal permit was necessary, as Dr. Muck was conductor of the Imperial Orchestra of Berlin before he came here. He is in America on a year's leave of absence.

Dr. Muck is rather distinguished looking, quite bejeweled, musical, of course, and very clean-cut and healthy appearing. By his own declaration he is fond of hunting—birds and small game in the Austrian mountains, also of horseback riding.

"Automobiling?"

"So expensive," says the Herr Conductor Doctor Muck.

Democratic and Affable.

He was a very democratic and affable man who received an artist and reporter in his suite in the Hotel Empire, No. 333 Commonwealth avenue. Fortunately, the artist sprenchen sie Deustche. He, the artist? said "Herr Muck." The dark Bavarian features of the new Symphony conductor flashed into a smile and a greeting. Then there were cigarettes out of a hammered silver, turquoise-studded case. It seems that the cigarettes are of the same brand that the Sultan Abdul Hamid of Turkey gives to the Kaiser. They are of a rather delicate flavor.

Dr. Muck had been unpacking several trunks.

"There was a delay at the dock. The customs inspectors took so long."

One trunk went lost, as it were, but fortunately was recovered.

Dr. Muck was dressed in blue serge with tan shoes. Over his waistcoat a fine-link, gold watch chain flowed with abandon. In his old rose, small cravat was a jeweled scarf pin with a head shaped like a coronet. His cuff links were a pair of fleur-de-lis of gold, studded with small diamonds and with the links connected by slender gold chains, the latter bearing smaller diamonds. There were a few rings.

"Symphony Cannot Be Improved."

The new conductor is a man of medium height, slender, with sharply chiselled features, high forehead and hair worn somewhat long. He is quite filled with interest of this new country, which he has never seen before, yet slow to comment and planning no radical changes so far as his professional work goes.

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra," he says through the interpretation of the artist, "is ideal in every way. I do not plan any changes. I might use works of new composers. But, so far as the work of the orchestra goes, as I have known it, it cannot be improved in any way."

This from the man who is the Kaiser's own musical conductor and who directed the production of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth for seven years, even before the Herr Direktor Conried ventured it on Boston.

"You have met Herr Conried?"

"No."

"You have heard of him?"

"Oh, Jah!"—with a flash of white teeth.

Then the story of what Herr Conried had said of Boston and its lack of appreciation of the Conried "Parsifal," followed by the praise of Boston by Dr. Muck as a city which could support the Boston Symphony Orchestra, "eines der besten in der welt."

Two Are Whole Family.

Dr. Muck is about 47 years old or so. Mrs. Muck seems quite a bit younger. She likes music, though she does not play. She is fond of literature and literary things. There are no children, so when Dr. and Mrs. Muck are here the entire Muck household is with us.

Dr. Muck is a stranger here, too. He knows Manager Ellis of the Symphony Orchestra, of course, but has no social acquaintances in the city, not yet. Nor hardly in the country, for that matter. He is much interested in America outside of his professional duties. Already, on his first morning in Boston, he was preparing for a tour of the city under Manager Ellis's guide, that he might become acquainted with the new community whose musical pet he is to direct this season.

It hardly seemed fair to ask Dr. Muck what he thought of this country. He had been here hardly one day and his principal introductory experience was having one trunk lost.

SOME EVENTS SCHEDULED FOR LOCAL MUSIC SEASON

Mme. Schumann-Heink to Give Opening Song Recital.

OTHER INSTITUTE OFFERINGS.

Sight-Singing Classes to Be Resumed —The Russian Symphony Concerts.

The orchestras are out with news of their several sets of concerts. The Boston Symphony, with its new conductor, Dr. Carl Muck, begins its Carnegie Hall series on November 8 and 10. Paderewski will make his only New York appearance this winter with this orchestra in January, when his new symphony will be played. His own number will be the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto.

If the auction sale of seats for the Boston concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which took place last week in Boston can be accepted as a criterion of the whole season to come, 1906-'07 will be the most prosperous that the orchestra has ever had. The sale was a large one in the matter of price (for every seat for both public rehearsals and concerts has been sold for years). Dr. Muck arrived last Tuesday and went immediately to Boston. Monday he meets the orchestra for the first time and rehearsals will begin at once. His personality has made a favorable impression on those that have met him. There is a decided charm about the man, and at the same time all the needed evidence of his being a very serious artist.

The full prospectus for the Boston Symphony season in Brooklyn will be published in next Saturday's papers, the season sale opening on Tuesday evening, Oct. 23.

Boston Transcript
WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
FRIDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1906

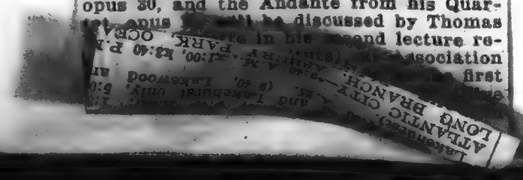
The Worcester Festival

At the orchestral concert of the Worcester Festival, yesterday afternoon, a set of symphonic variations by Mr. Stock, the conductor of the Chicago Orchestra, were played for the first time outside that city. By all accounts they were ingenious, highly-colored, fanciful and decorative, which is nearly all that music cast in such a form can be unless some very great composer like Richard Strauss in "Don Quixote," bends it to more expressive purposes. Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," Saint-Saëns's third concerto for violin, with Mr. Adamowski to play the solo part; Schumann's fourth symphony and two vocal numbers made the rest of the programme. Mr. Kneisel conducted, and the band came from our Symphony Orchestra. In the evening at a choral concert Brahms's "Song of Destiny" and Verdi's Requiem were sung, with Mr. Goodrich conducting and with dramatic fervor and musical discernment hand in hand.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

If the auction sale of seats for the Boston concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which took place last week in Boston can be accepted as a criterion of the whole season to come, 1906-1907 will be the most prosperous that the orchestra has ever had. The sale was a large one in the matter of price (for every seat for both public rehearsals and concerts has been sold for years). Dr. Muck arrived last Tuesday and went immediately to Boston. Monday he meets the orchestra for the first time and rehearsals will begin at once. His personality has made a favorable impression on those that have met him. The full prospectus for the Boston Symphony season in Brooklyn will be published next Saturday, the season sale opening on Tuesday evening, October 23.

Tschaikowsky's Quartet in E flat minor, opus 30, and the Andante from his Quartet, opus [illegible] will be discussed by Thomas [illegible] in his second lecture recital [illegible] association [illegible] first



[illegible] the cars run. Healy [illegible] that he was escorting his mother [illegible] that he did no more than he had [illegible] to protect her. Healy was acquitted [illegible] and brought suit against Aspinwall [illegible] charging him with malicious prosecution. At the first trial of this case [illegible] the jury found for the plaintiff, but Judge Holmes set the verdict aside [illegible] for the first time will have the opportunity to know the new conductor. The auction sales testified to the fact that interest in the concerts this year is keener than it has ever been before, and this naturally is due largely to the curiosity which the coming of Dr. Muck has excited.

Because interest centers in Dr. Muck there will be no soloist in this first program, which Dr. Muck arranged last spring, when Mr. Ellis was in Berlin. He has chosen for his introductory work the C minor Symphony No. 5 of Beethoven, which is generally regarded as a final test of the conductor's knowledge of the traditions of the great classics. As Dr. Muck has been so closely identified with the Wagner movement for the last twenty years, it is but natural that Wagner's works should find representation in his first program; but he has chosen works which are complete in themselves, not excerpts from operas unless the Prelude to "The Mastersingers" is regarded as such. The program for the first concert is as follows:

Beethoven—Symphony in C minor No. 5.
Wagner—A Faust Overture.
Wagner—Siegfried Idyll.
Wagner—Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813
309-311 Washington St.

OCTOBER 6, 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

With Dr. Muck here and settled, with the auction sales finished, the way is now clear for the Symphony season of 1906-1907, the 26th of the Symphony Orchestra. The first public rehearsal and the first concert will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively, and Boston for the first time will have the opportunity to know the new conductor.

Because interest centres in Dr. Muck there will be no soloist in this first programme which Dr. Muck arranged last spring when Mr. Ellis was in Berlin.

The programme for the first concert is Beethoven, Symphony in C minor No. 5; Wagner, A Faust overture; Wagner, Siegfried Idyll; Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

EVENING RECORD
OCTOBER 6, 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

With Dr. Muck here and settled, with the auction sales finished, the way is now clear for the Symphony season of 1906-1907, the 26th of the Symphony Orchestra. The first public rehearsal and the first concert will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively, and Boston for the first time will have the opportunity to know the new conductor.

Because interest centres in Dr. Muck there will be no soloist in this first programme which Dr. Muck arranged last spring when Mr. Ellis was in Berlin.

The programme for the first concert is Beethoven, Symphony in C minor No. 5; Wagner, A Faust overture; Wagner, Siegfried Idyll; Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

[22]

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1906

DR. MUCK IN BOSTON

A GLIMPSE OF THE MAN AT THE OUTSET OF HIS WORK

A Conductor That Seems Unconscious of Himself—The Simplicity, Sincerity and Candor That Make His Charm—The Intellectual Acuteness and the Quick Feeling That Are in Him—A Musician Who Works Rather Than Talks and Sets Small Store by Musical Psychology—His Anticipations of His Audiences Here—Humorous Eagerness for Each New American Thing—The Traits and Incidents That a Little Conversation Disclosed

Across our broadest avenue, in the clearness of an autumn noon, the sun was pouring into the room, and Dr. Muck was sitting in the full warmth and brightness of it. He has his prepossessions in favor of America and of Boston, and he believed that by such a day he could fairly judge our climate and our weather. It was warmer and brighter than autumn usually goes in Berlin, which is a cold and rather cloudy northern city. It was promising for the winter. The meanest of cynics could not have the heart to disillusion him, and only experience, after all, really discovers our New England climate. Dr. Muck has been going often to Vienna, and there, in winter, are days of as many sorts as our Boston days. So, perhaps, he is forearmed. The conductor was working swiftly at his table; a score lay open before him; a pile of "parts"—that the players use in rehearsal and performance—stood beside it; a little farther away were the solace and stimulus of a green box of German cigarettes. Dr. Muck was busy with a task that is characteristic. He was correcting the players' parts from the full score, and inserting missing marks of expression. There is nothing harder to copy accurately than a manuscript of music; with the clearest of copies, the most careful of printers make many errors. Mr. Hertz, at the Metropolitan Opera House, discovered 1100, for example, in the sheets of "Parsifal" that his band was using. Little by little he has corrected them all, and in the same way Dr. Muck was correcting the parts of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl." It is not work that any conductor does eagerly; most of them, indeed, shun it, and take their chances on the accuracy of copyists and printers. But Dr. Muck believes that the composer and the audience deserve the score, to the smallest chromatic inflection, to the minutest mark of expression, as it came from the hand that wrote it. In the library of the Opera at Berlin there are scores that are monuments to his industry and patience, and when he has been conducting, listeners with fine and discriminating ears have heard notes and whole phrases that they never heard before. He loves the middle-voices and the under-voices in an orchestral ensemble. After all, the composer did write his minutest note in his most subordinate parts that it might be heard. Nothing daunted, though at least twenty-four programmes and 125 concerts stretch before him, Dr. Muck has begun the correction of our orchestra's scores. He loves work in the quiet of the small hours, and the student's habit is still in him.

In a moment Dr. Muck had shut the score, pushed the parts backward and the cigarettes forward, and with the action the charm of the man began. The relentless biographical handbooks have done him injustice. They put him far forward in the forties. To see and to hear, he might hardly be at the beginning of them. His is still the alert spare figure of young manhood, unweighted with middle-age. Years of work over the conductor's desk in opera houses and concert halls and over his writing table at home have not bent his thin square shoulders. A youth in the twenties in the days when our American type did [illegible] to a gross and clumsy heaviness [illegible] with the radiant air of a victor. "It's a [illegible] cangles!" "A bit ritualistic," I suggested. "A bit! Now, I 'll tell you the story I told t' parson when 'e come to see me. A boy went to t' grocer's in t' daytime, I says, to fetch some things for 'is mother. 'I want cangles,' says 'e. 'Cangles!' says the shopman. 'Wot do yer want wiv cangles in the daylight?'" "What did the parson say to that?" I asked. "Say?" returned my friend, "'e, a dusky red-litten parlor I have had many a jolly meal, was in process of being knocked to the ground by a swarm of strenuous workmen. The genial rooms were dusty skeletons, all their kind shelters open to the "peering day." A piece of brand new stonework, the first bud, so to speak, of the new building, was already thrusting its staring freshness out of the decay. Skilfully dodging lumps of falling plaster, I penetrated into this new parlor. Here, on a painfully clean seat, sat the quintessence of that village's wisdom, wagging his head beard in indignant eloquence over his tankard. I timorously appealed for information. "New men, new fangles," he said fiercely, and waved his polished brown stick. "Towd Red Lion were good enow for me, and me feyther afore me. 'Modern improvements,' they say; young man; it won't wear. They 're all for t' frame nowadays, but it won't wear, young man; it won't wear. They 're all for t' frame nowadays, and ne'er mind t' plcter.

"Take our fresh parson, now," he went on, growing a little fiercer. "Put me 'ead in t' church on Sunday mornin', and wot do I see? Cangles (candles), young man, cangles!" "A bit ritualistic," I suggested. "A bit! Now, I 'll tell you the story I told t' parson when 'e come to see me. A boy no finer reward for the conductor than such an established bond between him and his audiences, and here in Boston he must begin at the beginning to weave it. He was eager for the work, but it was an honestly anxious eagerness.

One element in that understanding Dr. Muck as honestly and unaffectedly ignored. In all his talk—and it was sincerity itself—there was not a hint of it. Interest is the mother of understanding, and charm stimulates both. Dr. Muck, by every sign, will be interesting to his audiences and they will feel the charm of the candor and earnestness that are in him. There have been conductors here in Boston that kept all their interesting qualities hid under an exterior that was measured gravity itself. There have been others who heaped idiosyncrasy upon idiosyncrasy until their hearers were cloyed. Dr. Muck's interesting qualities shine transparently through him. He could not conceal them if he would. He would not obtrude them if he could, and in such simplicity and sincerity lie. his charm. The work, he will say, is everything, but he forgets that an audience may not separate the work and the worker. As week by week it follows the one, it comes to know and to like the other. Not only as a new conductor, but as a different conductor, with a persuasive individuality of his own, Dr. Muck will interest his audiences.

It is hard for Dr. Muck to speak of music. He has been no wandering virtuoso conductor, glib in six languages to as many interviewers. His work formulates his ideas, methods, convictions, preferences. Through it and by it they may speak clearest for him. Besides, he is spending his first days in a new America and a new city; he is dabbling for the first time in a new language; he is touching a little gingerly new manners, customs, society. A sedulous clipping agency piles his table with every scrap of newspaper on which his name is printed. "Ah! you have them in America, too! They used to tell me in the morning at Berlin that I was to conduct at night." For the first time he catches the distinctive odor of a cigarette of Virginia tobacco. "American tobacco," and his eyes brighten with quick eagerness, "you must let me try one." Someone has sent him a stylographic pen. It promptly sheds its ink, after the manner of its uncertain kind. He springs for blotting paper, and then he is all alert to understand its mechanism. Machinery, it seems, has always interested him. He likes to visit factories. Ought he to take lessons in English, or will he pick up enough in the ordinary intercourse of his new life? Moreover, he knows a little already, and as gayly as a boy he scribbles his first English sentence with the new pen on the back of a chance envelope. His mind and his talk dart back and forth spontaneously, unaffectedly, humorously. A word about the younger Krupp and his despatch of the Philharmonic Orchestra from Vienna to London last summer leaps into inquiry about the American Steel Trust, for Dr. Muck is no man of purely professional interests. He is glad to escape for a time the heavier burden of operatic conducting—"there are singers, you know, that are never sure of their parts"—but then there is the haunting thought of the new audiences to conquer. A passing motor brushes the anxiety away, and then in the smiling recital of an adventure in a hotel intractably regular in its hours for meals, it quite disappears. A very eminent conductor, it seems, newly come to strange lands and customs, may go supperless to bed—and see the humor of it next day.

And in Germany there are strange tales of our America and our Boston. The returning virtuoso or the reminiscent singer likes to tell them in the café at Berlin or under the trees at Baireuth. It is his plain duty to bring back "experiences" more piquant with flavor than rigid with truth. Usually he tells them to gravely receptive hearers. But to Dr. Muck he has told them to a man with a keen and duly sceptical sense of humor. He smiled at the inherent improbability when he heard them. He smiles now at the actual impossibility when he is seeing the things of America and of Boston face to face. Long before any thought of a year's work here came to him he knew the just note of our orchestra, and from that knowledge he inferred the musical intelligence and the musical discrimination of the public that maintains it. In a week he will meet band and audience face to face, and the anticipation warms him to honest eagerness and his fullest mettle.

H. T. P.

/ / + / /

The First Symphony Concerts

The first Symphony Concerts for the new season take place next Friday afternoon at 2.30 and next Saturday evening at eight in Symphony Hall, and at them Dr. Muck, the new conductor, makes his first appearances here and in all America. Mr. Gericke ended the final concert of last spring with Beethoven's fifth symphony, and with it Dr. Muck begins the first concert of the new year. Wagner's music makes the rest of the programme, but in no case has he chosen any of the "excerpts" from actual scenes in the music-dramas that are usually misplaced and limping in the concert room. The group comprises the "Faust" overture, which is Wagner in his stormy youth; the "Siegfried Idyl," which is Wagner playful; and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which is Wagner in the fulness of his powers. Needless to say, with Dr. Muck appearing for the first time in Boston, there is no soloist. The test and the honors will be all the conductor's own.

/ / + / /

BOSTON HERALD

WORCESTER FESTIVAL ARTISTS

Miss Ormsby Last Night Work in Verdi's "Requiem." Pleased a Large Audience by Her Soprano Mr. Adamowski of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Famous Violin Soloist, Played a Saint-Saens Composition in the Afternoon. Mme. Bouton Also Sang in the "Requiem."

MME. SAMAROFF
PIANIST

T. ADAMOWSKI
VIOLINIST

FESTIVAL TRIUMPH FOR MME. SAMAROFF

Her Performance of Rubinstein Concerto Feature of Last Day.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

WORCESTER, Oct. 5, 1906. The programme of the fourth concert of the Worcester music festival, given this afternoon in Mechanics Hall, was as follows: Schubert's Symphony in C major, No. 7; "O mio Fernando," from "La Favorita" (Mrs. Grace Preston Naylor); Rubinstein's piano concerto in D minor, No. 4 (Mme. Olga Samaroff); MacDowell's "The Beautiful Alda" and "The Saracens." Mr. Kneisel conducted.

The feature of this concert was the performance of Rubinstein's concerto by Mme. Samaroff. She played it for the first time and thus added to her extensive repertory. There was talk of her playing Liszt's concerto in E flat, but as she played it several times in the course of the last season she preferred to try her fortune with Rubinstein's, possibly fearing that she might be identified with Liszt's. It is doubtful whether she at present plays any concerto better than she does the brilliant "triangle" one, yet her unwillingness to be a "single speech Samaroff" is a good omen for her growth and development. Meyerbeer was always vexed when he was referred to complimentarily as the composer of the fourth act of "The Huguenots."

Mme. Samaroff's performance this afternoon was an interesting one, although the accompaniment was too often ragged and scratchy. The orchestra rehearsed this morning until half-past 12, and after the work of the preceding days and nights it was cruel to impose on it Schubert's symphony.

The concerto is still a work for a large hall, and it is still a work for a heroic pianist, whose strength includes sentiment. No one has ever played it as Rubinstein did, though there have been brave men and women since Agamemnon. Amazons of the piano, as Sophie Menter, have delighted in it, and it is not surprising that a woman of Mme. Samaroff's digital force is anxious to succeed with it. But strength is not all that is required to win success with this concerto. The paw of the lion should be felt at the first crash, but there is also romantic feeling, tender song in the music; there is also demoniacal rush, wild exultation as of the strong man desiring to run a race.

Her Bravura Passages Best.

Mme. Samaroff was more wholly successful in the stormier and bravura passages than in the contemplative and purely lyrical. In her song she is still given to a too pronounced attack of the first note or notes of a suave melody. It is as though she began to sing after she had announced forcibly her intention of so doing. This undue and disturbing italicization of notes that are not always wholly essential easily becomes a mannerism, and several distinguished pianists are not free from it.

Mme. Samaroff, in the course of a season, met with a success that might easily have turned the head of any virtuoso. This success was legitimately gained, and she wore the laurel modestly. But success, as Victor Hugo said, is hideous, and the more immediate it is, the more dangerous it is to the future of the conqueror. Mme. Samaroff's many and admirable qualities have been frequently discussed in The Herald. There is no young pianist among women who gives more promise of a long and honorable career. Musicians and the people hear her gladly. She has strength, dash, speed, elegance and a pronounced individuality in the display of her acquirements. We beseech her to cultivate the emotional side of her art. Let her song be one of caressing tenderness, of perfect passion.

The crowning glory of a woman, even when she is an applauded pianist, is her womanhood. An audience is to be wooed and the cold keys of a piano may be warmed with the message that each hearer believes to be personal and intimate.

An Instantaneous Triumph.

There was no question today of her instantaneous triumph. The applause was spontaneous and long continued. The pianist played in response a piece for the left hand by Scriabine. This feat provoked enthusiasm, also the inquiry on the part of several hearers whether Mme. Samaroff is by nature left [illegible]

BOSTON TRAVELER
OCTOBER 6, 1906.

With Dr. Muck here and s[illegible]tled, with the auction sale finished, the way is now clear for the Symphony season of 1906-1907, the 26th of the Symphony orchestra. The first public rehearsal and the first concert will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively, and Boston, for the first time, will have the opportunity to know the new conductor.

Because interest centres in Dr. Muck, there will be no soloist in this first programme which Dr. Muck arranged last spring when Mr. Ellis was in Berlin. He has chosen for his introductory work the C minor Symphony No. 5 of Beethoven, which is generally regarded as a final test of the conductor's knowledge of the traditions of the great classics. As Dr. Muck has been so closely identified with the Wagner movement for the last 20 years, it is but natural that Wagner's works should find representation in his first programme; but he has chosen works which are complete in themselves, not excerpts from operas, unless the Prelude to "The Mastersingers" is regarded as such.

The programme for the first concert is as follows:

Symphony in C minor No. 5...Beethoven
A Faust Overture.....Wagner
Siegfried Idyl .....Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .....Wagner

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wo[illegible]

ess .....

If the auction sale of seats for the Boston concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which took place last week in Boston can be accepted as a criterion of the whole season to come, 1906-07 will be the most prosperous that the Orchestra has ever had. A certain increase was to be expected under any conditions, and the coming of Dr. Muck was an added stimulus to the bidders. Dr. Muck arrived last Tuesday and went immediately to Boston. To-morrow he meets the orchestra for the first time and rehearsals will begin at once.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON STAATS-ZEITUNG

is .....

OCT 7 - 1906

Aus der Kanzlei des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters verlautet, daß auf Grund des auktionsweisen Verkaufs von Sitzen für die heurigen Bostoner Konzerte die kommende Saison als die glänzendste je dagewesene heute schon bezeichnet werden kann; sowohl für die Generalproben, als für die eigentlichen Konzerte seien sämmtliche Sitze auf Jahre hinaus verkauft. Das ausführliche Saison-Programm wird nächste Woche erscheinen, der Vorverkauf für die New Yorker Saison in Carnegie Hall nimmt Montag, den 15. Oktober, seinen Anfang.

Die 6 Konzerte des russischen Symphonie-Orchesters werden in Carnegie Hall an folgenden Donnerstag Abenden stattfinden: 15. November, 20. Dezember, 17. Januar, 7. und 28. Februar und 14. März. Der Vorverkauf beginnt am 8. Oktober in Carnegie Hall. Dirigent Modest Altschuler hat ein reiches Programm russischer Musik zusammengestellt, worin sich nicht weniger als 21 Novitäten befinden. Es sind die bekanntesten russischen Komponisten dabei vertreten, unter anderen Glinka, Seroff, Rubinstein, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Glazunoff, Rachmanioff, Sibelius, Taneyeff etc. Von Tschaikowsky wird unter anderem der ganze erste Akt seiner hierzulande unbekannten Oper „Eugène Onegin" zur Wiedergabe gelangen.

[23]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in The World
N. Y. TRIBUNE
om
ddress
OCT 7-
ate

If the auction sale of seats for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last week in Boston, can be accepted as a criterion of the whole season to come, 1906-'07 will be the most prosperous that the orchestra has ever had. The sale was a large one in the matter of price (for every seat for both public rehearsals and concerts has been sold for years). A certain increase was to be expected under any conditions, and unquestionably the coming of Dr. Muck was an added stimulus to the bidders. Dr. Muck arrived last Tuesday and went immediately to Boston. To-morrow he meets the orchestra for the first time, and rehearsals will begin at once. His personality has made a most favorable impression on those that have met him. There is a decided charm about the man, and at the same time all the needed evidence of his being a very serious artist. The full prospectus of the Boston Symphony season in New York will be found in next Sunday's papers, the season sale opening at Carnegie Hall on Monday, the 15th.

POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
s

The Boston Symphony Quartet has issued an interesting prospectus for its concert season in Washington. Mr. Hess writes: "As far as I have been able to observe, the spirit in Washington is very favorable to the production of first-class works in chamber music. Our audiences in the city have been appreciative of the best music, and the very fact that the city has supported two organizations of that kind proves that chamber music, which is its highest form, is known and loved by the people. We look forward with the greatest interest to our visits in the beautiful city this winter."

The works from which Mr. Hess will select the programmes for Washington include two quartets of Beethoven, that in E minor, opus 59, and that in B flat, opus 130, which is among his last and greatest works in this form. Both of these quartets were heard in Washington last season, and the first was played in 1897 and 1903 by the Kneisels. The list also contains the Brahms quartet, in B flat major, opus 67, which has probably not been given here since 1895; Debussy's string quartet, in G minor, opus 10, two movements of which were played here in 1905; Haydn's, in D, opus 76, No. 1, and Mozart's, in G, No. 1, both of which have been played here several times, but not recently; the Schubert quintet, in C, which was a favorite with the old Richard Wagner Society of this city; Schumann's quartet, in F major, opus 41, No. 2, played here in 1899 and 1904, and Saint-Saens' quartet for piano and strings, in B flat major, opus 41, which was played by the Richard Wagner Society in 1887. The members of the quartet who gave the composition are all residents of Washington yet. They were Messrs. Anton Gloetzner, Herman Rakemann, Ernest Lent, and Szemelenyi.

There is little danger of Washington hearing chamber music too often, and the repetition of an occasional quartet serves to clarify the first hasty impression made on the mind after a single hearing. Yet it is good to have a few novelties, and with these Washington will be well supplied, the numbers performed here being chosen from the following: Mendelssohn, quintet for strings in F major, opus 1; Jaques-Dalcroze, serenade for strings, opus 61; R. Gliere, quartet for strings in A major, opus 2; Hugo Kaun, quartet for strings in D major, opus 41, No. 2, and Joseph Suk, quartet for strings in B-flat major, opus 11. Two of these composers, Suk and Gliere, are Russians. Jaques-Dalcroze is the Swiss composer whose concerto Marteau performed at the fifth of last season's Boston Symphony concerts, and Hugo Kaun is the German composer who lived in Milwaukee for several years and found so little appreciation for his work in America he returned to Europe. Since that time the interest in his compositions has grown noticeably. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has performed his symphonic poem, "Minnehaha," and last year Frederick Stock gave his recent work, "Falstaff," with the Theodore Thomas Orchestra.

A probable addition to one or more of these novelties will be Gabriel Faure's violin sonata for piano and violin in A major, opus 13, which was played here at a private studio recital by Messrs. Gloss and Mierach last winter. The Caesar Franck pianoforte quintet in F minor, Schubert's string quartet in G major, opus 161, and Mendelssohn's string quintet in F major, opus 18, may also be rendered.

POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
ss

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

If the aution sale of seats for the Boston concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which took place in Boston can be accepted as criterion of the whole season to come, 1906-1907 will be the most prosperous that the orchestra has ever had. The sale was a large one in the matter of price (for every seat for both public rehearsals and concerts has been sold for years). A certain increase was to be expected under any conditions, and unquestionably the coming of Dr. Muck was an added stimulus to the bidders. Dr. Muck arrived last Tuesday and went immediately to Boston. To-morrow he meets the orchestra for the first time and rehearsals will begin at once. His personality has made a favorable impression on those that have met him. There is a decided charm about the man and at the same time all the needed evidence of his being a very serious artist. The full prospectus of the Boston Symphony season in New York will be found in next Sunday's papers, the season sale opening at Carnegie Hall on Monday, the 15th.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 7, 1906

Baton to Wave No More

The Symphony Orchestra's New Leader Tells of an Ideal He Hopes to Achieve

The baton as a prominent factor at a Symphony concert will soon be no more, if Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor, is able to carry out his intention.

"In time, I hope that I will be able to do in Boston as I used to do in Vienna, that is to let the orchestra play without my moving the baton up and down. The work of the conductor is at the rehearsals, and if the orchestra responds with enthusiasm then he is really not much more than a figurehead at the concert proper," Dr. Muck, who arrived in this city from Berlin last week, told the Sunday Post reporter.

"Boston is a beautiful city, nothing at all like what we expected to find," he went on.

"I look with great pleasure to the coming season, for a city that supported for so many years the best orchestra in the world is certain to have a population with a thorough musical knowledge.

"The Symphony Hall is a beautiful temple of music, and I somehow anticipate that the audiences will be in full accord with the building.

A Friendly Smile

"My impressions of Boston are somewhat limited," and the beautiful smile of the doctor came into full play.

By the way, this smile is certain to charm his audiences fully as much as his musical ability. It is all embracing, it is full of mirth and kindness; an enthusiastic German maiden once said, "it just sparkles."

"My wife and I expected to find in Boston a foggy town, something of a smaller London, and the sunshine here was quite a surprise to us. From my hurried impressions I would say that Boston is more of an English city than an American; but however one classifies it, it must be admitted that architecturally it is beautiful."

He Is Forty-Seven

Doctor Muck frankly owns up to 47 years, but he hardly looks it.

He is of medium height, well proportioned and quite graceful. His dark, bushy hair, artistically uncombed, does not show a silver thread. His eyes are full of laughter. They are hypnotic eyes. They are the eyes of a boy ready for mischief; they are the eyes of an inspired artist; they proclaim a talent and good fellowship at the same time.

His hooked nose and the prominent chin gave him somewhat of a Mephistophelean appearance, but there are no harsh lines in the face, and that smile of his robs the features of every vestige of sternness.

"I am sorry I cannot speak English, and I fear that I am too much of a philologue to learn it quickly," he declared. "You know, before I became a conductor of orchestras I studied languages, dead and modern, and so the study of a language implies with me a labor of quite great proportions.

"But to return to Boston. Some way or other I do not feel as if I landed among strangers, and I hope that Bostonians will take as readily to me and my wife as I have taken to them.

Tries to Sink Himself

"I really do not contemplate any striking moves in connection with the orchestra. I believe in good music, but of course I have my individual preferences. I always try to bring out exactly what the composer intended, and I try to bury my individuality, but in how far I succeed, of this I cannot judge.

"With me music is a sacred performance, I fully understand the famous Von Buelow when he stopped the orchestra on account of two chatting women. I do not say that I would go to the same extreme, but if the Boston public is to have the best of me, the audiences will have to share my view on music.

"Nothing distracts more than inattention. It simply hinders the performance, and were I one of the audience I would protest vehemently if some neighbors of mine indulged in talking and laughing instead of listening. Such behavior, to say the least, is disrespectful.

Of Course Not, in Boston

"But I do not anticipate anything of the sort in Boston," he hastened to add, and smiled one of his most winning smiles.

"My ideal of a conductor is one who can absorb the ideals of the masters, whose baton does not serve the purpose of time beating alone, but arouses the audience to a full appreciation of the work performed, portrays visions before its mind's eye, makes them feel, as he himself feels, the glory and greatness of the particular composition that the orchestra renders.

"I must admit I am an enthusiast. How can one otherwise claim the right to conduct a peerless orchestra in peerless compositions? But I assure you, I present a very quiet and dignified figure on the stage.

"Why don't I compose myself? For the very simple reason that I do not think I can write something really great, and as to mediocre, there is already too much of it produced daily. Whenever I am tempted to do so, I turn the light of criticism on myself, and I remain in doubt but for a very short while.

"My personal habits? I am a very sedate man. I pass my evenings at home. I read a great deal, in fact literature is quite a hobby with me, not only am I not a Bohemian, but, to tell the truth, I dislike society. We expect to live in Boston as quietly as we did in Berlin. A few intimate friends, and that is all."

Mme. Muck is as blond as her husband is dark. She looks distinctly German, and unlike her husband speaks a very fair English that sounds somewhat quaint, although it is strictly grammatical.

If the doctor is quick and agile, his wife is placid. If his are the impulsive ways of the artist, hers are the slow ones of the thinker. But there is an air of perfect harmony about both of them.

BOSTON AMERICAN—
OCTOBER 7, 1906.

Ready for Symphonies

With Dr. Muck, the new conductor, here and settled, with the auction sales finished, the way is now clear for the Symphony season of 1906-1907. The first public rehearsal and the first concert will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and Boston for the first time will have the opportunity to know the new conductor.

The coming to Boston of Leoncavallo, the celebrated Italian composer, to give a pair of concerts at Symphony Hall, will be a most important event of the early musical season. These concerts will be given on Saturday afternoon the 20th inst., and Sunday evening the 21st inst., a change in the [illegible]

Joseph Lhevinne, the great Russian pianist, will leave Paris for this country on October 13, and within the following thirty days he will begin one of the longest tours in his career. His first appearance in Boston is scheduled for Saturday afternoon, November 10, in Steinert Hall.

The Boston Post
The Representative Democratic Paper of New England
Issued Sunday by Post Publishing Co.
OCTOBER 7, 1906. NO. 1; VOL. 42
Office 250 Washington st., Boston, Mass.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

With Dr. Muck here and settled, with the auction sales finished, the way is now clear for the season of 1906-1907, the 26th of the Symphony Orchestra. The first public rehearsal and the first concert will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively, and Boston for the first time will have the opportunity to know the new conductor.

Because interest centres in Dr. Muck, there will be no soloist in this first programme which Dr. Muck arranged last spring when Mr. Ellis was in Berlin. He has chosen for his introductory work the C minor Symphony No. 5 of Beethoven, which is generally regarded as a final test of the conductor's knowledge of the traditions of the great classics. As Dr. [illegible] has been so closely identified with [illegible] movement for the last 20 [illegible] is not natural that Wagner's [illegible]

The First Established and Most Cen... Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World AMERICAN
ss

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

If the auction sale of seats for the Boston concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last week in Boston, can be accepted as a criterion of the whole season to come, 1906-07 will be the most prosperous that the orchestra has ever had. The sale was a large one in the matter of prices (for every seat for both public rehearsals and concerts has been sold for years). A certain increase was to be expected under any conditions, and unquestionably the coming of Dr. Muck was an added stimulus to the bidders. Dr. Muck arrived last Tuesday and went immediately to Boston. To-morrow he meets the orchestra for the first time, and rehearsals will begin at once. His personality has made a favorable impression on those that have met him. There is a decided charm about the man, and at the same time all the needed evidences of his being a very serious artist.

The full prospectus of the Baltimore Symphony season in Baltimore will be published in the papers of Sunday, October 21.

[24]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wo
om
ddress NEW YORK
ate OCT 8-

If the auction sale of seats for the Boston concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last week in Boston, can be accepted as a criterion of the whole season to come, 1906-07 will be the most prosperous the orchestra has known. To-day Dr. Muck meets the orchestra for the first time and rehearsals will begin at once. The full prospectus of the Boston Symphony season in New York will be issued soon, and the season sale will open in Carnegie Hall on October 15.

ress
te OCT 8-

IF the auction sale of seats for the Boston concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last week in Boston, can be accepted as a criterion of the whole season to come, 1906-1907 will be the most prosperous that the orchestra has ever had. The sale was a large one in the matter of price (for every seat for both public rehearsals and concerts has been sold for years). A certain increase was to be expected under any conditions, and unquestionably the coming of Dr. Muck was an added stimulus to the bidders. Dr. Muck arrived last Tuesday and went immediately to Boston. To-day he meets the orchestra for the first time, and rehearsals will begin at once.

The full prospectus of the Boston Symphony season in New York will be announced next Saturday. The season sale opens at Carnegie Hall on Monday, the 15th.

rom N. Y. EV'G SUN
ddress
ate OCT 10 190

"No soloists" at the November concerts of the Boston Symphony in New York means that Dr. Muck, the conductor, is himself the novelty and the star. Nor has Muck as yet determined what he will do on his last visit to this city in March. The soloists announced for intervening dates are four pianists, Paderewski, Rosenthal, Gabrilowitsch and Olga Samaroff, and two violinists, Willy Hess and Adamowski.

om YORK COMMERCIAL dress GLOBE
te OCT 10 1906

DR. KARL MUCK has brought with him to America the score of Paderewski's new symphony, which is to have its first performance in Boston on Jan. 4 and 5. In the next week it will be played in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York, and Brooklyn. It is said to be a work very modern in tone and of great orchestral brilliancy, and it fairly bristles with technical difficulties. Paderewski will be present to hear it played, for he is to be the soloist with the orchestra on that occasion. Thus, however the symphony turns out, the audience is sure of its reward.

TRANSCRIPT,
OCTOBER 10, 1906

Here in Boston

A change has been made in the hour of admission to the seats in the second balcony at the Symphony "rehearsals" on Friday afternoons. Heretofore the door on Huntington avenue, through which the waiting line enters Symphony Hall, has been opened at one o'clock. Beginning next Friday it will not be opened until half-past one. Many of the regular purchasers of the "rush seats" have requested the change.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om

ddress

ate

If the auction sale of seats for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last week in Boston, can be accepted as a criterion of the whole season to come, 1906-'07 will be the most prosperous that the orchestra has ever had. The sale was a large one in the matter of price (for every seat for both public rehearsals and concerts has been sold for years). A certain increase was to be expected under any conditions, and unquestionably the coming of Dr. Muck was an added stimulus to the bidders. Dr. Muck arrived last Tuesday and went immediately to Boston. To-morrow he meets the orchestra for the first time, and rehearsals will begin at once. His personality has made a most favorable impression on those that have met him. There is a decided charm about the man and at the same time all the needed evidence of his being a very serious artist. The full prospectus of the Boston Symphony season in New York will be found in next Sunday's papers, the season sale opening at Carnegie Hall on Monday, the 15th.

:s

The Boston Symphony Quartet has issued an interesting prospectus for its concert season in Washington. Mr. Hess writes: "As far as I have been able to observe, the spirit in Washington is very favorable to the production of first-class works in chamber music. Our audiences in the city have been appreciative of the best music, and the very fact that the city has supported two organizations of that kind proves that chamber music, which is its highest form, is known and loved by the people. We look forward with the greatest interest to our visits in the beautiful city this winter."

The works from which Mr. Hess will select the programmes for Washington include two quartets of Beethoven, that in E minor, opus 52, and that in B flat, opus 130, which is among his last and greatest works in this form. Both of these quartets were heard in Washington last season, and the first was played in 1897 and 1903 by the Kneisels. The list also contains the Brahms quartet, in B flat major, opus 67, which has probably not been given here since 1895; Debussy's string quartet, in G minor, opus 10, two movements of which were played here in 1905; Haydn's, in D, opus 76, No. 1, and Mozart's, in G, No. 1, both of which have been played here several times, but not recently; the Schubert quintet, in C, which was a favorite with the old Richard Wagner Society of this city; Schumann's quartet, in F major, opus 41, No. 2, played here in 1899 and 1904, and Saint-Saens' quartet for piano and strings, in B flat major, opus 41, which was played by the Richard Wagner Society in 1887. The members of the quartet who gave the composition are all residents of Washington yet. They were Messrs. Anton Gloetzner, Herman Rakemann, Ernest Lent, and Szemelenyi.

There is little danger of Washington hearing chamber music too often, and the repetition of an occasional quartet serves to clarify the first hasty impression made on the mind after a single hearing. Yet it is good to have a few novelties, and with these Washington will be well supplied, the numbers performed here being chosen from the following: Mendelssohn, quintet for strings in F major, opus 1; Jaques-Dalcroze, serenade for strings, opus 61; R. Gliere, quartet for strings in A major, opus 2; Hugo Kaun, quartet for strings in D major, opus 41, No. 2, and Joseph Suk, quartet for strings in B-flat major, opus 11. Two of these composers, Suk and Gliere, are Russians. Jaques-Dalcroze is the Swiss composer whose concerto Marteau performed at the fifth of last season's Boston Symphony concerts, and Hugo Kaun is the German composer who lived in Milwaukee for several years and found so little appreciation for his work in America he returned to Europe. Since that time the interest in his compositions has grown noticeably. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has performed his symphonic poem, "Minnehaha," and last year Frederick Stock gave his recent work, "Falstaff," with the Theodore Thomas Orchestra.

A probable addition to one or more of these novelties will be Gabriel Faure's violin sonata for piano and violin in A major, opus 13, which was played here at a private studio recital by Messrs. Glose and Miersch last winter. The Caesar Franck pianoforte quintet in F minor, Schubert's string quartet in G major, opus 161, and Mendelssohn's string quintet in F major, opus 18, may also be rendered.

...the World

ss

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

If the aution sale of seats for the Boston concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which took place in Boston can be accepted as criterion of the whole season to come, 1906-1907 will be the most prosperous that the orchestra has ever had. The sale was a large one in the matter of price (for every seat for both public rehearsals and concerts has been sold for years). A certain increase was to be expected under any conditions, and unquestionably the coming of Dr. Muck was an added stimulus to the bidders. Dr. Muck arrived last Tuesday and went immediately to Boston. To-morrow he meets the orchestra for the first time and rehearsals will begin at once. His personality has made a favorable impression on those that have met him. There is a decided charm about the man and at the same time all the needed evidence of his being a very serious artist.

The full prospectus of the Boston Symphony season in Washington will be published in next Sunday's papers, the sale opening on Tuesday, the 16th.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 7, 1906

Baton to Wave No More

The Symphony Orchestra's New Leader Tells of an Ideal He Hopes to Achieve

The baton as a prominent factor at a Symphony concert will soon be no more, if Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor, is able to carry out his intention.

"In time, I hope that I will be able to do in Boston as I used to do in Vienna, that is to let the orchestra play without my moving the baton up and down. The work of the conductor is at the rehearsals, and if the orchestra responds with enthusiasm then he is really not much more than a figurehead at the concert proper," Dr. Muck, who arrived in this city from Berlin last week, told the Sunday Post reporter.

"Boston is a beautiful city, nothing at all like what we expected to find," he went on.

"I look with great pleasure to the coming season, for a city that supported for so many years the best orchestra in the world is certain to have a population with a thorough musical knowledge.

"The Symphony Hall is a beautiful temple of music, and I somehow anticipate that the audiences will be in full accord with the building.

A Friendly Smile

"My impressions of Boston are somewhat limited," and the beautiful smile of the doctor came into full play.

By the way, this smile is certain to charm his audiences fully as much as his musical ability. It is all embracing, it is full of mirth and kindness; an enthusiastic German maiden once said, "it just sparkles."

"My wife and I expected to find in Boston a foggy town, something of a smaller London, and the sunshine here was quite a surprise to us. From my hurried impressions I would say that Boston is more of an English city than an American; but however one classifies it, it must be admitted that architecturally it is beautiful."

He Is Forty-Seven

Doctor Muck frankly owns up to 47 years, but he hardly looks it.

He is of medium height, well proportioned and quite graceful. His dark, bushy hair, artistically uncombed, does not show a silver thread. His eyes are full of laughter. They are hypnotic eyes. They are the eyes of a boy ready for mischief; they are the eyes of an inspired artist; they proclaim a talent and good fellowship at the same time.

His hooked nose and the prominent chin gave him somewhat of a Mephistophelean appearance, but there are no harsh lines in the face, and that smile of his robs the features of every vestige of sternness.

"I am sorry I cannot speak English, and I fear that I am too much of a philologue to learn it quickly," he declared. "You know, before I became a conductor of orchestras I studied languages, dead and modern, and so the study of a language implies with me a labor of quite great proportions.

"But to return to Boston. Some way or other I do not feel as if I landed among strangers, and I hope that Bostonians will take as readily to me and my wife as I have taken to them.

Tries to Sink Himself

"I really do not contemplate any striking moves in connection with the orchestra. I believe in good music, but of course I have my individual preferences. I always try to bring out exactly what the composer intended, and I try to bury my individuality, but in how far I succeed, of this I cannot judge.

"With me music is a sacred performance, I fully understand the famous Von Buelow when he stopped the orchestra on account of two chatting women. I do not say that I would go to the same extreme, but if the Boston public is to have the best of me, the audiences will have to share my view on music.

"Nothing distracts more than inattention. It simply hinders the performance, and were I one of the audience I would protest vehemently if some neighbors of mine indulged in talking and laughing instead of listening. Such behavior, to say the least, is disrespectful.

Of Course Not, in Boston

"But I do not anticipate anything of the sort in Boston," he hastened to add, and smiled one of his most winning smiles.

"My ideal of a conductor is one who can absorb the ideals of the masters, whose baton does not serve the purpose of time beating alone, but arouses the audience to a full appreciation of the work performed, portrays visions before its mind's eye, makes them feel, as he himself feels, the glory and greatness of the particular composition that the orchestra renders.

"I must admit I am an enthusiast. How can one otherwise claim the right to conduct a peerless orchestra in peerless compositions? But I assure you, I present a very quiet and dignified figure on the stage.

"Why don't I compose myself? For the very simple reason that I do not think I can write something really great, and as to mediocre, there is already too much of it produced daily. Whenever I am tempted to do so, I turn the light of criticism on myself, and I remain in doubt but for a very short while.

"My personal habits? I am a very sedate man. I pass my evenings at home. I read a great deal, in fact literature is quite a hobby with me. not only am I not a Bohemian, but, to tell the truth, I dislike society. We expect to live in Boston as quietly as we did in Berlin. A few intimate friends, and that is all."

Mme. Muck is as blond as her husband is dark. She looks distinctly German, and unlike her husband speaks a very fair English that sounds somewhat quaint, although it is strictly grammatical.

If the doctor is quick and agile, his wife is placid. If his are the impulsive ways of the artist, hers are the slow ones of the thinker. But there is an air of perfect harmony about both of them.

BOSTON AMERICAN—OCTOBER 7, 1906.

Ready for Symphonies

With Dr. Muck, the new conductor, here and settled, with the auction sales finished, the way is now clear for the Symphony season of 1906-1907. The first public rehearsal and the first concert will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and Boston for the first time will have the opportunity to know the new conductor.

The coming to Boston of Leoncavallo, the celebrated Italian composer, to give a pair of concerts at Symphony Hall, will be a most important event of the early musical season. These concerts will be given on Saturday afternoon the 20th inst., and Sunday [illegible] the 21st inst., an entire change in the [illegible]

Joseph Lhevinne, the great Russian pianist, will leave Paris for this country on October 13, and within the following thirty days he will begin one of the longest tours in his career. His first appearance in Boston is scheduled for Saturday afternoon, November 10, in Steinert Hall.

The Boston Post

The Representative Democratic Paper of New England

Issued Sunday by Post Publishing Co.
OCTOBER 7, 1906. NO. 1; VOL. 42
Office 259 Washington st., Boston, Mass.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

With Dr. Muck here and settled, with the auction sales finished, the way is now clear for the season of 1906-1907, the 26th of the Symphony Orchestra. The first public rehearsal and the first concert will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively, and Boston for the first time will have the opportunity to know the new conductor.

Because interest centres in Dr. Muck, there will be no soloist in this first programme which Dr. Muck arranged last spring when Mr. Ellis was in Berlin. He has chosen for his introductory work the C minor Symphony No. 5 of Beethoven, which is generally regarded as a final test of the conductor's knowledge of the tradition of the great classics. As Dr. Muck has been so closely identified with the Wagner movement for the last 20 years, it is but natural that Wagner's works should find representation in his programme.

he First Established and most ...
ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...

:s

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

If the auction sale of seats for the Boston concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last week in Boston, can be accepted as a criterion of the whole season to come, 1906-07 will be the most prosperous that the orchestra has ever had. The sale was a large one in the matter of prices (for every seat for both public rehearsals and concerts has been sold for years). A certain increase was to be expected under any conditions, and unquestionably the coming of Dr. Muck was an added stimulus to the bidders. Dr. Muck arrived last Tuesday and went immediately to Boston. To-morrow he meets the orchestra for the first time, and rehearsals will begin at once. His personality has made a favorable impression on those that have met him. There is a decided charm about the man, and at the same time all the needed evidences of his being a very serious artist.

The full prospectus of the Baltimore Symphony season in Baltimore will be published in the papers of Sunday, October 21.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wo

om

ddress

ate

If the auction sale of seats for the Boston concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last week in Boston, can be accepted as a criterion of the whole season to come, 1906-07 will be the most prosperous the orchestra has known. To-day Dr. Muck meets the orchestra for the first time and rehearsals will begin at once. The full prospectus of the Boston Symphony season in New York will be issued soon, and the season sale will open in Carnegie Hall on October 15.

1

ress

te

IF the auction sale of seats for the Boston concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last week in Boston, can be accepted as a criterion of the whole season to come, 1906-1907 will be the most prosperous that the orchestra has ever had. The sale was a large one in the matter of price (for every seat for both public rehearsals and concerts has been sold for years). A certain increase was to be expected under any conditions, and unquestionably the coming of Dr. Muck was an added stimulus to the bidders. Dr. Muck arrived last Tuesday and went immediately to Boston. To-day he meets the orchestra for the first time, and rehearsals will begin at once.

The full prospectus of the Boston Symphony season in New York will be announced next Saturday. The season sale opens at Carnegie Hall on Monday, the 15th.

rom

ddress

ate

"No soloists" at the November concerts of the Boston Symphony in New York means that Dr. Muck, the conductor, is himself the novelty and the star. Nor has Muck as yet determined what he will do on his last visit to this city in March. The soloists announced for intervening dates are four pianists, Paderewski, Rosenthal, Gabrilowitsch and Olga Samaroff, and two violinists, Willy Hess and Adamowski.

om

dress

te

DR. KARL MUCK has brought with him to America the score of Paderewski's new symphony, which is to have its first performance in Boston on Jan. 4 and 5. In the next week it will be played in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York, and Brooklyn. It is said to be a work very modern in tone and of great orchestral brilliancy, and it fairly bristles with technical difficulties. Paderewski will be present to hear it played, for he is to be the soloist with the orchestra on that occasion. Thus, however the symphony turns out, the audience is sure of its reward.

TRANSCRIPT,

OCTOBER 10, 1906

Here in Boston

A change has been made in the hour of admission to the seats in the second balcony at the Symphony "rehearsals" on Friday afternoons. Heretofore the door on Huntington avenue, through which the waiting line enters Symphony Hall, has been opened at one o'clock. Beginning next Friday it will not be opened until half-past one. Many of the regular purchasers of the "rush seats" have requested the change.

[24]

BOSTON POST, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1906

Mrs. Muck Delighted With the Shops and Shoppers of the Hub

Dr. Carl Muck, who is to conduct th e Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his wife, at the piano, posed especially for the Post

Mrs. Anita Muck, the accomplished wife of Boston's new Symphony leader, did her first day's shopping in the Hub yesterday.

She brushed elbows with the struggling masses of feminine shopgoers that thronged the busy department stores on Tremont and Washington streets, watched with curious eyes the trim and daintily clad women that lined up before attractive counters in quest of some much-heralded bargains, saw these same trimly-clad females drive away in their carriages or automobiles, took a walk through the Public Garden and up along the boulevard to her hotel on Commonwealth avenue, and then decided that she liked Boston, Boston stores and Boston women.

Mrs. Muck is a handsome women of barely 34 years, rather of the blonde type, with regular features and a most winning presence. She doesn't pretend to be at all musical—neither sings nor plays—but contents herself with the opinion that it is just as well for all the musical talent to be confined to one member of the family.

"Women are the same everywhere," said Mrs. Muck to a Post reporter, "but when it comes to form and style, there is of course a decided difference. As for the American women, I think them a happy medium between the English and the French. Boston women, in particular, remind me greatly of the Parisians.

"They go to extremes in style, however, it seems to me, as do the French. But when it comes to shopping, it appears as if the women of all nations are on a par.

"Your stores remind me more nearly of our Berlin warehouses and bear some resemblance to the big shops on the Strand in London. But all stores are alike and the women of Boston act just the same before a bargain counter as do the women at home.

"I never saw so many automobiles as I have seen in this city, and, wonder of wonders! your women do not seem in the least afraid to drive them. They must have wonderful courage. In my country we would be helpless without our chauffeurs. And it frightens me almost to see the speed at which they run their cars.

"One custom especially appeals to me here as well calculated to make a stranger feel at home. That is the custom your ladies here have of calling on a visitor first. In Berlin strangers must break the ice. But this custom takes away the feeling of strangeness which overtakes every foreigner, and especially a woman. It is a custom that should be adopted at home, I think."

Mrs. Muck has not visited many of the public buildings yet; but of those she has seen, the public library appeals to her most.

Both Dr. and Mrs. Muck have visited Symphony Hall, and, while they describe it as somewhat smaller than the one in Berlin, they are enthusiastic in praise of it. The doctor states that its acoustics could not be surpassed.

Both Dr. and Mrs. Muck intend to do considerable visiting this week, and will take in Harvard and other places of interest, if, as Mrs. Muck says, she can "spare the time from those attractive donwtown stores."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Dr. Muck brought with him to America the score of Paderewski's new symphony, which is to have its first appearance in Boston on January 4 and 5. In the next week it will be played in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York, and Brooklyn. It is said to be a work very modern in tone and of great orchestral brilliancy. It fairly bristles with technical difficulties. Paderewski will be present to hear it played, for he is to be the soloist with the orchestra on that occasion.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Rehearsals of the first programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, began in Symphony Hall, under Dr. Karl Muck, last Monday, October 8, and the first public rehearsal and concert took place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, respectively. Dr. Muck's introductory programme was Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Wagner's "A Faust Overture," Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and his prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Interest in the orchestra in Boston is greater this year than it has ever been before, this having been proved in a substantial manner by the receipts from the auction sales for the season. The conviction steadily grows that in securing Dr. Muck, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has brought to this country a man of all men fitted to be at its head. Dr. Muck brought with him to America the score of Paderewski's new symphony, which is to have its first appearance in Boston on January 4 and 5. In the next week it will be played in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. It is said to be a work very modern in tone and of great orchestral brilliancy. It fairly bristles with technical difficulties. Paderewski will be present to hear it played, for he is to be the soloist with the orchestra on that occasion.

om
dress
ite

DR. MUCK CONDUCTS IN BOSTON.

Boston, Oct. 12.—Dr. Karl Muck, the new rector of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, ceived a hearty welcome on his first appearat to-day before a Boston audience at the open public rehearsal of the organization.

[25]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW LEADER PLEASES BOSTON

Dr. Muck Applauded at First Symphony Orchestra Concert.

[SPECIAL TELEGRAM TO PUBLIC LEDGER.]

BOSTON, Oct. 12.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its twenty-sixth season today, under the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, who has been engaged for one year to succeed Wilhelm Gericke. In its reception and recognition of the new man the decorous Friday afternoon audience displayed what is here considered enthusiasm.

Doctor Muck gave the impression today of a man of commanding authority and technical power, undemonstrative and self-contained before the public and his men and very little concerned apparently in making his way with his audience by any hint of personal display.

om
dress
ate

Karl Muck, for whom the Symphony Hall is lighting up in Boston to-night, has brought with him to America the score of Paderewski's new symphony, which he is to produce in Boston, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn early in January, with Paderewski present.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
OCTOBER 12, 1906

DR. CARL MUCK

THE NEW CONDUCTOR OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Thorough Conservative in Music—Not in Favor of Long Programmes—A Man of Versatile Culture.

In very pleasant apartments in "The Empire," on Commonwealth ave., the old musical reviewer met the new musical conductor. The pair did not glare at each other with the antipathy that sometimes exists between the critic and the criticised, between reviewer and reviewee, but entered into friendly converse and exchanged many ideas.

Those expressed by Dr. Carl Muck may interest many who are to hear him the coming season. His sharply outlined face and thin body gave a first impression of asceticism, which, however, vanished completely when he smiled or laughed, which he often did.

Dr. Muck is not as yet well acquainted with the American repertoire of compositions, even John K. Paine being but a name to him. He knew of the compositions of his friend and classmate (in Leipsic), Geo. W. Chadwick; he had heard some of the works of Van der Stucken; Arthur Bird and the American resident musicians in Berlin were of course familiar to him. But of the larger number of American composers he was, as yet, ignorant. He expressed a desire to know more of them and of their work, and we do not believe that the native composer will be neglected by the new conductor.

That Dr. Muck is a musical conservative cannot for an instant be doubted. Emil Paur recently sent his opinion to the present writer to the effect that Max Reger is a genius who is working from darkness into light; Dr. Muck, however, confessed that he could find no coherency or artistic sanity in many of his works. He appreciated Strauss' genius to the full, yet held that in "Heldenleben" and later works the radical had gone too far. Yet he is to attempt even some of these in his programmes, if at all possible. As regards the "Sinfonia Domestica" the statement in one of our contemporaries, that we are to have it "at last," is not quite correct. The fact that our orchestra is not in the Musicians' Union, and that therefore we cannot get the extra instruments and players to fill the exorbitant score, militates as strongly against Dr. Muck as it did against Mr. Gericke. The latter more than once expressed his regret to the present writer that it was impossible to bring this work to performance under present conditions, and Dr. Muck confessed that if the extra parts were to be filled it would probably be in an inferior manner, under the circumstances.

It was quite natural to find Dr. Muck remarking that much of the modern French music "is rather from the head than from the heart," and it was also typical of the breadth of the man that he is to produce it, "tout de meme," in order that it may be studied. He felt that all the fine arts are going through a transition period just now, and spoke of the throes and agonies of recent Painting and Drama and Fiction. In Literature he believed that Germany had passed the danger point, and that the wild struggles of the mystics "to find the fourth dimension" were almost done. And this led him to speak of the love of Shakespeare in Germany, and he stated that the poet is more often presented on the stage in the Fatherland than in any other country on earth.

A man of versatile culture is Dr. Muck, and the literary trend of part of the conversation led the reviewer to ask why the English language had not been added to his accomplishments.

He then told of his strenuous study in the gymnasium, of his father's love for scientific study and of his own exertions in mathematics, Greek, Latin, and an extra course in French. "You can imagine that not many quarter-hours were left over for English or any other study," said he.

Had he composed any works? No; he had studied composition and had perpetrated a few things which were profound secrets between himself and his writing table, but he had never published or sought performance for these works.

In speaking of the different national schools Dr. Muck expressed a belief in Russia. "There is something sturdy and healthy there in spite of all the bizarre effects," said he, "and the music of the people makes a thorough foundation."

Of Mahler he but echoed the views often expressed in these columns, that his later works are programme-music with the "programme" (or plot) omitted. He says that their formless style, their bold contrasts, their graphic effects are all contrary to the ideal of abstract or pure music.

Speaking of his own programmes Dr. Muck said that he did not believe in much length—for which the critics will call down blessings upon his head. In Berlin they sometimes begin a concert early in the evening and continue until nearly midnight. For himself, he thought that an hour and a half, at most an hour and three quarters, was about as much as an auditor ought to be called upon to digest.

Altogether the impression gleaned from this new musical luminary in our firmament is that he is a conservative who is not narrow or prejudiced. He prefers the old masters, but he believes in an honest study of the new. He comes to us with his mind open and is ready to be guided by circumstances. He is of course delighted with his orchestra, and it may also be stated that the musicians are delighted with him. His permission to give his views in print and the interest which the public must feel in the successor of Wilhelm Gericke is sufficient cause for a recital of an informal interview.

Louis C. Elson.

Oct. 13, 06

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA UNDER DR. KARL MUCK

Begins Its Twenty-sixth Season with a New Conductor.

BRILLIANT AND EFFECTIVE

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony Rendered with Sharp Contrasts, but Without Exaggeration.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Oct. 12.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its twenty-sixth season to-day under the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, who has been engaged for one year to succeed Wilhelm Gericke. There was, of course, intense interest on the part of the Boston public, which is not so accustomed to new conductors as the New York public has become in the last few years, to learn what manner of man and musician it is who will have the famous orchestra in his charge during the coming season, and this interest extends beyond Boston to New York and the other cities in which the Boston organization is so highly prized and so frequent a visitor. The hall was thronged to overflowing. In its reception and recognition of the new man the decorous Friday afternoon audience expended what is here considered as enthusiasm.

Dr. Muck is a German conductor of distinction, not yet 47 years old, and younger in appearance, who was a Doctor of Philosophy before he was a musician, and has won his way to a post in the Royal Opera of Berlin, where he stands next to Dr. Richard Strauss as conductor. He was released from his duties in Berlin, to which he has recently been reappointed for a term of years, by special favor of the Emperor, and there is no reason to believe that he is contemplated as conductor of the Boston Orchestra for a period longer than the present season.

Dr. Muck gave the impression to-day of a man of commanding authority and technical power, undemonstrative and self-contained before the public and his men, and very little concerned apparently in making his way with his audience by any hint of personal display. He is indeed rather stiff and unyielding in his bearing, and his beat in itself has very little of the eloquence that some expect to be communicated in this manner. It was clear that he had already established an understanding with the orchestra, and he gained his effects with certainty. He played Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, and of Wagner "A Faust Overture," the "Siegfried Idyll," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The reading of the symphony was brilliant and effective, abounding in sharp contrasts, without exaggeration, and only in the slow movement showing a suggestion of unaccustomed emphasis in certain passages. The "Meistersinger" prelude he took rather more rapidly than we are accustomed to hear it, and in this, too, brilliancy and precision of phrase and strong contrast of nuance were the dominating qualities, rather than the fire of eloquence or the glow of tenderness and passion. But let none decide offhand that Dr. Muck does not possess these qualities, for there is still much for him and his men to do to gain full insight into each other, and for the nervous wire edge of these first appearances to be smoothed away.

Nor is it just to conclude from the four programmes that Dr. Muck has already announced that he is an unsuccessful programme maker. He has made a conservative beginning; it ought not to take him long to find out what the musical audiences of this country have been accustomed to and expect. That he is a man of unusual power and ability is unquestionable. By the time he is in New York in November there will be a fairer test of the musician than was possible to-day.

GROSS N. Y. ZEITUNG

OCT 13 1906

Dr. Muck's Debut.

Sein erstes Konzert mit dem Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester beifällig aufgenommen.

Boston, 12. Oktober. Dr. Karl Muck, der neue Dirigent des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters, hat heute bei seinem ersten Konzert einen herzlichen Empfang erhalten.

Die Art und Weise wie Dr. Muck den Taktstock führt, unterscheidet sich zwar von der seiner Vorgänger, er führen aber die Musiker gut unter der Kontrole zu haben und erntete, nachdem die Zuhörer sich an seine lebhaften Bewegungen gewöhnt hatten,

NEW YORK CI

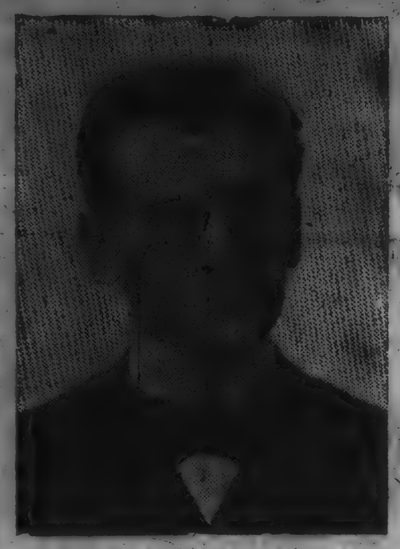
OCT 13 1906

Dr. Muck's erstes Konzert.

Der berühmte Musiker schwingt zum ersten Mal in Boston den Taktstock.

Eine Kritik seiner Leistungen.

Boston, 13. Okt. Dr Karl Muck, dem berühmten Musiker, wurde gestern Abend bei seinem ersten Concert hier ein herzlicher Empfang bereitet. Es hatte sich eine große und erlesene Zuhörerschaar eingefunden, die seinen Leistungen mit mehr Enthusiasmus applaudirte, als Bostoner Musikverständige es sonst wohl zu thun pflegen.



Dr. Carl Muck.

Das Programm enthielt u. a. Beethoven's fünfte Symphonie, das „Siegfried Idyll" und die Ouvertüre der Meistersinger von Wagner.

Die hiesige „Times" schreibt über das Muck'sche Concert:

„Herr Muck machte den Eindruck eines Mannes von großer Autorität und technischer Kraft, wenig aus sich heraustretend, aber durchaus mit kraftvollem Selbstbewußtsein vor dem Publikum und seinen Musikern. Er war augenscheinlich nicht geneigt, sich durch andere Mittel als nur sein Können beim Publikum in Gunst zu setzen. Er ist thatsächlich etwas steif und unnachgiebig beim Dirigiren und sein Anschlag scheint beim ersten Anblick nichts von der Beredtsamkeit zu haben, die man wohl zu finden glaubte. Er hatte aber augenscheinlich schon ein ziemliches Einverständniß mit seinen Musikern erzielt, denn er konnte seine Absichten durchführen, ohne daß ein Schleppen oder Zögern zu bemerken war.

„Herr Muck las die Symphonie in brillanter und wirksamer Weise. Es gab manche scharfe Kontraste, die indessen nicht zu stark accentuirt wurden. Nur in den langsamen Passagen zeigte sich eine bisher nicht ungewohnte Emphase. Die Meistersinger-Ouverture nahm er schneller als wir es gewohnt sind und auch hier waren eher brillante und präcise Phrasirung und scharfe Kontraste die hervorstechenden Eigenschaften als Zartheit der Tongebung und das Glühen der Leidenschaft und der Beredtsamkeit. Man sollte aber nicht ohne Weiteres sagen, daß Dr. Muck nicht diese Eigenschaften besitzt, denn es ist zwischen ihm und seinen Musikern noch kein vollständiger Einklang geschaffen und außerdem ist zu berücksichtigen, daß das erste Auftreten gewöhnlich einige Nervosität zeitigt. Man sollte aus den vier entworfenen Programmen nicht schließen, daß Dr. Muck ein nicht erfolgreicher Repertoirist ist. Er hat einen konservativen Anfang gemacht, es wird ihm nicht lange nehmen, auszufinden, was die Musik-Gönner hierzulande erwarten. Es ist ganz außer Frage, daß er ein Mann von großem Können und vielen Fähigkeiten ist. Wenn er erst im November nach New York kommt, wird der Musiker in ihm besser erkannt werden können als jetzt.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK HERA

OCT 13 1906

Dr. Muck's American Debut.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Friday.—Large audiences this afternoon and to-night filled Symphony Hall at the opening of the series of Boston Symphony concerts. The feature was the first public appearance in America of Dr. Carl Muck, of Vienna. He was welcomed warmly.

He was simple and modest throughout. He made no pantomimic displays and did little gesturing with the baton. From the welcome Boston, as represented in the large and fashionable audiences to-day, is highly pleased with the new conductor.

The programme included Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, Wagner's "Faust" overture, "Siegfried" idyll and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

RIDGELY SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1906 COMPANY

Although the first concert in Providence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra does not take place until Nov. 22 a large number of applications from new subscribers is already on file in Symphony Hall, Boston. This seems to indicate that Providence will be in line with the other cities where the orchestra makes regular visits, for everywhere there are signs of a decided increase in interest which will be followed by an increase in patronage. Full details regarding the Providence season will be made in due time.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK MAIL

ess

OCT 13 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its life of twenty-five years, has never yet made a mistake in choosing a conductor—Georg Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur all have had their striking merits. Probably Dr. Karl Muck, who takes the baton to-night in Symphony Hall, Boston, for the first time, will be found highly interesting there and here—at any rate, Boston's public paid higher prices for seats at auction this year than for several seasons past.

The Boston orchestra's popularity in New York was at its highest when Nikisch conducted. At least, those were the days when subscribers would besiege ticket offices the day after a concert to find out what was to be played at the next event, a month off. But the last few seasons have shown a steady and generous support that perhaps eclipsed all previous monetary records of this orchestra in New York. The ten concerts at Carnegie Hall in 1906-07 are likely to prove among the winter's most satisfactory musical events.

Dr. Muck, who is still a young man, began as chorus master in the opera at Zurich. Twelve years later he had risen to be one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera in Berlin, a post from which he has now obtained a year's leave of absence. In symphonic music he also made a name, first in Graz, then in Prague, and later in Berlin, where he divided with Felix Mottl the leadership of the Philharmonic Orchestra.

At the first New York concerts, on Thursday evening, November 8, and Saturday afternoon, November 10, there will be no soloist, Dr. Muck himself being the center of attraction.

EVENING BULLETIN—PHILADELPHIA,

OCTOBER 13, 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its twenty-second season in Philadelphia on Monday evening, November 5, with four Monday evening concerts to follow, on December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18. The coming season of the Boston Orchestra promises to be of more than ordinary interest through the presence in this country as its conductor of Dr. Karl Muck, who for the past fourteen years has been one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Dr. Muck's career as a conductor covers twenty years, and he is to-day one of the most prominent figures in European musical circles. Among the soloists to appear with the orchesthra this season is Paderewski, who, at the January concert will play his own new concerto, this being one of only seven appearances which he will make in America this season. At the December concert the soloist will be Moriz Rosenthal, the pianist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the W

om INQUI

ldress PHILADELPHIA,

te OCT 14

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The sale of season tickets for the twenty-second season in Philadelphia of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open tomorrow (Monday) morning, October 15, at Miss Harris' ticket office in Heppe's music store, 1115 Chestnut street. As last year, five Monday evening concerts will be given, on November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18, the place being, of course, the Academy of Music. The coming season of Boston's great orchestra promises to be one of more than ordinary interest through the presence in this country as its conductor of Dr. Karl Muck, who for the past fourteen years has been one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera, Berlin. At Dr. Muck's special request there will be no soloist at his introductory concert here on November 5, for he has arranged a purely orchestral program which does not admit of the presence of one. The soloist at the February concert will be Professor Willy Hess, who had so successful a debut here at the first concert in the fall of 1904. Professor Hess purposes introducing this year a new concerto for violin by Frederic d'Erlanger, of which he thinks very highly.

The orchestra itself returns this year without any change in its personnel, to bring to Philadelphia its full strength of ninety-six men.

OCT 1

Musical Notes.

THE season sale of tickets for the popular series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall during the coming winter will open at the box office of Carnegie Hall Monday morning at 9 o'clock.

More than ordinary interest is attached to the Boston Symphony concerts this season, owing to the presence of Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin, who has come to America on a year's leave of absence from the Royal Opera of that city to be conductor of the Boston Orchestra.

No doubt the brilliant achievements of the past will be duplicated under Dr. Muck. He comes to this country with a splendid reputation won in a career of twenty-six years in some of the most exacting posts of Europe. Beginning at the bottom round of the ladder as chorusmaster in the Opera in Zurich, his advancement was so rapid that in twelve years he was appointed one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera in Berlin, a post which he now holds. Though it is true that he is best known as an operatic conductor, his experience in concert work has been thorough, and in Europe he is esteemed as highly in concert as in opera.

The engagement of Dr. Muck is, to a certain extent, a radical departure in the policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the past the plan has been to take a man who was comparatively unknown. Mr. Henschel, the first conductor, was absolutely unknown in that capacity when he took charge of the orchestra in 1881. Mr. Gericke, when he first came to America, had been a subordinate in the Vienna Opera House, and Messrs. Nikisch and Paur, coming from the Municipal Theatre of Leipsic, were both unknown men. Curiously enough, all of them had been identified almost entirely with opera.

To be sure, when Mr. Nikisch left the orchestra in the spring of 1893 Hans Richter was engaged, and when he broke his contract with Mr. Higginson he wrote urgently to Dr. Muck asking him to come instead. Had he done so Dr. Muck would have been another comparatively unknown man to take charge of the orchestra. But now, thirteen years later, he comes to America a member of that small group of men who have raised the position of conductor to a higher plane than it has ever held before.

There will be no soloists at the November concerts in New York, and for the March concerts no soloists are yet announced, since Dr. Muck has not determined what he will do on his last visit to this city. The soloists for the intermediate concerts are four pianists and two violinists. The pianists are Messrs. Paderewski, Rosenthal, and Gabrilowitsch, and Mme Olga Samaroff. The violinists are Willy Hess and Timothée Adamowski. Mr. Paderewski will make his only appearance in New York next winter when he is soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

om NEW YORK PRI

ldress

te OCT 14 1906

Boston Greets Dr. Karl Muck.

BOSTON, Oct. 12.—Dr. Karl Muck, the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received a hearty welcome upon his first appearance to-day, at the opening public rehearsal of the organization. Dr. Muck's manner of conducting is somewhat different from that of his predecessors. He always appeared to have his men well under control, and after the audience became accustomed to his snappy arm movements his methods seemed to meet with favor.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

OCTOBER 13, 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give this year as usual six concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, the dates being Thursday evenings, Oct. 25, Dec. 6, Jan. 24, Feb. 28, April 4, and May 2. The price of season tickets for the six concerts is $5.00.

Hiram G. Tucker is going to give a reception to Dr. Karl Muck and Mrs. Muck at the Tuileries on Saturday evening after the first symphony concert.

Announcement is made of the usual series of three concerts which will be given by the Longy Club in Boston, this winter. They will be given in Potter Hall on Wednesday evenings, Nov. 14, Jan. 2 and Feb. 6.

The second symphony programme of the season, which will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be devoted entirely to masterpieces of the classical period. Dr. Muck has arranged his introductory programmes with the definite object in view of giving four distinct styles.

[26]

Oct. 13, 06

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA UNDER DR. KARL MUCK

Begins Its Twenty-sixth Season with a New Conductor.

BRILLIANT AND EFFECTIVE

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony Rendered with Sharp Contrasts, but Without Exaggeration.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Oct. 12.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its twenty-sixth season to-day under the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, who has been engaged for one year to succeed Wilhelm Gericke. There was, of course, intense interest on the part of the Boston public, which is not so accustomed to new conductors as the New York public has become in the last few years, to learn what manner of man and musician it is who will have the famous orchestra in his charge during the coming season, and this interest extends beyond Boston to New York and the other cities in which the Boston organization is so highly prized and so frequent a visitor. The hall was thronged to overflowing. In its reception and recognition of the new man the decorous Friday afternoon audience expended what is here considered as enthusiasm.

Dr. Muck is a German conductor of distinction, not yet 47 years old, and younger in appearance, who was a Doctor of Philosophy before he was a musician, and has won his way to a post in the Royal Opera of Berlin, where he stands next to Dr. Richard Strauss as conductor. He was released from his duties in Berlin, to which he has recently been reappointed for a term of years, by special favor of the Emperor, and there is no reason to believe that he is contemplated as conductor of the Boston Orchestra for a period longer than the present season.

Dr. Muck gave the impression to-day of a man of commanding authority and technical power, undemonstrative and self-contained before the public and his men, and very little concerned apparently in making his way with his audience by any hint of personal display. He is indeed rather stiff and unyielding in his bearing, and his beat in itself has very little of the eloquence that some expect to be communicated in this manner. It was clear that he had already established an understanding with the orchestra, and he gained his effects with certainty. He played Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, and of Wagner "A Faust Overture," the "Siegfried Idyll," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The reading of the symphony was brilliant and effective, abounding in sharp contrasts, without exaggeration, and only in the slow movement showing a suggestion of unaccustomed emphasis in certain passages. The "Meistersinger" prelude he took rather more rapidly than we are accustomed to hear it, and in this, too, brilliancy and precision of phrase and strong contrast of nuance were the dominating qualities, rather than the fire of eloquence or the glow of tenderness and passion. But let none decide offhand that Dr. Muck does not possess these qualities, for there is still much for him and his men to do to gain full insight into each other, and for the nervous wire edge of these first appearances to be smoothed away.

Nor is it just to conclude from the four programmes that Dr. Muck has already announced that he is an unsuccessful programme maker. He has made a conservative beginning; it ought not to take him long to find out what the musical audiences of this country have been accustomed to and expect. That he is a man of unusual power and ability is unquestionable. By the time he is in New York in November there will be a fairer test of the musician than was possible to-day.

Dr. Muck's Debut.

Sein erstes Konzert mit dem Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester beifällig aufgenommen.

Boston, 12. Oktober. Dr. Karl Muck, der neue Dirigent des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters, hat heute bei seinem ersten Konzert einen herzlichen Empfang erhalten.

Die Art und Weise wie Dr. Muck den Taktstock führt, unterscheidet sich zwar von der seiner Vorgänger, er schien aber die Musiker gut unter der Kontrolle zu haben und erntete, nachdem die Zuhörer sich an seine lebhaften Armbewegungen gewöhnt hatten, reichen Applaus.

NEW YORK CI

OCT 13 1906

Dr. Muck's erstes Konzert.

Der berühmte Musiker schwingt zum ersten Mal in Boston den Taktstock.

Eine Kritik seiner Leistungen.

Boston, 13. Okt. Dr Karl Muck, dem berühmten Musiker, wurde gestern Abend bei seinem ersten Concert hier ein herzlicher Empfang bereitet. Es hatte sich eine große und erlesene Zuhörerschaar eingefunden, die seinen Leistungen mit mehr Enthusiasmus applaudirte, als Bostoner Musikverständige es sonst wohl zu thun pflegen.

Dr. Carl Muck.

Das Programm enthielt u. a. Beethoven's fünfte Symphonie, das „Siegfried Idyll" und die Ouvertüre der Meistersinger von Wagner.

Die hiesige „Times" schreibt über das Muck'sche Concert:

„Herr Muck machte den Eindruck eines Mannes von großer Autorität und technischer Kraft, wenig aus sich heraustretend, aber durchaus mit kraftvollem Selbstbewußtsein vor dem Publikum und seinen Musikern. Er war augenscheinlich nicht geneigt, sich durch andere Mittel als nur sein Können beim Publikum in Gunst zu setzen. Er ist thatsächlich etwas steif und unnachgiebig beim Dirigiren und sein Anschlag scheint beim ersten Anblick nichts von der Beredtsamkeit zu haben, die man wohl zu finden glaubte. Er hatte aber augenscheinlich schon ein ziemliches Einverständniß mit seinen Musikern erzielt, denn er konnte seine Absichten durchführen, ohne daß ein Schleppen oder Zögern zu bemerken war.

„Herr Muck las die Symphonie in brillanter und wirksamer Weise. Es gab manche scharfe Kontraste, die indessen nicht zu stark accentuirt wurden. Nur in den langsamen Passagen zeigte sich eine bisher nicht ungewohnte Emphase. Die Meistersinger-Ouverture nahm er schneller als wir es gewohnt sind und auch hier waren eher brillante und präcise Phrasirung und scharfe Kontraste die hervortechenden Eigenschaften als Zartheit der Tongebung und das Glühen der Leidenschaft und der Beredtsamkeit. Man sollte aber nicht ohne Weiteres sagen, daß Dr. Muck nicht diese Eigenschaften besitzt, denn es ist zwischen ihm und seinen Musikern noch kein vollständiger Einklang geschaffen und außerdem ist zu berücksichtigen, daß das erste Auftreten gewöhnlich einige Nervosität zeitigt. Man sollte aus den vier entworfenen Programmen nicht schließen, daß Dr. Muck ein nicht erfolgreicher Repertoirist ist. Er hat einen konservativen Anfang gemacht, es wird ihm nicht lange nehmen, auszufinden, was die Musik-Gönner hierzulande erwarten. Es ist ganz außer Frage, daß er ein Mann von großem Können und vielen Fähigkeiten ist. Wenn er erst im November nach New York kommt, wird der Musiker in ihm besser erkannt werden können als jetzt.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Dr. Muck's American Debut.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Friday.—Large audiences this afternoon and to-night filled Symphony Hall at the opening of the series of Boston Symphony concerts. The feature was the first public appearance in America of Dr. Carl Muck, of Vienna. He was welcomed warmly.

He was simple and modest throughout. He made no pantomimic displays and did little gesturing with the baton. From the welcome Boston, as represented in the large and fashionable audiences to-day, is highly pleased with the new conductor.

The programme included Beethoven's Symphony in C minor; Wagner's "Faust" overture, "Siegfried" Idyll and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

PAWTUCKET, R. I.

The Evening Times.

ESTABLISHED 1885 — INCORPORATED 1901

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1906.

Although the first concert in Providence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra does not take place until Nov. 22 a large number of applications from new subscribers is already on file in Symphony Hall, Boston. This seems to indicate that Providence will be in line with the other cities where the orchestra makes regular visits, for everywhere there are signs of a decided increase in interest which will be followed by an increase in patronage. Full details regarding the Providence season will be made in due time.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its life of twenty-five years, has never yet made a mistake in choosing a conductor—Georg Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur all have had their striking merits. Probably Dr. Karl Muck, who takes the baton to-night in Symphony Hall, Boston, for the first time, will be found highly interesting there and here—at any rate, Boston's public paid higher prices for seats at auction this year than for several seasons past.

The Boston orchestra's popularity in New York was at its highest when Nikisch conducted. At least, those were the days when subscribers would besiege ticket offices the day after a concert to find out what was to be played at the next event, a month off. But the last few seasons have shown a steady and generous support that perhaps eclipsed all previous monetary records of this orchestra in New York. The ten concerts at Carnegie Hall in 1906-07 are likely to prove among the winter's most satisfactory musical events.

Dr. Muck, who is still a young man, began as chorus master in the opera at Zurich. Twelve years later he had risen to be one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera in Berlin, a post from which he has now obtained a year's leave of absence. In symphonic music he also made a name, first in Graz, then in Prague, and later in Berlin, where he divided with Felix Mottl the leadership of the Philharmonic Orchestra.

At the first New York concerts, on Thursday evening, November 8, and Saturday afternoon, November 10, there will be no soloist, Dr. Muck himself being the center of attraction.

EVENING BULLETIN
PHILADELPHIA,
OCTOBER 13, 1906.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its twenty-second season in Philadelphia on Monday evening, November 5, with four Monday evening concerts to follow, on December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18. The coming season of the Boston Orchestra promises to be of more than ordinary interest through the presence in this country as its conductor of Dr. Karl Muck, who for the past fourteen years has been one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Dr. Muck's career as a conductor covers twenty years, and he is to-day one of the most pominent figures in European musical circles. Among the soloists to appear with the orchestra this season is Paderewski, who, at the January concert, will play his own new concerto, this being one of only seven appearances which he will make in America this season. At the December concert the soloist will be Moriz Rosenthal, the pianist

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the W

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The sale of season tickets for the twenty-second season in Philadelphia of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open tomorrow (Monday) morning, October 15, at Miss Harris' ticket office in Heppe's music store, 1115 Chestnut street. As last year, five Monday evening concerts will be given, on November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18, the place being, of course, the Academy of Music. The coming season of Boston's great orchestra promises to be one of more than ordinary interest through the presence in this country as its conductor of Dr. Karl Muck, who for the past fourteen years has been one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera, Berlin. At Dr. Muck's special request there will be no soloist at his introductory concert here on November 5, for he has arranged a purely orchestral program which does not admit of the presence of one. The soloist at the February concert will be Professor Willy Hess, who had so successful a debut here at the first concert in the fall of 1904. Professor Hess purposes introducing this year a new concerto for violin by Frederic d'Erlanger, of which he thinks very highly.

The orchestra itself returns this year without any change in its personnel. It will bring to Philadelphia its full strength of ninety-six men.

Musical Notes.

THE season sale of tickets for the two series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall during the coming winter will open at the box office of Carnegie Hall Monday morning at 9 o'clock.

More than ordinary interest is attached to the Boston Symphony concerts this season, owing to the presence of Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin, who has come to America on a year's leave of absence from the Royal Opera of that city to be conductor of the Boston Orchestra.

No doubt the brilliant achievements of the past will be duplicated under Dr. Muck. He comes to this country with a splendid reputation won in a career of twenty-six years in some of the most exacting posts of Europe. Beginning at the bottom round of the ladder as chorusmaster in the Opera in Zurich, his advancement was so rapid that in twelve years he was appointed one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera in Berlin, a post which he now holds. Though it is true that he is best known as an operatic conductor, his experience in concert work has been thorough, and in Europe he is esteemed as highly in concert as in opera.

The engagement of Dr. Muck is, to a certain extent, a radical departure in the policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the past the plan has been to take a man who was comparatively unknown. Mr. Henschel, the first conductor, was absolutely unknown in that capacity when he took charge of the orchestra in 1881. Mr. Gericke, when he first came to America, had been a subordinate in the Vienna Opera House, and Messrs. Nikisch and Paur, coming from the Municipal Theatre of Leipsic, were both unknown men. Curiously enough, all of them had been identified almost entirely with opera.

To be sure, when Mr. Nikisch left the orchestra in the spring of 1893 Hans Richter was engaged, and when he broke his contract with Mr. Higginson he wrote urgently to Dr. Muck asking him to come instead. Had he done so Dr. Muck would have been another comparatively unknown man to take charge of the orchestra. But now, thirteen years later, he comes to America a member of that small group of men who have raised the position of conductor to a higher plane than it has ever held before.

There will be no soloists at the November concerts in New York, and for the March concerts no soloists are yet announced, since Dr. Muck has not determined what he will do on his last visit to this city. The soloists for the intermediate concerts are four pianists and two violinists. The pianists are Messrs. Paderewski, Rosenthal, and Gabrilowitsch, and Mme Olga Samaroff. The violinists are Willy Hess and Timothée Adamowski. Mr. Paderewski will make his only appearance in New York next winter when he is soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

---

om

ldress

ite

Boston Greets Dr. Karl Muck.

BOSTON, Oct. 12.—Dr. Karl Muck, the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received a hearty welcome upon his first appearance to-day, at the opening public rehearsal of the organization. Dr. Muck's manner of conducting is somewhat different from that of his predecessors. He always appeared to have his men well under control, and after the aud ence became accustomed to his snappy arm movements his methods seemed to meet with favor.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

OCTOBER 13, 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give this year as usual six concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, the dates being Thursday evenings, Oct. 25, Dec. 13, Jan. 24, Feb. 28, April 4, and May 2. The price of season tickets for the six concerts is $5.00.

Hiram G. Tucker is going to give a reception to Dr. Karl Muck and Mrs. Muck at the Tuileries on Saturday evening after the first symphony concert.

Announcement is made of the usual series of three concerts which will be given by the Longy Club in Boston, this winter. They will be given in Potter Hall on Wednesday evenings, Nov. 14, Jan. 2 and Feb. 6.

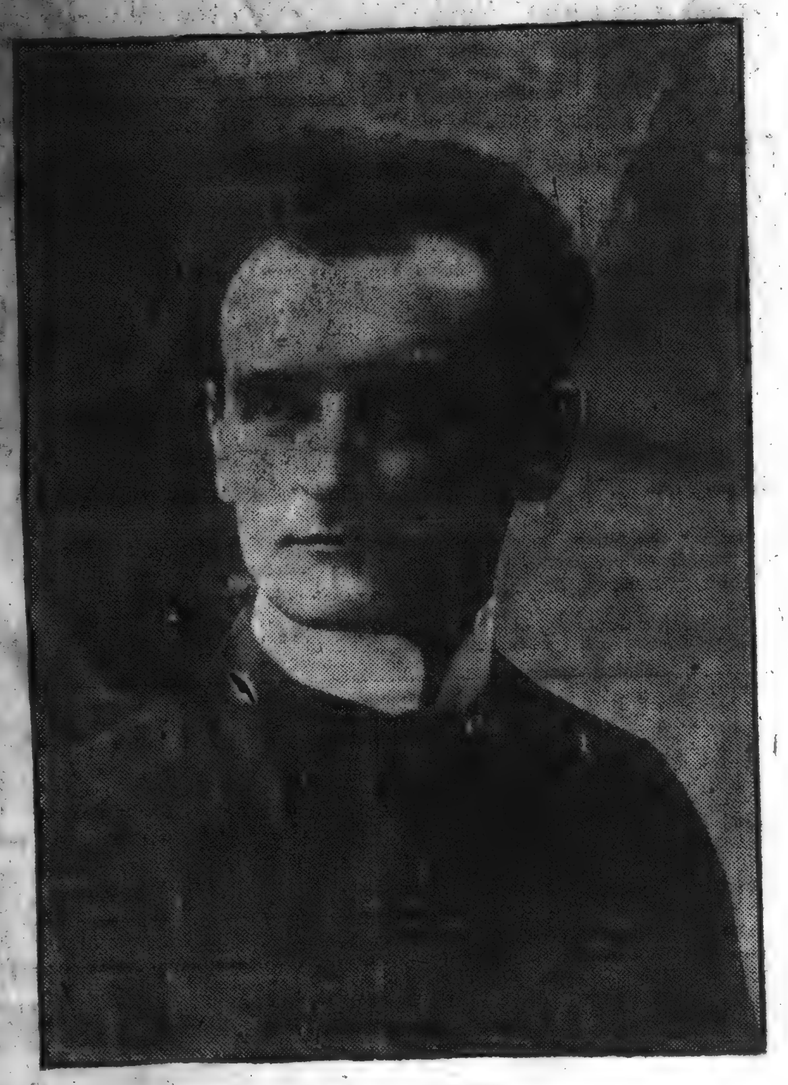
The second symphony programme of the season, which will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be devoted entirely to masterpieces of the classical period. Dr. Muck has arranged his introductory programmes with the definite object in view of giving four distinct styles.

[26]

BOSTON GLOBE—
SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1906.

NEW LEADER MAKES A MODEST DEBUT

Muck Pleases a Large Symphony Rehearsal Audience.



DR KARL MUCK.

"He's a 'snapper'!" said a hearer of Dr Karl Muck yesterday at the conclusion of the Beethoven number. Perhaps that was the best characterization that could be made of the new leader of the Symphony orchestra, be it spoken in admiration and not in any derogatory sense.

Boston received him with a little conservatism. He was welcomed on his appearance with enthusiastic and generous applause, and after the first number, the symphony, he was recalled again and again, but following the Wagner numbers there was comparatively little furore. At the close of the concert the players sat decorously in their seats, but one recall was all the rapidly departing audience vouchsafed.

The conductor is a slight man, grave of demeanor, and with almost no play of expression in his face. He is smooth-shaven, and wears eyeglasses with a dangling cord which gets in the way. He seemed of steel, electrified, but gave the physically slight man's sign of stooping his knees for any extra effort.

"He has the beat!" said a musician, delightedly. And indeed, Dr Muck's manner of leading was unusual. His baton describes no sweeping circles; he moves his arm only from his elbow, for the most part, and in flashes of movement. He held his baton as it might be in the bill of a huge bird, so oddly did his fingers close round it; and much of the time he poked his whole hand forward, "beating time end on," as a bird might peck at the orchestra. During passages where the time was established, and the score called for no changes of tempo or of weight of sound, he stopped beating time altogether, and remained still, his stick resting against the open score.

"Halfway between Nikisch and Gericke" was another musician's comment. This is not close to the mark, for Dr Muck, though he has characteristics of both conductors, has an individuality quite outside of either. His reading of the Beethoven symphony—No. 5—was not sensationally different from that of other conductors; his handling of three Wagner numbers was appreciative and comprehensive, but in no single place did one hear the expression of a personality.

Dr Muck has comparatively little forehead and a good deal of chin; what this may signify let the physiognomists tell; to the mere observer he seems a scholarly man, an aristocrat to the bone, and above all a man who will not so much insist on his personality as on the work of his band and a great faithfulness to the composers whose works he gives. Considerable comment was made yesterday afternoon on the program he selected for his debut; the Fifth symphony, and Wagner's "Faust" overture, "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Die Maestersinger"—here was no effort to startle, to interest by the weight of something new. It was modest, yet calculated to make comparisons with former conductors inevitable.

Musical people crowded the house. A great curiosity was manifest to see and hear Dr Muck, and many people were in the hall who go more to Saturday night performances than to the rehearsals. Maj Higginson, on whom has rested considerable anxiety about the new leader, naturally enough, sat in his

Dr Muck will make his social debut tonight, at a reception to be given for him after the symphony concert, at hotel Tuileries. The host is Hiram G. Tucker, and the guests will include most of Boston's musical people.

The great question at present is, of course, "What will his policy as leader be?" And Dr Muck's answer would probably be just now, "What do the people here wish?" His first program was noncommittal; next week's, including symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, a Bach suite and a Spohr concerto, has nothing indicative about it, unless it is to be taken to mean that the symphony season is to represent what westerners believe it does mean in Boston, a sort of sacrifice to the ancients.

Dr Muck—on the word of one who has talked with him—does not come to show Boston what it has been missing, either in new music or in the handling of well-known pieces. He does not come to show Boston how Dr Muck conducts. Within the courteous limits, he wishes to give Boston what Boston wants to hear, and beyond that, he is simply one of the best-trained, most scholarly expositors of music, a skilful player on the many voices of the orchestra. The players who rose to receive him on his entrance, and beat their fiddle backs in greeting, are already enthusiastic over him, and perhaps that is the best tribute he received yesterday.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—
SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1906.

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY.

The second symphony program of the season, which will be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be devoted entirely to masterpieces of the classical period. Dr. Muck has arranged his introductory programs with the definite object in view of giving four distinct styles. The names of the composers of the program are Bach, Haydn, Spohr and Mozart. The soloist will be Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra. The program is as follows:

Suite for flute and string orchestra.....Bach
Symphony in G major (B. and H. No. 13)..Haydn
Concerto for violin and orchestra in G major, No. 9, opus 55.....Spohr
Symphony in C major, "Jupiter".....Mozart

• • •

[redacted] will give this year as usual six concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, the dates being Thursday evenings, Oct. 25, Dec. 13, Jan. 24, Feb. 28, April 4, and May 2. This year the time of beginning the concerts will be changed, for instead of being 7:45 it will be 8 o'clock. The soloists will be: Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto; Miss Lillia Snelling, contralto; Mme. Antoinette Szumowska, pianist; Miss Olga Radecki, pianist; Prof. Willy Hess, violinist.

• • •

[redacted] Eckering Hall, Wednesday evening, Oct. 24, will suggest the possibility of a teachable method for the artistic use of the pedal in pianoforte music for the benefit of students of the instrument. The subject

NOTES ON THINGS MUSICAL.

Of all the pianists who have appeared in Boston in recent years, none has been taken more quickly into favor by the musical public than Mme. Olga Samaroff, who last year gave two recitals here in addition to being soloist with the Symphony Orchestra. Mr. C. A. Ellis, Mme. Samaroff's manager, announces that she will give the first recital of the present season in Chickering Hall on Monday afternoon, Nov. 5.

Announcement is made of the usual series of three concerts which will be given by the Longy Club in Boston this winter. They will be given in Potter Hall on Wednesday evenings Nov. 14, Jan. 2 and Feb. 6. Subscriptions for the series may now be sent to C. A. Ellis, Symphony Hall. The price of the subscription will be the same as last year, $4 for the series.

Mr. Hiram G. Tucker is to give a reception to Dr. Karl Muck and Mrs. Muck at the Tuilleries this evening after the first Symphony concert of the season.

THE BOSTON TRAVELER

Eighty-firs October 13, 1906. Established 1825.

THE second symphony programme of the season, which will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be devoted entirely to masterpieces of the classical period. Dr. Muck has arranged his introductory programmes with the definite object in view of giving four distinct styles. The names of the composers of the programme are Bach, Haydn, Spohr and Mozart. The soloist will be Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra. The programme is as follows:

Suite for flute and string orchestra.....Bach
Symphony in G major (B and H No. 13).....Haydn
Concerto for violin and orchestra in G major, No. 9, opus 55.....Spohr
Symphony in C major "Jupiter"..Mozart

• • •

[redacted] will give this year as usual six concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, the dates being Thursday evenings, Oct. 25, Dec. 13, Jan. 24, Feb. 28, April 4, and May 2. This year the time of beginning the concerts will be changed, for instead of being 7:45 it will be 8 o'clock. The soloists will be: Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto; Miss Lillia Snelling, contralto; Mme. Antoinette Szumowska, pianist; Miss Olga Radecki, pianist; Prof. Willy Hess, violinist.

• • •

[redacted] Eckering Hall, Wednesday evening, Oct. 24, will suggest the possibility of a teachable method for the artistic use of the pedal in pianoforte music for the benefit of students of the instrument. The subject

citals here, in addition to being soloist with the Symphony orchestra. Mr. C. A. Ellis, Mme. Samaroff's manager, announces that she will give the first recital of the present season in Chickering Hall, on Monday afternoon, Nov. 5.

• • •

The sale of season tickets for the six concerts which the Boston Symphony quartet will give in Chickering Hall this winter will open at the box office in Symphony Hall on Monday morning, Oct. 22. The dates of the concerts are Monday evenings, Oct. 29, Nov. 19, Dec. 17, Jan. 21, Feb. 25 and April 1. The assisting artists will be Dr. Karl Muck, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Heinrich Gebhard Victor Benham, H. G. Tucker and others. Mr. Gebhard will be the assisting artist at the first concert, when the programme will be Suk's quartet in B-flat major, opus 11, which is a novelty; Beethoven's trio for strings in C minor, opus 9, No. 3, and Cesar Franck's quintet for piano and strings in F minor.

• • •

[redacted] concerts to be given at Symphony Hall on Saturday afternoon of next week and on Sunday evening, the 21st. The programmes for these events will afford a hearing of a wide range of Leoncavallo's compositions under the most favorable conditions. Leoncavallo brings with him an orchestra of 65 musicians and a number of competent soloinsts selected from the opera company of the leading Italian cities. At both the Saturday afternoon and Sunday evening concerts it is announced that the programmes will be introduced by the new march composed by Leoncavallo and dedicated to President Roosevelt; "Vive L'Amerique," in which the [redacted] emes of "Yankee Doodle" and "Dixie" [redacted] interwoven.

• • •

[redacted] announcement is made of the usual [redacted] ries of three concerts which will be [redacted] ven by the Longy Club in Boston, [redacted] s winter. They will be given in [redacted] tter Hall on Wednesday evenings, [redacted] v. 14, Jan. 2 and Feb. 6.

Boston Transcript

324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1906

INTERMEZZO SINFONICO

"The hall was thronged to overflowing. In its reception and recognition of the new man, the decorous Friday afternoon audience expended what is here considered as enthusiasm." Thus the special correspondent of the New York Times, despatched to Boston for Dr. Muck's first appearance yesterday as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. But it was enthusiasm, and it would be "considered" enthusiasm anywhere—even in New York. Moreover, it was exactly the kind of enthusiasm that actors, singers and conductors usually tell us they like best. It waited results, and then testified to them. It began in a hush of expectancy. Everyone had come early, and everyone seemed to be keeping curiously silent. The door at the right of the stage opened noiselessly and Dr. Muck, seemingly seeing nothing and hearing nothing, was half way across the platform before the audience discovered him. The whole hall seemed to buzz with "There he is!" then rattle with applause; then fall into quick silence. The hush was tense through the symphony, which is the most flattering of enthusiasms, and at the end came applause such as no one but a few petted singers has been able to draw from the calm self-possession of an afternoon audience at the Symphony concerts. Once, twice, thrice it recalled the conductor, and each time it meant what it was trying to say.

In a word half the public of the Symphony concerts has seen Dr. Muck and liked him and heard the band under his conducting and liked him the more. And it is thirteen years since it has had a really new conductor to see and to give it agreeable sensations for the moment and for subsequent talk. Moreover, the new conductor was "different." He seemed so quiet, even so stiff, yet as anyone with a discriminating eye could see, he was tense with nervous energy. He made no show of commanding his men; he seemed simply at work with them. Yet the understanding between him and them was perfect, and he had more of his will and way with them than the domineering conductors often get with their orchestras. He seemed shy with his audience—not indifferent, and its applause only made him the more taut with nervous pleasure. At the start he was likable, and to an audience that is hard to please and to win. Before the concert was half over he had begun the winning. In all probability Dr. Muck will remain with the orchestra only a single musical year. His stay promises to make an exceptional and agreeable interlude in our musical calendar—sort of intermezzo sinfonico, since all musical terms should be in Italian.

Dr. Muck Magnet At Symphony Hal

Conducts First Rehearsal Amic Great Enthusiasm—Many Smart People Present.

Carl Muck was the magnet yesterday to draw a mammoth audience to Symphony Hall and not a seat was to be had at any price. Small wonder Messrs. Comee and Mudgett wore such expansive smiles as they were cordially greeted on all sides by regular patrons with whose faces they have become mutually familiar.

For some hours before the op[redacted] the front steps were filled with femininity representing the "rush seat" occupants and lines extended along the avenue. Hundreds were turned away and the same condition will prevail tonight.

Magnetic Conductor.

Not only was the program well chosen —Beethoven and Wagner, but the inspiration of a new and somewhat magnetic (also good-looking) conductor caused the audience to be on hand for the symphony—very few being shut out.

Among the early arrivals was Mrs. Carl Muck, accompanied by Mrs. George W. Chadwick, whom she met abroad during the negotiations with the orchestra management. Mr. Chadwick was on hand also, so were Arthur Foote, Louis Elson and all the critics.

Especially pointed out to me was James Aldrich, the eminent New York critic, who married the other day Margaret Livingston Chanler. He was a guest of Mr. Comee and displayed much enthusiasm over the setting which Boston gives her orchestra.

Mrs. Gardner Not Present.

Mrs. John L. Gardner was not there, but her seats were occupied by Miss Lena Little, now chatelaine pro tem. of Fenway Court, and Miss Clara Munger.

Noted in the throng were Mrs. Roger Wolcott, in light mourning, relieved by a string of pearls; Mrs. Harold Peabody (Marion Lawrence), Miss Juliet Higginson, the Misses Rosamond and Ethel Gibson.

Mrs. George Stoddard, Stanley McCormick, Mrs. Irvine Wood, Mrs. Edmund Brainerd Cowles, Mrs. Frederick R. Comee, Miss Mary Johnson, Mrs. Benjamin Pitman, Mrs. Theodore P. Gooding, Mrs. Lizzie Whipple Pierce and mother, Mrs. J. Reed Whipple, Mrs. Samuel Mixter and Mr. Dana Estes.

Others Present.

Maj. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. Edward Treble, with Mrs. L. H. Mudgett, Miss Stackpole, Mrs. George Francis, Mrs. Henry F. Miller and daughter, Mrs. L. Stevens Bingham, Mr. Robert Jordan, Mrs. Harry Pratt McKean, Mrs. Macomber, Mrs. Eben Sumner Draper, Mrs. William Humphrey and Mrs. John R. Alley (Miriam Stedman), Miss Anna Barron, Mrs. Martha Dana Shepard, Mme. Rotoli, Mrs. Charles H. Greenleaf, and hundreds more, of whom space forbids mention.

Others whom I saw at close range were Mrs. John Reece, in black broadcloth and toque with green plumage; Mrs. "Ollie" Ames, in green and blue fine plaid and a black hat; Mrs. Fred Dabney (nee Fay), in russet brown; Mrs. Alley, very handsome in severe black; Marion Peabody Lawrence, in pale gray and a pink straw hat with pink shaded wings; Mrs. Francis M. Stanley, in dark blue tailor-made gown and handsome feather boa; Mrs. Boylston Beal, in dark gray severely made; Mrs. Nathan Matthews, in the blue she likes so well and a fetching blue boa, and Mrs. Stanley McCormick, in dark blue with black embroidery and white felt hat with gray velvet trimmings.

POLLY AD[redacted]

[redacted]

"All the News That's Fit to Print."

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR BY THE NEW YORK TIMES COMPANY, Times Square, New York City.
Telephone: 1000 Bryant.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCT. 13, 1906.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA UNDER DR. KARL MUCK

Begins Its Twenty-sixth Season with a New Conductor.

BRILLIANT AND EFFECTIVE

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony Rendered with Sharp Contrasts, but Without Exaggeration.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Oct. 12.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its twenty-sixth season to-day under the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, who has been engaged for one year to succeed Wilhelm Gericke. There was, of course, intense interest on the part of the Boston public, which is not so accustomed to new conductors as the New York public has become in the last few years, to learn what manner of man and musician it is who will have the famous orchestra in his charge during the coming season, and this interest extends beyond Boston to New York and the other cities in which the Boston organization is so highly prized and so frequent a visitor. The hall was thronged to overflowing. In its reception and recognition of the new man the decorous Friday afternoon audience expended what is here considered as enthusiasm.

Dr. Muck is a German conductor of distinction, not yet 47 years old, and younger in appearance, who was a Doctor of Philosophy before he was a musician, and has won his way to a post in the Royal Opera of Berlin, where he stands next to Dr. Richard Strauss, as conductor. He was released from his duties in Berlin, to which he has recently been reappointed for a term of years, by special favor of the Emperor, and there is no reason to believe that he is contemplated as conductor of the Boston Orchestra for a period longer than the present season.

Dr. Muck gave the impression to-day of a man of commanding authority and technical power, undemonstrative and self-contained before the public and his men, and very little concerned apparently in making his way with his audience by any hint of personal display. He is indeed rather stiff and unyielding in his bearing, and his beat in itself has very little of the eloquence that some expect to be communicated in this manner. It was clear that he had already established an understanding with the orchestra, and he gained his effects with certainty. He played Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, and of Wagner "A Faust Overture," the "Siegfried Idyll," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

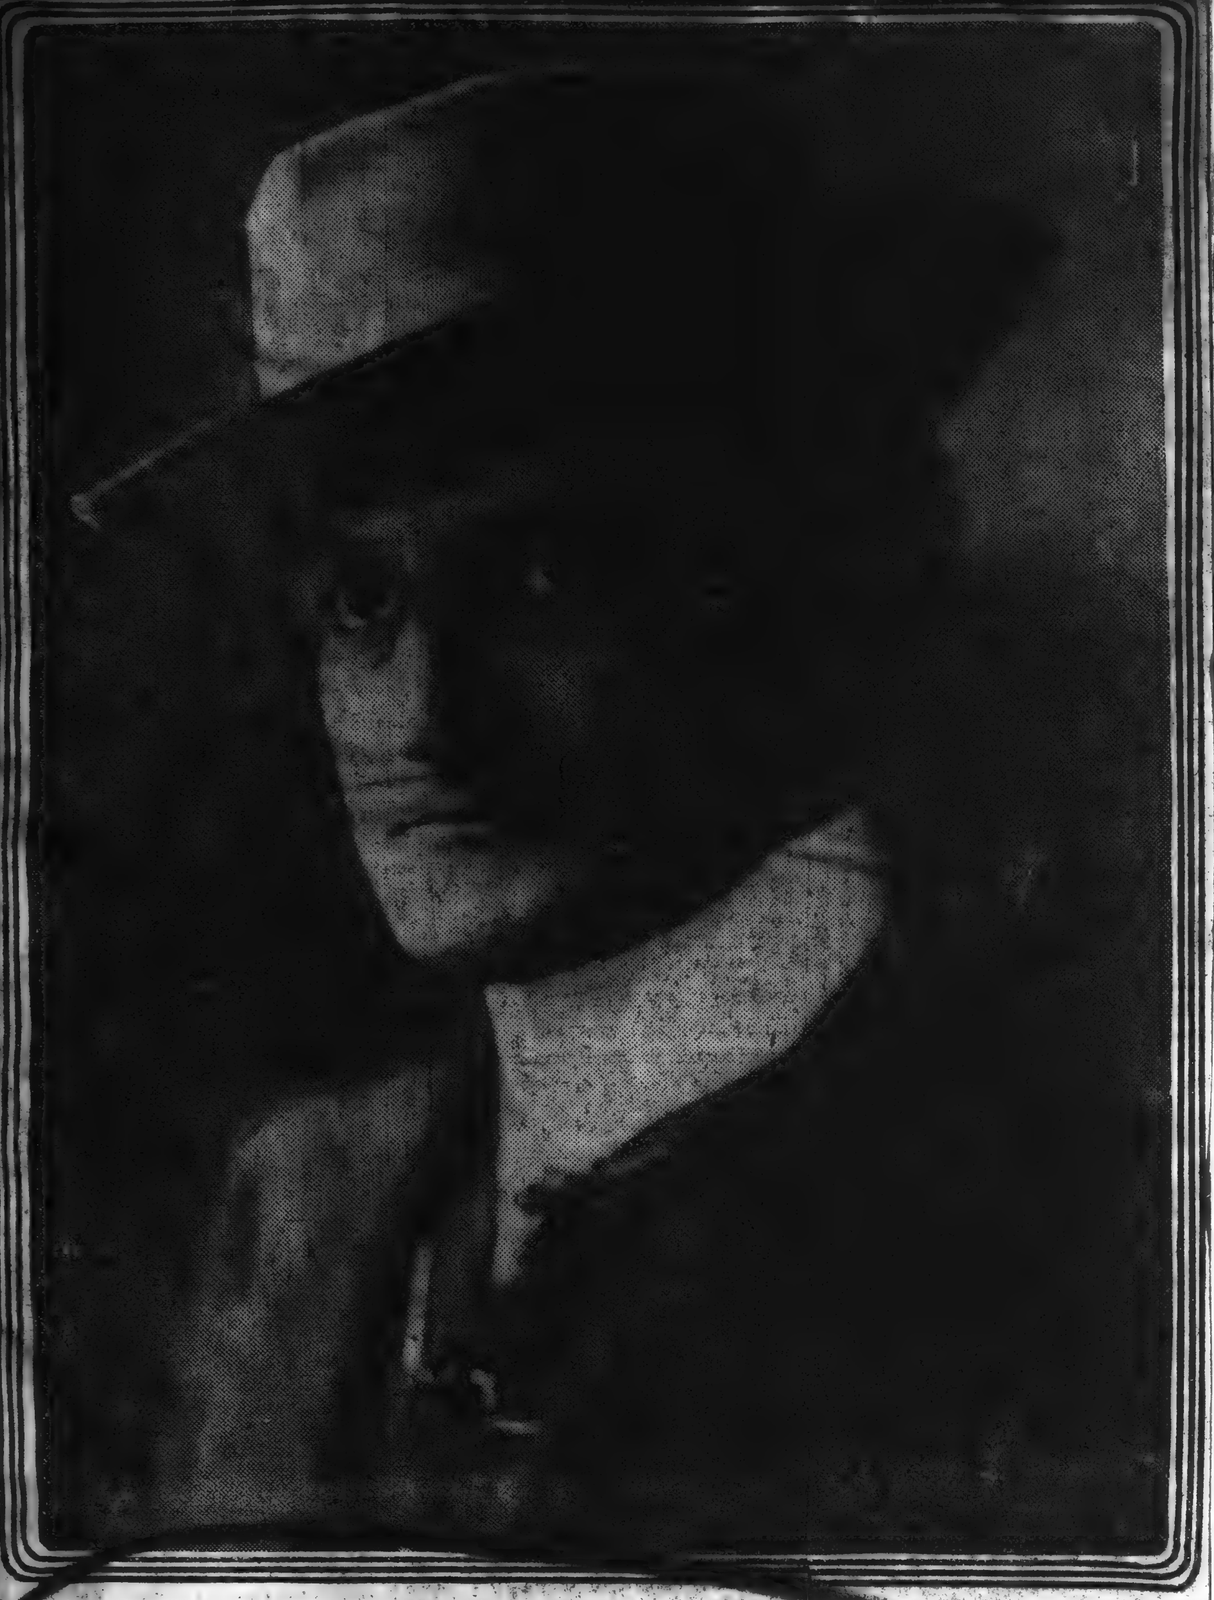
The reading of the symphony was brilliant and effective, abounding in sharp contrasts, without exaggeration, and only in the slow movement showing a suggestion of unaccustomed emphasis in certain passages. The "Meistersinger" prelude he took rather more rapidly than we are accustomed to hear it, and in this, too, brilliancy and precision of phrase and strong contrast of nuance were the dominating qualities, rather than the fire, eloquence or the glow of tenderness and passion. But let none decide offhand that Dr. Muck does not possess these qualities, for there is still much for him and the men to do to gain full insight into each other, and for the nervous wire edge of these first appearances to be smoothed away.

Nor is it just to conclude from the programmes that Dr. Muck has announced that he is an unsuccessful programme maker. He has made a conservative beginning; it ought not to take long to find out what the musical audiences of this country have been accustomed to and expect. That he is a man of unusual power and ability is unquestionable. By the time he is in New York in November there will be a fairer test of the musician than was possible to-day.

[redacted]
[27]

SYMPHONY LED BY DR. MUCK

DR. KARL MUCK, WHO MADE HIS FIRST APPEARANCE IN AMERICA YESTERDAY



NEW SYMPHONY LEADER PLEASES AUDIENCE AT HIS FIRST REHEARSAL

His Dignified Personality Proved the Chief Feature of the Performance, and He Received a Warm Welcome from City's Music Lovers.

BY PHILIP HALE.

Dr. Karl Muck made his first appearance in America as a conductor yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall at the first public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, the 26th of the organization. The review of the concert this evening will be published in The Herald tomorrow. We are not now concerned with programme or orchestral performance. The feature of the public rehearsal was the personality of Dr. Muck.

This is the period of the virtuoso conductor. He is the rival of the prima donna with her dazzling bravura or dramatic intensity of the applauded and fatuous tenor with the eagerly awaited and robust high C. He journeys from city to city in a conqueror's car, and there is hardly a reviewer who dares to remind him that he, too, is mortal. He rides his war horses, Beethoven, Berlioz, Wagner, Strauss, Tschaikowsky to victory. "What does he find in the Eroica symphony?" "How does his reading differ from that of the famous Herr Bullmaster?" "He is the only interpreter of the Fantastic and the Pathetic symphonies." The curiosity is concerning the conductor, not the composer.

The peculiarities, the mannerisms of the conductor when he is in action are noted minutely and passionately discussed. "Did you see that he did not turn the leaves of the score?" "How he glared at the orchestra when he made that tremendous climax!"

Virtuosity of the Rope-Dancer.

Something of the artistry of the rope-dancer enters into the composition of the acclaimed virtuoso conductor. He is never wholly unconscious of the audience. He bears in mind the fact that there are ladies in the gallery as on the floor. Perhaps his charm is in a delicately manicured left hand which he [illegible] due force. Or his face has passion-paleness, the paleness of a Vanderdecken once more allowed to land in search of the faithful bride. He is thus interesting, sympathetic. Or he is leonine and he shakes a formidable mane. Or he is demonstratively spectacular. His gestures are semaphoric; he is all x's and y's. He coaxes the strings; he tootles with the flute; he faces the brass in stormy passages, goads trumpets, horns and trombones to fury, and in the orgasm of sound reels and totters and mops his glowing forehead. From the moment of his raising the baton he courts, anticipates applause.

And there is the conductor who disdains the stick. He thrills his audience by the operations of his hands. With his fingers he plucks a pizzicato from the strings, a cadenza from the oboe, a gurgle from the reluctant, agonized bassoon.

Dr. Muck of a Different Breed.

Dr. Muck is, fortunately for us, not of this virtuoso family. He is a musician-virtuoso. When he came upon the stage he was welcomed warmly. Many on the floor stood up; some to show in an uncertain way their respect for his office and to pay homage to his reputation; some no doubt that they might obtain a clearer view of the man. He acknowledged the tribute modestly, as he did the recalls after the performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and at the end of the concert. He was simple and modest throughout. He was neither anxious to show his pleasure at the reception nor stiff in dignified acceptance.

He nothing common did, or mean,
Upon that memorable scene.

A celebrated English general once said: "Give me a man with plenty of nose." A conductor should have a good back. For the time has gone by when a conductor of a symphony concert faced the audience. Bilse of Berlin was probably the last to show thus his face and decorations. There have been memorable backs, and perhaps the most distinguished was that of Theodore Thomas. A back should neither be [illegible] arrogant. It should not suggest nervousness or rigidity. D[illegible] Muck has a good back.

No Play-Actor with Baton.

He is not a play-actor with his stic[k] He does not give a pantomimic displa[y] of musical emotions. He is consciou[s] of the fact that he has an orchestra t[o] serve as his medium, nor does he e[n]deavor to play tunes on the baton. H[is] attitude is authoritative, but not mil[i]tary; it is friendly and not that of [a] task master. His action has a sobriet[y] that is not indifferent or dull. His us[e] of the left hand is discreet and in ge[s]ture he is temperate. In a word, h[e] has no mannerisms that might caus[e] remark. He conducts like a thoughtfu[l] musician who, after he has shared wit[h] the players his convictions and belief[s] about the interpretation of a composi[-]tion, is willing that they should expres[s] the composer's thoughts with an occa[-]sional reminder, but without annoyin[g] interference.

Such interpreters are re-creators. Through them the hearer recognizes th[e] intention of the composer. They do no[t] stand between, hinder, obstruct. Th[e] highest praise of a conductor is that th[e] chief thought of the hearer is concern[ed] ing the music. Only when the concer[t] is over does he realize the all-importan[t] part so modestly assumed and main[-]tained by the conductor.

It is a pleasure to welcome this sincer[e] and accomplished artist, who now make[s] Boston his dwelling-place. His influenc[e] in the making toward musical righteous[-]ness will be all the more potent becaus[e] it is not flamboyant; because his per[-]sonality is not too personal.

The deeply interested audience wa[s] quick to appreciate this.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, S[illegible]

OCTOBER 13, 1906

DR. MUCK CONDUCTS

THE FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT OF THE NEW SEASON

Beethoven and Wagner Make the Programme—The New Conductor's Quiet Authority—Evident Feeling for Beautiful and Proportioned Tone and for Nice Adjustment of Details—Lucidity and Incisiveness—The Music of the Afternoon as It Disclosed the New Leader—A Possible Limitation

Yesterday afternoon Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, made his first appearance in Boston and in America at the opening concert of its twenty-sixth year. There had been no changes in the personnel of the band, and each man sat in his familiar place. The only details, indeed, in which there had been the smallest alteration, was a new form of titlepage in the programme book and a new arrangement of the list of the orchestra in it. Naturally there was no soloist, and the programme, which required exactly an hour and a half for performance, ran:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 5, in C-minor.
Wagner: A "Faust" overture.
Wagner: "A Siegfried Idyl."
Wagner: Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Dr. Muck slipped across the stage so quickly and quietly that the audience hardly detected his presence until Mr. Hess waved the orchestra to its feet. The buzz of discovery subsided in a little burst of welcoming applause; the new conductor bowed tautly and nervously to his men and to his audience, and for the first time the three were face to face. Neither photograph nor description had belied him. For the moment the face seemed unusually white and set, but mental acumen, nervous energy, resolution, entire self-control and concentration seemed to meet in it. There was similar nervous energy in his alert bearing and supple movements, but subject, again, to the same full self-mastery. A man could hardly seem more unaffectedly and quietly absorbed in his work and in the pleasure of it.

The beat and the whole manner of conducting were as characteristic. Since Theodore Thomas's time no familiar conductor has stood so still. Dr. Muck plunged at no group of players, beckoned none to their entrances, embraced none in sweeping gesture. Like Thomas, he reserves such muscular labors for rehearsals. His body does not even rise with a crescendo, or go taut with a climax. His score stands before him, his stick is in his hand, in the old fashion; and the beat is unfailingly clear and unfalteringly precise. Hand and stick seem to move little, but there is a curious, quivering nervous energy in their rise and fall. Now and then both arms, half extended, move to the rhythm or sharpen the accent. Rarely the lifted left hand modulates the volume of tone. Once at least, with both arms at ease, Dr. Muck left the band to go its own way. There are no vehemence or obvious emotional appeal or suggestion in any movement. At the rehearsals the conductor has disclosed and imposed his design, will and feeling. At the concert he seems to seek only the clear and exact fulfilment and expression of them. His conducting is lucid precision itself, but precision that is tense with nervous energy.

The range of the tone that Dr. Muck draws from the orchestra seems fuller than was Mr. Gericke's. In Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," for example, he sought and gained subtle graduations and very fine delicacies of beautiful sound; but at moments in the symphony and in the prelude to "The Mastersingers" he was equally capable of large and robust sonorities. His ear for quality of tone seems sensitive and his feeling for it warm. Naturally the men were on their mettle yesterday, and we that listened came fresh to old delights, but seldom have the voices of the orchestra had a more flowing and pliant, a richer and more persuasive loveliness. As fine and warm is Dr. Muck's sense of adroit and beautiful blending and proportioning of tone. He melts his instrumental voices into each other as he twines them in long and curving lines. He seems to seek the steady and delicate undulation of tone that such voices as Melba's sometimes have. Yet as the "Faust" overture showed, he can summon the poignant phrase and the burning accent. He loves too the cunning adjustment and disclosure, so to say, of each thread in the tonal web, and there were details in the interplay of the instruments in the symphony that seemed to leap freshly into life or to come strangely clear to many ears. Dr. Muck's sense of musical design is keen and searching. Everywhere he was entirely lucid. Details fell duly into their place among larger outlines until the whole musical structure rose and took shape before the ear and the imagination. Finely as Dr. Muck drew the threads of "A Siegfried Idyl," he kept the whole web clear and unbroken. Large as was his notion of Beethoven's symphony, no figure, no arabesque in it seemed to elude him. Nothing was blurred or slighted and nothing forced or exaggerated. He showed the faculty that analyzes and also reconstructs. Lucidity and symmetry, precision and plasticity went hand in hand. The sense of musical form and design seem to match the sense of tonal beauty and adjustment. Responsiveness to rhythm animated both and kept both from hardening. Never does Dr. Muck dull or slacken the due pace. He loves the quick, incisive contrast.

Into this design and with these means Dr. Muck in the symphony poured much of the passion, power and beauty of Beethoven. His devotion to the composer's purpose—and to nothing else—was whole-souled. From the start he summoned and kept a largeness of manner, a loftiness of utterance that were of the grand style. Where Beethoven rages he made the music rage. When it grumbles in the scherzo he made it grumble. The haunting reiterated song of the andante he kept in beautiful and manly simplicity. Familiar indeed is the transition from the scherzo to the finale. Yet Dr. Muck rekindled in some of his hearers the fine suspense of it. Deep and broad went the triumphant chant of the final movement. Nowhere was there the smallest exaggeration or the slightest trace of the conductor who must make each contrast a little more poignant, each melody of a deeper and more flowing beauty than ever conductor made it before. Reading, tempi, general design and incidental detail were normal and impersonal. But back of them seemed to be a singular fulness of understanding and an entire devotion to the music for its own sake. From that understanding the ear and the imagination seemed to hear the symphony as the eye and the fancy see a landscape in the clear sunshine and animating air of autumn. And from the intensity of that devotion came passion, power and beauty. They expressed themselves in the grand style, and they kept its noble reticence. The symphony lived its life again, and we that listened entered into it, understood it, and felt it.

The same fulness of understanding and community of feeling seemed to serve Dr. Muck in Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl." It is no fragment of music-drama in spite of its name and its melodic material. It is a little lyric, in which Wagner, happy for once, makes play in tones with intimate moods and fancies. It is delicate musical tracery, all glint and curve, with grace in every undulation. So Dr. Muck played it without the smallest effort to inflate it, with entire absorption in its tonal loveliness, gentle rhapsody, and tender revery. He gave to the listener the musing quiet of its beauty. On the other hand, there is no room for reticence and no hint of quiet in the prelude to "The Mastersingers." The tonal and formal pomp of it stirs; the ardor of it whips; the brilliancy of it mounts almost to explosion. It should sound like a long, glowing, irresistible improvisation. All the appropriate virtues that Dr. Muck had disclosed in the course of the afternoon were in his playing of it, but with all his pace, he hardly gave the due abandon. The conductor might well have vanished in the music; instead he kept it well in hand. So again, with the Byronic vein of much of the "Faust" overture. The music is thick with gloom, sardonic, almost, with struggle. It was the way of the hour, and it was the particular way of Wagner in the forties, "to pile on the agony," even when he was sticking close to an orthodox form. There is no other way nowadays; since we are a long way from Byronic gloom, "the agony" may even be wisely piled a little higher. Dr. Muck, except for one or two flashing phrases, preferred to read the music temperately, and temperance is much too sane a virtue for it. In a word the sheer romantic ardor of the prelude to "The Mastersingers" and the sheer romantic gloom of the "Faust" overture seemed to leave him, and therefore his audience, a little cold. It recalled him three times and with very hearty applause after the symphony. Its breathless silence through the "Siegfreid Idyl" was the finest of responses. Its answer to the two overtures was no more than the applause of courtesy.

H. T. P.

[28]

Mme. Schumann-Heink, the great contralto, will make her only appearance in Brooklyn this season at the Baptist Temple on Thursday evening. She will then come under direction of the Brooklyn Institute, for which she will open the season with a recital, with a programme which will bring out all that is best in her superb voice. The five numbers will contain nineteen selections, ranging in point of time from Handel to Richard Strauss. Three sacred songs will have organ accompaniment, played by Harlan A. Baker, while Miss Helen Schnitzul will be at the piano, being accompanists being those who will play for Mme. Schumann-Heink during her concert engagement. The programme includes:

Aria from "Rinaldo" ..... Handel
Ich liebe Dich ..... } Beethoven
Neue Liebe, Neues Leben ..... }
Litanei ..... } Schubert
Die junge Nonne ..... }
Rose Liebe ..... } Schumann
Frauen Liebe und Leben ..... }
(A cycle of eight songs.)
Seit ich ihn gesehen.
Er der Herrlichste von Allen.
Ich kann's nicht fassen, nicht glauben.
Du Ring an meinem Finger.
Helft mir ihr Schwestern.
Susser Freund Du blickst.
An meinem Herzen, an meiner Brust.
Nun hast Du mir den ersten Schmerz getan.
Three Sacred Songs.
The Fifth Psalm ..... Dvorak
Sei Still ..... Raff
Vater Unser ..... Krebs
Befreit ..... } Richard Strauss
Heimliche Aufforderung ..... }

Through the medium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Brooklyn is this season to make the acquaintance of Dr. Karl Muck, one of the most distinguished conductors in the world, who for 1906-1907 is to be at the head of the splendid organization which each year gives five concerts in this city. In the whole outlook of the coming season thre is no more important event than this. Several of the great conductors who belong to that small group of distinguished men, of which Dr. Muck has had the manuscript for some time studying it and preparing it for rehearsal.

Dr. Karl Muck.

At Dr. Muck's particular request there will be no soloist at the November concert and the soloists for the March concert cannot yet be announced because the plans for this have not yet been completed. For the other two concerts, however, the soloists will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, the young pianist who has had such a successful career, and Professor Willy Hess, who as a violinist, has very few equals in the world.

The dates of the concerts will be, as in the past, Friday evenings—November 9, December 7, January 11, February 22 and March 22 The series are, as usual, under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Purchasers of course tickets of last season will be able to secure the same seats for this season upon application in person or by mail at the box office, 502 Fulton street, at any time during this week.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

CITIZEN

m .....

ress .....

Through the medium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Brooklyn is this season to make the acquaintance of Dr. Karl Muck, one of the most distinguished conductors in the world, who for 1906-1907 is to be at the head of the splendid organization which each year gives five concerts in this city. He is now in the full prime of his life. Of his forty-seven years twenty-five of them have been spent as conductor of the notable operas and orchestras and one of them in getting his training for this work the year after he left Leipsic. Dr. Muck has his degree of Ph. D., which was not a complimentary one, but was secured after three years' hard work in the universities of Heidelberg and Leipsic. While he was at work in the university he was also working with his music. His father, who was a Councillor of State in the Kingdom of Bavaria, was also a talented amateur musician and gave his son his first lessons on the piano and violin and in harmony. As a boy Dr. Muck played quite often in public as a pianist and was a violinist in the orchestra in Wurzburg, his native city. When he went to Leipsic he continued his musical work in the conservatory, and in the same month that he received his university degree he made his debut as a pianist at one of the Gewandhaus concerts, Karl Reinecke conducting.

Determined to be a conductor, his career from that time on has been one of uninterrupted success. Beginning as chorusmaster in Zurich he went from there to be conductor in Salzburg, thence to Brunn, thence to Graz and thence in 1886 to Prague, where he was for six years, when he was called, in the fall of 1892, to be principal conductor in the Royal Opera of Berlin, which post he holds at this time. Known only as a promising conductor in 1892, in the fourteen years since then he has won a reputation in Europe second to none.

The dates of the Boston Symphony concerts here will be as in the past—Friday evenings, Nov. 9, Dec. 7; Jan. 11, Feb. 22, and March 22. The series are as usual under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

At Dr. Muck's particular request there will be no soloist at the November concert, and the soloists for the March concert cannot yet be announced because the plans for this have not yet been completed. For the other three concerts, however, the soloists will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, the young pianist who has had such a successful career; Paderewski, and Professor Willy Hess, who as a violinist, has very few equals in the world.

Purchasers of course tickets of last season will be able to secure the same seats for this season upon application in person or by mail at the box office, 502 Fulton street, at any time during the week of Oct. 15 to 20, inclusive. The opening of the general sale of course tickets will be on Tuesday evening, Oct. 23, at 8 o'clock, at the Art Galleries, 174 Montague street, and will continue at 502 Fulton street on and after Oct. 24, from 8:30 a. m. to 6:30 p. m.

ss .....

The soloists so far announced for the Washington concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are Paderewski, said to be his only appearance here this season; Olga Samaroff, the young pianist who created something of a sensation last season with the Philadelphia Orchestra here and many other places, and Timothee Adamowski, violinist, who has been with the symphony orchestra for many years. Mme. Samaroff is particularly well known in Washington, having lived here for several years before beginning her professional career. She was then Miss Lucy Hickenlooper, granddaughter of the late Gen. Hickenlooper, who died here only a few weeks ago in the home of his daughter, Mrs. Sebring. Miss Elaine Sebring, another granddaughter of the general, is also winning laurels for herself as a musician, and in a smaller way. She has a contralto voice of more than ordinary beauty and sings with unusual artistic finish and temperament.

Mr. Edwin Hughes, one of the best known young pianists and composers in local circles, returned to his home in this city on Tuesday from New York, after having given a recital at Tarrytown-on-the-Hudson on Saturday evening. His program included the Beethoven Polonaise in C major; Schubert-Liszt's "Auf dem Wasser zu Singen," Schumann's "Nachtstuck in F major" and the Paganinni Etude; Chopin's Mazurka in A minor, Etude in A flat major and two waltzes, G flat major and A flat major; the Rachmaninoff Preludo; Schuett's Waltz, "A la bien Aimee," Liszt's "Consolation" and Sixth Rhapsodie Hongroise. Mr. Hughes was in good form and played exceedingly well. He was obliged to play an encore at the end of the program and gave a charming performance of Dvorak's "Humoreque." Mr. Hughes was assisted by Mr. Alfred S. Ely of New York, baritone. The rumor that Mr. Hughes had accepted a flattering offer in the west in an institution of prominence was not well founded, as Mr. Hughes has decided to remain at home again this year.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess .....

Through the medium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Brooklyn is this season to make the acquaintance of Dr. Karl Muck, who for 1906-1907 is to be at the head of the splendid organization which each year gives five concerts in this city. Several of the great conductors have visited America in recent years, but none of them has had the good fortune to implant his ideas of art by means of such an orchestra as the Boston Symphony. Dr. Muck will also have the further advantage of being associated with the Boston Orchestra long enough to get into intimate touch with it, and thus secure the highest and best artistic results. No conductor, however great, can work to much advantage with a strange orchestra with one or two rehearsals, and before Dr. Muck comes to Brooklyn for the first time in November he will have had four weeks constant association with the orchestra, and will be in full sympathy with it, and it will be in full sympathy with him.

Paderewski will be the soloist at the January concert. It has been several years since Paderewski has been heard in Brooklyn with an orchestra, so this in itself will have the savor of novelty. The great pianist comes to America to play seven times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after which he will return to Europe to fulfil his engagements on that side of the ocean. One of his seven appearances with the orchestra will be in Brooklyn and the others in Boston, Manhattan, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. He is coming to this country primarily to hear for the first time the symphony which he has written, it having been understood long ago when he first began working on it that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would give it to the world. It is possible that this work will be included in the programme of this January concert. Dr. Muck has had the manuscript for some time studying it and preparing it for rehearsal.

At Dr. Muck's particular request there will be no soloist at the November concert, and the soloists for the March concert cannot yet be announced because the plans for this have not yet been completed. For the other two concerts, however, the soloists will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, the young pianist who has had such a successful career, and Prof. Willy Hess, concertmaster of the orchestra.

The dates of the concerts will be as in the past, Friday evenings, Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 22 and March 22. The series are as usual under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Purchasers of course tickets of last season will be able to secure the same seats for this season upon application in person or by mail at the box office, 502 Fulton street, at any time during the week of Oct. 15 to 20, inclusive. The opening of the general sale of course tickets will be on Tuesday evening, Oct. 23, at 8 o'clock, at the Art Galleries, 174 Montague street, and will continue at 502 Fulton street on and after Oct. 24 from 8:30 A. M. to 6:30 P. M.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n .....

ress .....

e .....

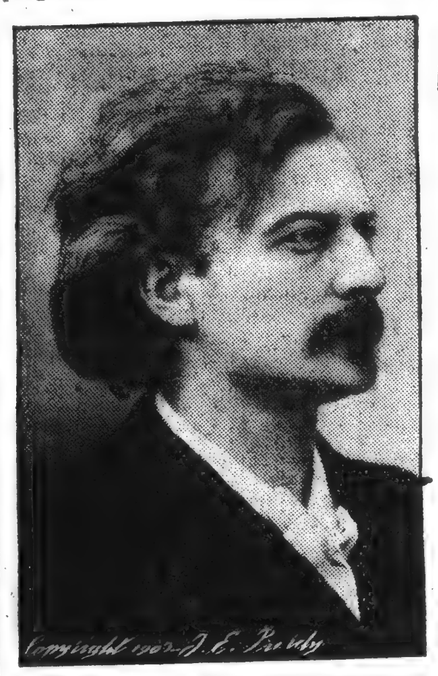
The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Rehearsals of the first programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began in Symphony Hall, under Dr. Karl Muck, last Monday, and the first public rehearsal and concert took place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, respectively. Dr. Muck's introductory programme was Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, No. 5; Wagner's "A Faust Overture," Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and his Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg." Interest in the orchestra in Boston is greater this year than it has ever been before, as indicated in a substantial manner by the reecipts from the auction sales for the season.

Dr. Muck brought with him to America the score of Paderewski's new symphony, which is to have its first appearance in Boston on January 4 and 5. In the next week it will be played in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. It is said to be a work very modern in tone and of great orchestral brilliancy, fairly bristling with technical difficulties. Paderewski will be present to hear it played, for he is to be the soloist with the Boston band on that occasion.

Walter N. Dietrich, teacher and pianist, has completed his first book on piano technique. Mr. Dietrich's careful study of technical problems has resulted in his finding many simple exercises to facilitate those seemingly insurmountable difficulties which so frequently arise with many piano students.

Pianiste Germaine Schnitzer has postponed the opening of her forthcoming American tour until January next, because of the sudden death of her fatner at Berlin. European critics have wellnigh exhausted their stock of laudatory adjectives in describing the impressions produced by Mlle. Schnitzer's playing. She is youthful and beautiful, moreover—no slight artistic asset in these days of exigent audiences.



Paderewski.

SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 14, 1906

MUCK OVATION AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

The first concert of the 26th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at Symphony Hall. Dr. Karl Muck, the new director, appeared for the first time, and this was the programme, without a soloist:

Symphony No. 5, op. 67 ..... Beethoven
"Faust" overture, Siegfried Idyl and prelude to "Die Meistersinger" ..... Wagner

Naturally there was great interest in Dr. Muck, the new director, and upon his entrance he was given an immense ovation.

On the stage he appears quiet and unassuming; there is an absence of mannerisms, nothing to excite the "gallery," so to speak. Yet from the first there was something that indicated that here was a virtuoso-musician, not simply a conductor who could impress with freak interpretations or spectacular demonstrations of any sort.

He directed always with authority, surety and ease of manner. The programme included only familiar numbers, yet each of these was interpreted so as to appear practically new. Especially so was the reading of the Beethoven symphony, which, though in the classic spirit, was never old-fashioned or academic; it was strong, virile, modern in every way.

Seldom, if ever, has this familiar symphony impressed so strongly. The Wagner numbers were also given in admirable manner, especially the "Siegfried Idyl," and Dr. Muck received another ovation and recalls at the close of the concert. He has ceraintly "made good" from the beginning, and one is confident in saying that the coming Symphony season will be one of especial interest. Mr. Hess will be the soloist at the rehearsal and concert this coming week in the ninth violin concerto by Spohr. There will also be symphonies by Haydn and Mozart, and a suite by Bach—a severely classic programme all through.

[29]

MUCK WINS SYMPHONY HEARTS

Drawn by Boston American staff artist.
"MONSIEUR LE DIRECTEUR" MUCK IN ACTION.

New Orchestra Leader Captivates Great Throng at First Concert by Charm of Manner and Ability.

By Kent Perkins.

The King is dead! Long live the King!

It seemed in Symphony Hall last night, when the great assemblage of Boston's fashion and music culture showered its plaudits on Dr. Carl Muck, the new king of the Symphony baton, that only a few minutes before the hall was ringing with the farewell tributes to the departing Gericke.

If there were any lingering regrets for the vanished monarch, they were wholly submerged by the flood of welcome that was poured upon the new ruler.

Coming straight from Berlin and Bayreuth, with the glamor of the Kaiser's patronage upon him, Dr. Muck was the centre of chief interest. The music was secondary—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," "Faust" overture and "Meistersinger" prelude. That was all familiar. But the personality of the new conductor was something new. That was the thing to think about.

2,500 Question Marks.

As every seat in the hall was occupied, there were something like 2,500 human interrogation points waiting for the Herr Doctor, when the bell rang and the moment of the twenty-sixth Symphony season's opening was at hand. Dr. Muck appeared, walked with quick, springy step across the stage to his stand, took his baton and turned to bow his acknowledgment of the cordial applause that greeted him.

You would never suspect by any outward sign that here was the favorite of the German Emperor, the most famous orchestra conductor of Europe, of the [illegible] with whom one associates [illegible] and [illegible] and [illegible] ease and grace; of artistic attainment; of savoir faire; of restrained, fully-mastered, skilfully directed nervous energy—the very figure of a gentlemanly, scholarly, musician who knew himself and his work thoroughly. There was no humbleness, no assertiveness—just modest consciousness of power.

These were the characteristics of all his efforts last night—superb poise, repose that might be called "aristocratic," vitalizing energy always ready, always well in hand, vividness of imagination, clearness of thought and lively sensitiveness to the intent of the composer.

Dr. Muck led; he did not command. The splendid orchestra rejoiced to follow him with enthusiastic loyalty. His few easy gestures, gently made, were mere suggestions, but were given with an authority that could not be questioned.

Orchestra Responsive

Playing upon the wonderful instrument of the Symphony Orchestra, the leader sought for more vivid contrasts than we have been accustomed to, a gentler touch where softness and pure beauty of tone are called for, a mightier swell of sound where great emphasis is required, and he obtained results with a readiness and a responsiveness that was delightful.

The greater sharpness of contrast and more vitalized life in expression were produced with no suddenness or shock and with entire lack of sensationalism. They seemed to flow from the baton of Dr. Muck in quick, energizing electric waves or to slip from the illuminating gestures of his ever ready left hand straight to the instruments of the players.

At the close of the Symphony the new leader was recalled repeatedly, amid great applause and shouts of "Bravo!" He bowed modestly. The nature of the man was revealed when he waved the plaudits [illegible] credit is theirs," he said

FETCHING GOWNS NOTABLE AT SYMPHONY'S OPENING

Symphony, Boston's best beloved, called out the first gathering of the elect this season, last night, and the lobby of Symphony Hall echoed to the merry greetings and gay chatter of the wanderers. It is considered quite the thing to attend the opening concert, and those traveling abroad or touring in the mountains timed their return in order to be present.

The audience last night was larger and more fashionable than on any opening night for many seasons.

Beautifully gowned women predominated in the audience, and among the most notable were Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, in black lace over black satin, relieved by touches of white lace on the bodice, and a small black toque trimmed with black plumes.

Mrs. Gardner Misses Opening.

Mrs. Gardner, who is traveling in Europe, was missed from her accustomed seat in the balcony, which was occupied by Miss Little, who wore a light olive green gown, with yoke of white lace and deep girdle of green velvet.

Mrs. Charles H. Bond, of Commonwealth avenue, was radiant in a gown of beige chiffon cloth.

Mrs. Harold Peabody, one of Boston's new young matrons, who only recently returned from her honeymoon, was in light blue chiffon over light blue silk, and a vastly becoming hat of blue felt of the same shade, trimmed with Parisian pink roses under the brim, and white plumes about the crown.

Miss Emily Sargent, looking brown and happy after her Summer's outing, was in a becoming gown of light blue cloth, trimmed with heavy white lace. Her hat was of the same shade, trimmed with white plumes. Mrs. Sargent was in black lace and wore a long black wrap.

Mrs. William D. Sohier was accompanied by her beautiful daughter, Alice, who wore a gown of white lace and black hat trimmed [illegible]

Beautiful Gowns Feature.

Miss Juliet Higginson was in white chiffon silk with Persian trimmings, and black hat trimmed with sweeping shaded rose plume.

Mrs. George Stoddard was in white lace over which she wore a long Alice blue wrap. Mrs. Nathan Matthews wore a becoming frock of blue chiffon cloth, and a small black hat trimmed with one large blue cloth. Mrs. Frederick L. Dabney in Gordon Abbott, was in black lace with touches of light blue.

Mrs. Bayard Thayer, who came up from her country house for the occasion, was in black. Mrs. Boylston Beal was in dark blue cloth. Mrs. rederick L. Dabney in light lavender chiffon. Miss Priscilla Stackpole in gray cloth. Mrs. Oliver Ames in black. Mrs. Harry Pratt McKean in light brown and Mrs. George L. Mumford in dark gray chiffon cloth.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK SUN
n ress
e
OCT 14 1904

Rehearsals of the first programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began in Symphony Hall under Dr. Karl Muck last Monday, October 3, and the first public rehearsal and concert took place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively. Dr. Muck's introductory programme was Beethoven's Symphony in C minor No. 5, Wagner's "A Faust Overture," Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and his prelude to "The Meistersinger of Nuremberg." Interest in the orchestra in Boston is greater this year than it has ever been before, this having been proved in a substantial manner by the receipts from the auction sales for the season. The conviction steadily grows that in securing Dr. Muck the Boston Symphony Orchestra has brought to this country a man of all men fitted to be at its head.

m
RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, ress
e

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Five Monday Evening Concerts at Academy of Music.

PADEREWSKI'S APPEARANCE

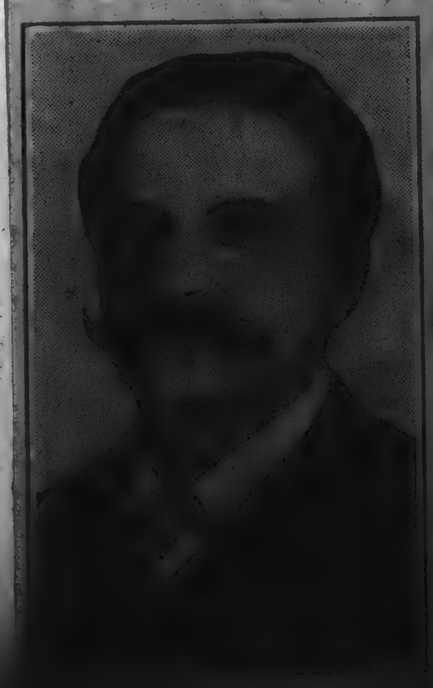
No Soloist at the Opening Next Month—Moris Rosenthal and Willy Hess to Be Heard With the Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the twenty-second season in Philadelphia of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open to-morrow morning at Miss Harris' ticket office, No. 1115 Chestnut street. Five Monday evening concerts will be given, on November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18, in the Academy of Music.

The season promises to be of special interest because of the new director, Dr. Karl Muck, who for the past 14 years has been one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

Although several efforts had been made in recent years to induce Dr. Muck to come to America, none succeeded until C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony made the request.

Muck, who is a Bavarian by birth, received his title of "Doctor" from the University of Leipsic in 1880. In the same month he made his debut in Leipsic as a pianist. He had, however, no thought of a career as a pianist, having decided to make conducting his life work. His first post was as chorus master at Zurich. Then, in succession he was the conductor at Salzburg, Brun and Graz, the first recognition of his talent coming when he was appointed in 1886 conductor of the German Opera at Prague and, at the same time, conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra in the same city. There he remained for six years, giving up that post for the one at the Royal Opera in Berlin. By his many "guest" appearances as orchestral and operatic conductor in Europe, by his post of conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra and by his close connection with Bayreuth where in the last four festivals he was conductor of "Parsifal," he won an enviable reputation.



While Dr. Muck, himself, may fairly be regarded as making the Philadelphia concerts of the Boston Symphony attractive, the management has engaged a notable list of soloists. Foremost is Paderewski, whose only appearance in Philadelphia will be with the orchestra on January 7. Paderewski comes to this country for three weeks, in which time he will make seven appearances with the orchestra and will then return to Europe for a long tournee there. It has been several years since this greatest of pianists was heard in Philadelphia with an orchestra. It is probable that at this concert a new symphony by Paderewski will be played.

At the December concert the soloist will be Moriz Rosenthal, who is coming to America after eight years' absence to make an extensive tour.

At Dr. Muck's special request there will be no soloist at his introductory concert here on November 3, and he has arranged a purely orchestral program which does not admit of the presence of a soloist. The soloist at the February concert will be Professor Willy Hess, who had his debut here at the first concert in the fall of 1904. Professor Hess purposes introducing this year a new concerto for violin by Frederic d'Erlanger.

The soloist for the last concert is not announced at this time because Dr. Muck has some special plans for the last monthly trip of the orchestra.

The orchestra returns this year without any change in its personnel. It will bring to Philadelphia its full strength of 96 men.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA
ess
OCT 14 1904

We publish today portraits of three of the soloists who will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts to be given at the Academy of Music during the coming season. The first concert, on November 5, will be without a soloist, the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, having arranged for his first appearance a purely orchestral programme. The soloist for the final concert of the season is not announced at this time, as Doctor Muck has not completed his plans for the last monthly tour of the orchestra. The three soloists whose names are given are of the highest importance. Moriz Rosenthal, one of the foremost living pianists, will play at the concert on December 9, this being his first appearance here this season. Paderewski, who plays on January 7, returns after several years' absence. This will be his only appearance in Philadelphia, his flying visit in this country being brief—but three weeks—after which he will return to Europe for a long tournee. It is expected that the feature of the January concert will be a new symphony by Paderewski, a work which has been highly praised by those who have seen it in manuscript. Willy Hess, the concertmaster, will be the soloist on February 18 when he will introduce a new concerto for the violin by Frederic d'Erlanger. The orchestra itself will return without any change in its personnel. It will bring to Philadelphia its full complement of [illegible]

[30]

DR. MUCK WINS SYMPHONY HEARTS

Drawn by Boston American staff artist.

"MONSIEUR LE DIRECTEUR" MUCK IN ACTION.

New Orchestra Leader Captivates Great Throng at First Concert by Charm of Manner and Ability.

By Kent Perkins.

The King is dead! Long live the King!

It seemed in Symphony Hall last night, when the great assemblage of Boston's fashion and music culture showered its plaudits on Dr. Carl Muck, the new king of the Symphony baton, that only a few minutes before the hall was ringing with the farewell tributes to the departing Gericke.

If there were any lingering regrets for the vanished monarch, they were wholly submerged by the flood of welcome that was poured upon the new ruler.

Coming straight from Berlin and Bayreuth, with the glamor of the Kaiser's patronage upon him, Dr. Muck was the centre of chief interest. The music was secondary—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," "Faust" overture and "Meistersinger" prelude. That was all familiar. But the personality of the new conductor was something new. That was the thing to think about.

2,500 Question Marks.

As every seat in the hall was occupied, there were something like 2,500 human interrogation points waiting for the Herr Doctor, when the bell rang and the moment of the twenty-sixth Symphony season's opening was at hand. Dr. Muck appeared, walked with quick, springy step across the stage to his stand, took his baton and turned to bow his acknowledgment of the cordial applause that greeted him.

You would never suspect by any outward sign that here was the favorite of the German Emperor, the most famous orchestra conductor of Europe, of the "virtuoso" sort, with whom one associates long, flying hair and fearsome gyrations of arms and head and, sometimes even, of legs.

"A Gentleman and a Scholar."

Of slight, pleasing figure and medium height, Dr. Muck was the embodiment of ease and grace; of artistic attainment; of savoir faire; of restrained, fully-mastered, skilfully directed nervous energy—the very figure of a gentlemanly, scholarly, musician who knew himself and his work thoroughly. There was no humbleness, no assertiveness—just modest consciousness of power.

These were the characteristics of all his efforts last night—superb poise, repose that might be called "aristocratic," vitalizing energy always ready, always well in hand, vividness of imagination, clearness of thought and lively sensitiveness to the intent of the composer.

Dr. Muck led; he did not command. The splendid orchestra rejoiced to follow him with enthusiastic loyalty. His few easy gestures, gently made, were mere suggestions, but were given with an authority that could not be questioned.

Orchestra Responsive

Playing upon the wonderful instrument of the Symphony Orchestra, the leader sought for more vivid contrasts than we have been accustomed to, a gentler touch where softness and pure beauty of tone are called for, a mightier swell of sound where great emphasis is required, and he obtained results with a readiness and a responsiveness that was delightful.

The greater sharpness of contrast and more vitalized life in expression were produced with no suddenness or shock and with entire lack of sensationalism. They seemed to flow from the baton of Dr. Muck in quick, energizing electric waves or to slip from the illuminating gestures of his ever ready left hand straight to the instruments of the players.

At the close of the Symphony the new leader was recalled repeatedly, amid great applause and shouts of "Bravo!" He bowed modestly. The nature of the man was revealed when he waved the plaudits of the people from himself to the standing orchestra. "The credit is theirs," he said without speaking.

And that was one of the main reasons for the feeling that pervaded the throng: "The King is dead! Long live the King!"

FETCHING GOWNS NOTABLE AT SYMPHONY'S OPENING

Symphony, Boston's best beloved, called out the first gathering of the elect this season, last night, and the lobby of Symphony Hall echoed to the merry greetings and gay chatter of the wanderers. It is considered quite the thing to attend the opening concert, and those traveling abroad or touring in the mountains timed their return in order to be present.

The audience last night was larger and more fashionable than on any opening night for many seasons.

Beautifully gowned women predominated in the audience, and among the most notable were Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, in black lace over black satin, relieved by touches of white lace on the bodice, and a small black toque trimmed with black plumes.

Mrs. Gardner Misses Opening.

Mrs. Gardner, who is traveling in Europe, was missed from her accustomed seat in the balcony, which was occupied by Miss Little, who wore a light olive green gown, with yoke of white lace and deep girdle of green velvet.

Mrs. Charles H. Bond, of Commonwealth avenue, was radiant in a gown of beige chiffon cloth.

Mrs. Harold Peabody, one of Boston's new young matrons, who only recently returned from her honeymoon, was in light blue chiffon over light blue silk, and a vastly becoming hat of blue felt of the same shade, trimmed with Parisian pink roses under the brim, and white plumes about the crown.

Miss Emily Sargent, looking brown and happy after her Summer's outing, was in a becoming gown of light blue cloth, trimmed with heavy white lace. Her hat was of the same shade, trimmed with white plumes. Mrs. Sargent was in black lace and wore a long black wrap.

Mrs. William D. Sohier was accompanied by her beautiful daughter, Alice, who wore a gown of white lace, and black hat trimmed with...

Beautiful Gowns Feature.

Miss Juliet Higginson was in white chiffon silk with Persian trimmings, and black hat trimmed with sweeping shaded rose plume.

Mrs. George Stoddard was in white lace over which she wore a long Alice blue wrap. Mrs. Nathan Matthews wore a becoming frock of blue chiffon cloth, and a small black hat trimmed with one large blue cloth; Mrs. Frederick L. Dabney in Gordon Abbott was in black lace with touches of light blue.

Mrs. Bayard Thayer, who came up from her country house for the occasion, was in black. Mrs. Boylston Beal was in dark blue cloth. Mrs. rederick L. Dabney in light lavender chiffon, Miss Priscilla Stackpole in gray cloth, Mrs. Oliver Ames in black, Mrs. Harry Pratt McKean in light brown and Mrs. George L. Mumford in dark gray chiffon cloth.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n

ress

e

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Five Monday Evening Concerts at Academy of Music.

PADEREWSKI'S APPEARANCE

No Soloist at the Opening Next Month—Moriz Rosenthal and Willy Hess to Be Heard With the Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the twenty-second season in Philadelphia of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open to-morrow morning at Miss Harris' ticket office, No. 1115 Chestnut street. Five Monday evening concerts will be given, on November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18, in the Academy of Music.

The season promises to be of special interest because of the new director, Dr. Karl Muck, who for the past 14 years has been one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

Although several efforts had been made in recent years to induce Dr. Muck to come to America, none succeeded until C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony made the request.

Muck, who is a Bavarian by birth, received his title of "Doctor" from the University of Leipsic in 1880. In the same month he made his debut in Leipsic as a pianist. He had, however, no thought of a career as a pianist, having decided to make conducting his life work. His first post was as chorus master at Zurich. Then, in succession he was the conductor at Salzburg, Brun and Graz, the first recognition of his talent coming when he was appointed in 1886 conductor of the German Opera at Prague and, at the same time, conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra in the same city. There he remained for six years, giving up that post for the one at the Royal Opera in Berlin. By his many "guest" appearances as orchestral and operatic conductor in Europe, by his post of conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra and by his close connection with Bayreuth where in the last four festivals he was conductor of "Parsifal," he won an enviable reputation.

WILLY HESS.

While Dr. Muck, himself, may fairly be regarded as making the Philadelphia concerts of the Boston Symphony attractive, the management has engaged a notable list of soloists. Foremost is Paderewski, whose only appearance in Philadelphia will be with the orchestra on January 7. Paderewski comes to this country for three weeks, in which time he will make seven appearances with the orchestra and will then return to Europe for a long tournee there. It has been several years since this greatest of pianists was heard in Philadelphia with an orchestra. It is probable that at this concert a new symphony by Paderewski will be played.

At the December concert the soloist will be Moriz Rosenthal, who is coming to America after eight years' absence to make an extensive tour.

At Dr. Muck's special request there will be no soloist at his introductory concert here on November 3, and he has arranged a purely orchestral program which does not admit of the presence of a soloist. The soloist at the February concert will be Professor Willy Hess, who had his debut here at the first concert in the fall of 1904. Professor Hess purposes introducing this year a new concerto for violin by Frederic d'Erlanger.

The soloist for the last concert is not announced at this time because Dr. Muck has some special plans for the last monthly trip of the orchestra.

The orchestra returns this year without any change in its personnel. It will bring to Philadelphia its full strength of 96 men.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

1

ess

We publish today portraits of three of the soloists who will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts to be given at the Academy of Music during the coming season. The first concert, on November 5, will be without a soloist, the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, having arranged for his first appearance a purely orchestral programme. The soloist for the final concert of the season is not announced at this time, as Doctor Muck has not completed his plans for the last monthly tour of the orchestra. The three soloists whose names are given are of the highest importance. Moriz Rosenthal, one of the foremost living pianists, will play at the concert on December 3, this being his first appearance here this season. Paderewski, who plays on January 7, returns after several years' absence. This will be his only appearance in Philadelphia, his flying visit in this country being brief—but three weeks—after which he will return to Europe for a long tournee. It is expected that the feature of the January concert will be a new symphony by Paderewski, a work which has been highly praised by those who have seen it in manuscript. Willy Hess, the concertmaster, will be the soloist on February 18, when he will introduce a new concerto for the violin by Frederic d'Erlanger. The orchestra itself will return without any change in its personnel. It will bring to Philadelphia its full strength of ninety-six men. The sale of season tickets for the twenty-second season in Philadelphia will open tomorrow morning.

[30]

Rehearsals of the first programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began in Symphony Hall under Dr. Karl Muck last Monday, October 8, and the first public rehearsal and concert took place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively. Dr. Muck's introductory programme was Beethoven's Symphony in C minor No. 5, Wagner's "A Faust Overture," Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and his prelude to "The Mastersinger of Nuremberg." Interest in the orchestra in Boston is greater this year than it has ever been before, this having been proved in a substantial manner by the receipts from the auction sales for the season. The conviction steadily grows that in securing Dr. Muck the Boston Symphony Orchestra has brought to this country a man of all men fitted to be at its head.

SKETCH OF DR. KARL MUCK, CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

DR. MUCK'S LEADING MASTERLY

NOTABLE PLAYING OF BEETHOVEN'S 5TH

Large Part of Programme Also Devoted to Wagner Numbers.

The first concert of the 26th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor, made his first appearance at an evening concert in America.

The Herald described yesterday morning the personal bearing of Dr. Muck as a conductor at the public rehearsal of the day before. We have now to do with the character of the programme and the performance.

The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 5, C minor.....Beethoven
A "Faust" overture.....Wagner
A Siegfried Idyl.....Wagner
Prelude to the "Mastersingers of Nuremberg".....Wagner

A conductor who leads, for the first time in a strange city, an orchestra with which he has little acquaintance, naturally chooses compositions to make, as he fondly thinks, a strong impression. Mr. Nikisch's first programme in 1889 was as follows: Prelude to "The Mastersingers"; Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus"; entr'acte from ballet music of Schubert's "Rosamunde"; Schumann's symphony in D minor. Mr. Paur's first programme in 1893, included Beethoven's fifth symphony, Tschaikowsky's serenade in C major, for strings; Wagner's overture to "Tannhaeuser." Mr. Gericke, entering on his second term in 1898, chose the overture to "Euryanthe"; Bach's prelude, Adagio and Gavotte for strings; Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn; and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

It will be seen that three conductors in the history of the orchestra chose Beethoven's fifth symphony for their first appearance. There are house decorators who say to the mistress, sorely perplexed: "You can't go wrong with yellow." There are conductors who believe this of the fifth symphony. The immortal work will make its way if the conductor only lets it alone, if he is not afire with the longing to show his own originality.

BY PHILIP HALE.

Dr. Muck did not attempt to be sensational in his interpretation. His treatment of the much discussed initial motive reassured those who were timorous, fearing lest their Beethoven might be Wagnerized. He did not indulge in gross liberties to prove his affection. But his interpretation was conspicuous for clarity, proportion and rhythmic flow. The purely melodic passages were sung as by an accomplished and emotional singer. When there were such passages for solo instruments the players were allowed their liberty. The dynamic gradations of tone were finely observed and climaxes were skilfully prepared without too deliberate contrivance. The andante which is hurried by some for fear of sentimentalism was nobly sung.

The mysterious pages that connect the scherzo with the finale were effective and the performance of the finale itself was memorable. Too often the interest of the hearer flags after the first triumphal burst, and there is the thought of inability to sustain the musical enthusiasm at the high pitch. Last night the peroration was overwhelming and all that is in the magnificent finale led up to it.

Dr. Muck is reputed to be one of the leading conductors of Wagner's music dramas; he is said to have few rivals. It was natural that he should put on the first programme compositions by Wagner. Although only the prelude to the "Mastersingers" came from the opera house, the "Faust" overture is dramatic in both the earlier and the later operatic spirit of the composer. It is not necessary to speak at length of the familiar pieces. Criticism of the performance of them would be chiefly glowing eulogy. It was not the conductor's fault that the "Sieg-

FAVORITE WAR HORSES RIDDEN BY NEW LEADER

Strong Tone Gradations Noted Feature of the First Evening Concert.

fried Idyl" seemed intolerably long-winded and too often idle chatter. Garrulity was the besetting sin of Wagner in his music dramas, his literary work, his letters and his conversation.

The performance of the "Faust" overture was the crowning glory of a concert which, with the exception just noted, was of engrossing interest. Never has the middle section seemed more beautiful. Never has the overture seemed so firmly knit and poetically logical. The prelude to the "Mastersingers" was taken at a little faster pace than that to which we have been accustomed, but the breadth and the square-toed dignity were preserved; the lyrical portions were read with peculiar charm; and there was a spirit, a vitality, a gusto that carried everything before it.

The orchestral performance was far superior to that at the public rehearsal. That players who have been scattered during the summer and have had only a few rehearsals with a new conductor whose methods of expression are necessarily unfamiliar should so often give evidences of consummate artistry is a proof of the rare technical proficiency of the organization. In a few weeks the conductor and the men will undoubtedly understand each other perfectly and be in full sympathy.

Dr. Muck was greeted warmly and there was a steady crescendo of spontaneous applause which culminated in genuine enthusiasm.

The programme of the concert this week will be as follows: Bach's suite in B minor for flute and strings (von Buelow's edition); Haydn's symphony in G major (B. & H., No. 13); Spohr's violin concerto in D minor, No. 9 (Mr. Willy Hess); Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony.

From N Y

Address

MUSIC NOTES.

The season sale of tickets for the two series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall during the coming winter will open at the box office of Carnegie Hall to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock.

More than ordinary interest is attached to the Boston Symphony concerts this season, due to the presence of Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, who has come to America on a year's leave of absence from the Royal Opera of that city to be the conductor of Boston's orchestra. It is thirteen years since the Boston Symphony brought a new conductor to New York—if the visit, last year, of Vincent d'Indy be excepted—the last one having been Emil Paur, now of the Pittsburg orchestra. When the orchestra first came to this city to give a concert in Steinway Hall, Mr. Gericke, then in his first term of service, was at its head. During the last three years of Mr. Gericke's first engagement the orchestra became firmly established in the affections of New York's music lovers, and under Nikisch, Paur, and again Gericke, its patronage here has grown steadily until, indeed, New York has come to regard it as partly its own.

Dr. Muck comes to this country with a splendid reputation won in a career of twenty-six years in some of the most exacting posts of Europe. Beginning at the bottom round of the ladder, as chorus master in the Opera in Zürich, his advancement was so rapid that in twelve years he was appointed one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera in Berlin, which post he now holds.

The engagement of Dr. Muck is to a certain extent a radical departure in the policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the past the plan has been to take a man who was comparatively unknown. Henschel, the first conductor, was absolutely unknown in that capacity when he took charge of the orchestra in 1881. Gericke, when he first came to America, had been a subordinate in the Vienna Opera House, while Nikisch and Paur, coming from the Municipal Theatre of Leipsic, were both unknown men. Curiously enough, all of them had been identified almost entirely with opera

To be sure, when Nikisch left in the spring of 1893, Hans Richter was engaged, and when he broke the contract with Mr. Higginson he wrote urgently to Dr. Muck asking him to come instead. Had this happened Dr. Muck would have been another comparatively unknown man to take charge of the orchestra. But now, thirteen years later, he comes to America, a member of that small group of men who have raised the position of the conductor to a higher plane than it has ever held before.

There will be no soloist at the November concert in New York, and for the March concerts no soloists are yet announced, since Dr. Muck has not yet determined what he will do on his last visit to this city. But the soloists who are announced are unusually strong, four pianists and two violinists. The pianists are Paderewski, Rosenthal, Gabrilowitsch and Olga Samaroff. The violinists are Willy Hess and Timothée Adamowski.

Paderewski will play only once in New York next winter, and that will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He comes to this country for three weeks, in which time he will play seven concerts with the Boston Symphony. Rosenthal will make his first appearance with orchestra in New York with the Boston Symphony. Gabrilowitsch has always been a favorite here, and Olga Samaroff is rapidly establishing herself as one of the most brilliant of our pianists. Neither Willy Hess nor Timothée Adamowski needs introduction to Boston Symphony audiences in New York. Both are among those who make "the virtuosi orchestra an orchestra of virtuosi."

Announcements of novelties will be made later.

The following biographical data concerning Dr. Muck are authoritative, having been supplied by Dr. Muck himself. He was born on October 22, 1859, in Würzburg, Germany, the son of Dr. J. Muck, a councillor of the kingdom of Bavaria. He began the study of the violin, piano and counterpoint under his father, who was a talented musician, continuing it later in the Gymnasium. At the age of eleven he began to appear in public as a pianist, generally in chamber music, and later played the violin in a symphony orchestra. The year of 1876 he spent at the University of Heidelberg, whence he went to Leipsic, where he stayed two years working for his degree in philosophy, classical philology and musical history, at the same time working in the Leipsic Conservatory under Ernst Friedrich Richter and Karl Reinecke. He made his debut as a pianist in the Leipsic Gewandhaus in 1880, the same year receiving his degree of Ph. D. His subsequent career has been as follows: 1880-'81, chorus master in the Municipal Theatre in Zürich; 1881-'82, conductor at Salzburg, Austria; 1882-'84, conductor of opera at Brünn, Austria; 1884-'86, conductor of opera at Graz, Austria, at the same time he was conducting the Styrian Musikverein; 1886-'92, conductor of the German Opera at Prague and conductor of the Philharmonic concerts in the same city; 1889, conductor of Angelo Neumann's company, which gave the first performances in Russia of Wagner's "Ring"; 1891, conductor of Angelo Neumann's company at the Lessing Theatre, Berlin; 1892-1906, principal conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin. He has been the director of the oratorio concerts of the Royal Opera chorus and since 1894 has been the conductor of the Schleswig Music Festival. As "Guest Conductor" he has appeared in St. Petersburg and Moscow; at the Philharmonic concerts in Bremen, where in 1895 he gave a scenic production of Rubinstein's "Christus"; at the Philharmonic concerts in Copenhagen; at the royal concerts in Madrid; at the Philharmonic concerts in Paris; at the royal concerts in Budapest, and at the Philharmonic concerts and Royal Opera in London. In 1901, 1902, 1904 and 1906 he conducted all the performances of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth. For the last three seasons he has been one of the conductors of the Vienna Philharmonic concerts, and was to have conducted all of them in the winter of 1906-'07 had he not come to America.

[31]

Quartets & Symphony ... Longy Club and Other Societies

The sale of season tickets for the six concerts of the Boston Symphony quartet in Chickering Hall this winter will open at the box office of Symphony Hall on Monday morning, Oct. 23. The dates of the concerts are Monday evening, Oct. 28, Nov. 18, Dec. 17, Jan. 21, Feb. 25 and April 1. The assisting artists will be Dr. Muck, Messrs. Gabrilowitsch, Gebhard, Heinham, Tucker and others. Mr. Gebhard will assist at the first concert, when the programme will be Suk's quartet in B flat major, opus 11, which is a novelty; Beethoven's trio in C minor, opus 9, No. 3, and Cesar Franck's quintet in F minor.

The usual series of three concerts will be given by the Longy Club in Boston this winter, in Potter Hall, on Wednesday evenings, Nov. 14, Jan. 2 and Feb. 6. Subscriptions for the series may now be sent to C. A. Ellis, Symphony Hall. The price of subscription will be the same as last year.

Mme. Olga Samaroff will give a piano recital in Chickering Hall Monday afternoon, Nov. 5.

Mr. Arthur Whiting will demonstrate his theory of the use of the damper piano pedal in a lecture recital in Chickering Hall Oct. 24. He has analyzed and applied to the piano certain principles long ago accepted by writers of orchestral music. In expostion of his theory, Mr. Whiting will play works by early and modern composers.

The Choral Art Society of Boston, Mr. Wallace Goodrich, conductor, will sing twice this season: first in Jordan Hall, Thursday evening, Dec. 13, and then in Trinity Church in March. Two important changes in the manner of subscription are to be noted. A subscription will be for a single ticket, and not for the season. Seats will be reserved for both evenings and allotted in the order of receipt of subscription. Subscription lists will open Monday, Oct. 22. The programme of the first evening will include groups of old Italian madrigals, old French noels and chansons harmonized by Gevaert; chorals by Bach; a new and short work by Loeffler for eight part mixed chorus without accompaniment; choruses by Brahms for female voices with accompaniment of harp and horns; motet by Tschaikowsky. The programme of the second evening will be made up exclusively of church music appropriate to Lent, and it will include Allegri's Miserere and settings of portions of Holy Week offices.

Handel and Haydn, Mr. Mollenhauer conductor, will give this season the customary performances of the "Messiah." On Feb. 17 it will sing Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," with the assistance of Mme. Schumann-Heink and Mr. de Gogorza; on Easter Sunday Handel's "Belshazzar." There will be a performance of "Elijah" on Sunday, Nov. 4, for the benefit of the Handel and Haydn building fund, and the solo singers will be Mrs. Genevieve Wilson, Mrs. Bertha Child, Mr. Edward Johnson, Mr. Miles.

The Hoffmann Quartet will give concerts of its fifth season in Potter Hall on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 27, Jan. 1, March 5. The programmes will be made up of works by Beethoven, Converse, Dubois, Haydn, R. Strauss, Schumann, Hugo Wolf and others. The soloists will be announced soon.

Mr. Homer Humphrey of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music will give an organ recital in Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening, when he will play pieces by Bach, Franck, Saint-Saens, Schumann, Widor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give this year six concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday evenings, Oct. 25, Dec. 13, Jan. 24, Feb. 28, April 4 and May 2. This year the time of beginning the concerts will be 8 o'clock. The soloists will be Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto; Miss Lillia Snelling, contralto; Mme. Antoinette Szumowska, pianist; Miss Olga Radecki, pianist; Mr. Willy Hess, violinist. The price of season tickets for the six concerts is $5. The sale will be conducted according to the plan used last year; subscribers of last season may secure the same seats by making application to George H. Kent, on or before next Thursday, Oct. 18. The unclaimed seats will be offered for sale at the University Book Store, Harvard Square, Cambridge, on Saturday morning, Oct. 20.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—OCTOBER 13, 1907.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

First of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

Program Splendidly Interpreted Under Dr Muck's Direction.

Recitals and Other Events of the Week.

Dr Carl Muck, on leave given by the German emperor from the Royal opera house in Berlin, last night opened the 28th season of the Boston symphony orchestra, making his first appearance on the conductor's stand in this city. His program—Beethoven's No. 5 symphony, Wagner's "Faust" overture, "Siegfried idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," was not one which made for the display of individuality, and except for a sharper attack, a bolder reading, a more explosive enunciation, than is often given, especially by the polite traditions of the Boston symphony orchestra, Dr Muck's performance was not very markedly different from those of preceding conductors. Two of the Wagner numbers are comparatively unfamiliar; none of the music is heard for the first time here.

Dr Muck's conducting is somewhat peculiar; none of the broad, sweeping strokes of the baton which characterized Mr Gericke; he beats time from his elbow, often poking his baton at the players. He beats with swift strokes, vehement or light, but describing an astonishingly small arc, and illustrated last night what he said in an interview shortly after landing, that he believes a good conductor needs no stick. During the finale of the Beethoven number, when the time and the volume ran along evenly in the score, he stopped beating altogether, and stood for some 20 bars motionless, leaning the tip of his stick on the open score before him. Occasionally the vehemence of his beating caused him to beat with his whole body, rising to his toes and coming down again with his knees bending in his effort.

The C minor symphony ... in the savage grief of its first ... ment, with heavy tone, and somewhat faster than former leaders have taken it. And all the drama of what Berlios called "the painting of disordered sentiments which overthrow a great soul" the orchestra thrilled out with awe-inspiring earnestness.

The second movement—andante con moto—was so exactly as Mr Gericke would have had it, that it brought the reflection that after all Dr Muck can do in the few days since his arrival have done much with the orchestra. Added to that was an apparent modesty in the conductor, who seemed desirous of sinking his personality so far as possible. His smooth-shaven face was serious, immobile; his gestures were few, and only his tense, electric beat of his baton suggested any feeling.

And this immobility but made the terrible, sinister music of the scherzo movement the more threatening. And at the last, as the great burst of the finale mounted up in an explosion, the little conductor seemed actually to grow smaller and slighter before the majesty of it.

The "Faust" overture, which Wagner himself said should bear the title "Faust in Solitude," or "The Solitary Faust: a Tone Poem for Orchestra," made an admirable contrast to the symphony, and was placed exactly right in the program. It is a work about which there has been some dispute, comparatively little interest, and a good deal of misunderstanding. It is "Faust without the woman," as Wagner himself said, though Faust's individuality in the operatic versions of the story shapes itself only when the woman appears.

The overture tells of the world-weary man driven forever by his indwelling dæmon to engage anew in life's endeavors. The fierce, aching and roaring insistence, deep in the bass, the cry of the rebellious and tortured soul, the fancies that draw the man away toward rest, all in the subtle phrase of Wagner make the overture, though in form a thing to be remembered apart from all formal works of the name.

The "Siegfried Idyl," which Wagner wrote for a birthday gift to his wife Cosima, is a weaving of recollections of Siegfried and Die Walkuere, with all the sensuous spell of the gentler motives of Siegfried developed to quite other phases than in the opera. Not lacking in spirit, it has little of the wrenching, shouting Wagner about it, nor does it disdain, as the prophet of the new music so often did, the return to a tune once played. Even more, it falls away gradually to its sweet end, with no crashing climax to stun at the finale.

The shouting all came in the prelude to "Die Maestersinger," which was superbly played.

The audience, which had for a great part come back from Europe and from its summer haunts, was composed of society people. It has become a tradition in Boston not to miss a first symphony concert of the season. They received the new conductor with marked approbation, but not with the wild, undiscriminating furore that would have been less subtle a compliment, as assessing how little change in the orchestra he had yet made.

Next week's program contains Haydn's symphony in G minor, No. 13; Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony in C; Spohr's concerto for violin, with Prof Willy Hess for soloist, and Bach's suite for flute and strings.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

MUSIC IN WASHINGTON.

The dates for the concerts to be given in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are Tuesday afternoons, November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19, and March 19. They will be given at the New National Theater. These concerts, because of the appointment of the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and the appearance with the orchestra of prominent soloists, promise to be of great interest to Washington. Dr. Muck was chosen last spring after the announced retirement of Mr. Gericke. A Bavarian by birth, he received his title of "doctor" from the University of Leipzig in 1880. While he was pursuing his studies he was working at music, and the same month that he received his degree of "doctor of philosophy," he made his debut in Leipzig as a pianist. He had, however, no thought of a career as a pianist, having long since decided to make conducting his life work. His first post was as chorus master at Zurich, then in succession he was the conductor at Salzburg, Brunn, and Graz, the first recognition of his talent coming when he was appointed, in 1886, conductor of the German Opera at Prague, and at the same time conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra in the same city. There he remained for six years, giving up that post for the one in Berlin, which he has held since then. By his many "guest" appearances as orchestral and operatic conductor in Europe, by his post of conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra, and his close connection with Bayreuth, where in the last four festivals he has been conductor of "Parsifal," he has won for himself a most notable reputation as a conductor and as a musician.

The next in interest to Dr. Muck will be the appearance of Paderewski as soloist at the January concert of the orchestra. This will be Paderewski's only appearance in Washington, for he comes to this country to play seven times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after which he will return immediately to Europe. A complete list of soloists cannot at this time be given, for Dr. Muck has not yet fully decided on his plans for the last concert in March. Two names, however, can be announced, those of Mme. Olga Samaroff and Mr. Timothee Adamowski. Samaroff made a favorable impression when she played here last year with the Philadelphia Orchestra, and later with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and therefore her coming will be warmly welcomed by the musicians of this city. Mr. Adamowski has not played in Washington for several years. This year he will play in New York as well as Washington.

The orchestra itself returns without any change in its personnel. It will bring to Washington its full strength of ninety-six men.

The Boston Symphony Quartet will depart from its usual custom of evening concerts, and the three afternoons programmed for the coming winter are December 20, February 20, and March 20 at 4 o'clock at the New Willard Hotel. The programmes will be selected from the works of Brahms, Cesar Franck, Saint-Saens, Schumann, Mendelssohn and

NEW YORK STAATS ZEITUNG
NEW YORK CITY
OCT 14

Musikalische Angelegenheiten.

Orchester-Concerte. — „Madam Butterfly". — Kommende Concerte.

Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester kündigt für die kommende New Yorker Concert-Saison zehn Concerte an, welche in Carnegie Hall an Donnerstag-Abenden und Samstag-Nachmittagen stattfinden werden. Die ersten Concerte wurden für Donnerstag, den 8., und Samstag, den 10. November, angekündigt, und die übrigen finden am 6. und 8. Dezember, 10. und 12. Januar, 21. und 23. Februar und 21. und 23. März statt. Der Billet-Verkauf wird morgen Vormittag in Carnegie Hall eröffnet, die Liste der Novitäten wird später bekanntgegeben werden. In den November-Concerten werden keine Solisten auftreten und auch für die März-Concerte wurden noch keine Solisten bestimmt, dagegen sind für die übrigen Gelegenheiten Pianisten von überragender Bedeutung genannt: Rosenthal, Paderewski, Gabrilowitsch und Olga Samaroff, sowie die bestbekannten Violinvirtuosen Willy Heß und Timothée Adamowski. Dr. Muck, der neue Dirigent, wird die neue Symphonie von Paderewski, welche als modernes Werk von außergewöhnlicher Brillanz und Wirkung bezeichnet wird, in Boston am 4. und 5. Januar zur Aufführung bringen, welches Werk sodann in New York und anderen Städten wiederholt werden soll. Die ersten Bostoner Concerte der berühmten Vereinigung haben am Freitag und Samstag unter außerordentlichem Erfolg stattgefunden. Das Programm, das Dr. Muck gewählt hatte, bestand aus Beethoven's C moll-Symphonie No. 5, Wagner's „Faust"-Ouverture, „Siegfried"-Idyll" und dem Vorspiel zu den „Meistersingern". Die drahtlichen Mittheilungen aus Boston bezeichnen Dr. Muck's Erfolg als einen vollen. Es wird darauf hingewiesen, daß der Genannte seit 13 Jahren wieder der erste neue Dirigent des Bostoner Orchesters ist, wenn man von dem flüchtigen Erscheinen Vincent d'Indy's im Vorjahr absieht. Dr. Muck, dessen Ruhm eigentlich als Theaterkapellmeister begründet wurde, hat sich drüben auch als Concert-Dirigent einen großen Ra[illegible] und die Theater-Musik zu Sh[illegible]

Dr. Karl Muck,
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1906-1907.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

The sale of season tickets for the series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give this winter in the New National Theater will open on next Tuesday morning at the ticket office of T. Arthur Smith in Sanders & Stayman's music store, in F street, at 9 o'clock. The concerts, as last year, will be given on Tuesday afternoons, the dates being November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19, and March 19.

Dr. Karl Muck, who will be the conductor of the orchestra, was chosen last spring after the announced retirement of Mr. Gericke from that place. Dr. Muck is one of the foremost conductors of Europe. For the last fourteen years he has held the post of conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin, and he has conducted the performances of "Parsifal" at the last four festivals in Baireuth.

Paderewski will appear as soloist at the January concert of the orchestra. This will be his only appearance in Washington.

A complete list of soloists cannot at this time be given, for Dr. Muck has not yet fully decided on his plans for his last concert in March. Two names, however, can be announced, those of Mme. Olga Samaroff and Mr. Timothee Adamowski.

The orchestra returns without any change in its personnel. It will bring to Washington its full strength of ninety-six men, and its season promises to be the most successful in its history.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With the added attractions of Dr. Muck as conductor and Paderewski and Melba as soloists, in January and February, respectively, their only appearance in Baltimore, the prospects are that the subscription of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season will be the largest in history. The management at this time is careful to announce that the prices for single tickets for these two concerts will be materially increased, so that purchasers of season tickets will have more than usual advantage over those who buy their tickets from concert to concert. This is not the general policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but when it is necessary to pay the very large sums demanded by such artists as Paderewski and Melba an increase in the prices of the concerts is absolutely necessary. Otherwise, it would not be possible to present such soloists to Baltimore. There will be no increase whatever in the prices of season tickets.

Baltimore will be one of the six cities which will hear Paderewski this year and one of a half dozen cities outside of New York where Melba will sing.

The full prospectus of the season will be published next Sunday.

N. Y. AMERICAN
OCT 14 19

Paderewski will play but once in New York this Winter, and that will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Rosenthal will make his first appearance with orchestra in New York with the Boston Symphony. Gabrilowitsch has always been a favorite here, and Olga Samaroff is rapidly establishing herself as one of the most brilliant of our pianists.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUAR[illegible]
The sale of season tickets for the concerts which the Boston [illegible] Quartet will give in Chickering hall this winter will open at the box of Symphony hall, Oct. 23. The dates of the concerts are Monday evening Oct 28, Nov 18, Dec 17, Jan 21, Feb 25 and April 1. The assisting artists will be Dr Karl Muck, Messrs. Gebhard, Heinrich Gebhard, Victor Benham, G. Tucker and others. Mr Gebhard will be the assisting artist at the concert when the program will be Suk's quartet in B flat major, opus 11, which is a novelty; Beethoven's trio for strings in C minor, opus 9, No. 3, and Cesar Franck's quintet for piano and strings in F minor.

THE SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE
The Boston Symphony orchestra will give this year as usual six concerts in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, the dates being Thursday evenings, Oct. 25, Dec. 13, Jan 24, Feb 28, April 4 and May 2. This year the time of beginning the concerts will be changed, for instead of 8 o'clock, it will be at 8 o'clock. The soloists will be Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto, Miss Lillia Snelling, contralto, Mme Antoinette Szumowska, pianist, Miss Olga Radecki pianist, Prof Willy Hess violinist.

The price of season tickets for the six concerts is $5. The sale will be conducted according to the plan used last year. Subscribers of last season will secure the same seats by making application to George H. Kent on or before next Thursday, Oct 18. The unclaimed seats will be offered for sale at the University book store Oct 20.

LONGY CLUB.
Announcement is made of the usual series of three concerts which will be given by the Longy club in Boston this winter. They will be given in Potter hall on Wednesday evenings, Nov 14, Jan 2 and Feb 6. Subscriptions for the series may now be sent to C. A. Ellis, Symphony hall. The price of subscription will be the same as last year, for the series.

RECORD
PHILA. PA
OCT 14 1907

Dr Karl Muck

Dr Muck has chosen ... score of Paderewski's new symphony ... is to have its first appearance ... January 4 and 5. In the next ... be played in Philadelphia, Washington, New York and Brooklyn. It is said to be a work very modern in its ... orchestral brilliancy. It ... technical difficulties. Paderewski is anxious to hear it played, for he is to play it with the orchestra on their

PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA
OCT 14 1907

[32]

BOSTON, OCTOBER 14, 1906.

Concerts by Symphony Quartet, Longy Club and Other Societies

The sale of season tickets for the six concerts of the Boston Symphony quartet in Chickering Hall this winter will open at the box office of Symphony Hall on Monday morning, Oct. 22. The dates of the concerts are Monday evening, Oct. 29, Nov. 19, Dec. 17, Jan. 21, Feb. 25 and April 1. The assisting artists will be Dr. Muck, Messrs. Gabrilowitsch, Gebhard, Benham, Tucker and others. Mr. Gebhard will assist at the first concert, when the programme will be Suk's quartet in B flat major, opus 11, which is a novelty; Beethoven's trio in C minor, opus 9, No. 3, and Cesar Franck's quintet in F minor.

The usual series of three concerts will be given by the Longy Club in Boston this winter, in Potter Hall, on Wednesday evenings, Nov. 14, Jan. 2 and Feb. 6. Subscriptions for the series may now be sent to C. A. Ellis, Symphony Hall. The price of subscription will be the same as last year.

Mme. Olga Samaroff will give a piano recital in Chickering Hall Monday afternoon, Nov. 5.

Mr. Arthur Whiting will demonstrate his theory of the use of the damper piano pedal in a lecture recital in Chickering Hall Oct. 24. He has analyzed and applied to the piano certain principles long ago accepted by writers of orchestral music. In exposition of his theory, Mr. Whiting will play works by early and modern composers.

The Choral Art Society of Boston, Mr. Wallace Goodrich, conductor, will sing twice this season: first in Jordan Hall, Thursday evening, Dec. 13, and then in Trinity Church in March. Two important changes in the manner of subscription are to be noted. A subscription will be for a single ticket, and not for the season. Seats will be reserved for both evenings and allotted in the order of receipt of subscription. Subscription lists will open Monday, Oct. 22. The programme of the first evening will include groups of old Italian madrigals, old French noels and chansons harmonized by Gevaert; chorals by Bach; a new and short work by Loeffler for eight part mixed chorus without accompaniment; choruses by Brahms for female voices with accompaniment of harp and horns; motet by Tschaikowsky. The programme of the second evening will be made up exclusively of church music appropriate to Lent, and it will include Allegri's Miserere and settings of portions of Holy Week offices.

Handel and Haydn, Mr. Mollenhauer conductor, will give this season the customary performances of the "Messiah." On Feb. 17 it will sing Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," with the assistance of Mme. Schumann-Heink and Mr. de Gogorza; on Easter Sunday Handel's "Belshazzar." There will be a performance of "Elijah" on Sunday, Nov. 4, for the benefit of the Handel and Haydn building fund, and the solo singers will be Mrs. Genevieve Wilson, Mrs. Bertha Child, Mr. Edward Johnson, Mr. Miles.

The Hoffmann Quartet will give concerts of its fifth season in Potter Hall on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 27, Jan. 1, March 5. The programmes will be made up of works by Beethoven, Converse, Dubois, Haydn, R. Strauss, Schumann, Hugo Wolf and others. The soloists will be announced soon.

Mr. Homer Humphrey of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music will give an organ recital in Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening, when he will play pieces by Bach, Franck, Saint-Saens, Schumann, Widor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give this year six concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday evenings, Oct. 25, Dec. 13, Jan. 24, Feb. 28, April 4 and May 2. This year the time of beginning the concerts will be 8 o'clock. The soloists will be Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto; Miss Lillia Snelling, contralto; Mme. Antoinette Szumowska, pianist; Miss Olga Radecki, pianist; Mr. Willy Hess, violinist. The price of season tickets for the six concerts is $5. The sale will be conducted according to the plan used last year; subscribers of last season may secure the same seats by making application to George H. Kent, on or before next Thursday, Oct. 18. The unclaimed seats will be offered for sale at the University Book Store, Harvard Square, Cambridge, on Saturday morning, Oct. 20.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess

1 ess

e

MUSIC IN WASHINGTON.

The dates for the concerts to be given in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are Tuesday afternoons, November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19, and March 19. They will be given at the New National Theater. These concerts, because of the appointment of the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and the appearance with the orchestra of prominent soloists, promise to be of great interest to Washington. Dr. Muck was chosen last spring after the announced retirement of Mr. Gericke. A Bavarian by birth, he received his title of "doctor" from the University of Leipzig in 1889. While he was pursuing his studies he was working at music, and the same month that he received his degree of "doctor of philosophy," he made his debut in Leipzig as a pianist. He had, however, no thought of a career as a pianist, having long since decided to make conducting his life work. His first post was as chorus master at Zurich, then in succession he was the conductor at Salzburg, Brunn, and Graz, the first recognition of his talent coming when he was appointed, in 1886, conductor of the German Opera at Prague, and at the same time conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra in the same city. There he remained for six years, giving up that post for the one in Berlin, which he has held since then. By his many "guest" appearances as orchestral and operatic conductor in Europe, by his post of conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra, and his close connection with Bayreuth, where in the last four festivals he has been conductor of "Parsifal," he has won for himself a most notable reputation as a conductor and as a musician.

The next in interest to Dr. Muck will be the appearance of Paderewski as soloist at the January concert of the orchestra. This will be Paderewski's only appearance in Washington, for he comes to this country to play seven times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after which he will return immediately to Europe. A complete list of soloists cannot at this time be given, for Dr. Muck has not yet fully decided on his plans for the last concert in March. Two names, however, can be announced, those of Mme. Olga Samaroff and Mr. Timothee Adamowski. Samaroff made a favorable impression when she played here last year with the Philadelphia Orchestra, and later with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and therefore her coming will be warmly welcomed by the musicians of this city. Mr. Adamowski has not played in Washington for several years. This year he will play in New York as well as Washington.

The orchestra itself returns without any change in its personnel. It will bring to Washington its full strength of ninety-six men.

The Boston Symphony Quartet will depart from its usual custom of evening concerts, and the three afternoons promised for the coming winter are December 5, February 20, and March 20 at 4 o'clock in the New Willard Hotel. The programmes will be selected from the works of Beethoven, Brahms, Cesar Franck, Haydn, Mozart, Saint-Saens, Schumann, Richard Strauss, Mendelssohn, and others.

Musikalische Angelegenheiten.

Orchester-Concerte. — „Madam Butterfly". — Kommende Concerte.

Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester kündigt für die kommende New Yorker Concert-Saison zehn Concerte an, welche in Carnegie Hall an Donnerstag-Abenden und Samstag-Nachmittagen stattfinden werden. Die ersten Concerte wurden für Donnerstag, den 8., und Samstag, den 10. November, angekündigt, und die übrigen finden am 6. und 8. Dezember, 10. und 12. Januar, 21. und 23. Februar und 21. und 23. März statt. Der Billet-Verkauf wird morgen Vormittag in Carnegie Hall eröffnet, die Liste der Novitäten wird später bekanntgegeben werden. In den November-Concerten werden keine Solisten auftreten und auch für die März-Concerte wurden noch keine Solisten bestimmt, dagegen sind für die übrigen Gelegenheiten Pianisten von überragender Bedeutung genannt: Rosenthal, Paderewski, Gabrilowitsch und Olga Samaroff, sowie die bestbekannten Violinvirtuosen Willy Heß und Timothée Adamowski. Dr. Muck, der neue Dirigent, wird die neue Symphonie von Paderewski, welche als modernes Werk von außergewöhnlicher Brillanz und Wirkung bezeichnet wird, in Boston am 4. und 5. Januar zur Aufführung bringen, welches Werk sodann in New York und anderen Städten wiederholt werden soll. Die ersten Bostoner Concerte der berühmten Vereinigung haben am Freitag und Samstag unter außerordentlichem Erfolg stattgefunden. Das Programm, das Dr. Muck gewählt hatte, bestand aus Beethoven's C moll-Symphonie No. 5, Wagner's „Faust"-Ouverture, „Siegfried"-Idyll" und dem Vorspiel zu den „Meistersingern". Die drahtlichen Mittheilungen aus Boston bezeichnen Dr. Muck's Erfolg als einen vollen. Es wird darauf hingewiesen, daß der Genannte seit 13 Jahren wieder der erste neue Dirigent des Bostoner Orchesters ist, wenn man von dem flüchtigen Erscheinen Vincent d'Indy's im Vorjahr absieht. Dr. Muck, dessen Ruhm eigentlich als Theaterkapellmeister begründet wurde, hat sich drüben auch als Concert-Dirigent einen großen Ruf [illegible] und die Theater-Musik zu Sh[illegible] Heinrich VIII." von Thoring[illegible]

MUSICAL MATTERS.

First of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

Program Splendidly Interpreted Under Dr Muck's Direction.

Recitals and Other Events of the Week.

Dr Carl Muck, on leave given by the German emperor from the Royal opera house in Berlin, last night opened the 26th season of the Boston symphony orchestra, making his first appearance on the conductor's stand in this city. His program—Beethoven's No. 5 symphony, Wagner's "Faust" overture, "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," was not one which made for the display of individuality, and except for a sharper attack, a bolder reading, a more explosive enunciation, than is often given, especially by the polite traditions of the Boston symphony orchestra, Dr Muck's performance was not very markedly different from those of preceding conductors. Two of the Wagner numbers are comparatively unfamiliar; none of the music is heard for the first time here.

Dr Muck's conducting is somewhat peculiar; none of the broad, sweeping strokes of the baton which characterized Mr Gericke; he beats time from his elbow, often poking his baton at the players. He beats with swift strokes, vehement or light, but describing an astonishingly small arc, and illustrated last night what he said in an interview shortly after landing, that he believes a good conductor needs no stick. During the finale of the Beethoven number, when the time and the volume ran along evenly in the score, he stopped beating altogether, and stood for some 20 bars motionless, leaning the tip of his stick on the open score before him. Occasionally the vehemence of his beating caused him to beat with his whole body, rising to his toes and coming down again with his knees bending in his effort.

The C minor symphony he attacked in the savage grief of its first movement, with heavy tone, and somewhat faster than former leaders have taken it. And all the drama of what Berlioz called "the painting of disordered sentiments which overthrow a great soul" the orchestra thrilled out with awe-inspiring earnestness.

The second movement—andante con moto—was so exactly as Mr Gericke would have had it, that it brought the reflection that after all Dr Muck cannot in the few days since his arrival have done much with the orchestra. Added to that was an apparent modesty in the conductor, who seemed desirous of sinking his personality so far as possible. His smooth-shaven face was serious, immobile; his gestures were few, and only the tense, electric beat of his baton showed any feeling.

And this immobility but made the terrible, sinister music of the scherzo movement the more threatening. And at the last, as the great burst of the finale mounted up in an explosion, the little conductor seemed actually to grow smaller and slighter before the majesty of it.

The "Faust" overture, which Wagner himself said should bear the title "Faust in Solitude," or "The Solitary Faust; a Tone Poem for Orchestra," made an admirable contrast to the symphony, and was placed exactly right in the program. It is a work about which there has been some dispute, comparatively little interest, and a good deal of misunderstanding. It is "Faust without the woman," as Wagner himself said, though Faust's individuality in the operatic versions of the story shapes itself only when the woman appears.

The overture tells of the world-weary man driven forever by his indwelling daemon to engage anew in life's endeavors. The fierce, aching and roaring insistence, deep in the bass, the cry of the rebellious and tortured soul, the fancies that draw the man away toward rest, all in the subtle phrase of Wagner make the overture, though in form a thing to be remembered apart from all formal works of the name.

The "Siegfried Idyl," which Wagner wrote for a birthday gift to his wife Cosima, is a weaving of recollections of Siegfried and Die Walkuere, with all the sensuous spell of the gentler motives of Siegfried developed to quite other phases than in the opera. Not lacking in spirit, it has little of the wrenching, shouting Wagner about it, nor does it disdain, as the prophet of the new music so often did, the return to a tune once played. Even more, it falls away gradually to its sweet end, with no crashing climax to stun at the finale.

The shouting all came in the prelude to "Die Maestersinger," which was superbly played.

The audience, which had for a great part come back from Europe and from its summer haunts, was composed of society people. It has become a tradition in Boston not to miss a first symphony concert of the season. They received the new conductor with marked approbation, but not with the wild, undiscriminating furore that would have been less subtle a compliment, as now seeing how little change in the orchestra he had yet made.

Next week's program contains Haydn's symphony in G minor, No. 13; Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony in C; Spohr's concerto for violin, with Prof Willy Hess for soloist, and Bach's suite for flute and strings.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m

ress

e

Dr. Karl Muck,
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1906-1907.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

The sale of season tickets for the series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give this winter in the New National Theater will open on next Tuesday morning at the ticket office of T. Arthur Smith in Sanders & Stayman's music store, in F street, at 9 o'clock. The concerts, as last year, will be given on Tuesday afternoons, the dates being November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19, and March 19.

Dr. Karl Muck, who will be the conductor of the orchestra, was chosen last spring after the announced retirement of Mr. Gericke from that place. Dr. Muck is one of the foremost conductors of Europe. For the last fourteen years he has held the post of conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin, and he has conducted the performances of "Parsifal" at the last four festivals in Baireuth.

Paderewski will appear as soloist at the January concert of the orchestra. This will be his only appearance in Washington.

A complete list of soloists cannot at this time be given, for Dr. Muck has not yet fully decided on his plans for his last concert in March. Two names, however, can be announced, those of Mme. Olga Samaroff and Mr. Timothee Adamowski.

The orchestra returns without any change in its personnel. It will bring to Washington its full strength of ninety-six men, and its season promises to be the most successful in its history.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With the added attractions of Dr. Muck as conductor and Paderewski and Melba as soloists, in January and February, respectively, their only appearance in Baltimore, the prospects are that the subscription of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season will be the largest in history. The management at this time is careful to announce that the prices for single tickets for these two concerts will be materially increased, so that purchasers of season tickets will have more than usual advantage over those who buy their tickets from concert to concert. This is not the general policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but when it is necessary to pay the very large sums demanded by such artists as Paderewski and Melba an increase in the prices of the concerts is absolutely necessary. Otherwise, it would not be possible to present such soloists to Baltimore. There will be no increase whatever in the prices of season tickets.

Baltimore will be one of the six cities which will hear Paderewski this year and one of a half dozen cities outside of New York where Melba will sing.

The full prospectus of the season will be published next Sunday.

Paderewski will play but once in New York this Winter, and that will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Rosenthal will make his first appearance with orchestra in New York with the Boston Symphony. Gabrilowitsch has always been a favorite here, and Olga Samaroff is rapidly establishing herself as one of the most brilliant of our pianists.

OLGA SAMAROFF'S RECITALS.

Of all the pianists who have appeared in Boston in recent years, none has been taken more quickly into favor by the musical public than Mme Olga Samaroff, who last year gave two recitals here in addition to being soloist with the Symphony orchestra. Mr Ellis, Mme Samaroff's manager, announces that she will give the first recital of the present season in Chickering hall, Monday afternoon, Nov 5.

Mme Samaroff's season began week before last, when she was a piano soloist at the artists' concert in Worcester. Her performance there of [illegible]'s concerto in D minor excited great admiration in the audience and proved to be another triumph for this brilliant young artist.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The sale of season tickets for the six concerts which the Boston Symphony Quartet will give in Chickering hall this winter will open at the box office of Symphony hall, Oct 22. The dates of the concerts are Monday evenings, Oct 29, Nov 19, Dec 17, Jan 21, Feb 25 and April 1. The assisting artists will be Dr Karl Muck, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Heinrich Gebhard, Victor Benham, H. G. Tucker and others. Mr Gebhard will be the assisting artist at the first concert when the program will be Suk's quartet in B flat major, opus 11, which is a novelty; Beethoven's trio for strings in C minor, opus 9, No 3, and Cesar Franck's quintet for piano and strings in F minor.

THE SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give this year as usual six concerts in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, the dates being Thursday evenings, Oct 25, Dec 13, Jan 24, Feb 28, April 4 and May 2. This year the time of beginning the concerts will be changed, for instead of being at 7:45, it will be at 8 o'clock. The soloists will be Miss Lilla Ormond contralto, Miss Lillia Snelling contralto, Mme Antoinette Szumowska pianist, Miss Olga Radecki pianist, Prof Willy Hess violinist.

The price of season tickets for the six concerts is $5. The sale will be conducted according to the plan used last year. Subscribers of last season may secure the same seats by making application to George H. Kent on or before next Thursday, Oct 18. The unclaimed seats will be offered for sale at the University book store Oct 20.

LONGY CLUB.

Announcement is made of the usual series of three concerts which will be given by the Longy club in Boston this winter. They will be given in Potter hall Wednesday evenings, Nov 14, Jan 2 and Feb 6. Subscriptions for the series may now be sent to C. A. Ellis, Symphony hall. The price of subscription will be the same as last year, for the series.

Dr. Karl Muck

Dr Muck brought with him to America the score of Paderewski's new symphony which is to have its first appearance in Boston on January 4 and 5. In the next week it will be played in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. It is said to be a work very modern in tone and of great orchestral brilliancy. It fairly bristles with technical difficulties. Paderewski will be present to hear it played, for he is to be the soloist with the orchestra on that occasion.

[32]

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Advent of a New and Noted Conductor, Dr. Karl Muck.

The dates of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in this city at Carnegie Hall are Thursday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21, March 21 and Saturday afternoons November 10, December 8, January 12, February 23 and March 23. These concerts will have a new interest this season by reason of the presence of Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin, who has come to America on a year's leave of absence from the Royal Opera of that city to be the conductor of Boston's orchestra. It is thirteen years since the Boston Symphony brought a new conductor to New York—if the visit last year, of Vincent d'Indy be excepted—the last one having been Emil Paur, now of the Pittsburg Orchestra. When the orchestra first came to this city to give a concert in Steinway Hall, Mr. Gericke, then in his first term of service, was at its head. During the last three years of Mr. Gericke's first engagement the orchestra became firmly established in the affection of New York's music lovers and under Nikisch, Paur, and again Gericke, its patronage here has grown steadily until, indeed, New York has come to regard it as partly its own.

There is no reason to doubt that the brilliant achievements of the past will be duplicated under Dr. Muck. He comes to this country with a splendid reputation won in a career of twenty-six years in some of the most exacting posts of Europe. Beginning at the bottom round of the ladder, chorus master in the Opera in Zürich, his advancement was so rapid that in twelve years he was appointed one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera in Berlin, which post he now holds.

While it is true that he is best known as an operatic conductor, his experience in concert work has been very thorough, and in Europe he is esteemed as highly in concert as in opera. In the early years of his career, when he was the chief conductor of Graz, he began to make a name for himself in symphonic music. In Prague, where he was principal conductor of the German opera from 1886 to 1892, he was also the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts and gave them a standing which they had never had before. Later, when he went to Berlin, he began to receive invitations from the leading orchestras of Europe, and to-day is one of the most sought after of the "star" conductors. After Mahler relinquished the Philharmonic Orchestra Dr. Muck was one of the first "guest" conductors invited to lead that band. Last year and the year before he conducted four of the eight concerts, Felix Mottl of Munich conducting the others. For the coming year arrangements had been made whereby he was to have conducted all eight of the concerts, but his engagement to come to America compelled the Philharmonic Society to fall back on the old plan of having two conductors, who are to be Mottl and Richard Strauss.

The engagement of Dr. Muck is to a certain extent a radical departure in the policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the past the plan has been to take a man who was comparatively unknown. Henschel, the first conductor, was absolutely unknown in that capacity when he took charge of the orchestra in 1881. Gericke, when he first came to America, had been a subordinate in the Vienna Opera House, while Nikisch and Paur, coming from the Municipal Theatre of Leipsic, were both unknown men. Curiously enough, all of them had been identified almost entirely with opera.

To be sure when Nikisch left in the spring of 1893 Hans Richter was engaged, and when he broke his contract with Mr. Higginson he wrote urgently to Dr. Muck asking him to come instead. Had this happened, Dr. Muck would have been another comparatively unknown man to take charge of the orchestra. But now, thirteen years later, he comes to America a member of that small group of men who have raised the position of the conductor to a higher plane than it has ever held before.

There will be no soloists at the November concerts in New York, and for the March concerts no soloists are yet announced, since Dr. Muck has not yet determined what he will do on his last visit to this city. But the soloists who are announced are unusually strong, four pianists and two violinists. The pianists are Paderewski, Rosenthal, Gabrilowitsch and Olga Samaroff. The violinists are Willy Hess and Timothée Adamowski.

Paderewski will play but once in New York next winter, and that will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He comes to this country for three weeks, in which time he will play seven concerts with the Boston Symphony. Rosenthal will make his first appearance with orchestra in New York with the Boston Symphony. Gabrilowitsch has always been a favorite here and Olga Samaroff is rapidly establishing herself as one of the most brilliant of our pianists. Neither Willy Hess not Timothée Adamowski needs introduction to Boston Symphony audiences in New York. They are among those who make "the virtuosi orchestra an orchestra of virtuosi."

Announcements of novelties will be made later.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

rom

ddress

ate

Dr. Muck brought with him to America the score of Paderewski's new symphony, which is to have its first appearance in Boston on January 4 and 5. In the next week it will be played in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. It is said to be a work very modern in tone and of great orchestral brilliancy. It fairly bristles with technical difficulties. Paderewski will be present when it is played, for he is to be the soloist with the orchestra on that occasion.

ress NEW YORK CITY
T 14 1906

Dr. Karl Muck, dem berühmten Musiker, wurde Freitag Abend bei seinem ersten Concert in Boston ein herzlicher Empfang bereitet. Es hatte sich eine große und erlesene Zuhörerschaar eingefunden, die seinen Leistungen mit mehr Enthusiasmus applaudirte, als Bostoner Musikverständige es sonst wohl zu thun pflegen.

Dr. Karl Muck.

Das Programm enthielt u. a. Beethoven's fünfte Symphonie, das „Siegfried Idyll" und die Ouvertüre der Meistersinger von Wagner.

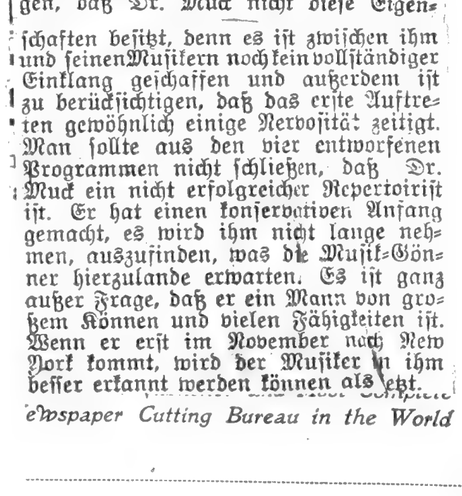
Ueber den Verlauf des Concertes wird Folgendes berichtet:

„Herr Muck machte den Eindruck eines Mannes von großer Autorität und technischer Kraft, wenig aus sich heraustretend, aber durchaus mit kraftvollem Selbstbewußtsein vor dem Publikum und seinen Musikern. Er war augenscheinlich nicht geneigt, sich durch andere Mittel als nur sein Können beim Publikum in Gunst zu setzen. Er ist thatsächlich etwas steif und unnachgiebig beim Dirigiren und sein Anschlag scheint beim ersten Anblick nichts von der Beredtsamkeit zu haben, die man wohl zu finden glaubte. Er hatte aber augenscheinlich schon ein ziemliches Einverständniß mit seinen Musikern erzielt, denn er konnte seine Absichten durchführen, ohne daß ein Schleppen oder Zögern zu bemerken war.

„Herr Muck las die Symphonie in brillanter und wirksamer Weise. Es gab manche scharfe Kontraste, die indessen nicht zu stark accentuirt wurden. Nur in den langsamen Passagen zeigte sich eine bisher nicht ungewohnte Emphase. Die Meistersinger-Ouverture nahm er schneller als wir es gewohnt sind und auch hier waren eher brillante und präcise Phrasirung und scharfe Kontraste die hervorstechenden Eigenschaften als Zartheit der Tongebung und das Glühen der Leidenschaft und der Beredtsamkeit. Man sollte aber nicht ohne Weiteres sagen, daß Dr. Muck nicht diese Eigenschaften besitzt, denn es ist zwischen ihm und seinen Musikern noch kein vollständiger Einklang geschaffen und außerdem ist zu berücksichtigen, daß das erste Auftreten gewöhnlich einige Nervosität zeitigt. Man sollte aus den vier entworfenen Programmen nicht schließen, daß Dr. Muck ein nicht erfolgreicher Repertoirist ist. Er hat einen konservativen Anfang gemacht, es wird ihm nicht lange nehmen, auszufinden, was die Musik-Gönner hierzulande erwarten. Es ist ganz außer Frage, daß er ein Mann von großem Können und vielen Fähigkeiten ist. Wenn er erst im November nach New York kommt, wird der Musiker in ihm besser erkannt werden können als jetzt.

ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

s



DR. CARL MUCK,

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The sale of season tickets for the coming series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give next winter in the New National Theater will open on next Tuesday morning at the ticket office of T. Arthur Smith, in Sanders & Stayman's music store, on F street, at 9 o'clock. The concerts, as last year, will be given on Tuesday afternoons, the dates being November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19, and March 19.

After the extraordinary success of the series of Boston Symphony concerts last year, it would seem rash to prophesy greater success for the coming season, but as practically all the subscribers of last year have renewed their subscriptions for the coming season, and as there is a very long list of new subscribers, it looks now as if there would not be even so many seats to sell for single concerts as there were last year.

Dr. Karl Muck, who will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was chosen last spring after the announced retirement of Mr. Gericke from that place. His engagement was a source of great relief to the friends of the orchestra because they knew that in his hands the orchestra would not only maintain the high standard which had characterized it in the past, but would probably rise to higher ones, for Dr. Muck is admittedly one of the very few great conductors of the world.

Although several efforts have been made in recent years to induce him to come to America, none succeeded until Mr. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony, finally persuaded him, last spring, after a long series of negotiations. These negotiations had to be not merely with Dr. Muck, but twice the matter had to be carried to the German Emperor, whose personal consent it was necessary to get in order that Dr. Muck might secure a leave of absence for a year.

The next one in interest to Dr. Muck will be the appearance of Paderewski, as soloist, at the January concert of the orchestra. This will absolutely be Paderewski's only appearance in Washington, for he comes to this country to play seven times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after which, he will return immediately to Europe to fulfill many engagements on that side of the water.

A complete list of soloists cannot at this time be given, for Dr. Muck has not yet fully decided on his plans for his last concert in March. Two names, however, can be announced, those of Mme. Olga Samaroff and Mr. Timothee Adamowski. Samaroff made a veritable sensation when she played here last year with the Philadelphia Orchestra, and later with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Adamowski has not played in Washington for several years. He is one of the several artists enrolled under the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who, if they wanted to, could tour as virtuosi with as great success as any violinist now before the public.

The orchestra itself returns without any change in its personnel. It will bring to Washington its full strength of ninety-six men.

ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

;s

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the coming series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give next winter in the New National Theater will open on next Tuesday morning at the ticket office of T. Arthur Smith, in Sanders & Stayman's music store, in F street, at 9 o'clock. The concerts, as last year, will be given on Tuesday afternoons, the dates being November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 19. Dr. Karl Muck, who will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was chosen last spring after the announced retirement of Mr. Gericke from that place. A Bavarian by birth, he received his title of "doctor" from the University of Leipsic in 1880. While he was pursuing his university studies he was working at music, and the same month that he received his degree of "doctor of philosophy" he made his debut in Leipsic as a pianist. He had, however, no thought of a career as a pianist, having long since decided to make conducting his life work. His first post was as chorus master at Zurich, then in succession he was the conductor at Salzburg, Brunn and Graz, the first recognition of his talent coming when he was appointed in 1886, conductor of the German Opera at Prague and at the same time conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra in the same city. There he remained for six years, giving up that post for the present one in Berlin, which he has held since then.

Paderewski will appear as soloist at the January concert of the orchestra. Paderewski comes to this country to play seven times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after which he is to return immediately to Europe to fulfill many engagements on that side of the water.

A complete list of soloists cannot at this time be given, for Dr. Muck has not yet fully decided on his plans for his last concert in March. Two names, however, are announced, those of Mme. Olga Samaroff and Mr. Timothee Adamowski. The orchestra itself returns without change in its personnel.

m Y. AMERICAN
ress

In the Music World.

MORE than ordinary interest is attached to the Boston Symphony concerts this season, due to the presence of Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, who has come to America on a year's leave of absence from the Royal Opera of that city to be the conductor of the Boston's orchestra. The first concert of the Boston Symphony will be given on Thursday evening, November 8, to be followed by Thursday concerts on December 6, January 10, February 21, March 21, and Saturday concerts on November 10, December 8, January 12, February 23 and March 23.

There will be no soloists at the November concerts in New York, and for the March concerts no soloists are yet announced, since Dr. Muck has not yet determined what he will do on his last visit to this city. But the soloists who are announced are unusually strong—four pianists and two violinists. The pianists are Paderewski, Rosenthal, Gabrilowitsch and Olga Samaroff. The violinists are Willy Hess and Timothee Adamowski.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the W

rom

ddress

ate

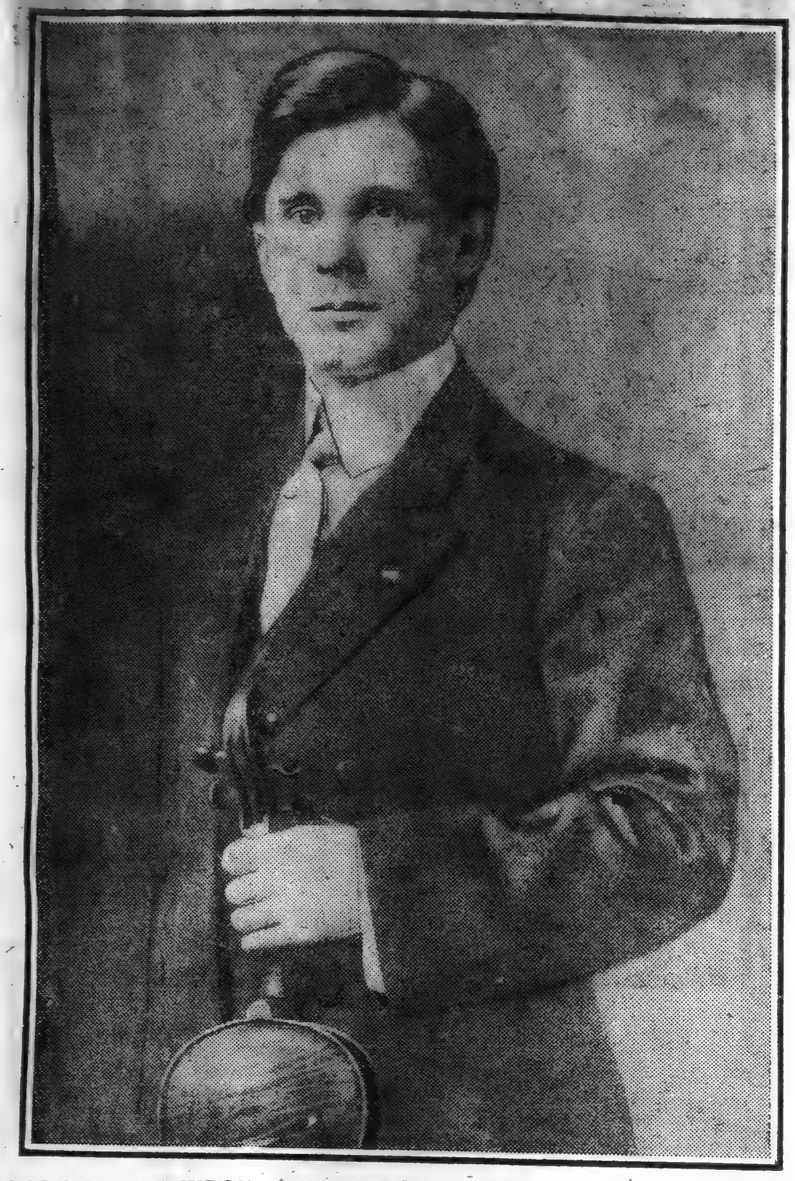
The sale of season tickets for the twenty-second season in Philadelphia of he Boston Symphony Orchestra will open to-morrow morning, October 15, at Miss Harris' ticket office in Heppe's Music Store. As last year, five Monday evening concerts will be given, on November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18, the place being, of course, the Academy of Music.

The coming season of Boston's great orchestra promises to be one of more than ordinary interest through the presence in this country as its conductor of Dr. Karl Muck, who for the past fourteen years has been one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera, Berlin. The choice of a new conductor, made necessary by the retirement of Mr. Gericke last Spring, was a source of deep anxiety to the friends and patrons of the orchestra and the good fortune of securing even for one year a man of the artistic stature of Dr. Muck has been a source not merely of relief, but of congratulation.

Although several efforts have been made in recent years to induce Dr. Muck to come to America, none succeeded until Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony, asked him to come. His career as a conductor, which covers twenty-five years, has been a most distinguished one, and to-day he stands one of that small group of men who have brought the art of conducting to a higher standard than it has ever held in the past.

[33]

The World of Music



SOLOIST AT FIRST PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Thaddeus Rich, the concertmeister, will play at both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts. Rich is an American by birth, and little over 21 years of age.

The Philadelphia Orchestra will open the music season at the Academy next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, with the first public rehearsal and symphony concert, and Mr. Scheel has arranged a program of unusual interest. The symphony announced is the Tschaikowsky Fifth—a work for the first time appearing on the programs of the Philadelphia Orchestra. The program will also include Wagner's "Meistersinger," Vorspiel, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulonspigel and His Merry Pranks." Thaddeus Rich, the new concertmeister, is to be the soloist, and his number will be the Wieniawski Concerto in D minor.

A noted Russian commentator in speaking of Tschaikowsky's "Fifth Symphony," says: "It is a striking work and takes a prominent place not only among Tschaikowsky's compositions, but among Russian musical works in general. The symphony is divided into the usual four movements. The first—Andante, Allegro con anima—opens with an introduction in which we hear the exposition of the chief subject of the symphony. This subject runs like a dark thread through the whole tissue of the work.

"The introduction is conceived in that mood of sadness so common to Tschaikowsky. The Allegro has two subjects, one melancholy in character, the other full of brightness and vitality. Both are developed with much brilliance and animation. Then, suddenly, the chief subject reappears and the music grows somber once more. As this theme dies away on the bassoons, the movement comes to an end.

"The second movement—Andante cantabile con alcuna licenza—takes the form of a romance. The subject given out by a solo horn passes over to the violoncello and is afterward assigned to the strings. Here again the chief theme of the symphony breaks in in a fragmentary, almost unexpected manner, casting momentary shadows over the radiant mood which pervades the movement.

"The third movement consist of a poetical, graceful valse. As in the preceding movement, the chief theme returns occasionally in a fitful way, but later on, in the finale, it is displayed in its fullest power. The introduction to the finale—Andante maestoso—is entirely based upon it and is penetrated with religious feeling. The finale itself—Allegro vivace—grows gradually clearer as it proceeds, as though the heart had cast off a load of suffering and God's world shone out bright once more. An episode in the finale has a subject which it quite Russian in character.

"The entire symphony seems to set forth some dark spiritual experience; some heavy condition of a mind torn by importunate memories which have poisoned existence. Only at the close the cloud lifts, the sky clears and we see the blue stretching pure and clear beyond."

While the name of Rich is a new one to the Philadelphia music public, yet his talent and equipment are such as to call forth praise of the highest character from European critics and masters of the violin. Mr. Rich was born in America a little more than twenty-one years ago.

* * *

The sale of season tickets for the twenty-second season in Philadelphia of he Boston Symphony Orchestra will open to-morrow morning, October 15, at Miss Harris' ticket office in Heppe's Music Store. As last year, five Monday evening concerts will be given, on November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18, the place being, of course, the Academy of Music.

The coming season of Boston's great orchestra promises to be one of more than ordinary interest through the presence in this country as its conductor of Dr. Karl Muck, who for the past fourteen years has been one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera, Berlin. The choice of a new conductor, made necessary by the retirement of Mr. Gericke last Spring, was a source of deep anxiety to the friends and patrons of the orchestra and the good fortune of securing even for one year a man of the artistic stature of Dr. Muck has been a source not merely of relief, but of congratulation.

Although several efforts have been made in recent years to induce Dr. Muck to come to America, none succeeded until Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony, asked him to come. His career as a conductor, which covers twenty-five years, has been a most distinguished one, and to-day he stands one of that small group of men who have brought the art of conducting to a higher standard than it has ever held in the past.

* * *

Dr. Muck brought with him to America the score of Paderewski's new symphony which is to have its first appearance in Boston on January 4 and 5. In the next week it will be played in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. It is said to be a work very modern in tone and of great orchestral brilliancy. It fairly bristles with technical difficulties. Paderewski will be present to hear it played, for he is to be the soloist with the orchestra on that occasion.

TWO STARS OF THE PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA

PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON THIS WEEK

Programme of Unusual Interest, Including Many Masterpieces, Provided by Conductor Scheel for Initial Event

CONDUCTOR FRITZ SCHEEL, with his Philadelphia Orchestra, will open the music season at the Academy next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, with the first public rehearsal and symphony concert, in a noted programme of unusual interest. The symphony announced is the Tschaikowsky Fifth—for the first time on the list of the Philadelphia Orchestra. The numbers also include Wagner's "Meistersinger" vorspiel, and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspigel and His Merry Pranks."

Thaddeus Rich, the new concert master, is to be the soloist, playing the Weiniawski concerto in D Minor.

Rich is the youngest, yet perhaps the most important accession of the year to Conductor Scheel's orchestral force. He is but 21, and has been playing the violin ever since he was 8 years old. He acquired technical skill rapidly, and nine years ago he was sent abroad to the Leipzig Conservatory, where he graduated March 30, 1900.

Since that time he passed one year with the Gewandhaus Orchestra as first violinist, under the direction of Arthur Nikisch, and one year as first concertmeister of the Western Opera, Berlin, Germany, under Hans Pfitzner and Alexander von Fielitz. Besides, he has played as soloist in all the great music centres of Germany.

Vladimir Dubinsky, the new first 'cellist, is a Russian of the Russians, with all the instincts, traditions and poetic aspirations of the neo-Russian school of music, which has given us Tschaikowsky, Glazonouw and Rimsi-Korschakoff. His artistic proficiency as a solo 'cellist is a household word in musical Europe.

New Feature is Poetic Drama.

The incidental music for MacKay's "Jeanne d'Arc," which is to be produced for the first time in this city tomorrow, is a new and interesting feature in poetic drama. It has been composed especially for the production by Professor F. S. Converse, of Harvard University.

It approaches the problem of dramatic expression from a broader and more highly organized standpoint, and uses, to a certain extent, the "leading motive" plan, which obtains in modern opera. Although there are several independent ballads, choruses and chants, drawn mostly from mediaeval French folksong and Gregorian ritual chants, suitable to the nature of the play, the music is, as a whole, built upon original themes, which represent different characters, situations and emotional phases of the drama.

These musical thoughts are worked and woven, in overture and between acts, into orchestral pieces which bridge over the entr'acte pauses. Twenty-four musicians are employed in rendering this music.

Music from "Zaza," "Roland di Berlind" and "Chatterton" was heard at the second "Leoncavallo" concert at the Academy of Music last night. As at the previous concert, these numbers from the maestro's later operas augmented popular curiosity as to the works in their entirety. If Signor Leoncavallo's brief American tour shall result in a general and liberal staging of his operas in the United States, his transatlantic trip will have been well worth the making, no matter what disappointment may attend its financial outcome.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Rehearsals of the first programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began in Symphony Hall, under Dr. Karl Muck, last Monday, and the first public rehearsal and concert took place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, respectively. Dr. Muck's introductory programme was Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, No. 5; Wagner's "A Faust Overture," Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and his Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg." Interest in the orchestra in Boston is greater this year than it has ever been before, as indicated in a substantial manner by the receipts from the auction sales for the season.

Dr. Muck brought with him to America the score of Paderewski's new symphony, which is to have its first appearance in Boston on January 4 and 5. In the next week it will be played in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. It is said to be a work very modern in tone and of great orchestral brilliancy, fairly bristling with technical difficulties. Paderewski will be present to hear it played, for he is to be the soloist with the Boston band on that occasion.

[34]

...A DAILY ADVERTISER
...OBER 15, 1906

...E SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

...Symphony No. 5, in C minor.
...aust Overture.
...Siegfried Idylle.
...Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

...re is no question but that the orches... is continuing in safe hands; that much ... established before the end of the performance of the Beethoven symphony. Dr. Muck was greeted cordially by both audience and orchestra, the latter paying him the unusual compliment of rising at his entrance. It was an odd coincidence (and a purely accidental one) that the work which ended last season should have begun the present one, the last work directed here by Mr. Gericke was the first conducted by Dr. Muck.

It would be a thankless task to make comparisons. Given a great work, and two eminent conductors, and there are sure to be noticeable differences of detail and even of result. In even the first four measures there was exhibited a difference of reading. There was no long pause separating the two first figures. "Beethoven wrote the hold over the chord, not over the eighth rest," says Dr. Muck, and the interpretation is an effective one, yet it is a reading that we have not had in Boston for a generation.

It was at once evident that, like Mr. Gericke, Dr. Muck is a true musician and not a "poseur." There was no frantic beat no sensational distortion of the composer's meaning to draw attention to the conductor's great powers of discovery, no looking too deeply into the millstone; yet with the minimum of gesture and without any excited action on the part of the conductor, the men were evidently under entire control.

Beyond the point noted above it is impossible to give any new impression in the first movement, yet one may mention that the struggle of the chief and subordinate theme with each other was commendably balanced. The second movement was sung in broad and beautiful style,—a trifle slower than we are accustomed to hear it, but very effective in this tempo. But the glory of the performance was in the Scherzo and Finale. The mysterious character of the chief theme, and the mock heroics that follow it, were finely contrasted, and the contrabasses were not overdriven in the Trio. The bassoon work was more audible than usual and we liked this "nuance." The transition to the Finale was most effectively mysterious, and the last movement was triumphantly powerful.

In short, without searching for any startling devices, without injecting too much "personality" into the reading (the vice of many a modern conductor) Dr. Muck brought out all the poetry of the old work and aroused the audience to much enthusiasm.

Mr. Gericke has given us the acme of Wagner orchestral interpretation, and there were no such revelations in the later part of the programme as could be found in the symphony. Yet the Faust overture was given a most dramatic reading. The Siegfried Idylle was less effective. We begin to doubt the fitness of this work for a large concert hall, although it was interesting to contrast the discontented Wagner of "Faust" with the happy composer of the Idylle.

We have had many great performances of the "Meistersinger" prelude. It would be exaggeration to say that Dr. Muck surpassed them, but he certainly equalled the standard that has been set. Every point of the work told; every one of the sharp contrasts was properly caught up, and a thoroughly enjoyable performance given. If one bears in mind that this was not only the first concert after a long vacation, but the first stage of the acquaintance of Dr. Muck with the great instrument upon which he is to play, the result may be considered as triumphant.

It remains to be seen how conservative the new conductor is going to be. Dr. Muck will soon discover that the average Boston concert-goer is impatient of further education in the early classics and demands more excitement than Mozart and Haydn can furnish. The next programme is to be entirely on the staid and conservative lines. There has not been such a programme given in Boston in 25 years as the one of this week. Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Spohr, two simple symphonies (for even the fugue of the "Jupiter" is no longer intricate to the symphonic auditor) and not one measure of modern puzzles or pepper. We shall watch the result of this innovation with the keenest interest. Dr. Muck says that he does not believe in sudden jumps into dissimilar schools. There will certainly be no such jumps in the next concert.

Louis C. Elson.

...ospaper ...ting Bureau
NEW YORK DAILY NE...
...
OCT 15 190...

...Muck.

It is gratifying to find here, in Boston and in Washington men of genius who recall to us the great men of the past. Will we be apt to soon forget Damrosch, Theodore Thomas, Seidl, Gilmore? Tell it not in Gath. Dr. Muck is already well and favorably known in Boston. He deserves all that is said about him.

...324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
MONDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1906

Dr. Muck's Second Appearance

At the Symphony concert of Saturday Dr. Muck renewed and strengthened the excellent impression that he had made on Friday afternoon. The conductor, the orchestra and the audience all seemed more at their ease. In particular Dr. Muck measured better the baffling and trying acoustics of Symphony Hall. Especially in Wagner's "Faust" overture and in the prelude to "The Mastersingers," he gained a sonority, incisiveness and vitality of tone that were lacking on Friday, and that gave the overture a sharper poignancy and a more sombre cast, and the prelude a larger eloquence and a warmer brilliancy. A certain diffidence with which the men played on Friday afternoon, as though hesitating a little over the novel freedom the new conductor was allowing them, had also vanished, and throughout the band was surety and elasticity themselves. To the audience also, since the musical part of the town had talked of little else than Dr. Muck since Friday, he did not come quite strange. It was ready with welcoming applause. It listened with unrelaxing and clearly responsive interest, and it was very hearty in its approval at the close of the symphony, and at the end of the concert.

Admirable, again, were Dr. Muck's feeling for tone that is beautiful in texture, undulating in motion and adroitly proportioned in mass and detail; and for the quality of pure orchestral song in Beethoven's andante or in the lyrical passages of the two overtures by Wagner. His sense of musical design seemed as lucid and large, especially in its grasp of each composition as an organic whole. In the symphony, for example, not only did the music rise steadily to the searching transition to the final movement, but it mounted thereafter to the very last chords. He was as skilful, too, in the adjustment of all the changing moods of the prelude to "The Mastersingers" into the glowing mass of the whole, and it glowed more brightly than it did on Friday, even if the final touch of splendid improvisation was lacking. Clearer, too, was his acute sense of the tonal contrasts that point the composer's thought and set sparks to the listener's imagination, as in the restless transitions of the "Faust" overture or the shimmering tracery of "A Siegfried Idyll." And in his stiff, sharp beat lurks, after all, the nervous quiver that makes climaxes elastic, undulating and alive. They marched on Saturday, they rose, and they did not dally for "effect."

H. T. P.

A correspondent sends us a justly indignant letter about the one incident that marred Dr. Muck's first appearances here—the conspicuous departure of a fraction of the audience on Friday afternoon before the final number of a very short programme. Doubtless the offence was partly habit and partly carelessness, but it is a custom and an indifference that are increasing on Friday afternoons and that, to a stranger to local ways, as Dr. Muck still is, was singularly discourteous and disconcerting. Our correspondent writes to the point:

"After the Siegfried music on Friday I should say that between fifty and seventy-five persons, if not more, from the front half of the hall alone got up and went out, and this at ten minutes before four. Considering that it was Mr. Muck's first appearance, it was a singularly discourteous thing to do, and must have struck him like a slap in the face. Boston's alleged musical culture is pretty laughable poppycock, and I often wonder what percentage of the Friday crowd really knows much about or cares really for music. To have cut out one moment of yesterday's concert was inconceivable, but first of all it was a mighty rude way to treat a newcomer, and all should have made a point of staying until the end, whether or not it was a case of having the proverbial 'pearls cast before' them or not."

...
POST
...
OCT 15 1906

Rehearsals of the first programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began in Symphony Hall under Dr. Karl Muck last Monday, October 8, and the first public rehearsal and concert took place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, respectively. Dr. Muck's introductory programme included Beethoven's "Symphony in C Minor No. 5," Wagner's a "Faust" overture, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," and his prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Dr. Muck brought with him to America the score of Paderewski's new symphony, which is to have its first appearance in Boston on January 4 and 5. In the next week it will be played in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York, and Brooklyn. It is said to be a work very modern in tone and of great orchestral brilliancy. It fairly bristles with technical difficulties. Paderewski will be present to hear it played, for he is to be the soloist with the orchestra on that occasion.

...ospaper Clipping Bureau
NEWS
...
BALTIMORE
OCT 17 190...

One of Dr. Muck's novelties will be a symphony by Paderewski. It will probably be performed in Baltimore, and the titanic pianist will have an opportunity to blot out the faint record made by "Manru" three years since. Whether Paderewski's genial lyric vein can take on the stalwartism and sustain continuity requisite to a successful symphony is at least questionable.

...TON ...
...TOBER 15, 1906.

MUCK BRINGS OUT NEW BEAUTIES IN SYMPHONY

Produces Effects That Are Broad, Stirring and Poetic, Classic and Yet Modern—Gets What He Wants by Close Range Methods.

That the Symphony Orchestra has drawn a great conductor in Dr. Carl Muck was made evident before the dark, slender, graceful man had led half the way through the Beethoven "Fifth" at the opening concert on Saturday evening; that the audience was quick to recognize the satisfying fact was as clearly proven by its spontaneous and hearty expressions of pleasure at every proper opportunity.

The orchestra, an almost perfect musical instrument, was ready; the leader, an embodiment of well controlled fire, of authority and of keen and accurate knowledge, took command with the ease of a veteran and produced effects that were broad and beautiful, stirring and poetic, classic and yet intensely modern at the same time.

Dr. Muck is not a Delsartean conductor. His beat is unexaggerated, but it is firm, decisive and all-embracing. He gains the effects he wants by close-range methods, often by the merest suggestion. Once, in the Beethoven slow movement, he dropped his right arm entirely and stood as if brooding over the beauty of the music while the orchestra played on for many bars with a rhythmic perfection that seemed all the more fascinating because undirected.

The program, while made up of extremely familiar things, was cleverly constructed. Beethoven and Wagner! Each the greatest the world has yet produced in his especial field. Two golden opportunities for a conductor who has something to say about his composer. Dr. Muck shone in both. His reading of the Fifth Symphony, while in no sense revolutionary, was individual and romantic. He dared to employ "rubato" in the marvelous slow movement, thereby increasing the etherial charm, and he brought out into the open the strength of the brasses in the jubilant finale. Unless all signs fail, he will not repress that power and sonority that the band has within it and may well express without at all injuring the tonal splendor for which it is famous.

As an interpreter of Wagner music, the new conductor has won his greatest renown, and results proved that his reputation is well founded. He made the "Faust" overture a thing of unusual clarity and tenderness, so that in all respects the performance was the finest within memory. Only a little less successful was the "Siegfried Idyll," while the pomp and circumstance of the "Meistersinger" prelude came as an inspiring close to an evening of exceptional interest.

After the concert a reception was given Dr. Muck by H. G. Tucker in the Napoleon room of the Tuileries, where a large company of Boston's musically elect met and congratulated the new leader.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD
OCTOBER 15, 1906

DR. MUCK IS A TRUE MUSICIAN

There is no question but that the orchestra is continuing in safe hands; that much was established before the end of the performance of the Beethoven symphony. Dr. Muck was greeted cordially by both audience and orchestra, the latter paying him the unusual compliment of rising at his entrance. It was an odd coincidence (and a purely accidental one) that the work which ended last season should have begun the present one, the last work directed here by Mr. Gericke was the first conducted by Dr. Muck.

It would be a thankless task to make comparisons. Given a great work, and two eminent conductors, and there are sure to be noticeable differences of detail and even of result. In even the first four measures there was exhibited a difference of reading. There was no long pause separating the two first figures. "Beethoven wrote the hold over the chord, not over the eighth rest," says Dr. Muck, and the interpretation is an effective one, yet it is a reading that we have not had in Boston for a generation.

It was at once evident that, like Mr. Gericke, Dr. Muck is a true musician and not a "poseur." There was no frantic beat no sensational distortion of the composer's meaning to draw attention to the conductor's great powers of discovery, no looking too deeply into the millstone; yet with the minimum of gesture and without any excited action on the part of the conductor, the men were evidently under entire control.

In short, without searching for any startling devices, without injecting too much "personality" into the reading (the vice of many a modern conductor) Dr. Muck brought out all the poetry of the old work and aroused the audience to much enthusiasm.

...OCTOBER ..., 1906.

The first of the season's Symphony concerts was given Saturday evening under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, whose appearance was greeted with generous applause from an audience eagerly expectant and curious to see the new conductor.

The programme consisted of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor and three Wagner numbers; a "Faust" overture, "Siegfried Idyl," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Dr. Muck's conducting was characteristic of his personality—quiet and determined, as though holding much in reserve, till such times as he seemed infused with the spirit of the theme, when, perhaps, after standing motionless for a few bars, he would suddenly begin a tense beating with his baton, rising on his toes and coming down again with knees slightly bent.

The symphony in C minor is one of Beethoven's masterpieces, in which are developed the composer's thoughts—his sorrows and concentrated rage—his reveries and bursts of enthusiasm. These furnished the theme and were nobly portrayed in harmony and rhythm.

The first movement in the symphony was taken up somewhat faster than by former conductors, and one was made to feel the intense despair and voiceless sorrow till it finally broke loose in one frantic delirium of fury.

Then came the second movement which seemed also to partake of the melancholy quiet of the former, the theme being represented always in a profound and sad simplicity which was found to leave its impression on the souls of its hearers.

And finally the scherzo—a strange composition provoking inexplicable emotion—sombre and mysterious, for a time partaking of an indifferent tonality interrupted only by a few violin tones lightly plucked, and strange little cluckings of bassoons, till at the finale the sinister movement of the scherzo broke forth in one grand explosion, and the audience fairly forgot the little conductor in the intensity of his portrayal of this great symphony.

The "Faust" overture was distinctly a Tone Poem for orchestra, and was followed by the "Siegfried Idyl," a beautiful selection of soothing sweetness. The climax all came in the prelude to "The Mastersingers," which was beautifully rendered.

The programme for next week will consist of selections from Bach, Haydn and Spohr, and Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony in C major, with Prof. Willy Hess as soloist.

...ess

IN all probability the most important event of the present orchestral season in this country was the début, at Boston last Friday and Saturday, of Dr. Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Boston papers comment on the occasion with enthusiasm.

Says the Transcript of Dr. Muck's manner and beat: "Since Theodore Thomas's time no familiar conductor has stood so still. Dr. Muck plunged at no group of players, beckoned none to their entrances, embraced none in sweeping gesture. Like Thomas, he reserves such muscular labors for rehearsals. His score stands before him, his stick is in his hand, in the old fashion; and the beat is unfailingly clear and unfalteringly precise. His conducting is lucid precision itself, but precision that is tense with nervous energy."

Of Dr. Muck's "readings" the Herald speaks as follows: "Dr. Muck did not attempt to be sensational in his interpretation of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. His treatment of the much discussed initial motive reassured those who were timorous, fearing lest their Beethoven might be Wagnerized. The purely melodic passages were sung as by an accomplished and emotional singer. When there were such passages for solo instruments the players were allowed their liberty. The dynamic gradations of tone were finely observed, and climaxes were skilfully prepared without too deliberate contrivance. The andante, which is hurried by some for fear of sentimentalism, was nobly sung.

Boston Daily Globe.
WEDNESDAY, OCT 17, 1906.

SAINT-SAENS COMING.

French Composer Opens American Tour with Symphony Orchestra.

Camille Saint-Saens, the most famous of living French composers and one of the greatest composers of the world who is coming to this country for 20 concerts, is to make his debut in America in Boston at a special concert which the Symphony orchestra will give in Symphony hall on Wednesday evening, Oct 31. It has been generally announced that he would make his American debut in New York, but C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Symphony orchestra, made arrangements yesterday whereby his first appearance will be here.

Saint-Saens is the most versatile of musicians. He is one of the world's greatest composers; he is a conductor, an accomplished pianist and organist, and in Boston he will be heard as composer, conductor and as pianist. The works on the program will be his own, and he will conduct all but his piano concerto which he will play himself.

In the past 20 years 26 of his compositions have appeared on Boston symphony programs no less than 116 times; in fact, he ranks 13th in number of performances in a list of 236 composers. In this country Saint-Saens is best known generally as the composer of the opera "Samson and Delilah."

The concert which he will conduct in Symphony hall will be out of the regular subscription. The full Symphony orchestra will be used.

[35]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
OCTOBER 15, 1906

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—Symphony No 5, in C minor.
Wagner—Faust Overture.
Wagner—Siegfried Idylle.
Wagner—Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

There is no question but that the orchestra is continuing in safe hands; that much was established before the end of the performance of the Beethoven symphony. Dr. Muck was greeted cordially by both audience and orchestra, the latter paying him the unusual compliment of rising at his entrance. It was an odd coincidence (and a purely accidental one) that the work which ended last season should have begun the present one, the last work directed here by Mr. Gericke was the first conducted by Dr. Muck.

It would be a thankless task to make comparisons. Given a great work, and two eminent conductors, and there are sure to be noticeable differences of detail and even of result. In even the first four measures there was exhibited a difference of reading. There was no long pause separating the two first figures. "Beethoven wrote the hold over the chord, not over the eighth rest," says Dr. Muck, and the interpretation is an effective one, yet it is a reading that we have not had in Boston for a generation.

It was at once evident that, like Mr. Gericke, Dr. Muck is a true musician and not a "poseur." There was no frantic beat no sensational distortion of the composer's meaning to draw attention to the conductor's great powers of discovery, no looking too deeply into the millstone; yet with the minimum of gesture and without any excited action on the part of the conductor, the men were evidently under entire control.

Beyond the point noted above it is impossible to give any new impression in the first movement, yet one may mention that the struggle of the chief and subordinate theme with each other was commendably balanced. The second movement was sung in broad and beautiful style,—a trifle slower than we are accustomed to hear it, but very effective in this tempo. But the glory of the performance was in the Scherzo and Finale. The mysterious character of the chief theme, and the mock heroics that follow it, were finely contrasted, and the contrabasses were not overdriven in the Trio. The bassoon work was more audible than usual and we liked this "nuance." The transition to the Finale was most effectively mysterious, and the last movement was triumphantly powerful

In short, without searching for any startling devices, without injecting too much "personality" into the reading (the vice of many a modern conductor) Dr. Muck brought out all the poetry of the old work and aroused the audience to much enthusiasm.

Mr. Gericke has given us the acme of Wagner orchestral interpretation, and there were no such revelations in the later part of the programme as could be found in the symphony. Yet the Faust overture was given a most dramatic reading. The Siegfried Idylle was less effective. We begin to doubt the fitness of this work for a large concert hall, although it was interesting to contrast the discontented Wagner of "Faust" with the happy composer of the Idylle.

We have had many great performances of the "Meistersinger" prelude. It would be exaggeration to say that Dr. Muck surpassed them, but he certainly equalled the standard that has been set. Every point of the work told; every one of the sharp contrasts was properly caught up, and a thoroughly enjoyable performance given. If one bears in mind that this was not only the first concert after a long vacation, but the first stage of the acquaintance of Dr. Muck with the great instrument upon which he is to play, the result may be considered as triumphant.

It remains to be seen how conservative the new conductor is going to be. Dr. Muck will soon discover that the average Boston concert-goer is impatient of further education in the early classics and demands more excitement than Mozart and Haydn can furnish. The next programme is to be entirely on the staid and conservative lines. There has not been such a programme given in Boston in 25 years as the one of this week? Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Spohr, two simple symphonies (for even the fugue of the "Jupiter" is no longer intricate to the symphonic auditor) and not one measure of modern puzzles or pepper. We shall watch the result of this innovation with the keenest interest. Dr. Muck says that he does not believe in sudden jumps into dissimilar schools. There will certainly be no such jumps in the next concert.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
MONDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1906

Dr. Muck's Second Appearance

At the Symphony concert of Saturday Dr. Muck renewed and strengthened the excellent impression that he had made on Friday afternoon. The conductor, the orchestra and the audience all seemed more at their ease. In particular Dr. Muck measured better the baffling and trying acoustics of Symphony Hall. Especially in Wagner's "Faust" overture and in the prelude to "The Mastersingers," he gained a sonority, incisiveness and vitality of tone that were lacking on Friday, and that gave the overture a sharper poignancy and a more sombre cast, and the prelude a larger eloquence and a warmer brilliancy. A certain diffidence with which the men played on Friday afternoon, as though hesitating a little over the novel freedom the new conductor was allowing them, had also vanished, and throughout the band was surety and elasticity themselves. To the audience also, since the musical part of the town had talked of little else than Dr. Muck since Friday, he did not come quite strange. It was ready with welcoming applause. It listened with unrelaxing and clearly responsive interest, and it was very hearty in its approval at the close of the symphony, and at the end of the concert.

Admirable, again, were Dr. Muck's feeling for tone that is beautiful in texture, undulating in motion and adroitly proportioned in mass and detail; and for the quality of pure orchestral song in Beethoven's andante or in the lyrical passages of the two overtures by Wagner. His sense of musical design seemed as lucid and large, especially in its grasp of each composition as an organic whole. In the symphony, for example, not only did the music rise steadily to the searching transition to the final movement, but it mounted thereafter to the very last chords. He was as skilful, too, in the adjustment of all the changing moods of the prelude to "The Mastersingers" into the glowing mass of the whole, and it glowed more brightly than it did on Friday, even if the final touch of splendid improvisation was lacking. Clearer, too, was his acute sense of the tonal contrasts that point the composer's thought and set sparks to the listener's imagination, as in the restless transitions of the "Faust" overture or the shimmering tracery of "A Siegfried Idyll." And in his stiff, sharp beat lurks, after all, the nervous quiver that makes climaxes elastic, undulating and alive. They marched on Saturday, they rose, and they did not dally for "effect."

H. T. P.

A correspondent sends us a justly indignant letter about the one incident that marred Dr. Muck's first appearances here—the conspicuous departure of a fraction of the audience on Friday afternoon before the final number of a very short programme. Doubtless the offence was partly habit and partly carelessness, but it is a custom and an indifference that are increasing on Friday afternoons and that, to a stranger to local ways, as Dr. Muck still is, was singularly discourteous and disconcerting. Our correspondent writes to the point:

"After the Siegfried music on Friday I should say that between fifty and seventy-five persons, if not more, from the front half of the hall alone got up and went out, and this at ten minutes before four. Considering that it was Mr. Muck's first appearance, it was a singularly discourteous thing to do, and must have struck him like a slap in the face. Boston's alleged musical culture is pretty laughable poppycock, and I often wonder what percentage of the Friday crowd really knows much about or cares really for music. To have cut out one moment of yesterday's concert was inconceivable, but first of all it was a mighty rude way to treat a newcomer, and all should have made a point of staying until the end, whether or not it was a case of having the proverbial 'pearls cast before' them or not."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau ...

Rehearsals of the first programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began in Symphony Hall under Dr. Karl Muck last Monday, October 8, and the first public rehearsal and concert took place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, respectively. Dr. Muck's introductory programme included Beethoven's "Symphony in C Minor No. 5," Wagner's a "Faust" overture, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," and his prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Dr. Muck brought with him to America the score of Paderewski's new symphony, which is to have its first appearance in Boston on January 4 and 5. In the next week it will be played in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York, and Brooklyn. It is said to be a work very modern in tone and of great orchestral brilliancy. It fairly bristles with technical difficulties. Paderewski will be present to hear it played, for he is to be the soloist with the orchestra on that occasion.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau ...

Muck.

It is gratifying to find here, in Boston and in Washington men of genius who recall to us the great men of the past. Will we be apt to soon forget Damrosch, Theadore Thomas, Seidl, Gilmore? Tell it not in Gath. Dr. Muck is already well and favorably known in Boston. He deserves all that is said about him.

One of Dr. Muck's novelties will be a symphony by Paderewski. It will probably be performed in Baltimore, and the titanic pianist will have an opportunity to blot out the faint record made by "Manru" three years since. Whether Paderewski's genial lyric vein can take on the stalwartism and sustain continuity requisite to a successful symphony is at least questionable.

BOSTON JOURNAL
OCTOBER 15, 1906.

MUCK BRINGS OUT NEW BEAUTIES IN SYMPHONY

Produces Effects That Are Broad, Stirring and Poetic, Classic and Yet Modern—Gets What He Wants by Close Range Methods.

That the Symphony Orchestra has drawn a great conductor in Dr. Carl Muck was made evident before the dark, slender, graceful man had led half the way through the Beethoven "Fifth" at the opening concert on Saturday evening; that the audience was quick to recognize the satisfying fact was as clearly proven by its spontaneous and hearty expressions of pleasure at every proper opportunity.

The orchestra, an almost perfect musical instrument, was ready; the leader, an embodiment of well controlled fire, of authority and of keen and accurate knowledge, took command with the ease of a veteran and produced effects that were broad and beautiful, stirring and poetic, classic and yet intensely modern at the same time.

Dr. Muck is not a Delsartean conductor. His beat is unexaggerated, but it is firm, decisive and all-embracing. He gains the effects he wants by close-range methods, often by the merest suggestion. Once, in the Beethoven slow movement, he dropped his right arm entirely and stood as if brooding over the beauty of the music while the orchestra played on for many bars with a rhythmic perfection that seemed all the more fascinating because undirected.

The program, while made up of extremely familiar things, was cleverly constructed. Beethoven and Wagner! Each the greatest the world has yet produced in his especial field. Two golden opportunities for a conductor who has something to say about his composer. Dr. Muck shone in both. His reading of the Fifth Symphony, while in no sense revolutionary, was individual and romantic. He dared to employ "rubato" in the marvelous slow movement, thereby increasing the etherial charm, and he brought out into the open the strength of the brasses in the jubilant finale. Unless all signs fail, he will not repress that power and sonority that the band has within it and may well express without at all injuring the tonal splendor for which it is famous.

As an interpreter of Wagner music, the new conductor has won his greatest renown, and results proved that his reputation is well founded. He made the "Faust" overture a thing of unusual clarity and tenderness, so that in all respects the performance was the finest within memory. Only a little less successful was the "Siegfried Idyll," while the pomp and circumstance of the "Meistersinger" prelude came as an inspiring close to an evening of exceptional interest.

After the concert a reception was given Dr. Muck by H. G. Tucker in the Napoleon room of the Tuileries, where a large company of Boston's musically elect met and congratulated the new leader.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD
OCTOBER 15, 1906

DR. MUCK IS A TRUE MUSICIAN

There is no question but that the orchestra is continuing in safe hands; that much was established before the end of the performance of the Beethoven symphony. Dr. Muck was greeted cordially by both audience and orchestra, the latter paying him the unusual compliment of rising at his entrance. It was an odd coincidence (and a purely accidental one) that the work which ended last season should have begun the present one, the last work directed here by Mr. Gericke was the first conducted by Dr. Muck.

It would be a thankless task to make comparisons. Given a great work, and two eminent conductors, and there are sure to be noticeable differences of detail and even of result. In even the first four measures there was exhibited a difference of reading. There was no long pause separating the two first figures. "Beethoven wrote the hold over the chord, not over the eighth rest," says Dr. Muck, and the interpretation is an effective one, yet it is a reading that we have not had in Boston for a generation.

It was at once evident that, like Mr. Gericke, Dr. Muck is a true musician and not a "poseur." There was no frantic beat no sensational distortion of the composer's meaning to draw attention to the conductor's great powers of discovery, no looking too deeply into the millstone; yet with the minimum of gesture and without any excited action on the part of the conductor, the men were evidently under entire control.

In short, without searching for any startling devices, without injecting too much "personality" into the reading (the vice of many a modern conductor) Dr. Muck brought out all the poetry of the old work and aroused the audience to much enthusiasm.

BOSTON TRAVELER
OCTOBER 15, 1906.

The first of the season's Symphony concerts was given Saturday evening under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, whose appearance was greeted with generous applause from an audience eagerly expectant and curious to see the new conductor.

The programme consisted of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor and three Wagner numbers; a "Faust" overture, "Siegfried Idyl," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Dr. Muck's conducting was characteristic of his personality—quiet and determined, as though holding much in reserve, till such times as he seemed infused with the spirit of the theme, when perhaps, after standing motionless for a few bars, he would suddenly begin a tense beating with his baton, rising on his toes and coming down again with knees slightly bent.

The symphony in C minor is one of Beethoven's masterpieces, in which are developed the composer's thoughts—his sorrows and concentrated rage—his reveries and bursts of enthusiasm. These furnished the theme and were nobly portrayed in harmony and rhythm.

The first movement in the symphony was taken up somewhat faster than by former conductors, and one was made to feel the intense despair and voiceless sorrow till it finally broke loose in one frantic delirium of fury.

Then came the second movement which seemed also to partake of the melancholy quiet of the former, the theme being represented always in a profound and sad simplicity which was bound to leave its impression on the souls of its hearers.

And finally the scherzo—a strange composition provoking inexplicable emotion—sombre and mysterious, for a time partaking of an indifferent tonality interrupted only by a few violin tones lightly plucked, and strange little cluckings of bassoons, till at the finale the sinister movement of the scherzo broke forth in one grand explosion, and the audience fairly forgot the little conductor in the intensity of his portrayal of this great symphony.

The "Faust" overture was distinctly a Tone Poem for orchestra, and was followed by the "Siegfried Idyl," a beautiful selection of soothing sweetness. The climax all came in the prelude to "The Mastersingers," which was beautifully rendered.

The programme for next week will consist of selections from Bach, Haydn and Spohr, and Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony in C major, with Prof. Willy Hess as soloist.

ess

IN all probability the most important event of the present orchestral season in this country was the début, at Boston last Friday and Saturday, of Dr. Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Boston papers comment on the occasion with enthusiasm.

Says the Transcript of Dr. Muck's manner and beat: "Since Theodore Thomas's time no familiar conductor has stood so still. Dr. Muck plunged at no group of players, beckoned none to their entrances, embraced none in sweeping gesture. Like Thomas, he reserves such muscular labors for rehearsals. His score stands before him, his stick is in his hand, in the old fashion; and the beat is unfailingly clear and unfalteringly precise. His conducting is lucid precision itself, but precision that is tense with nervous energy."

Of Dr. Muck's "readings" the Herald speaks as follows: "Dr. Muck did not attempt to be sensational in his interpretation of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. His treatment of the much discussed initial motive reassured those who were timorous, fearing lest their Beethoven might be Wagnerized. The purely melodic passages were sung as by an accomplished and emotional singer. When there were such passages for solo instruments the players were allowed their liberty. The dynamic gradations of tone were finely observed, and climaxes were skilfully prepared without too deliberate contrivance. The andante, which is hurried by some for fear of sentimentalism, was nobly sung.

Boston Daily Globe.
WEDNESDAY, OCT 17, 1906.

SAINT-SAENS COMING.

French Composer Opens American Tour with Symphony Orchestra.

Camille Saint-Saens, the most famous of living French composers and one of the greatest composers of the world who is coming to this country for 20 concerts, is to make his debut in America in Boston at a special concert which the Symphony orchestra will give in Symphony hall on Wednesday evening, Oct 31. It has been generally announced that he would make his American debut in New York, but C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Symphony orchestra, made arrangements yesterday whereby his first appearance will be here.

Saint-Saens is the most versatile of musicians. He is one of the world's greatest composers; he is a conductor, an accomplished pianist and organist, and in Boston he will be heard as composer, conductor and as pianist. The works on the program will be his own, and he will conduct all but his piano concerto which he will play himself.

In the past 20 years 26 of his compositions have appeared on Boston symphony programs no less than 116 times; in fact, he ranks 13th in number of performances in a list of 236 composers. In this country Saint-Saens is best known generally as the composer of the opera "Samson and Delilah."

The concert which he will conduct in Symphony hall will be out of the regular subscription. The full Symphony orchestra will be used.

[35]

ress _____

OCT 15 1906

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

The Boston Orchestra.

Boston has its new conductor, Dr. Carl Muck, and is pleased with him. He made his first appearance on Friday. Mr. Philip Hale thus sums up his impressions in the Boston Herald, which gave its place of honor on the first page to the event:

It is a pleasure to welcome this sincere and accomplished artist, who now makes Boston his dwelling place. His influence in the making towards musical righteousness will be all the more potent because it is not flamboyant; because his personality is not too personal. The deeply interested audience was quick to appreciate this.

The Transcript says:

His ear for quality of tone seems sensitive and his feeling for it warm. Naturally the men were on their mettle yesterday, and we that listened came fresh to old delights, but seldom have the voices of the orchestra had a more flowing and pliant, a richer and more persuasive loveliness. As fine and warm is Dr. Muck's sense of adroit and beautiful blending and proportioning of tone. He melts his instrumental voices into each other as he twines them in long and curving lines. He seems to seek the steady and delicate undulation of tone that such voices as Melba's sometimes have. Yet as the "Faust" overture showed, he can summon the poignant phrase and the burning accent.

. . . Nowhere was there the smallest exaggeration or the slightest trace of the conductor who must make each contrast a little more poignant, each melody of a deeper and more flowing beauty than ever conductor made it before. Reading, tempi, general design and incidental detail were normal and impersonal. But back of them seemed to be a singular fulness of understanding and an entire devotion to the music for its own sake. . . . Dr. Muck, except for one or two flashing phrases, preferred to read the music temperately, and temperance is much too sane a virtue for it. In a word the sheer romantic ardor of the prelude to "The Mastersingers" and the sheer romantic gloom of the "Faust" overture seemed to leave him, and therefore his audience, a little cold. It recalled him three times and with very hearty applause after the symphony. Its breathless silence through the "Siegfried Idyl" was the finest of responses. Its answer to the two overtures was no more than the applause of courtesy.

The programme comprised Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, and three Wagner numbers: the "Faust" overture, "Siegfried Idyl," and Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

Mr. Louis C. Elsen writes in the Advertiser:

Speaking of his own programmes, Dr. Muck said that he did not believe in much length—for which the critics will call down blessings upon his head. In Berlin they sometimes begin a concert early in the evening and continue until nearly midnight. For himself, he thought that an hour and a half, at most an hour and three-quarters, was about as much as an auditor ought to be called upon to digest.

That Dr. Muck is a musical conservative cannot for an instant be doubted. Emil Paur recently sent his opinion to the present writer to the effect that Max Reger is a genius who is working from darkness into light; Dr. Muck, however, confessed that he could find no coherency or artistic sanity in many of his works. He appreciated Strauss's genius to the full, yet held that in "Heldenleben" and later works the radical had gone too far. Yet he is to attempt even some of these in his programmes, if at all possible. As regards the "Sinfonia Domestica," the statement in one of our contemporaries, that we are to have it "at last," is not quite correct. The fact that our orchestra is not in the Musicians' Union, and that therefore we cannot get the extra instruments and players to fill the exorbitant score, militates as strongly against Dr. Muck as it did against Mr. Gericke. The latter more than once expressed his regret to the present writer that it was impossible to bring this work to performance under present conditions, and Dr. Muck confessed that if the extra parts were to be filled, it would probably be in an inferior manner, under the circumstances.

The dates for the New York (Carnegie Hall) concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are November 8, 10, December 6, 8, January 10, 12, February 21, 23, March 21, 23, the time being Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons.

There will be no soloist at the November concert in New York, and for the March concerts no soloists are yet announced, since Dr. Muck has not yet determined what he will do on his last visit to this city. The soloists who are announced are Paderewski, Rosenthal, Gabrilowitsch, and Olga Samaroff, Willy Hess, and Timothée Adamowski. Paderewski will play but once in New York next winter, and that will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He comes to this country for three weeks, in which time he will play seven concerts with the Boston Symphony. Rosenthal will make his first appearance with orchestra in New York with the Boston Symphony.

The same soloists will be heard at the "Brooklyn Philharmonic" concerts of the Boston Orchestra, at the Baptist Temple. Their dates are between each group of two concerts in Carnegie Hall. Old subscribers can renew their subscriptions up to October 20.

OCTOBER 17, 1906

SAINT-SAENS IN BOSTON.

Camille Saint-Saens, the most famous of living French composers, and one of the greatest composers of the world, who is coming to this country for 20 concerts, is to make his debut in America in Boston at a special concert which the Symphony Orchestra will give in Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening, Oct. 30.

It has been generally announced that he would make his American debut in New York, but C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Symphony Orchestra, has made arrangements whereby his first appearance will be made in Boston.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

NEW

BALTIMORE, MD

OCT 17

Six of the soloists for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in New York have been announced, and the list is prodigally brilliant—Paderewski, Willeg Hess, Rosenthal, Gabrilowitsch, Olga Samaroff and Timothee Adamowski. Dr. Muck has not yet decided as to whether he will employ solo artists for his March concert. The November concert will be [illegible] orchestral.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

om

dress BALTIMORE, MD

OCT 17

te

One's first impression of Dr. Muck is that he is the embodiment of keen intellectuality. Intensity, earnestness and self-reliance are clearly depicted in his physiognomy. He is an exceedingly undemonstrative conductor, still he, like Rothwell, exerts a control over performing forces which savors of the occult. Dr. Muck is 47 years of age, but the first half of his life was devoted to earnest study and contained no "Wunderkind" episodes, although he became uncommonly proficient on both the piano and violin in his youth. He worked at the Leipsic Conservatory under Richter and Reinecke, but at the same time pursued course of work at the University, which finally won his Ph. D.

BOSTON POST,

OCTOBER 17, 1906

SAINT-SAENS TO HONOR HUB

Famous French Composer Will Make First Stop Here

Camille Saint-Saens, the most famous of living French composers and one of the greatest composers of the world, who is coming to this country for 20 concerts, is to make his debut in America in Boston at a special concert which the Symphony Orchestra will give in Symphony Hall on Tuesday evening, Oct. 30.

It has been generally announced that he would make his American debut in New York, but C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Symphony Orchestra, made arrangements yesterday whereby his first appearance will be made in Boston.

Saint-Saens is the most versatile of musicians. He is one of the world's greatest composers, he is a conductor, an accomplished pianist and organist, and in Boston he will be heard as composer, conductor and as pianist.

The works on the programme will be his own and he will conduct all but his piano concerto, which he will play himself.

The concert which he will conduct in Symphony Hall will, of course, be out of the regular subscription. The full Symphony Orchestra will be used.

It will be in the nature of a tribute to the greatest of French composers and one of the greatest composers of the last century, a man who has left the deepest sort of impress on contemporary art.

PO

n

WASHINGTON, D. C.

ress

OCT 21

e

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the New National Theater, beginning on Tuesday afternoon, November 6, will continue until next Saturday. The sale of tickets for the first concert will open on Thursday morning, November 1.

GREAT FRENCH COMPOSER TO MAKE AMERICAN DUBUT

Here at Special Symphony Concert of His Own Works.

Camille Saint-Saens, the most famous of living French composers and one of the great composers of the world, who is coming to this country for 20 concerts, is to make his debut in America in Boston at a special concert which the Symphony orchestra will give in Symphony Hall Wednesday evening, Oct. 30. It has been generally announced that he would make his American debut in New York, but C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Symphony orchestra, has made arrangements whereby his first appearance will be made in Boston.

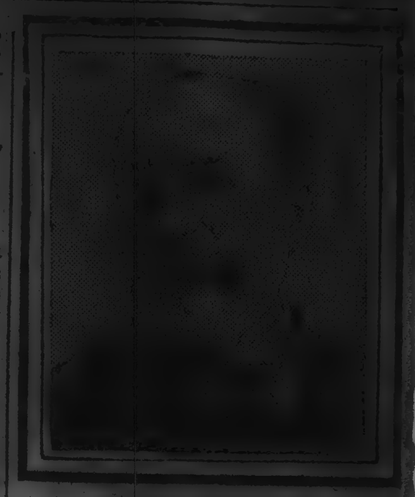
M. Saint-Saens is one of the world's greatest composers, a critic, a conductor and an accomplished pianist and organist, and in Boston he will be heard as composer, conductor and pianist. The works on the programme will be his own and he will conduct all but his piano concerto, which he will play himself.

His list of compositions is very long, including all forms of music. He has composed symphonies and symphonic poems for the orchestra, concertos for violin, 'cello and piano, a symphony for the organ, many operas and oratorios and much chamber music. As a conductor he ranks high, and in Europe he is generally regarded as one of the great pianists of our time. He is now 70 years old, yet last summer he played a Mozart concerto at the Mozart festival in Salzburg, winning the highest praise, and this fall he has given concerts in London which were regarded as events of the season.

It is fitting that his American debut should be with the Boston Symphony orchestra. In the past 20 years some 20 of his compositions have appeared on Boston Symphony programmes no less than 116 times; in fact, he ranks 13th in number of performances in a list of 23 composers.

In this country Saint-Saens is best known generally as the composer of "Samson and Delilah," which, in oratorio form, has been sung by nearly every choral society in the land. Several of his concerts in America will be devoted to the performance of this work, which he will conduct.

The concert which he will conduct in Symphony Hall will, of course, be out of the regular subscription. The full Symphony orchestra will be used. It will be in the nature of a tribute to him as a man who has left a deep impress on contemporary art. Full details regarding the concert and the programme will be made in a few days.



Camille Saint-Saens.
Greatest Living French Composer.

TOUR OCT. 30 IN BOSTON

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wo

From NEW YORK EV'G POST

Address

OCT 18 1906

Date

For the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tickets will be sold as usual at reduced rates in the north and south galleries to students. These tickets will be sold only to students of the Packer Institute, Polytechnic Institute, Alelphi College, Pratt Institute, Berkeley Institute, St. John's College, St. Francis Xavier College, Brooklyn Heights Seminary, St. Catherine's Hall, Miss Rounds's School, the Master School of Music, to students of the Teachers' Training School, and all the high schools; to students of music in schools of music of high grade, or under well accredited teachers of music, and to students of other institutions that may make formal application for students' tickets and have their applications granted by the department of music.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess NEW YORK COMMERCIAL

GLOBE

OCT 18 1906

DR. KARL MUCK, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, though he has been in Boston but a month, is already making plans for his trip back to Germany next spring. Apparently there is no discontent with the Puritan capital implied, merely the eager anticipation of an enthusiastic traveller. Both Dr. and Mrs. Muck are enthusiastic travellers, and they are hoping to return to Germany by way of the Pacific, stopping in Australia and the Philippines on the way. The main objection to this plan is the extreme heat that prevails in summer on the Red Sea. Paderewski, on his way to Australia three years ago, went through the Red Sea in May, and in describing the trip to Dr. Muck, he spoke of that part of it as a nightmare.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

N. Y. EV'G SUN

ess

OCT 19 1906

Messrs. Ellis, Comee and Walter, who help to guide the travels of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will next week announce Dr. Muck's programmes for his first two New York concerts. The season sale for ten concerts has beaten all its former records at Carnegie Hall this week. As we ventured to predict, it appears that the hall could be sold out to-day for the one concert in January with Paderewski.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

N. Y. EV'G SUN

OCT 18 1906

Now Boston is "thinking scornful, Mulvaney-like, concerning this metropolis. From Boston we bear that "Saint-Saëns, who is coming to this country for twenty concerts, is to make his début in America in Boston at a special concert which the Symphony Orchestra will give in Symphony Hall on Oct. 31. "It has," continues our authority, "been generally announced that he would make his American début in New York, but Manager C. A. Ellis has made other arrangements possible."

So Saint-Saëns, like Carl Muck, must see the Hub first and our more speedy Rim of Creation afterward.

Conductor Muck made a successful début in Boston. He was, said the Transcript in an editorial broadside, "So quiet, even so stiff, yet tense with nervous energy." And the audience's behavior was enthusiastic. "It would be considered enthusiasm even in New York."

Dr. Muck, so his friends Down East say, is an enthusiastic traveller, and in this he has the warm support of Mrs. Muck. He is considering a plan of return to Germany next spring by way of the Pacific, stopping at the Philippines, and going even so far as Australia.

The only thing that makes him doubtful is the awful heat one encounters in the Red Sea in the summer. Paderewski, when he went to Australia three years ago, went through the Red Sea in May, and he has told Dr. Muck that the memory of it is a nightmare to him.

Mrs. Muck is tremendously interested in the various Polar expeditions. She says that the only reason she regrets being a woman is that she cannot hope to go far into the North. On the orchestra's first trip this winter she might profit by the opportunity to meet Mrs. Robert E. Peary and the Snow Baby, who know the high latitudes as well as they do their home in Washington.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PRESS

PHILADELPHIA, PA

OCT 17

—Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is an enthusiastic traveler and in this he has the warm support of Mrs. Muck. He is considering a plan of return to Germany next Spring by way of the Pacific, stopping at the Philippines and so on as far as Australia. The only thing that makes him doubtful is that [illegible] has told him that the Red Sea in Summer is a place to be [illegible]

[36]

n

ress

e OCT 15 1906

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

The Boston Orchestra.

Boston has its new conductor, Dr. Carl Muck, and is pleased with him. He made his first appearance on Friday. Mr. Philip Hale thus sums up his impressions in the Boston Herald, which gave its place of honor, on the first page, to the event:

It is a pleasure to welcome this sincere and accomplished artist, who now makes Boston his dwelling place. His influence in the making towards musical righteousness will be all the more potent because it is not flamboyant; because his personality is not too personal. The deeply interested audience was quick to appreciate this.

The Transcript says :

His ear for quality of tone seems sensitive and his feeling for it warm. Naturally the men were on their mettle yesterday, and we that listened came fresh to old delights, but seldom have the voices of the orchestra had a more flowing and pliant, a richer and more persuasive loveliness. As fine and warm is Dr. Muck's sense of adroit and beautiful blending and proportioning of tone. .He melts his instrumental voices into each other as he twines them in long and curving lines. He seems to seek the steady and delicate undulation of tone that such voices as Melba's sometimes have. Yet as the "Faust" overture showed, he can summon the poignant phrase and the burning accent.

. . . Nowhere was there the smallest exaggeration or the slightest trace of the conductor who must make each contrast a little more poignant, each melody of a deeper and more flowing beauty than ever conductor made it before. Reading, tempi, general design and incidental detail were normal and impersonal. But back of them seemed to be a singular fulness of understanding and an entire devotion to the music for its own sake. . . . Dr. Muck, except for one or two flashing phrases, preferred to read the music temperately, and temperance is much too sane a virtue for it. In a word the sheer romantic ardor of the prelude to "The Mastersingers" and the sheer romantic gloom of the "Faust" overture seemed to leave him, and therefore his audience, a little cold. It recalled him three times and with very hearty applause after the symphony. Its breathless silence through the "Siegfried Idyl" was the finest of responses. Its answer to the two overtures was no more than the applause of courtesy.

The programme comprised Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, and three Wagner numbers: the "Faust" overture, "Siegfried Idyl," and Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

Mr. Louis C. Elsen writes in the Advertiser:

Speaking of his own programmes, Dr. Muck said that he did not believe in much length—for which the critics will call down blessings upon his head. In Berlin they sometimes begin a concert early in the evening and continue until nearly midnight. For himself, he thought that an hour and a half, at most an hour and three-quarters, was about as much as an auditor ought to be called upon to digest.

That Dr. Muck is a musical conservative cannot for an instant be doubted. Emil Paur recently sent his opinion to the present writer to the effect that Max Reger is a genius who is working from darkness into light; Dr. Muck, however, confessed that he could find no coherency or artistic sanity in many of his works. He appreciated Strauss's genius to the full, yet held that in "Heldenleben" and later works the radical had gone too far. Yet he is to attempt even some of these in his programmes, if at all possible. As regards the "Sinfonia Domestica," the statement in one of our contemporaries, that we are to have it "at last," is not quite correct. The fact that our orchestra is not in the Musicians' Union, and that therefore we cannot get the extra instruments and players to fill the exorbitant score, militates as strongly against Dr. Muck as it did against Mr. Gericke. The latter more than once expressed his regret to the present writer that it was impossible to bring this work to performance under present conditions, and Dr. Muck confessed that if the extra parts were to be filled, it would probably be in an inferior manner, under the circumstances.

The dates for the New York (Carnegie Hall) concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are November 8, 10, December 6, 8, January 10, 12, February 21, 23, March 21, 23, the time being Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons.

There will be no soloist at the November concert in New York, and for the March concerts no soloists are yet announced, since Dr. Muck has not yet determined what he will do on his last visit to this city. The soloists who are announced are Paderewski, Rosenthal, Gabrilowitsch, and Olga Samaroff, Willy Hess, and Timothée Adamowski. Paderewski will play but once in New York next winter, and that will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He comes to this country for three weeks, in which time he will play seven concerts with the Boston Symphony. Rosenthal will make his first appearance with orchestra in New York with the Boston Symphony.

The same soloists will be heard at the "Brooklyn Philharmonic" concerts of the Boston Orchestra, at the Baptist Temple. Their dates are between each group of two concerts in Carnegie Hall. Old subscribers can renew their subscriptions up to October 20.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
OCTOBER 17, 1906

SAINT-SAENS IN BOSTON.

Camille Saint-Saens, the most famous of living French composers, and one of the greatest composers of the world, who is coming to this country for 20 concerts, is to make his debut in America in Boston at a special concert which the Symphony Orchestra will give in Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening, Oct. 30.

It has been generally announced that he would make his American debut in New York, but C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Symphony Orchestra, has made arrangements whereby his first appearance will be made in Boston.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wo

Six of the soloists for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in New York have been announced, and the list is prodigally brilliant—Paderewski, Willeg Hess, Rosenthal, Gabrilowitsch, Olga Samaroff and Timothee Adamowski. Dr. Muck has not yet decided as to whether he will employ solo artists for his March concerts. The November concert will be entirely orchestral.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om

dress

te

One's first impression of Dr. Muck is that he is the embodiment of keen intellectuality. Intensity, earnestness and self-reliance are clearly depicted in his physiognomy. He is an exceedingly undemonstrative conductor, still he, like Rothwell, exerts a control over performing forces which savors of the occult. Dr. Muck is 47 years of age, but the first half of his life was devoted to earnest study and contained no "Wünderkind" episodes, although he became uncommonly proficient on both the piano and violin in his youth. He worked at the Leipzig Conservatory under Richter and Reinecke, but at the same time pursued a course of work at the University, which finally won his Ph. D.

BOSTON POST,
OCTOBER 17, 1906

SAINT-SAENS TO HONOR HUB

Famous French Composer Will Make First Stop Here

Camille Saint-Saens, the most famous of living French composers and one of the greatest composers of the world, who is coming to this country for 20 concerts, is to make his debut in America in Boston at a special concert which the Symphony Orchestra will give in Symphony Hall on Tuesday evening, Oct. 30.

It has been generally announced that he would make his American debut in New York, but C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Symphony Orchestra, made arrangements yesterday whereby his first appearance will be made in Boston.

Saint-Saens is the most versatile of musicians. He is one of the world's greatest composers, he is a conductor, an accomplished pianist and organist, and in Boston he will be heard as composer, conductor and as pianist.

The works on the programme will be his own and he will conduct all but his piano concerto, which he will play himself.

The concert which he will conduct in Symphony Hall will, of course, be out of the regular subscription. The full Symphony Orchestra will be used.

It will be in the nature of a tribute to the greatest of French composers and one of the greatest composers of the last century, a man who has left the deepest sort of impress on contemporary art.

n

ress

e

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

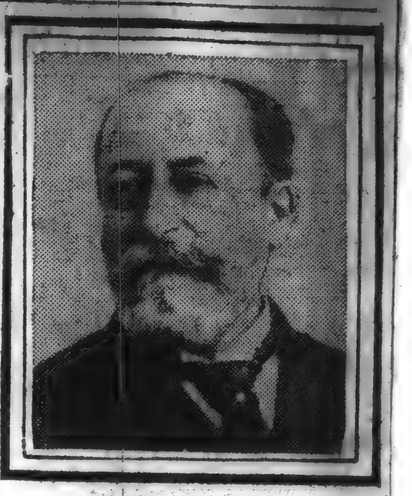
The sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the New National Theater, beginning on Tuesday afternoon, November 6, will continue until next Saturday. The sale of tickets for the first concert will open on Thursday morning, November 1.

BOSTON HERALD---WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1906

SAINT-SAENS TO START TOUR OCT. 30 IN BOSTON

GEAT FRENCH COMPOSER TO MAKE AMERICAN DUBUT

Here at Special Symphony Concert of His Own Works.



Camille Saint-Saens.
Greatest Living French Composer.

Camille Saint-Saens, the most famous of living French composers and one of the great composers of the world, who is coming to this country for 20 concerts, is to make his debut in America in Boston at a special concert which the Symphony orchestra will give in Symphony Hall Wednesday evening, Oct. 30. It has been generally announced that he would make his American debut in New York, but C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Symphony orchestra, has made arrangewhereby his first appearance will be made in Boston.

M. Saint-Saens is one of the world's greatest composers, a critic, a conductor and an accomplished pianist and organist, and in Boston he will be heard as composer, conductor and pianist. The works on the programme will be his own and he will conduct all but his piano concerto, which he will play himself.

His list of compositions is very long, including all forms of music. He has composed symphonies and symphonic poems for the orchestra, concertos for violin, 'cello and piano, a symphony for the organ, many operas and oratorios and much chamber music. As a conductor he ranks high, and in Europe he is generally regarded as one of the great pianists of our time. He is now 70 years old, yet last summer he played a Mozart concerto at the Mozart festival in Salzburg, winning the highest praise, and this fall he has given concerts in London which were regarded as events of the season.

It is fitting that his American debut should be with the Boston Symphony orchestra. In the past 20 years some 25 of his compositions have appeared on Boston Symphony programmes no less than 116 times; in fact, he ranks 13th in number of performances in a list of 236 composers.

In this country Saint-Saens is best known generally as the composer of "Samson and Delilah," which, in oratorio form, has been sung by nearly every choral society in the land. Several of his concerts in America will be devoted to the performance of this work, which he will conduct.

The concert which he will conduct in Symphony Hall will, of course, be out of the regular subscription. The full Symphony orchestra will be used. It will be in the nature of a tribute to him as a man who has left a deep impress on contemporary art. Full details regarding the concert and the programme will be made in a few days.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wo

From

Address

Date

For the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tickets will be sold as usual at reduced rates in the north and south galleries to students: These tickets will be sold only to students of the Packer Institute, Polytechnic Institute, Alelphi College, Pratt Institute, Berkeley Institute, St. John's College, St. Francis Xavier College, Brooklyn Heights Seminary, St. Catherine's Hall, Miss Rounds's School, the Master School of Music, to students of the Teachers' Training School, and all the high schools; to students of music in schools of music of high grade, or under well accredited teachers of music, and to students of other institutions that may make formal application for students' tickets and have their applications granted by the department of music.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess GLOBE

DR. KARL MUCK, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, though he has been in Boston but a month, is already making plans for his trip back to Germany next spring. Apparently there is no discontent with the Puritan capital implied, merely the eager anticipation of an enthusiastic traveller. Both Dr. and Mrs. Muck are enthusiastic travellers, and they are hoping to return to Germany by way of the Pacific, stopping in Australia and the Philippines on the way. The main objection to this plan is the extreme heat that prevails in summer on the Red Sea. Paderewski, on his way to Australia three years ago, went through the Red Sea in May, and in describing the trip to Dr. Muck, he spoke of that part of it as a nightmare.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess

Messrs. Ellis, Comee and Walter, who help to guide the travels of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will next week announce Dr. Muck's programmes for his first two New York concerts. The season sale for ten concerts has beaten all its former records at Carnegie Hall this week. As we ventured to predict, it appears that the hall could be sold out to-day for the one concert in January with Paderewski.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Now Boston is "thinking scornful," Mulvaney-like, concerning this metropolis. From Boston we bear that "Saint-Saëns, who is coming to this country for twenty concerts, is to make his début in America in Boston at a special concert which the Symphony Orchestra will give in Symphony Hall on Oct. 31. "It has," continues our authority, "been generally announced that he would make his American début in New York, but Manager C. A. Ellis has made other arrangements possible."

So Saint-Saëns, like Carl Muck, must see the Hub first and our more speedy Rim of Creation afterward.

Conductor Muck made a successful début in Boston. He was, said the Transcript in an editorial broadside, "So quiet, even so stiff, yet tense with nervous energy." And the audience's behavior was enthusiastic. "It would be considered enthusiasm even in New York."

Dr. Muck, so his friends Down East say, is an enthusiastic traveller, and in this he has the warm support of Mrs. Muck. He is considering a plan of return to Germany next spring by way of the Pacific, stopping at the Philippines, and going even so far as Australia.

The only thing that makes him doubtful is the awful heat one encounters in the Red Sea in the summer. Paderewski, when he went to Australia three years ago, went through the Red Sea in May, and he has told Dr. Muck that the memory of it is a nightmare to him.

Mrs. Muck is tremendously interested in the various Polar expeditions. She says that the only reason she regrets being a woman is that she cannot hope to go far into the North. On the orchestra's first trip this winter she might profit by the opportunity to meet Mrs. Robert E. Peary and the Snow Baby, who know the high latitudes as well as they do their home in Washington.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

s

—Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is an enthusiastic traveler and in this he has the warm support of Mrs. Muck. He is considering a plan of return to Germany next Spring by way of the Pacific, stopping at the Philippines and going even as far as Australia. The only thing that makes him doubtful is that Paderewski has told him that the Red Sea in the Summer is a place to be avoided.

[36]

SAINT-SAENS MAKES AMERICAN DEBUT IN BOSTON

Most Versatile of Musicians Will Be Heard Here as Conductor, Composer and Pianist—Special Concert by Symphony Orchestra.

Camille Saint-Saens, the most famous of living French composers and one of the greatest composers of the world, who is coming to this country for twenty concerts, is to make his debut in America in Boston at a special concert which the Symphony Orchestra will give in Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening, Oct. 30. It has been generally announced that he would make his American debut in New York, but C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Symphony Orchestra, made arrangements yesterday whereby his first appearance will be made here.

Saint-Saens is the most versatile of musicians. He is one of the world's greatest composers, he is a conductor, an accomplished pianist and organist, and, in Boston, he will be heard as composer, conductor and as pianist. The works on the program will be his own, and he will conduct all but his piano concerto, which he will play himself.

High Rank as Conductor.

His list of compositions is very long, including all forms of music. He has composed symphonies and symphonic poems for the orchestra, concertos for violin, 'cello and piano, a symphony for organ, many operas and oratorios and much chamber music. As a conductor he ranks as high as he does as a composer, and in Europe he is generally regarded as one of the great pianists of our time. He is now a man of 70 years, but last summer he played a Mozart concerto at the Mozart festival in Salzburg, winning the highest praise, and this fall he has given concerts in London which were regarded as events of the season.

It is very fitting that his American debut should be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the past twenty years twenty-six of his compositions have appeared on Boston Symphony progams no less than 116 times; in fact, he ranks thirteenth in number of performances in a list of 236 composers.

Tribute to French Composers.

In this country Saint-Saens is best known generally as the composer of "Samson and Delilah," which in oratorio form has been sung by nearly every choral society in the land. Several of his concerts in America will be devoted to the performance of this work, which he will conduct.

The concert which he will conduct in Symphony Hall will, of course, be out of the regular subscription. The full Symphony Orchestra will be used. It will be in the nature of a tribute to the greatest of French composers and one of the greatest composers of the last century, a man who has left the deepest sort of impress on contemporary art. M. Saint-Saens has not only taught by the music he has written, but as a critic he ranks with the greatest in France. His various essays have had the widest of influences on his art.

In every respect it is a most considerable distinction for Boston to have the honor of the first appearance of this great man. Full details regarding the concert and the program will be made in a few days.

The Boston Journal
OCTOBER 19, 1906.

Mrs. Muck to Visit Capital.

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the new director, Karl Muck, is eagerly anticipated in Washington society, and sittings are nearly all taken for the first concert, Nov. 6, in the New National Theater. For the January concert in that city by "our" orchestra, Paderewski is to be soloist. Mrs. Muck goes over and will be cordially received socially.

I predict a large audience of the fashionable set at the Hollis Monday to welcome Maude Adams, who has such a following in the large cities.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N.
Date OCT 20 19

The time for the renewals of last year's subscriptions to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra having expired, the general sale of season tickets for the coming series will open at the Art Building, 174 Montague street, on next Tuesday evening, October 23, and beginning the next morning will be continued at the ticket office of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, at 502 Fulton street.

[illegible] WASHINGTON STREET, [illegible] MASS.
FRIDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1906

For interesting comparison with the programmes of our Symphony Orchestra this is the programme that the Chicago Orchestra is playing today and tomorrow: Overture, "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; symphony in G-minor, No. 7, Nielsen (first time); overture, "Husitzka," Dvorak; theme with variations arranged for string orchestra from the quartet in D-minor, Schubert; concert study, Sinigaglia (first time); tone-poem, "The Moldau," Smetana. In Philadelphia, Mr. Scheel's orchestra is beginning the season today with Tschaikovski's fifth symphony for the chief number of its programme.

There is one distinction of the Symphony Concerts that bids fair to continue under Dr. Muck in even higher degrees. Probably our orchestra gives shorter concerts than does any similar band the world over. Mr. Colonne's and Mr. Chevillard's in Paris cheerfully make theirs three hours long, and their audiences listen as cheerfully. Mr. Wood, in London, seems to feel that he would be unjust to his hearers if he did not keep them at least two hours and a half. Concerts in Germany are often lengthy beyond endurance, and in New York, the Philharmonic Society and Mr. Damrosch's orchestra are seldom content with less than two hours and a quarter. By every sign the programmes of the Chicago Orchestra are as long. Yet Mr. Gericke very rarely let a concert run more than an hour and three-quarters, and sometimes an hour and a half sufficed him. Last week Dr. Muck's programme, intermission and all, filled no more time. The list for today and tomorrow is not much longer, and that for next week seems still shorter. Never have our conductors tried to hold too long the concentration, receptivity and imagination of their audiences. They have been discerning enough to see that these faculties will not remain in active play for more than an hour and a half, and wise enough to wish their hearers to come to the last number without fatigue or restlessness, and then to depart full, but not gorged. The understanding of music and the emotional response to it must come on the instant, and therefore the hearing of it makes the most exhaustive listening in the world. There is no turning backward as there is with the pages of a book; no second glance as there is with pictures and sculptures; and no veiled summaries and explanations as there often are in plays. If the psychologists and the pedagogues only knew it, there is no better training in mental and emotional concentration than the understanding and responsive listening to music.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From CITIZEN.
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date

The time for the renewals of last year's subscriptions to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra having expired, the general sale of season tickets for the coming series will open at the Art Building, No. 174 Montague street, on next Tuesday evening, Oct. 23, and beginning the next morning will be continued at the ticket office of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, at No. 502 Fulton street.

From TIMES
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date OCT 20 1906

While Olga Samaroff was the piano soloist at the recent Worcester festival, her season really began in Buffalo on Friday evening, October 11, when she gave a recital in Convention Hall of that city. Her reception was brilliant and enthusiastic as it is everywhere she plays. In October she will give recitals in Oberlin and Baltimore and will play in Philadelphia with the Philadelphia Orchestra. Next month she will give recitals, among other cities, in Boston and Detroit, and will play with the Chicago Orchestra in Chicago, coming to Brooklyn to be the soloist at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in December.

Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date OCT 20 1906

The time for the renewals of last year's subscriptions to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra having expired, the general sale of season tickets for the coming series will open at the Art Building, 174 Montague street, on next Tuesday evening, and beginning the next morning will be continued at the ticket office of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, at 502 Fulton street.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date OCT 20 1906

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is an enthusiastic traveler, and in this he has the warm support of Mrs. Muck. He is considering a plan of return to Germany next spring by way of the Pacific, stopping at the Philippines and going even as far as Australia. The only thing that makes him doubtful is the awful heat one encounters in the Red Sea in the summer. Paderewski, when he went to Australia three years ago, went through the Red Sea in May, and he has told Dr. Muck that the memory of it is a nightmare to him. Mrs. Muck is tremendously interested in the various polar expeditions. She says the only reason she regrets being a woman is that she cannot hope to get far into the north.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From TIMES
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date OCT 20 1906

The time for the renewals of last year's subscriptions to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra having expired, the general sale of season tickets for the coming series will open at the Art Building, 174 Montague street on next Tuesday evening, and beginning the next morning will be continued at the ticket office of the Institute of Arts and Sciences at 502 Fulton street.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From NEW YORK EV'G
Address
Date OCT 20 1906

One of the questions that interest New York as well as Boston audiences is the attitude Dr. Muck is likely to take toward American composers. On this point, Mr. Louis Elson remarks in the Boston Advertiser:

Dr. Muck is not as yet well acquainted with the American repertoire of compositions, even John K. Paine being but a name to him. He knew of the compositions of his friend and classmate (in Leipsic), George W. Chadwick; he had heard some of the words of Van der Stucken; Arthur Bird and the American resident musicians in Berlin were of course familiar to him. But of the larger number of American composers he was, as yet, ignorant. He expressed a desire to know more of them, and of their work, and we do not believe that the native composer will be neglected by the new conductor.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From NEWS
Address BALTIMORE, MD.
Date OCT 20 1906

BOSTON SEASON SALE.

Symphony Orchestra Tickets Will Be Ready On Monday.

The sale of season tickets for the coming series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give during the imminent season at the Lyric will open on Monday morning at Albaugh's ticket office, at 109 North Charles street. The concerts, as last year, will be given on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20.

Not since the Boston Symphony Orchestra has begun to come regularly to Baltimore has there been such a large number of renewals by the subscribers of the previous season. This is only one of the signs which seem to promise that this season the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be enjoying the greatest patronage that it has ever had in this city. While a part of this patronage may be attributed to the normal increase that the Symphony concerts show every year, unquestionably the jump in the subscriptions is due to two important reasons. The first is the presence as conductor of the Orchestra of Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin, one of the most distinguished men of his class in the world. The second is the promise that with the Orchestra will appear two such artists as Mme. Nellie Melba and Mr. Paderewski. They will appear only with the Orchestra—Paderewski at the January concert and Melba at the February concert.

The Orchestra itself returns without any change in its personnel. It will bring to Baltimore its full strength of 96 men.

From BULLETIN
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date OCT 20 1906

Five concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music beginning on Monday, November 5. The sale of tickets for the first concert will begin on Wednesday, October 31. It is an interesting fact that it would be possible now to sell out the house for the Paderewski concert in January, but no orders are being taken for this. Prices will be raised and those not having subscription tickets will [illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From NEWS
Address BALTIMORE, MD.
Date OCT 20 1906

Further Objections To The News' Musical Criticisms.

To the Editor of THE NEWS:

In my criticism of "O. B. B." I assumed that his comments published in The News were intended for the bulk of its readers who find delight in higher music, and not for the comparatively few experts in the city whose entire energies are devoted to the pursuit of the art. These comments are afforded the prestige and power of a newspaper of general circulation. Their potentiality for evil effect must be estimated with that fact in calculation, as well, too, the vital relationship they of necessity bear toward that body of people who make possible the various musical productions at the Lyric.

"B.'s" letter in The News yesterday illustrates the narrow arrogation which gentlemen of his class presume to make of the term "musical person." He writes that the Leoncavallo march was enough to rouse the ire of a musical person. Inasmuch as the march was repeated to satisfy the fervent applause not only of the gallery, but the people on the floor who paid $2 admission, and no ire was anywhere discernible, there must have been in "B.'s" notion no other musical persons present than himself, and possibly a few like him, who saved up their ire to exploit it in print.

I do not maintain that Leoncavallo should not have been criticised. But "O. B. B." in his very article of condemnation should not have made a blunder in the citation of the programme, unpardonable in any attentive auditor, much more a professional critic. Some time ago, as The News files will show, "O. B. B." condemned the consecutive performance of two movements of a certain composition. Though he was promptly notified these movements were constructed to be played together, and were never reputably disjoined, no explanation from him was forthcoming. "O. B. B.'s" denunciation of the Washington Orchestra was in the circumstances simply savage and brutal.

Take a few lines from his column in The News yesterday. He styles Paderewski "the titanic pianist." If this artist was in the habit of playing the piano with crowbars the adjective might pass. But it is grotesque and absurd when used to designate finger force, however extraordinary. "O. B. B." proceeds to question whether this "titanic pianist's" "genial lyric vein can take on the stalwartism and sustain continuity requisite to a successful symphony." This sentence is not much of a symphony, surely. Does "O. B. B." mean to assert that the great symphonists owe their success to absence of genial lyric qualities? "O. B. B." describes Doctor Muck exerting a control over performers "which savors of the occult." So that we are to expect to witness at the next Boston Symphony concert an exhibition of spiritualism as well as of music. Again, "O. B. B." writes yesterday: "The older civilizations have a truer estimate and a more practically adequate manner of showing their appreciation of men or institutions that have the power and will to educate than have we Americans." This statement is repeated sometimes by fogy votaries of Old World customs. But it seems to me statistics may easily be supplied to demonstrate that the exact opposite of this assertion is nearer truth. The incident which "O. B. B." narrates of Joachim shrinks into insignificance when compared with Patti's last farewell tour of the United States.

But enough! I am, indeed, aware of the audacity exercised to combat any staff critic of a great newspaper, but as The News, with commendable generous spirit, opens its columns for the publication of opinions attacking even its editorials, I hope to be excused, especially as "B.'s" own palliation of "O. B. B.'s" harshness is love for justice. J. G.

Baltimore, Oct. 18.

In any printed work it is easy to pick out faults of detail. Neither The News nor its critic objects to frank discussion of the criticism which appears in the columns of this paper. Much honest antagonism has been aroused by The News' musical criticism, but the fact remains that "O. B. B.'s" work is standard among persons who are informed on the subject in this community, and is regarded with respect wherever it is read. A newspaper must make its choice between criticism and puffery, and "O. B. B.'s" steadfast adherence to musical art as he understands it has done much to promote a good standard and popular interest in the subject.—Ed. News.

[37]

The Boston Journal
OCTOBER 17, 1906.

SAINT-SAENS MAKES AMERICAN DEBUT IN BOSTON

Most Versatile of Musicians Will Be Heard Here as Conductor, Composer and Pianist—Special Concert by Symphony Orchestra.

Camille Saint-Saens, the most famous of living French composers and one of the greatest composers of the world, who is coming to this country for twenty concerts, is to make his debut in America in Boston at a special concert which the Symphony Orchestra will give in Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening, Oct. 30. It has been generally announced that he would make his American debut in New York, but C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Symphony Orchestra, made arrangements yesterday whereby his first appearance will be made here.

Saint-Saens is the most versatile of musicians. He is one of the world's greatest composers, he is a conductor, an accomplished pianist and organist, and, in Boston, he will be heard as composer, conductor and as pianist. The works on the program will be his own, and he will conduct all but his piano concerto, which he will play himself.

High Rank as Conductor.

His list of compositions is very long, including all forms of music. He has composed symphonies and symphonic poems for the orchestra, concertos for violin, 'cello and piano, a symphony for organ, many operas and oratorios and much chamber music. As a conductor he ranks as high as he does as a composer, and in Europe he is generally regarded as one of the great pianists of our time. He is now a man of 70 years, yet last summer he played a Mozart concerto at the Mozart festival in Salzburg, winning the highest praise, and this fall he has given concerts in London which were regarded as events of the season.

It is very fitting that his American debut should be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the past twenty years twenty-six of his compositions have appeared on Boston Symphony progams no less than 116 times; in fact, he ranks thirteenth in number of performances in a list of 236 composers.

Tribute to French Composers.

In this country Saint-Saens is best known generally as the composer of "Samson and Delilah," which in oratorio form has been sung by nearly every choral society in the land. Several of his concerts in America will be devoted to the performance of this work, which he will conduct.

The concert which he will conduct in Symphony Hall will, of course, be out of the regular subscription. The full Symphony Orchestra will be used. It will be in the nature of a tribute to the greatest of French composers and one of the greatest composers of the last century, a man who has left the deepest sort of impress on contemporary art. M. Saint-Saens has not only taught by the music he has written, but as a critic he ranks with the greatest in France. His various essays have had the widest of influences on his art.

In every respect it is a most considerable distinction for Boston to have the honor of the first appearance of this great man. Full details regarding the concert and the program will be made in a few days.

The Boston Journal
OCTOBER 19, 1906.

Mrs. Muck to Visit Capital.

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the new director, Karl Muck, is eagerly anticipated in Washington society, and sittings are nearly all taken for the first concert, Nov. 6, in the New National Theater. For the January concert in that city by "our" orchestra, Paderewski is to be soloist. Mrs. Muck goes over and will be cordially received socially.

I predict a large audience of the fashionable set at the Hollis Monday to welcome Maude Adams, who has such a following in the large cities.

From _____

Address _____

Date _____

The time for the renewals of last year's subscriptions to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra having expired, the general sale of season tickets for the coming series will open at the Art Building, 174 Montague street, on next Tuesday evening, October 23, and beginning the next morning will be continued at the ticket office of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, at 502 Fulton street.

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
FRIDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1906

For interesting comparison with the programmes of our Symphony Orchestra, this is the programme that the Chicago Orchestra is playing today and tomorrow: Overture, "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; symphony in G-minor, No. 7, Nielsen (first time); overture, "Husitzka," Dvorak; theme with variations arranged for string orchestra from the quartet in D-minor, Schubert; concert study, Sinigaglia (first time); tone-poem, "The Moldau," Smetana. In Philadelphia, Mr. Scheel's orchestra is beginning the season today with Tschaikovski's fifth symphony for the chief number of its programme

There is one distinction of the Symphony Concerts that bids fair to continue under Dr. Muck in even higher degree. Probably our orchestra gives shorter concerts than does any similar band the world over. Mr. Colonne's and Mr. Chévillard's in Paris cheerfully make theirs three hours long, and their audiences listen as cheerfully. Mr. Wood, in London, seems to feel that he would be unjust to his hearers if he did not keep them at least two hours and a half. Concerts in Germany are often lengthy beyond endurance, and in New York, the Philharmonic Society and Mr. Damrosch's orchestra are seldom content with less than two hours and a quarter. By every sign the programmes of the Chicago Orchestra are as long. Yet Mr. Gericke very rarely let a concert run more than an hour and three-quarters, and sometimes an hour and a half sufficed him. Last week Dr. Muck's programme, intermission and all, filled no more time. The list for today and tomorrow is not much longer, and that for next week seems still shorter. Never have our conductors tried to hold too long the concentration, receptivity and imagination of their audiences. They have been discerning enough to see that these faculties will not remain in active play for more than an hour and a half, and wise enough to wish their hearers to come to the last number without fatigue or restlessness, and then to depart full, but not gorged. The understanding of music and the emotional response to it must come on the instant, and therefore the hearing of it makes the most exhaustive listening in the world. There is no turning backward as there is with the pages of a book; no second glance as there is with pictures and sculptures; and no veiled summaries and explanations as there often are in plays. If the psychologists and the pedagogues only knew it, there is no better training in mental and emotional concentration than the understanding and responsive listening to music.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From _____

Address _____

The time for the renewals of last year's subscriptions to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra having expired, the general sale of season tickets for the coming series will open at the Art Building, No. 174 Montague street, on next Tuesday evening, Oct. 23, and beginning the next morning will be continued at the ticket office of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, at No. 502 Fulton street.

...tun.

While Olga Samaroff was the piano soloist at the recent Worcester festival, her season really began in Buffalo on Friday evening, October 11, when she gave a recital in Convention Hall of that city. Her reception was brilliant and enthusiastic as it is everywhere she plays. In October she will give recitals in Oberlin and Baltimore and will play in Philadelphia with the Philadelphia Orchestra. Next month she will give recitals, among other cities, in Boston and Detroit, and will play with the Chicago Orchestra in Chicago, coming to Brooklyn to be the soloist at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in December.

ss _____

The time for the renewals of last year's subscriptions to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra having expired, the general sale of season tickets for the coming series will open at the Art Building, 174 Montague street, on next Tuesday evening, and beginning the next morning will be continued at the ticket office of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, at 502 Fulton street.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau ... Standard Union ... N. Y.

ss _____

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is an enthusiastic traveler, and in this he has the warm support of Mrs. Muck. He is considering a plan of return to Germany next spring by way of the Pacific, stopping at the Philippines and going even as far as Australia. The only thing that makes him doubtful is the awful heat one encounters in the Red Sea in the summer. Paderewski, when he went to Australia three years ago, went through the Red Sea in May, and he has told Dr. Muck that the memory of it is a nightmare to him. Mrs. Muck is tremendously interested in the various polar expeditions. She says the only reason she regrets being a woman is that she cannot hope to get far into the north.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om _____

dress _____

te _____

The time for the renewal of last year's subscriptions to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra having expired, the general sale of season tickets for the coming series will open at the Art Building, 174 Montague street on next Tuesday evening, and beginning the next morning will be continued at the ticket office of the Institute of Arts and Sciences at 502 Fulton street.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the W

From _____

Address _____

Date _____

One of the questions that interest New York as well as Boston audiences is the attitude Dr. Muck is likely to take toward American composers. On this point, Mr. Louis Elson remarks in the Boston Advertiser:

Dr. Muck is not as yet well acquainted with the American repertoire of compositions, even John K. Paine being but a name to him. He knew of the compositions of his friend and classmate (in Leipsic), George W. Chadwick; he had heard some of the words of Van der Stucken; Arthur Bird and the American resident musicians in Berlin were of course familiar to him. But of the larger number of American composers he was, as yet, ignorant. He expressed a desire to know more of them, and of their work, and we do not believe that the native composer will be neglected by the new conductor.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the ...

m _____

ress _____

e _____

BOSTON SEASON SALE.

Symphony Orchestra Tickets Will Be Ready On Monday.

The sale of season tickets for the coming series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give during the imminent season at the Lyric will open on Monday morning at Albaugh's ticket office, at 109 North Charles street. The concerts, as last year, will be given on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20.

Not since the Boston Symphony Orchestra has begun to come regularly to Baltimore has there been such a large number of renewals by the subscribers of the previous season. This is only one of the signs which seem to promise that this season the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be enjoying the greatest patronage that it has ever had in this city. While a part of this patronage may be attributed to the normal increase that the Symphony concerts show every year, unquestionably the jump in the subscriptions is due to two important reasons. The first is the presence as conductor of the Orchestra of Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin, one of the most distinguished men of his class in the world. The second is the promise that with the Orchestra will appear two such artists as Mme. Nellie Melba and Mr. Paderewski. They will appear only with the Orchestra—Paderewski at the January concert and Melba at the February concert.

The Orchestra itself returns without any change in its personnel. It will bring to Baltimore its full strength of 96 men.

om _____

dress _____

te _____

Five concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music beginning on Monday, November 5. The sale of tickets for the first concert will begin on Wednesday, October 31. It is an interesting fact that it would be possible now to sell out the house for the Paderewski concert in January, but no orders are being taken for this. Prices will be raised and those not having subscription tickets will have to take their chances.

[37]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BALTIMORE, MD.
OCT 20 1906

Further Objections To The News' Musical Criticisms.

To the Editor of THE NEWS:

In my criticism of "O. B. B." I assumed that his comments published in The News were intended for the bulk of its readers who find delight in higher music, and not for the comparatively few experts in the city whose entire energies are devoted to the pursuit of the art. These comments are afforded the prestige and power of a newspaper of general circulation. Their potentiality for evil effect must be estimated with that fact in calculation, as well, too, the vital relationship they of necessity bear toward that body of people who make possible the various musical productions at the Lyric.

"B.'s" letter in The News yesterday illustrates the narrow arrogation which gentlemen of his class presume to make of the term "musical person." He writes that the Leoncavallo march was enough to rouse the ire of a musical person. Inasmuch as the march was repeated to satisfy the fervent applause not only of the gallery, but the people on the floor who paid $2 admission, and no ire was anywhere discernible, there must have been in "B.'s" notion no other musical persons present than himself, and possibly a few like him, who saved up their ire to exploit it in print.

I do not maintain that Leoncavallo should not have been criticised. But "O. B. B." in his very article of condemnation should not have made a blunder in the citation of the programme, unpardonable in any attentive auditor, much more a professional critic. Some time ago, as The News files will show, "O. B. B." condemned the consecutive performance of two movements of a certain composition. Though he was promptly notified these movements were constructed to be played together, and were never reputably disjoined, no explanation from him was forthcoming. "O. B. B.'s" denunciation of the Washington Orchestra was in the circumstances simply savage and brutal.

Take a few lines from his column in The News yesterday. He styles Paderewski "the titanic pianist." If this artist was in the habit of playing the piano with crowbars the adjective might pass, but it is grotesque and absurd when used to designate finger force, however extraordinary. "O. B. B." proceeds to question whether this "titanic pianist's" "genial lyric vein can take on the stalwartism and sustain continuity requisite to a successful symphony." This sentence is not much of a symphony, surely. Does "O. B. B." mean to assert that the great symphonists owe their success to absence of genial lyric qualities? "O. B. B." describes Doctor Muck exerting a control over performers which savors of the occult." So that we are to expect to witness at the next Boston Symphony concert an exhibition of spiritualism as well as of music. Again, "O. B. B." writes yesterday: "The older civilizations have a truer estimate and a more practically adequate manner of showing their appreciation of men or institutions that have the power and will to educate than have we Americans." This statement is repeated sometimes by fogy votaries of Old World customs. But it seems to me statistics may easily be supplied to demonstrate that the exact opposite of this assertion is nearer truth. The incident which "O. B. B." narrates of Joachim shrinks into insignificance when compared with Patti's last farewell tour of the United States.

But enough! I am, indeed, aware of the audacity exercised to combat any staff critic of a great newspaper, but as The News, with commendable generous spirit, opens its columns for the publication of opinions attacking even its editorials, I hope to be excused, especially as "B.'s" own palliation of "O. B. B.'s" harshness is love for justice. J. G.

Baltimore, Oct. 18.

In any printed work it is easy to pick out faults of detail. Neither The News nor its critic objects to frank discussion of the criticism which appears in the columns of this paper. Much honest antagonism has been aroused by The News' musical criticism, but the fact remains that "O. B. B.'s" work is standard among persons who are informed on the subject in this community, and is regarded with respect wherever it is read. A newspaper must make its choice between criticism and puffery, and "O. B. B.'s" steadfast adherence to musical art as he understands it has done much to promote a good standard and popular interest in the subject.—Ed. News.

BOSTON TRANSCRIPT — October 20, 1906.

DR. MUCK CONDUCTS AGAIN

AN AFTERNOON OF EIGHTEENTH CENTURY MUSIC

A Programme with Individuality in It—The Right of the Old Masters to Be Heard by Themselves—Bach, Haydn and Mozart According to Dr. Muck—His Sympathy with the Spirit of [illegible] Music—Concerts of Next Week and Weeks to Come—Musical News

There was unusually warm applause, for so feminine an audience, when Dr. Muck took his place to conduct the second Symphony concert yesterday, and it continued through the afternoon. Clearly he has interested and impressed his hearers, and they have found him modestly and humanly likable. Their friendly mood was in the air, and conductor, audience and players were mutually eager and at ease. The programme was longer than that of last week, and it comprised a suite and two symphonies of the eighteenth century, and a concerto of the first quarter of the nineteenth, with Mr. Hess to play the violin part. In detail it ran:

Bach: Suite, No. 2, in B minor, for flute and strings (Von Bülow's arrangement).
Haydn: Symphony in G major (B. & H. No. 13).
Spohr: Concerto, No. 9, in D minor, for violin and orchestra.
Mozart: Symphony in C major, "Jupiter."

With reason, but with risk, Dr. Muck originally made his programme wholly from the music of the eighteenth century, and then added Spohr's concerto as most in accord with it of all that are in Mr. Hess's repertory. With reason, because the composers of the eighteenth century, even the greatest and the most lasting, are best heard by themselves. With risk, because the first and the clearest sign of the gulf of years between them and us is a sated and flagging interest if we hear too much of their music, and because a symphony by Haydn and another by Mozart on the same programme repeats the symphonic form at its simplest. The orthodox and uninspired concerto did not bring variety, in spite of the delicate brilliance and supple smoothness of Mr. Hess's playing, and the suite, with its range of diverse dance measures, began the programme. After all, it was the precise and insistent progression of allegro, largo (or andante), minuet and finale through two symphonies of which the ear, mind and fancy began to weary. The music itself did not cloy the receptive faculties—it was played too persuasively and sympathetically for that—but the iterated form stiffened them.

Otherwise Dr. Muck's scheme was altogether defensible. It implied delicate and discriminating æsthetic perceptions in him and flattering confidence in the same perceptions in his audience. The connoisseur of pictures, if he is worthy of his possessions, does not mix his Watteaus and his Bouchers, or even his Reynoldses and his Gainsboroughs, with his Monets, his Sargents, and his Barbizon landscapes. Whichever he may prefer, he will not let his nineteenth-century pictures overbear and overcloud his eighteenth. No more should the connoisseur of music, be he conductor or listener, let his nineteenth-century music dull or dim his Mozart, his Haydn and his Bach. It has no æsthetic right even to point and to invite the inevitable contrasts. The farther it is away the better. Mozart, Haydn and Bach took scanty thought of posterity and posthumous glories. They did their day's work like the industrious men and musicians they were, took the immediate rewards of it, and let the rest go hang. The pleasure with which we in 1906 hear their music lays them under no reciprocal obligation. The conductor who tries to make them sound modern and the hearer who tries to listen to them as though they were modern go equally wrong. Mozart and Haydn and Bach wrote not only according to themselves, but according to their time and their hearers. Let their music, if it can, recall and recreate for the hour the moods, tastes and standards to which it was addressed. Let it make its own atmosphere and maintain it as long as it can. Do not disturb it with modern notions or smother it in modern wraps. There is a fair field in æsthetics as well as in sport, and Dr. Muck gave his eighteenth-century music a fair field yesterday, though he did have to play it in a hall, and therefore with an orchestra, twice or thrice too large for it.

Thus left to itself the music did speak with its own voice and summon its own atmosphere. It never commanded—that was not the way of the arts in the eighteenth century—it enticed, persuaded and fascinated. It charmed away the mental, emotional and æsthetic barriers that separate us of the twentieth century from the ladies in their brocades and the men in their laces for whom it was written. It melted all the standards by which we might falsely try it, and then crystallized standards of its own. For the moment the atmosphere of Symphony Hall became, with a little spring and settling of the imagination, like that of the minor court at Cöthen, for which Bach made his suite, or of the Concerts Spirituels in Paris, hearing the symphony commissioned from Haydn, or of the concert room at Prague, where Mozart felt the sunshine of favor. Bach's flute trod its measures through his stately dances, in and out among the curtseying and attendant strings, or tripped through the light steps of his "Badinage." We who listened were content to ask no more of music than glorified dance melodies and rhythms, pattering on the ear and the fancy, like the fall of dancing feet. Then came the clamorous staccato chords of the beginning of Haydn's symphony. Could eighteenth-century music turn strenuous after all? But it was only playful thumping. In a moment the music was as free from thunderbolts as lace, and was weaving its delicate patterns through a light allegro. Homely was the song of the largo, but the eighteenth century liked to play at homeliness and musing, and to end both as Haydn ends his with measured minuet and the gayer dance of the finale. Form grew lovable for its own sake and melody for the mere beautiful curve and contents of it, while play with theme and figure became exhilarating sport.

Yet Haydn in his symphonies and Bach in this particular suite were writing no more than superficial music. It was Mozart's symphony that searched the heart of his time as well as his own. Here were perfection and even complexity of form, as complexity went in those days. Yet underneath was a shiver and quiver of passion. Here was the beauty of sound for its own long-drawn and curving loveliness, yet underneath was haunting and wistful melancholy—the melancholy of some of Watteau's pictures. Here was restlessness, sharpening contrasts and disturbing rhythms, as though the tone patterns were shaken and twisted by some quick breath of passion. Here was music that leapt out of the pretty bonds of the minuet into the tumultuous freedom of the finale. The "Jupiter" symphony is indeed music with a life of its own, independent of all else but Mozart, yet in it also is the mood of its time. Mozart in spite of his detachment had begun to feel it and to smart under it.

This eighteenth-century music spoke, persuaded and charmed, because the form and the manner of it exactly impart its mood and substance, because all four are in nearly perfect fusion, and because Dr. Muck and the orchestra brought the fusion and the fascination to very full expression. It is formal music, but form that Bach, Haydn and Mozart never turn rigid, and Dr. Muck kept his band as supple as they. It is music that is full of the tracery of delicate detail that never becomes hard or meticulous. It was lightness itself, it had even the sense of graceful improvisation as Dr. Muck and his men often played it. They sang the largo of Haydn and the andante of Mozart as pure instrumental song. Under their hands the rhythms of Bach's suite danced in long measured curves or in tripping steps. They sent the gay abandon of Haydn's finale sparkling to the ear and the fancy. Their rush in Mozart's fugue was breathless—and sure. Everywhere were the beauty and the pliancy of tone, the euphony and the symmetry that give eighteenth-century music half its magic. Conductor anu men caught the cool, clear brightness of it. Not once did Dr. Muck try to force or to distort this music that it might sound for something different from what it is. He followed the letter of it to very delicate shadings, to very light transitions. He animated it with its spirit and life. But did he a little miss the wistfulness and the tenderness that Mozart at least could put quivering underneath?

H. T. P.

Concerts Next Week

For the third pair of Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck for the first time this season has put an ultra-modern composition, Strauss's "Don Juan," on his programme. With "Death and Transfiguration," it is the most familiar of Strauss's tone-poems, and the composer himself has conducted in it in Boston. It will put Dr. Muck, moreover, to new and interesting tests. The symphony is the first of Brahms in C-minor, and the dances of the sylphs and the will-o'-the-wisps and the Rakoczy March from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" complete the programme, which is notably short. There will be no soloist.

For the first of the Symphony concerts at Cambridge, in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening, at eight, Dr. Muck has made a programme of three symphonies, Haydn's in G-major, Mozart's "Jupiter," and Beethoven's fifth. Only these and nothing more. We doubt whether a programme like this has been made in America in recent years, and Dr. Muck is far too able a conductor to need to turn instructor in the evolution of the symphony.

Coming Concerts

Monday evening, Oct. 29, in Chickering Hall, first concert for the new season by the Symphony Quartet, with a new quartet for strings by Suk, a trio for strings by Beethoven and a quintet for piano and strings by César Franck on the programme. Messrs. Hess, Roth, Férir and Warnke make the quartet and Mr. Gebhard is the pianist for this concert.

Tuesday evening, Oct. 30, in Symphony Hall, concert by the Symphony Orchestra in honor of Saint-Saëns, the eminent French composer, who makes his first public appearance in America. The programme will consist of his own music with Saint-Saëns conducting and playing the solo part in one of his piano concertos. [Sale of seats, with mail orders in advance, begins Oct. 26.]

Friday afternoon, Nov. 2, in Symphony Hall, fourth Symphony rehearsal with Schumann's first symphony and Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony on the programme and Olive Fremstad for the singer.

Saturday evening, Nov. 3, in Symphony Hall, fourth Symphony concert, with programme and singer as just noted.

/ / + / /

The Plans of the Longy Club

Mr. Longy's club of virtuosi upon wind instruments will give its three concerts this season in Potter Hall on the evenings of Wednesdays, Nov. 14, Jan. 2 and Feb. 6. The retirement of the first flute, André Maquarre, makes a single change in the personnel of the club. Daniel Maquarre succeeds him, and Arthur Brooke, likewise of the Symphony Orchestra, takes his place in turn as the second flute. Various members of the Symphony Orchestra, notably Mr. Schuecker, the harpist; Mr. Kloepfel, the trumpeter, and Mr. Rettberg, the drummer, are to assist the club as its programmes may require. All music for groups of wind instruments is rarely heard, and Mr. Longy's club is almost the only body that now cultivates it in America; but this year there are an exceptional number of new compositions in his scheme. Young French composers like Georges Enesco—Servian by birth, but Parisian by residence and training—have a place in it, along with one American, Arthur Bird and such little known writers for wind instruments as Mouquet and Lacroy. Notable, too, are the number of compositions that enlist many instruments. Enesco's and Bird's ask ten; one of Mouquet's is also a "little symphony" for ten players, and Reynaldo Hahn's suite requires thirteen. Uncommonly interesting, too, is the concerto for horn that Richard Strauss wrote for his father, an accomplished horn player, and that is appearing on programmes the world over. From the repertory of the club Mr. Longy takes two octets for wind instruments by Beethoven and Lazzari respectively. For the rest music new in itself or to his hearers will make his programmes as follows:

Mozart: Trio for oboe, clarinet and bassoon.
Strauss: Concerto for horn.
Bird: Serenade for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.
Reynaldo Hahn: Suite for two flutes, oboe, two clarinets, two horns, two bassoons, trumpet, tympani, harp and piano.
Mouquet: "Pan"—Suite for flute and piano.
Mouquet: Sinfonietta for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.
Reinecke: Sextet for flute, oboe, clarinet, two horns and bassoon.
Reinecke: Trio for oboe, horn and piano.
Woollett: Quintet for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon.
Grieg: Lyrische Stücke (four small pieces).
Weber: Menuetto.
Händel: Air Varié.
Lacroy: Variations symphoniques for flute, oboe, English horn, clarinet, bass clarinet, horn and bassoon.
Enesco: Decemet for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.

/ / + / /

[38]

The Musical Journal
OCTOBER 20, 1906

THE LONGY CLUB.

Mr. George Longy, the leader of the Longy Club, is planning to present a most interesting lot of novelties at the concerts of this club this winter. They will be given in Potter Hall, on Wednesday evenings, Nov. 14, Jan. 2 and Feb. 6. The assisting artists will be Messrs. Schuecker, harpist; Kloepfel, trumpet; Rettberg, tympanist, and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The only change noted in the membership of the club this year is the retirement of Mr. Andre Maquarre, the first flute. His place is taken by Mr. Daniel Maquarre, and Mr. Arthur Brooke becomes the second flute. The program will be chosen from a notable list of works.

NEXT [illegible] SYMPHONY.

Brahms, Strauss and Berlioz are the composers represented in the third Symphony program, which will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. There will be no soloist. Particular interest is attached to the performance of Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," because Dr. Muck has for so many years been a friend and colleague of the composer, and it is certain that he will read the poem with highest authority. The full program is as follows:

Symphony in C minor No. 1.....Brahms
Tone Poem, "Don Juan".....Strauss
Three movements from the "Damnation of Faust".....Berlioz

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The general season sale for the series of six concerts which the Boston Symphony Quartet will give in Chickering Hall beginning on Monday, Oct. 29, will open at Symphony Hall Monday morning, Oct. 22. The transfer of the concerts from Jordan Hall to Chickering Hall has met with a great deal of approval among the patrons of the quartet, because it was the general belief that Jordan Hall was too large for chamber music and that it was impossible to find there the intimacy necessary to get the best results in such work. The Boston Symphony Quartet seems steadily to grow in the appreciation of the Boston public, for this year the subscription sale has been much larger than ever before. The sale of tickets for the first concert will open at Symphony Hall on next Friday morning, Oct. 26. As heretofore announced the assisting artist will be Mr. Heinrich Gebhard.

SAINT-SAENS' COMING.

The coming of Camille Saint-Saens to Boston on Tuesday evening, Oct. 30, under the management of the Symphony Orchestra gives promise of being one of the most interesting musical events of the season. This remarkable old man, who is now in his seventy-first year, is coming to America for the first time, despite the tradition that once in his annual disappearances from Paris he spent some weeks in New York incognito. While in America he will take part in twenty concerts. Some of these will be orchestral, when he will conduct his own works and play one of his concertos for the pianoforte. This is what he will do in Boston. Others will be choral, when he will conduct performances of his "Samson and Delilah." Of all the musicians of the past half century Saint-Saens, to say the least, is the most versatile. His fame as a composer is known to all. In that branch of his art he unquestionably stands at the head of all men in France since Berlioz. His coming to Boston will be, therefore, something more than the mere appearance of a "star." The concert which he will give with the assistance of the full Symphony Orchestra is more in the nature of a tribute to him and his achievements. The prices for the concert will be $2, $1.50 and $1. The public sale of seats will be open at Symphony Hall on next Friday morning, Oct. 26. In the meantime mail orders will be received and filled in the order in which they arrive, to be filled before the opening of the public sale.

THE BOSTON TRAVELER
OCTOBER 20, 1906

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Brahms, Strauss and Behlioz are the composers represented in the third Symphony programme which will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. There will be no soloist. Particular interest is attached to the performance of Richard Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan," because Dr. Muck has for so many years been a friend and colleague of the composer, and it is certain that he will read the poem with highest authority. The full programme is as follows:

Symphony in C minor No. 1....Brahms
Tone poem, "Don Juan".....Strauss
Three movements from the "Damnation of Faust".....Berlioz

Georges Longy, the leader of the Longy Club, is planning a most interesting lot of novelties for the concerts of the club this winter. They will be given in Potter hall on Wednesday evenings, Nov. 14, Jan. 2 and Feb. 6.

The general season sale for the series of six concerts which the Boston Symphony Quartet will give in Chickering Hall, beginning on Monday, Oct. 29, will open at Symphony Hall Monday morning, Oct. 22.

The coming of Camille Saint-Saens to Boston on Tuesday evening, Oct. 30, under the auspices of the Symphony orchestra, gives promise of being one of the most interesting musical events of the season. This remarkable old man, who is now in his 71st year, is coming to America for the first time, despite the tradition that once in his annual disappearances from Paris, he spent some weeks in New York incognito. While in America he will take part in 20 concerts.

N.Y. Times
OCT 21 1906

Dr. Karl Muck conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra

The season sale of tickets for the two series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall during the coming Winter has opened at the box office of Carnegie Hall.

More than ordinary interest is attached to the Boston Symphony concerts this season, due to the presence of Dr. Kari Muck of Berlin, who has come to America on a year's leave of absence from the Royal Opera of that city to be the conductor of Boston's orchestra. It is thirteen years since the Boston Symphony brought a new conductor to New York—if the visit, last year, of Vincent d'Indy be excepted—the last one having been Emil Paur, now of the Pittsburg Orchestra.

Dr. Muck comes to this country with a reputation won in a career of twenty-six years in some of the most exacting posts of Europe. Beginning at the bottom round of the ladder, as chorusmaster in the Opera in Zurich, his advancement was so rapid that in twelve years he was appointed one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera in Berlin, which post he now holds. While it is true that he is best known as an operatic conductor, his experience in concert work has been very thorough, and in Europe he is esteemed highly in concert.

There will be no soloists at the November concerts in New York, and for the March concerts no soloists are yet announced, since Dr. Muck has not yet determined what he will do on his last visit to this city. But the soloists who are announced are Paderewski, Rosenthal, Gabrilowitsch, and Olga Samaroff, pianists, and Willy Hess and Timothée Adamowski, violinists.

Dr. Muck brought with him to America the score of Paderewski's new symphony which is to have its first performance in Boston on Jan. 4 and 5. In the next week it will be played in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York, and Brooklyn. Paderewski will be present to hear it played, for he is to be the soloist with the orchestra on that occasion.

Paderewski will play but once in New York next Winter, and that will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He comes to this country for three weeks, in which time he will play seven concerts with the Boston Symphony. Rosenthal will make his first appearance with orchestra in New York with the Boston Symphony.

[illegible]ss

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The Kneisel Quartet announces that its chamber [illegible] given at [illegible] Hall on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 13, Dec. 11, Jan. 8, Feb. 5, March 5, April [illegible] son's subscribers may secure the same seats as last season if they will apply to J. M. Priaul[illegible] & Co., 367 Broadway, before Oct. 25. General subscriptions may be secured on and after Nov. 1.

The Adele Margulies Trio announces three chamber music concerts to be given at [illegible] Tuesday, Oct. 22; Tuesday, Jan. 15, and Tuesday, Feb. 19.

Prof. Willy Hess, the leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, has decided to put on his first New York programme a quartet in B flat major, Op. 11, by Joseph Suk. This is believed to be new to New York. Suk, some of whose larger works have been played here, is the second violin of the famous Bohemian quartet. The first concert of the three will be given in Mendelssohn Hall Friday afternoon, Nov. 9.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
N. Y. AMERICAN
OCT 21 1906

Musical Offerings.

It is already possible to announce ... the now fast nearing season ... grand opera at the Metropolitan ... the ambitious character of its ... the efficiency of the com... ... them, be the ... ard in this country. ... novelties," among ... Lescaut" and ... "La Damna... ... "Fedora," ... is also ... who ... during the past week directed several ... rehearsals of Richard Strauss's stu... ...pendous and extraordinary work.

The season sale for the ten concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been in progress at Carnegie Hall the past week, is the largest the orchestra has had since it first began to come to this city. In connection with this sale it is an interesting fact that Carnegie Hall could be almost sold out to-day for the concert in January when Paderewski will be the soloist. As a matter of fact, from the present aspect, there will be none too many seats to dispose of when the season sale is finished.

Dr. Muck's debut in Boston was accomplished with popular favor. At the end of Beethoven's fifth symphony at the concert the audience cheered him. The programmes for the first two New York concerts will be announced next week.

Prof. Willy Hess, the leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, has decided to put on his first New York programme a quartette in B flat major, op. 11, by Joseph Suk. This is believed to be quite new to New York. Suk, some of whose larger works have been played here, is the second violin of the famous Bohemian Quartette. The first concert of the three will be given in Mendelssohn Hall Friday afternoon, No-

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
N. Y. AMERICAN
OCT 21 1906

Prof. Willy Hess, the leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, has decided to put on his first New York programme a quartet in B flat major, op. 11, by Joseph Suk. This is believed to be quite new to New York. Suk, some of whose larger works have been played here, is the second violin of the famous Bohemian Quartet. The first concert of the three will be given in Mendelssohn Hall Friday afternoon, No-

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
REVIEW
NEW YORK CITY.
OCT 21 1906

Dr. Karl Muck gab im „Musical Age" eine interessante Beschreibung des Eindrucks, den die Einfahrt in den New Yorker Hafen auf ihn machte.

„Ich war sprachlos — ja, einfach sprachlos — als ich am Horizonte die gigantischen Häuser dieser Stadt auftauchen sah und noch sprachloser, als der Dampfer Langsam in den Hafen fuhr. Herrlich, es ist gigantisch, überwältigend, verwirrend! Die kühnsten Bilder, die ich mir machte, sind übertroffen. Die riesenhaften Gebäude mit ihren tausenden lauernden Augen drängten mit sofort das Bild größten Arbeitsfleißes auf. Das spricht deutlich für die Thatkraft, dem dieses Land seine Größe verdankt. Der Anblick ist wundervoll — einfach wundervoll. Das mag Ihnen naiv vorkommen. Aber bedenken Sie, daß ich zum ersten Male an diese Küste komme. Wenn ich wiederkomme, werde ich meine Eindrücke genauer beschreiben können. Heute fesselt mich alles, einfach alles."

SUNDAY HERALD
OCTOBER 21, 1906

THE LONGY CLUB

Mr. Georges Longy, the leader of the Longy Club (wind instruments) will present interesting novelties at its concerts the coming winter. These will be given in Potter Hall on Wednesday evenings, Nov. 14, Jan. 2 and Feb. 6. Messrs. Schuecker, harpist; Kloepfel, trumpet; Rettberg, tympanist, and other members of the Boston Symphony orchestra will assist. The only change noted in the membership of the club is the presence of Mr. Brooke as second flute. Mr. D. Maquarre has become first flute, Mr. A. Maquarre has retired. The programmes will be chosen from the following list of works:

Beethoven, octet, op. 103.
Mozart, trio for oboe, clarinet and bassoon.
Strauss, concerto for horn, op. 40.
Mozart, serenade.
Bird, suite.
Bach, "Pan," suite for flute and piano.
Mouquet, pantomietta.
Reinecke, sextet.
Woolett, quintet.
Reinecke, trio for oboe, horn and piano.
Grieg, lyrische stuecke.
Weber, menuetto; Handel air varie, for oboe, two clarinets and two bassoons.
Cesari, octet.
Lacroix, variation symphonique.
Enesco, decemet for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

The general season sale for the series of six concerts which the Boston Symphony quartet will give in Chickering Hall, beginning on Monday, Oct. 29, will open at Symphony Hall tomorrow (Monday) morning, Oct. 22. The quartet is steadily to grow in appreciation of the Boston public, for this year the season sale has been much larger than ever before. The sale of tickets for the first concert will open at Symphony Hall on next Friday morning, Oct. 26. The assistant pianist will be Heinrich Gebhard. The programme will include Suk's quartet in B flat op. 11, Beethoven's trio for strings, C minor op. 9, No. 3; Cesar Franck's [illegible] quartet.

DR. CARL MUCK.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss

The season sale for the ten concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which has been in progress at Carnegie Hall the last week is by all odds the largest the orchestra has had since it first began to come to this city. In connection with this sale it is an interesting fact that Carnegie Hall could be almost sold out to-day for the concert in January when Paderewski will be the soloist. As a matter of fact, from the present aspect, there will be none too many seats to dispose of when the season sale is finished. Dr. Muck's debut in Boston was cordially received. At the end of Beethoven's fifth symphony the audience cheered him. The programmes for the first two New York concerts will be announced next week.

Prof. Willy Hess, the leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, has decided to put on his first New York programme a quartette in B flat major, op. 11, by Joseph Suk. This is believed to be quite new to New York. Suk, some of whose larger works have been played here, is the second violin of the famous Bohemian Quartette. The first concert of the three will be given in Mendelssohn Hall, Friday afternoon, November 9.

From

Address

The season sale for the ten concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was in progress at Carnegie Hall last week, is by all odds the largest the orchestra has had since it first began to come to this city. Carnegie Hall could be almost sold out to-day for the single concert in January when Paderewski will be the soloist. As a matter of fact, from the present aspect, there will be none too many seats to dispose of when the season sale is finished.

Dr. Muck's debut in Boston was accomplished with popular favor. At the end of Beethoven's fifth symphony at the concert the audience cheered him. The programmes for the first two New York concerts will be announced next week.

Mr. Longy has arranged three concerts for this winter. He and his club will play in Potter Hall on Wednesday evenings, Nov. 21, Jan. 2, Feb. 6. Among the works he proposes to introduce are an octet by Beethoven, an octet by Lazzari, a serenade by Bird, and among the novelties a concerto for horn and piano, Strauss; a sextet, by Reinecke; trio for horn, oboe and piano, by Reinecke; decemet (wood wind instruments alone), by Mouquet; Pan (suite for flute and piano), Mouquet; quintet, by Woolett; Variations Symphoniques, by Lacroix; trio for oboe, clarinet and bassoon, Mozart; small pieces, by Händel, Weber and Grieg; decemet, by G. Enesco; "Paysages Normands," by G. Spork; grands suite ancienne for wood wind, two harps, piano, trumpet and symphony, by Reynaldo Hahn. And by kind authorization of the master, Saint-Saëns, Mr. Longy hopes to be able to give one hearing of the "Animals' Carnival" ("Carnaval des Animaux), a fine, small piece for wind instruments and

C. R.

ess

OCT 21 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the New National Theater beginning on Tuesday afternoon, November 6, is now in progress at Smith's ticket office. The sale of tickets for the first concert will open at that place on Thursday morning, November 1. The program for this first concert will be announced next week.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
RECORD
PHILADELPHIA
OCT 21

Boston Symphony Tickets.

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in the Academy of Music, beginning Monday, November 5, is proceeding at Miss Harris' ticket office, No. 1115 Chestnut street. The sale of tickets for the first concert will begin on Wednesday, October 31. It is an interesting fact that it would be possible now to sell out the house for the Paderewski concert in January, but no orders are being taken for this. Prices will be raised, and persons not holding season tickets will be at a disadvantage so far as obtaining good sittings as that concert is concerned.

N. Y. Herald

dress

OCT 21 1906

BOSTON AND NEW YORK SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will visit New York as usual and give five concerts and five matinees as its twenty-first season here, the times for these being, as usual, Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons and the several dates November 3 and 10, December 6 and 8, January 10 and 12, January 21 and 23, and March 21 and 23.

The organization's new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, who comes from the Imperial Opera in Berlin to succeed Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, has been a prominent figure in the life of musical Germany, and he is said to combine in a high degree the qualities which make an able conductor.

INQUIRER
PHILADELPHIA
OCT 21

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in the Academy of Music, beginning on Monday, November 5, is proceeding at Miss Harris' ticket office at 1115 Chestnut street. The sale of tickets for the first concert will begin on Wednesday, October 31. It is an interesting fact that it would be possible now to sell out the house for the Paderewski concert in January, but no orders are being taken for this. Prices will be raised and those not having subscription tickets will have to take their chances.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the

om

ddress PHILADELPHIA,

ate OCT 21

Paderewski Cancels Tour.

New York, Oct. 20 (Special).—Word was received by cable to-day from Ignace Paderewski, the famous pianist, who was booked to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert on November 3, in Carnegie Hall, that he was not coming to America because he was having trouble with his arm. This means that he will forfeit about $40,000.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
HERALD
WASHINGTON, D.
OCT 21

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give at the New National Theater, beginning on Tuesday afternoon, November 6, is now in progress. The sale of tickets for the first concert will open on Thursday morning, November 1. The programme for this next concert will be announced next week.

om TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
dress
OCT 21

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Season.

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the New National Theater beginning on Tuesday afternoon, November 6, is now in progress at Smith's ticket office in Sanders & Stayman's store, 1327 F street, and will continue until Saturday, October 27.

[39]

OCTOBER 21, 1906

CAMILLE SAINT-SAENS

The coming of Camille Saint-Saens to Boston on Tuesday evening, Oct. 30, under the auspices of the Symphony Orchestra, gives promise of being one of the most interesting musical events of the season. This remarkable old man, who is now in his 71st year, is coming to America for the first time, despite the tradition that once in his annual disappearances from Paris he spent some weeks in New York incognito. He himself asserts that he "disappeared" but once, which was in 1889, when he left Paris the night before the production of his opera, "Ascanio," and buried himself for three months in the Canary Islands. While in America he will take part in 20 concerts.

His coming to Boston will be, therefore, something more than mere appearance of a "star." The concert which he will give with the assistance of the full Symphony Orchestra is more in the nature of a tribute to him and to his achievements. It is impossible at this time to give the programme, but in general it will consist exclusively of his own works, which he will conduct, and in addition to these it is expected that he will play his concerto for pianoforte in G minor.

The prices for the concert will be $2, $1.50 and $1. The public sale of seats will open at Symphony Hall on next Friday morning, Oct. 26.

THE LONGY CLUB

Mr. George Longy, the leader of the Longy Club, is planning to present a number of most interesting novelties at his concerts in the coming winter. These will be given in Potter Hall on Wednesday evenings, Nov. 14, Jan. 2 and Feb. 6. The assisting artists will be Messrs. Schuecker, harpist; Kloepfel, trumpet; Rettberg, tympanist, and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The only change noted in the membership of the club is the presence of Mr. Brooke as second flute. Mr. D. Maquarre has become first flute, Mr. A. Maquarre having retired.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

The general season sale for the series of six concerts which the Boston Symphony Quartet will give in Chickering Hall, beginning on Monday, Oct. 29, will open at Symphony Hall tomorrow, Oct. 22. The transfer of the concerts to Chickering Hall has met with much approval among the patrons of the quartet. The sale of tickets for the first concert will open at Symphony Hall on next Friday morning, Oct. 26. As heretofore announced the assisting artist will be Mr. Heinrich Gebhard.

paper Cutting Bureau in the World
SUN
BALTIMORE, MD
OCT 21 1906

PADEREWSKI WON'T COME

Cables Agents Without Giving Any Reason.

New York, Oct. 20.—Ignace Paderewski, the pianist, who was due to arrive from Europe today on the Hamburg-American Line steamship Amerika, cabled his agents here at the last moment that he would not come. No reason was assigned in his message, but friends declare he is suffering from an injured arm.

Paderewski was to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He had signed a contract for $40,000, and when this was lived up to he was to give private recitals and appear for several charitable institutions, as he had promised on his last trip.

Rosenthal is a passenger on the Amerika, and Lhevinne, another celebrated pianist, was also due today.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
SUN
BALTIMORE, MD
OCT 21 1906

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

The sale of season tickets for the coming series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give during the coming season in the Lyric will open tomorrow at Albaugh's. The concerts, as last year, will be given on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
N.Y. AMERICAN
OCT 21 1906

Musical Offerings.

It is already possible to announce that the now fast nearing season of Grand opera at the Metropolitan will, as to the ambitious character of its programmes and the brilliancy of the company engaged to interpret them, be the finest remarkable record in this country. Rehearsals of novelties, among then Puccini's "La Damsa. "Madame Butterfly," Bruneau's "Fedora," tion de Faust," and Giordano's are well under way. "Sheba" has also been taken in hand by Alfred who has during the past week directed several piano rehearsals of Richard Strauss's stupendous and extraordinary work.

The season sale for the ten concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been in progress at Carnegie Hall the past week, is the largest the orchestra has had since it first began to come to this city. In connection with this sale it is an interesting fact that Carnegie Hall could be almost sold out to-day for the concert in January when Paderewski will be the soloist. As a matter of fact, from the present aspect there will be none too many seats to dispose of when the season sale is finished.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
N.Y. AMERICAN
OCT 21 1906

Professor Willy Hess, the leader of the Boston Symphony Qartet, has decided to put on his first New York programme a quartet in B flat major, op. 11, by Joseph Suk. This is believed to be quite new to New York. Suk, some of whose larger works have been played here, is the second violin of the famous Bohemian Quartet. The first concert of the three will be given in Mendelssohn Hall Friday afternoon, November 9.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK CITY

Dr. Karl Muck gab im „Musical Age" eine interessante Beschreibung des Eindrucks, den die Einfahrt in den New Yorker Hafen auf ihn machte.

„Ich war sprachlos — ja, einfach sprachlos — als ich am Horizonte die gigantischen Häuser dieser Stadt auftauchen sah und noch sprachloser, als der Dampfer langsam in den Hafen fuhr. Wirklich, es ist gigantisch, überwältigend, verwirrend! Die kühnsten Bilder, die ich mir machte, sind übertroffen. Die riesenhaften Gebäude mit ihren tausenden lauernden Augen drängten mir sofort das Bild größten Arbeitsfleißes auf. Das spricht deutlich für die Thatkraft, dem dieses Land seine Größe verdankt. Der Anblick ist wundervoll — einfach wundervoll. Das mag Ihnen naiv vorkommen. Aber bedenken Sie, daß ich zum ersten Male an diese Küste komme. Wenn ich wiederkomme, werde ich meine Eindrücke gemäßer beschreiben können. Heute fesselt mich alles, einfach alles."

SUNDAY HERALD---OCTOBER 21, 1906

THE LONGY CLUB.

Mr. Georges Longy, the leader of the Longy Club (wind instruments) will present interesting novelties at his concerts the coming winter. These will be given in Potter Hall on Wednesday evenings, Nov. 14, Jan. 2 and Feb. 6. Messrs. Schuecker, harpist; Kloepfel, trumpet; Rettberg, tympanist, and other members of the Boston Symphony orchestra will assist. The only change noted in the membership of the club is the presence of Mr. Brooke as second flute. Mr. D. Maquarre has become first flute. Mr. A. Maquarre has retired. The programmes will be chosen from the following list of works:

Beethoven, octet, op. 103.
Mozart, trio for oboe, clarinet and bassoon.
Strauss, concerto for horn, op. 40.
Bird, serenade.
Hahn, suite.
Mouquet, "Pan," suite for flute and piano, and Sinfonietta.
Reinecke, sextet.
Woollett, quintet.
Reinecke, trio for oboe, horn and piano.
Grieg, lyrische stuecke.
Weber, menuetto; Handel air varie, for flute, oboe, two clarinets and two bassoons.
Lazzari, octet.
Lacroix, variation symphonique.
Enesco, decemet for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The general season sale for the series of six concerts which the Boston Symphony quartet will give in Chickering Hall, beginning on Monday, Oct. 29, will open at Symphony Hall tomorrow (Monday) morning, Oct. 22. The quartet seems steadily to grow in appreciation of the Boston public, for this year the subscription sale has been much larger than ever before. The sale of tickets for the first concert will open at Symphony Hall on next Friday morning, Oct. 26. The assistant pianist will be Mr. Heinrich Gebhard. The programme will include Suk's quartet in B flat op. 11; Beethoven's trio for strings, C minor, op. 9, No. 3; Cesar Franck's piano quintet.

DR. CARL MUCK.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss

The season sale for the ten concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which has been in progress at Carnegie Hall the last week is by all odds the largest the orchestra has had since it first began to come to this city. In connection with this sale it is an interesting fact that Carnegie Hall could be almost sold out to-day for the concert in January when Paderewski will be the soloist. As a matter of fact, from the present aspect, there will be none too many seats to dispose of when the season sale is finished. Dr. Muck's debut in Boston was cordially received. At the end of Beethoven's fifth symphony the audience cheered him. The programmes for the first two New York concerts will be announced next week.

Prof. Willy Hess, the leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, has decided to put on his first New York programme a quartette in B flat major, op. 11, by Joseph Suk. This is believed to be quite new to New York. Suk, some of whose larger works have been played here, is the second violin of the famous Bohemian Quartette. The first concert of the three will be given in Mendelssohn Hall, Friday afternoon, November 9.

From

Address

The season sale for the ten concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was in progress at Carnegie Hall last week, is by all odds the largest the orchestra has had since it first began to come to this city. Carnegie Hall could be almost sold out to-day for the single concert in January when Paderewski will be the soloist. As a matter of fact, from the present aspect, there will be none too many seats to dispose of when the season sale is finished.

Dr. Muck's debut in Boston was accomplished with popular favor. At the end of Beethoven's fifth symphony at the concert the audience cheered him. The programmes for the first two New York concerts will be announced next week.

Mr. Longy has arranged three concerts for this winter. He and his club will play in Potter Hall on Wednesday evenings, Nov. 21, Jan. 2, Feb. 6. Among the works he proposes to introduce are an octet by Beethoven, an octet by Lazzari, a serenade by Bird, and among the novelties a concerto for horn and piano, Strauss; a sextet, by Reinecke; trio for horn, oboe and piano, by Reinecke; decemet (wood wind instruments alone), by Mouquet; Pan (suite for flute and piano), Mouquet; quintet, by Woolett; Variations Symphoniques, by Lacroix; trio for oboe, clarinet and bassoon, Mozart; small pieces, by Händel, Weber and Grieg; decemet, by G. Enesco; "Paysages Normands," by G. Spork; grande suite ancienne for wood wind, two harps, piano, trumpet and symphony, by Reynaldo Hahn. And by kind authorization of the master, Saint-Saëns, Mr. Longy hopes to be able to give one hearing of the "Animals' Carnival" ("Carnaval des Animaux), a fine, small piece for wind instruments and

ess

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the New National Theater beginning on Tuesday afternoon, November 6, is now in progress at Smith's ticket office. The sale of tickets for the first concert will open at that place on Thursday morning, November 1. The programme for this first concert will be announced next week.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m

dress

te

Boston Symphony Tickets.

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in the Academy of Music, beginning Monday, November 5, is proceeding at Miss Harris' ticket office, No. 1115 Chestnut street. The sale of tickets for the first concert will begin on Wednesday, October 31. It is an interesting fact that it would be possible now to sell out the house for the Paderewski concert in January, but no orders are being taken for this. Prices will be raised, and persons not holding season tickets will be at a disadvantage so far as obtaining good sittings as that concert is concerned.

om

dress

te

OCT 21 1906

BOSTON AND NEW YORK SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will visit New York as usual and give five concerts and five matinees as its twenty-first season here, the times for these being, as usual, Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons and the several dates November 8 and 10, December 6 and 8, January 10 and 12, January 21 and 23, and March 21 and 23.

The organization's new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, who comes from the Imperial Opera in Berlin to succeed Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, has been a prominent figure in the life of musical Germany, and he is said to combine in a high degree the qualities which make an able conductor.

l

ess

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in the Academy of Music, beginning on Monday, November 5, is proceeding at Miss Harris' ticket office at 1115 Chestnut street. The sale of tickets for the first concert will begin on Wednesday, October 31. It is an interesting fact that it would be possible now to sell out the house for the Paderewski concert in January, but no orders are being taken for this. Prices will be raised and those not having subscription tickets will have to take their chances.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om

ddress PHILADELPHIA,

ate spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

HERALD

OCT

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give at the New National Theater, beginning on Tuesday afternoon, November 6, is now in progress. The sale of tickets for the first concert will open on Thursday morning, November 1. The programme for this next concert will be announced next week.

om

dress

te

The Boston Symphony Orchestra season.

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the New National Theater beginning on Tuesday afternoon, November 6, is now in progress at Smith's ticket office in Sanders & Stayman's store, 1327 F street, and will continue until Saturday, October 27.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
The Boston Post
OCTOBER 21, 1906

CAMILLE SAINT-SAENS

The coming of Camille Saint-Saens to Boston on Tuesday evening, Oct. 30, under the auspices of the Symphony Orchestra, gives promise of being one of the most interesting musical events of the season. This remarkable old man, who is now in his 71st year, is coming to America for the first time, despite the tradition that once in his annual disappearances from Paris he spent some weeks in New York incognito. He himself asserts that he "disappeared" but once, which was in 1889, when he left Paris the night before the production of his opera, "Ascanio," and buried himself for three months in the Canary Islands. While in America he will take part in 20 concerts.

His coming to Boston will be, therefore, something more than mere appearance of a "star." The concert which he will give with the assistance of the full Symphony Orchestra is more in the nature of a tribute to him and to his achievements. It is impossible at this time to give the programme, but in general it will consist exclusively of his own works, which he will conduct, and in addition to these it is expected that he will play his concerto for pianoforte in G minor.

The prices for the concert will be $2, $1.50 and $1. The public sale of seats will open at Symphony Hall on next Friday morning, Oct. 26.

THE LONGY CLUB

Mr. George Longy, the leader of the Longy Club, is planning to present a number of most interesting novelties at his concerts in the coming winter. These will be given in Potter Hall on Wednesday evenings, Nov. 14, Jan. 2 and Feb. 6. The assisting artists will be Messrs. Schuecker, harpist; Kloepfel, trumpet; Rettberg, tympanist, and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The only change noted in the membership of the club is the presence of Mr. Brooke as second flute. Mr. D. Maquarre has become first flute, Mr. A. Maquarre having retired.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET

The general season sale for the series of six concerts which the Boston Symphony Quartet will give in Chickering Hall, beginning on Monday, Oct. 29, will open at Symphony Hall tomorrow, Oct. 22. The transfer of the concerts to Chickering Hall has met with much approval among the patrons of the quartet. The sale of tickets for the first concert will open at Symphony Hall on next Friday morning, Oct. 26. As heretofore announced the assisting artist will be Mr. Heinrich Gebhard.

paper Cutting Bureau in the World

BALTIMORE, MD.

PADEREWSKI WON'T COME

Cables Agents Without Giving Any Reason.

New York, Oct. 20.—Ignace Paderewski, the pianist, who was due to arrive from Europe today on the Hamburg-American Line steamship Amerika, cabled his agents here at the last moment that he would not come. No reason was assigned in his message, but friends declare he is suffering from an injured arm.

Paderewski was to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He had signed a contract for $40,000, and when this was lived up to he was to give private recitals and appear for several charitable institutions, as he had promised on his last trip.

Rosenthal is a passenger on the Amerika, and Lhevinne, another celebrated pianist, was also due today.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss

OCT 21

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

The sale of season tickets for the coming series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give during the coming season in the Lyric will open tomorrow at Albaugh's. The concerts, as last year, will be given on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20.

[39]

From TOWN & COUNTRY.
Address NEW YORK CITY.
Date OCT 20 1906

The First Symphony Concert in Boston

In Boston the event of the week ending October thirteenth was, of course, the first Symphony Concert on Friday afternoon, with he new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. That part of society still in the country came to town by means of gasolene, electricity and steam and Massachusetts Avenue, as well as Huntington Avenue, looked like a motor-show before and after the concert. Not only did the new conductor have a good reception and a warm welcome, but there was much of the "reception" feeling in the audience, as people welcomed each other after the summer scattering. Mrs. John L. Gardner, who is still abroad, was missed; but her usual seats will be occupied by friends. Miss Lena Little and a guest had them on Friday, for the opening. Among those noticed were Major and Mrs. Higginson, who came up from Manchester; Mrs. George B. Inches, who is still living in Grafton, and who was with her sister, Mrs. John Denny; Mrs. H. H. Fay, Miss Juliette Higginson, Miss Mary Curtis, Miss Iasigi, Mrs. Mollie Johnson, Mrs. Harry Pratt McKean, Miss Nathalie Matthews, Miss Jennie Moseley, Mrs. F. R. Comee, Mrs. Eben Draper, Miss Dorothy Devens, Mrs. Roger Wolcott, Mrs. Gorden Abbott, Miss Barbara Higginson, Mrs. F. L. Higginson, Professor and Mrs. George W. Chadwick, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Aldrich (Margaret L. Chanler), the newly married couple, in Boston on their wedding-tour (Mr. Aldrich is an authority on music); Mrs. James Lawrence, Jr., Miss Katherine Coolidge, whose engagement to Mr. Perkins was recently announced; Mrs. Morris Gray, Mrs. Frederic Converse, Mrs. L. H. Mudgett, Miss Rosamund Fay.

SUNDAY POST. OCTOBER 21, 1906

Many Beautiful Gowns at the Symphony Concert

Friday's balmy weather and bright sunshine brought together a number of fashionables for the second of the Symphony rehearsals. Noted among the many present were Mrs. Oliver Ames, 2d, who was very chic in navy blue cloth, with a diamond and sapphire ornament at the throat; a small hat to correspond, and corsage of violets; Mrs. Robert C. Hooper, wearing gun metal cloth and gray hat; Mrs. Gordon Abbott, very handsome in gray, with round turban to match; Miss May Kenney, in navy blue foulard, dotted with white, and a large hat with pink roses; Mrs. James Jackson, Sr., distinguished in black, with large plumed hat; Mrs. Brooks Frothingham, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Miss Lillian White, Mrs. John Mason Little, Mrs. Eben Draper, Mrs. Albert Bigelow, Mrs. De Ford Bigelow, Mrs. Samuel J. Mixter, Miss Marion Homans, Mrs. William Caleb Loring, Mrs. Frederick R. Comee, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Sr., Mrs. William Ames, Mrs. George Silbsee, Mrs. George Lewis, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Miss Edwards, Miss Grace Edwards, Miss Rosamond Gibson, Miss Margaret Thomas, Mrs. William P. Fay, Mr. J. Templeman Coolidge, Jr., Mrs. F. Lothrop Ames, Miss Mary Peabody, Mrs. George B. Shattuck, Mr. Robert Jordan, Miss Lena Little, Miss Amy Lowell, Mr. Frederick S. Converse, Mr. Wallace Goodrich, Miss Leslie Knowles, Miss Susan Thayer, Mrs. John Amory Jeffries and her niece, Miss Mary Eustis; Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. Richard D. Sears and her young daughter, Mrs. Lewis H. Mudgett and son, Miss Elizabeth Hall, Miss Mary Russell and scores more equally well known.

SUNDAY HERALD---
OCTOBER 21, 1906.

SYMPHONY MUSIC PLEASES AUDIENCE

Ultra-Classical Concert of Boston Orchestra Conducted by Dr. Muck Applauded.

BY PHILIP HALE

The programme of the second Symphony concert given last night in Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck conductor, was as follows:

Suite in B minor for flute and strings.....Bach
Symphony in G major (B. and H. No. 13).....Haydn
Violin Concerto in D minor, No. 9.....Spohr
Symphony in C major "Jupiter".....Mozart

In spite of its undue length this concert apparently gave much pleasure to the audience. The name of Bach is one to conjure with, and there are many who believe in his plenary inspiration. Every allegro is to them a masterpiece; every adagio is sublime. There should be more discrimination in this matter. Bach thought, lived, had his being in counterpoint and his fertility was amazing. What wonder, then, if there are many pages in his complete works that are formidably dull? There are lively movements that might go on forever or stop at any time as far as any true musical interest is concerned.

This suite, however it is arranged or disarranged, is exceedingly monotonous and tiresome. Last night Hans von Buelow's version was used, for the first time, we believe, in Boston. It is perhaps a little less dull than the version by Franz which has been heard at preceding concerts. The tonal monotony, however, must always remain, and even Von Buelow's ingenious tinkering cannot vitalize music that was composed originally in a perfunctory manner and for chamber hearing.

[illegible] symphony was played with [illegible] opening movement [illegible] Would [illegible] irreverent

Bach, Haydn, Spohr and Mozart—all in one concert and for two hours! A programme like this may be endured once in 24 concerts. Any one of the pieces might be welcome when well contrasted with those that are modern and hypo-modern. A programme like that of last night must inevitably suffer from lack of contrast.

Mr. Hess, who had hoped to play D'Erlanger's concerto this season, was obliged to keep within the frame of the programme, so he chose Spohr's ninth, a work that, as a rule, is of more interest to violinists than to a general audience. His choice turned out to be most fortunate.

Never before in this city has Mr. Hess displayed his artistry to such full advantage. His performance was admirable in quality and purity of tone, in fine phrasing, in the graceful surmounting of technical difficulties. Furthermore, there was a musical spirit, a prevailing taste, a sense of the style peculiar to Spohr's music, that engrossed the attention and compelled respect, enjoyment and applause. When the composer played this concerto in Paris he complained because the adagio made less effect there than did the first movement and the finale, and he indulged himself in sour remarks concerning the unwillingnes sof the French to play or listen to earnest adagios. Last evening Mr. Hess triumphed in each movement.

The performance of the orchestra was admirable, and due tribute should be given to Mr. Andre Maquerre, the flutist, for his work in the suite by Bach.

The programme of the concert this week will be as follows: Brahms' symphony in C minor, No. 1; Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan"; three movements from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

From INTER-OCEAN
Address CHICAGO, Ill.
Date OCT 21 1906

Dr. Muck Compared To Theodore Thomas.

Dr. Karl Muck, an account of whose debut with the Boston Symphony orchestra was printed in these columns last Sunday, seems to have impressed that critical city most favorably. The following appreciative analysis of his first concert appeared in the Boston Transcript over the signature of Henry T. Parker:

Dr. Muck slipped across the stage so quickly and quietly that the audience hardly detected his presence until Mr. Hess waved the orchestra to its feet. The buzz of discovery subsided in a little burst of welcoming applause; the new conductor bowed tautly and nervously to his men and to his audience, and for the first time the three were face to face. Neither photograph nor description had belied him. For the moment the face seemed unusually white and set, but mental acumen, nervous energy, resolution, entire self-control and concentration seemed to meet in it. There was similar nervous energy in his alert bearing and supple movements, but subject, again, to the same full self-mastery. A man could hardly seem more unaffectedly and quietly absorbed in his work and in the pleasure of it.

The beat and the whole manner of conducting were as characteristic. Since Theodore Thomas' time no familiar conductor has stood so still. Dr. Muck plunged at no group of players, beckoned none to the entrances, embraced none in sweeping gesture. Like Thomas, he reserves such muscular labors for rehearsals. His body does not even rise with a crescendo, or go taut with a climax. His score stands before him, his stick is in his hand, in the old fashion; and the beat is unfailingly clear and unfaiteringly precise. Hand and stick seem to move little, but there is a curious, quivering, nervous energy in their rise and fall. Now and then both arms, half extended, move to the rhythm or sharpen the accent. Rarely the lifted left hand modulates the volume of tone. Once at least, with both arms at ease, Dr. Muck left the band to go its own way. There are no vehemence or obvious emotional appeal or suggestion in any movement. At the rehearsals the conductor has disclosed and imposed his design, will, and feeling. At the concert he seems to seek only the clear and exact fulfillment and expression of them. His conducting is lucid precision itself, but precision that is tense with nervous energy.

The range of the tone that Dr. Muck draws from the orchestra seems fuller than was Mr. Gericke's. In Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," for example, he sought and gained subtle graduations and very fine delicacies of beautiful sound; but at moments in the symphony and in the prelude to "The Meistersingers" he was equally capable of large and robust sonorities. His ear for quality of tone seems sensitive and his feeling for it warm. Naturally the men were on their mettle yesterday, and we that listened came fresh to old delights, but seldom have the voices of the orchestra had a more flowing and pliant, a richer and more persuasive loveliness. As fine and warm is Dr. Muck's sense of adroit and beautiful blending and proportioning of tone. He melts his instrumental voices into each other as he twines them in long and curving lines. He seems to seek the steady and delicate undulation of tone that such voices as Melba's sometimes have. Yet, as the "Faust" overture showed, he can summon the poignant phrase and the burning accent. He loves, too, the cunning adjustment and disclosure, so to say, of each thread in the tonal web, and there were details in the interplay of the instruments in the symphony that seemed to leap freshly into life or to come strangely clear to many ears. Dr. Muck's sense of musical design is keen and searching. Everywhere he was entirely lucid. Details fell duly into their place among larger outlines until the whole musical structure rose and took shape before the ear and the imagination. Finely as Dr. Muck drew the threads of "A Siegfried Idyl," he kept the whole web clear and unbroken. Large as was his notion of Beethoven's symphony, no figure, no arabesque in it seemed to elude him. Nothing was blurred or slighted and nothing forced or exaggerated. He showed the faculty that analyzes and also reconstructs. Lucidity and symmetry, precision and plasticity went hand in hand. The sense of musical form and design seem to match the sense of tonal beauty and adjustment. Responsiveness to rhythm animated both and kept both from hardening. Never does Dr. Muck dull or slacken the due pace. He loves the quick, incisive contrast.

Into this design and with these means Dr. Muck in the symphony poured much of the passion, power, and beauty of Beethoven. His devotion to the composer's purpose—and to nothing else—was whole souled. From the start he summoned and kept a largeness of manner, a loftiness of utterance, that were of the grand style. Where Beethoven rages he made the music rage. Where it grumbles in the scherzo, he made it grumble. The haunting reiterated song of the andante he kept in beautiful and manly simplicity. Familiar indeed is the transition from the scherzo to the finale. Yet Dr. Muck rekindled in and held his hearers the fine suspense of it. Deep and [illegible] went the triumphant chant of the final [illegible]geration of. Nowhere was there the smallest ex[illegible]. I must mention to slightest trace of the conductor who [illegible]ake each contrast a little more poignant, each melody of a deeper and more flowing beauty than ever conductor made it before. Reading, tempi, general design, and incidental detail were normal and impersonal. But back of them seemed to be a singular fullness of understanding and an entire devotion to the music for its own sake. From that understanding the ear and the imagination seemed to hear the symphony as the eye and the fancy see a landscape in the clear sunshine and animating air of autumn. And from the intensity of that devotion came passion, power, and beauty. They expressed themselves in the grand style, and they kept its noble reticence. The symphony lived its life again, and we that listened entered into it, understood it, and felt it.

BOSTON AMERICAN
OCTOBER 21, 1906.

PROGRAMME ONE OF CLASSIC BEAUTY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

The second Symphony concert under Dr. Muck's leadership last night was one of classic beauty throughout, the programme being Bach's suite No. 2 in B minor for flute and strings; Haydn's symphony in G minor, No. 13; Spohr's violin concerto in D minor, No. 9; Mozart's symphony in C major, with fugue finale.

Though the programme was long and in a sense severe in its classicism, there were no signs of surfeit on the part of the great audience. Dr. Muck with somewhat more vigor and outward evidences of authority played with even more delicacy of touch and force of expression on the marvelous instrument before him than at his first concert, and the people showed their appreciation markedly.

A. Maquarre, who was solo flute player in the Bach suite, and Professor Willy Hess, who was the violin soloist, were showered with plaudits.

Next Saturday's programme will be devoted to Brahms, Richard Strauss and Berlioz.

MME. MELBA,
Soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PADEREWSKI,
Soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From AMERICA
Address NEW YORK
Date OCT 21 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the coming series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchesttra will give during the imminent season, in the Lyric, will open tomorrow morning at Albaugh's ticket office, at 109 North Charles street. The concerts, as last year, will be given on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20.

Not since the Boston Symphony Orchestra has begun to come regularly to Baltimore has there been such a large number of renewals by the subscribers of the previous season. While a part of this patronage may be attributed to the normal increase that the symphony concerts show every year, unquestionably the jump in the subscriptions is due to two important reasons. The first is the presence as conductor of the orchestra of Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, one of the most distinguished men of his class in the world. The second is the promise that with the orchestra will appear two such artists as Mme. Nellie Melba and Mr. Paderewski. They will appear only with the orchestra, Paderewski at the January concert and Melba at the February concert. Paderewski comes to this country in the end of September to remain three weeks, in which time he will make seven appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It has been regarded as a most fortunate stroke of business on the part of Mr. G. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, thus to secure the exclusive services of this great artist for the orchestra, and Baltimore is particularly fortunate in being one of the cities where he will play.

Mme. Melba, as is known, comes to America the first of the year primarily to be the prima donna of the Hammerstein opera, in New York. She will make a limited number of concert appearances, two of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra—one in Boston and one in Baltimore. This fall Mme. Melba is singing in the autumn season at Covent Garden, London, and all reports agree that her voice has never been so glorious as it is now.

Naturally, the chief interest of the season centers in Dr. Muck, whose first appearance in Boston on the 12th and 13th was distinguished by an ovation which has never been equaled in that city.

The orchestra itself returns without any change in its personnel. It will bring to Baltimore its full strength of 96 men.

[40]

From TOWN & COUNTRY.
NEW YORK CITY.
Address
OCT 20 1906
Date

The First Symphony Concert in Boston

In Boston the event of the week ending October thirteenth was, of course, the first Symphony Concert on Friday afternoon, with the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. That part of society still in the country came to town by means of gasolene, electricity and steam and Massachusetts Avenue, as well as Huntington Avenue, looked like a motor-show before and after the concert. Not only did the new conductor have a good reception and a warm welcome, but there was much of the "reception" feeling in the audience, as people welcomed each other after the summer scattering. Mrs. John L. Gardner, who is still abroad, was missed; but her usual seats will be occupied by friends. Miss Lena Little and a guest had them on Friday, for the opening. Among those noticed were Major and Mrs. Higginson, who came up from Manchester; Mrs. George B. Inches, who is still living in Grafton, and who was with her sister, Mrs. John Denny; Mrs. H. H. Fay, Miss Juliette Higginson, Miss Mary Curtis, Miss Iasigi, Mrs. Mollie Johnson, Mrs. Harry Pratt McKean, Miss Nathalie Matthews, Miss Jennie Moseley, Mrs. F. R. Comee, Mrs. Eben Draper, Miss Dorothy Devens, Mrs. Roger Wolcott, Mrs. Gorden Abbott, Miss Barbara Higginson, Mrs. F. L. Higginson, Professor and Mrs. George W. Chadwick, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Aldrich (Margaret L. Chanler), the newly married couple, in Boston on their wedding-tour (Mr. Aldrich is an authority on music); Mrs. James Lawrence, Jr., Miss Katherine Coolidge, whose engagement to Mr. Perkins was recently announced; Mrs. Morris Gray, Mrs. Frederic Converse, Mrs. L. H. Mudgett, Miss Rosamund Fay.

SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 21, 1906

Many Beautiful Gowns at the Symphony Concert

Friday's balmy weather and bright sunshine brought together a number of fashionables for the second of the Symphony rehearsals. Noted among the many present were Mrs. Oliver Ames, 2d, who was very chic in navy blue cloth, with a diamond and sapphire ornament at the throat, a small hat to correspond, and corsage of violets; Mrs. Robert C. Hooper, wearing gun metal cloth and gray hat; Mrs. Gordon Abbott, very handsome in gray, with round turban to match; Miss May Kenney, in navy blue foulard, dotted with white, and a large hat with pink roses; Mrs. James Jackson, Sr., distinguished in black, with large plumed hat; Mrs. Brooks Frothingham, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Miss Lillian White, Mrs. John Mason Little, Mrs. Eben Draper, Mrs. Albert Bigelow, Mrs. De Ford Bigelow, Mrs. Samuel J. Mixter, Miss Marion Homans, Mrs. William Cæleb Loring, Mrs. Frederick R. Comee, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Sr., Mrs. William Ames, Mrs. George Silbsee, Mrs. George Lewis, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Miss Edwards, Miss Grace Edwards, Miss Rosamond Gibson, Miss Margaret Thomas, Mrs. William P. Fay, Mr. J. Templeman Coolidge, Jr., Mrs. F. Lothrop Ames, Miss Mary Peabody, Mrs. George B. Shattuck, Mr. Robert Jordan, Miss Lena Little, Miss Amy Lowell, Mr. Frederick S. Converse, Mr. Wallace Goodrich, Miss Leslie Knowles, Miss Susan Thayer, Mrs. John Amory Jeffries and her niece, Miss Mary Eustis; Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. Richard D. Sears and her young daughter, Mrs. Lewis H. Mudgett and son, Miss Elizabeth Hall, Miss Mary Russell and scores more equally well known.

SUNDAY HERALD---
OCTOBER 21, 1906.

SYMPHONY MUSIC PLEASES AUDIENCE

Ultra-Classical Concert of Boston Orchestra Conducted by Dr. Muck Applauded.

BY PHILIP HALE

The programme of the second Symphony concert given last night in Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck conductor, was as follows:

Suite in B minor for flute and strings.....Bach
Symphony in G major (B. and H. No. 13).....Haydn
Violin Concerto in D minor, No. 9.....Spohr
Symphony in C major "Jupiter".....Mozart

In spite of its undue length this concert apparently gave much pleasure to the audience. The name of Bach is one to conjure with, and there are many who believe in his plenary inspiration. Every allegro is to them a masterpiece; every adagio is sublime. There should be more discrimination in this matter. Bach thought, lived, had his being in counterpoint and his fertility was amazing. What wonder, then, if there are many pages in his complete works that are formidably dull? There are lively movements that might go on forever or stop at any time as far as any true musical interest is concerned.

This suite, however it is arranged or disarranged, is exceedingly monotonous and tiresome. Last night Hans von Buelow's version was used, for the first time, we believe, in Boston. It is perhaps a little less dull than the version by Franz which has been heard at preceding concerts. The tonal monotony, however, must always remain, and even Von Buelow's ingenious tinkering cannot vitalize music that was composed originally in a perfunctory manner and intended for chamber hearing.

Haydn's symphony was played with great spirit, and the opening movement and the finale were good to hear. Would that Dr. Muck had had the irreverent

Balch, Haydn, Spohr and Mozart—all in one concert and for two hours! A programme like this may be endured once in 24 concerts. Any one of the pieces might be welcome when well contrasted with those that are modern and hypo-modern. A programme like that of last night must inevitably suffer from lack of contrast.

Mr. Hess, who had hoped to play D'Erlanger's concerto this season, was obliged to keep within the frame of the programme, so he chose Spohr's ninth, a work that, as a rule, is of more interest to violinists than to a general audience. His choice turned out to be most fortunate.

Never before in this city has Mr. Hess displayed his artistry to such full advantage. His performance was admirable in quality and purity of tone, in fine phrasing, in the graceful surmounting of technical difficulties. Furthermore, there was a musical spirit, a prevailing taste, a sense of the style peculiar to Spohr's music, that engrossed the attention and compelled respect, enjoyment and applause. When the composer played this concerto in Paris he complained because the adagio made less effect there than did the first movement and the finale, and he indulged himself in sour remarks concerning the unwillingness sof the French to play or listen to earnest adagios. Last evening Mr. Hess triumphed in each movement.

The performance of the orchestra was admirable, and due tribute should be given to Mr. Andre Maquerre, the flutist, for his work in the suite by Bach.

The programme of the concert this week will be as follows: Brahms' symphony in C minor, No. 1; Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan"; three movements from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the ...
...om
...dress
...te

Dr. Muck Compared To Theodore Thomas.

Dr. Karl Muck, an account of whose debut with the Boston Symphony orchestra was printed in these columns last Sunday, seems to have impressed that critical city most favorably. The following appreciative analysis of his first concert appeared in the Boston Transcript over the signature of Henry T. Parker:

Dr. Muck slipped across the stage so quickly and quietly that the audience hardly detected his presence until Mr. Hess waved the orchestra to its feet. The buzz of discovery subsided in a little burst of welcoming applause; the new conductor bowed tautly and nervously to his men and to his audience, and for the first time the three were face to face. Neither photograph nor description had belied him. For the moment the face seemed unusually white and set, but mental acumen, nervous energy, resolution, entire self-control and concentration seemed to meet in it. There was similar nervous energy in his alert bearing and supple movements, but subject, again, to the same full self-mastery. A man could hardly seem more unaffectedly and quietly absorbed in his work and in the pleasure of it.

The beat and the whole manner of conducting were as characteristic. Since Theodore Thomas' time no familiar conductor has stood so still. Dr. Muck plunged at no group of players, beckoned none to the entrances, embraced none in sweeping gesture. Like Thomas, he reserves such muscular labors for rehearsals. His body does not even rise with a crescendo, or go taut with a climax. His score stands before him, his stick is in his hand, in the old fashion; and the beat is unfailingly clear and unfalteringly precise. Hand and stick seem to move little, but there is a curious, quivering, nervous energy in their rise and fall. Now and then both arms, half extended, move to the rhythm or sharpen the accent. Rarely the lifted left hand modulates the volume of tone. Once at least, with both arms at ease, Dr. Muck left the band to go its own way. There are no vehemence or obvious emotional appeal or suggestion in any movement. At the rehearsals the conductor has disclosed and imposed his design, will, and feeling. At the concert he seems to seek only the clear and exact fulfillment and expression of them. His conducting is lucid precision itself, but precision that is tense with nervous energy.

The range of the tone that Dr. Muck draws from the orchestra seems fuller than was Mr. Gericke's. In Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," for example, he sought and gained subtle graduations and very fine delicacies of beautiful sound; but at moments in the symphony and in the prelude to "The Meistersingers" he was equally capable of large and robust sonorities. His ear for quality of tone seems sensitive and his feeling for it warm. Naturally the men were on their mettle yesterday, and we that listened came fresh to old delights, but seldom have the voices of the orchestra had a more flowing and pliant, a richer and more persuasive loveliness. As fine and warm is Dr. Muck's sense of adroit and beautiful blending and proportioning of tone. He melts his instrumental voices into each other as he twines them in long and curving lines. He seems to seek the steady and delicate undulation of tone that such voices as Melba's sometimes have. Yet, as the "Faust" overture showed, he can summon the poignant phrase and the burning accent. He loves, too, the cunning adjustment and disclosure, so to say, of each thread in the tonal web, and there were details in the interplay of the instruments in the symphony that seemed to leap freshly into life or to come strangely clear to many ears. Dr. Muck's sense of musical design is keen and searching. Everywhere he was entirely lucid. Details fell duly into their place among larger outlines until the whole musical structure rose and took shape before the ear and the imagination. Finely as Dr. Muck drew the threads of "A Siegfried Idyl," he kept the whole web clear and unbroken. Large as was his notion of Beethoven's symphony, no figure, no arabesque in it seemed to elude him. Nothing was blurred or slighted and nothing forced or exaggerated. He showed the faculty that analyzes and also reconstructs. Lucidity and symmetry, precision and plasticity went hand in hand. The sense of musical form and design seem to match the sense of tonal beauty and adjustment. Responsiveness to rhythm animated both and kept both from hardening. Never does Dr. Muck dull or slacken the due pace. He loves the quick, incisive contrast.

Into this design and with these means Dr. Muck in the symphony poured much of the passion, power, and beauty of Beethoven. His devotion to the composer's purpose—and to nothing else—was whole souled. From the start he summoned and kept a largeness of manner, a loftiness of utterance, that were of the grand style. Where Beethoven rages he made the music rage. Where it grumbles in the scherzo, he made it grumble. The haunting reiterated song of the andante he kept in beautiful and manly simplicity. Familiar indeed is the transition from the scherzo to the finale. Yet Dr. Muck rekindled in sol... and hof his hearers the fine suspense of it. Deep moved and went the triumphant chant of the final ...ggeration of Nowhere was there the smallest ex... must ma...e slightest trace of the conductor who ... ...ke each contrast a little more poignant, each melody of a deeper and more flowing beauty than ever conductor made it before. Reading, tempi, general design, and incidental detail were normal and impersonal. But back of them seemed to be a singular fullness of understanding and an entire devotion to the music for its own sake. From that understanding the ear and the imagination seemed to hear the symphony as the eye and the fancy see a landscape in the clear sunshine and animating air of autumn. And from the intensity of that devotion came passion, power, and beauty. They expressed themselves in the grand style, and they kept its noble reticence. The symphony lived its life again, and we that listened entered into it, understood it, and felt it.

BOSTON AMERICAN——

OCTOBER 21, 1906.

PROGRAMME ONE OF CLASSIC BEAUTY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

The second Symphony concert under Dr. Muck's leadership last night was one of classic beauty throughout, the programme being Bach's suite No. 2 in B minor for flute and strings; Haydn's symphony in G minor, No. 13; Spohr's violin concerto in D minor, No. 9; Mozart's symphony in C major, with fugue finale.

Though the programme was long and in a sense severe in its classicism, there were no signs of surfeit on the part of the great audience. Dr. Muck with somewhat more vigor and outward evidences of authority played with even more delicacy of touch and force of expression on the marvelous instrument before him than at his first concert, and the people showed their appreciation markedly.

A. Maquarre, who was solo flute player in the Bach suite, and Professor Willy Hess, who was the violin soloist, were showered with plaudits.

Next Saturday's programme will be devoted to Brahms, Richard Strauss and Berlioz.

COMING TO THE LYRIC

MME. MELBA,
Soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PADEREWSKI,
Soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

n.....
ress.....
e.....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the coming series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give during the imminent season, in the Lyric, will open tomorrow morning at Albaugh's ticket office, at 109 North Charles street. The concerts, as last year, will be given on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20.

Not since the Boston Symphony Orchestra has begun to come regularly to Baltimore has there been such a large number of renewals by the subscribers of the previous season. While a part of this patronage may be attributed to the normal increase that the symphony concerts show every year, unquestionably the jump in the subscriptions is due to two important reasons. The first is the presence as conductor of the orchestra of Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, one of the most distinguished men of his class in the world. The second is the promise that with the orchestra will appear two such artists as Mme. Nellie Melba and Mr. Paderewski. They will appear only with the orchestra, Paderewski at the January concert and Melba at the February concert. Paderewski comes to this country in the end of September to remain three weeks, in which time he will make seven appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It has been regarded as a most fortunate stroke of business on the part of Mr. G. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, thus to secure the exclusive services of this great artist for the orchestra, and Baltimore is particularly fortunate in being one of the cities where he will play.

Mme. Melba, as is known, comes to America the first of the year primarily to be the prima donna of the Hammerstein opera, in New York. She will make a limited number of concert appearances, two of which will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra—one in Boston and one in Baltimore. This fall Mme. Melba is singing in the autumn season at Covent Garden, London, and all reports agree that her voice has never been so glorious as it is now.

Naturally, the chief interest of the season centers in Dr. Muck, whose first appearance in Boston on the 12th and 13th was distinguished by an ovation which has never been equaled in that city.

The orchestra itself returns without any change in its personnel. It will bring to Baltimore its full strength of 96 men.

[40]

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 21, 1906.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S NEW GERMAN CONDUCTOR

A Close-Range Personal Sketch Of Karl Muck, Doctor Of Music.

Boston, Oct. 20.—A man of rather less than middle height, but slender and of a graceful build, which persuades one that he is considerably taller, whose gait and every action are filled with a tense, nervous strength which speaks of quick and final decision and of authority and power to command—such was the fleeting first impression made on the great audience which filled Boston's Symphony Hall last Saturday night, when Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, walked with a swift, springy step to the rostrum to conduct his first concert in America.

The next impression was of the charming modesty of the man. The orchestra rose to greet him. The hall was filled with the noise of clapping hands. The new conductor, baton in hand, bowed twice to the audience and then, facing his band, waited for the demonstration to cease. As the last sound died away, he lifted his right arm, with elbow sharply crooked, gave a quick, decisive beat and "fate was knocking at the door" in Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Dr. Muck, in Germany, is called "the aristocrat of conductors." This is partly due to his close relations with the German Emperor and with the Court in Berlin, where he is held in high favor, but chiefly it is his personality which has brought him its name. Although not born of the aristocracy, he comes of very good stock, that highly cultured upper middle class, which in all countries contributes the most to art and literature. Unlike too many musicians, Dr. Muck is an educated and cultured man. His interests do not stop with the art which he professes. His title of "doctor" was won by three years' hard work in the Universities of Heidelberg and Leipzig. Since then his life has placed him in close association not only with musicians, but with the men who are making Germany great in literature, in the drama, in art and in government, as well as in commerce and industry.

His interests are keen and wide reaching. He will talk music, shop, with a caller, if the caller insists, but he would much rather discuss the industrial and political development of this country, its manners and customs and tastes, its feeling for art and all kindred subjects. He confesses he knows little or nothing of America. He has not had time to learn. He speaks no English.

A MAN OF ENERGY.

"Had I known that I was to come to America, it would have been different," he said one day this week. "But my life has been so full that I seemed never to find the time to learn it, thinking, at best, it would be only an accomplishment. I left that to my wife. When I was a boy, I had little time to myself after the regular work in the gymnasium, with its extra course of French, and with my music, and it has been so ever since. Perhaps before I leave next spring I shall be able to make myself understood."

There is a very decided charm about the man, whether one sees him close at hand, talking to him or at a distance when he is conducting the orchestra. He seems to be the personification of nervous energy under complete and absolute control. His face is strongly marked and attractive, especially when it is lighted by his peculiarly fascinating smile, a smile which is full of good nature and full of humor. It is a face which once seen is not likely soon to be forgotten. The chin is long and strong. The mouth is small and firm, its sternness softened by little lines which show that laughter is never far away. The nose is big and masculine and exceedingly well modeled. The eyes are dark, bright and piercing, and look out from behind nose-glasses, which are rimmed with black rubber and are secured to his coat by a black silk ribbon. The forehead is rather low, and brushed back from it is fine, black, closely cropped hair. The head, while large, is well shaped and one notices no disproportion between it and the slender form which supports it.

One notices immediately another thing about Dr. Muck. He is well tailored and knows how to wear his clothes. He is no follower of the ancient tradition of musical slovenliness. It is difficult to believe that his coats have been cut by Berlin tailors; they smack too strongly of Bond street or Vienna. And he wears them with the easy grace of a man who has a good figure and is used to and takes pride in good clothes. In fact, there is just the least touch of the dandy about him. His cravts are rich in color and skillfully tied, and his scarf-pins are always in taste. One sees that he likes jewelry, for he wears several handsomely jeweled rings and his watch guard is of rich workmanship.

Without the glint of humor in his eyes, his ready smile and the richness and carefulness of his dress the impression one would carry from him would be of austerity, even asceticism. These elements are in him, and betray themselves in his stern and unwavering devotion to the highest ideals of his art, but once away from his work he is almost boyish in his keen enjoyment of everything he meets with.

A BROAD CONSERVATIVE.

In music Dr. Muck must be classed among the broad conservatives. He does not hesitate to say that he finds little that is truly admirable in the music that is being written today.

"We put it on our program," he says, "and we play it, but in our search for beauty we must still go back to the masters. This is an age of criticism, of analysis, not of creation. Music should be more than technique and the music of today is little else."

This does not mean, however, that Dr. Muck is entirely out of sympathy with the modern movements in music. He is a friend and for many years has been a colleague of Richard Strauss and a friend and admirer of Mahler, but he confesses that [illegible] and neither beauty nor coherency [illegible] of Max Reger. He believes [illegible] reached its highest

Richard Wagner. He finds much that is interesting in the Russians.

"They are often bizarre," he says, "and often brutal, but they are sincere and write as they feel."

He likes the strong national note found in their music and envies the Russians their rich store of folk material. The modern Frenchmen are interesting, but theirs is too often the music of the head instead of the heart. Again, it is music written in the analytical spirit rather than in the truly creative. If asked who is his favorite composer, he merely smiles and asks why comparisons are necessary.

He frankly likes the theatre. He thinks it is strange that Shakespeare is so little played in this country. "I am told," he says, "that we in Berlin have more Shakespeare in a year than the whole of America. You do not seem to cherish your classics as we do."

Of opera, too, naturally he is very fond, for the greater part of his career has been spent in opera houses. Operatic conducting has been his work, orchestral merely his recreation. This fact caused much anxiety among the Boston musicians. Ignoring the fact that as guest he has conducted all the leading orchestras of Europe and for two years has been one of the two conductors of the Vienna Philharmonic, they thought it was a great risk to engage a man who had been so identified with opera, forgetting that none of the four previous conductors had had much orchestral experience. Henschel, the first, had had practically no experience of any kind. Gericke had been fourth conductor at the Vienna Opera. Nikisch and Paur, both of them, came from the Municipal Opera in Leipzig, a very minor institution.

HIS FIRST CONCERT.

The first concert set the minds of the fearful ones at rest. However great Dr. Muck may be as an operatic conductor, there remained no doubt of his ability to hold the baton over Boston's orchestra. His splendidly broad and tremendously passionate reading of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, a performance which compelled the conservative Bostonians to rise and cheer him at the end, was ample evidence that he was all that he should be.

And yet, as one watched him conduct, one wondered how he did it. No conductor, not even Theodore Thomas, has been less demontrative. There were no frenzied shaking of heads or wild gyrating of arms. He stood quietly on the rostrum, for the most of the time his weight thrown on his right leg and leaning lightly on his left hand, which rested on the music rack. His baton is long and very slender and he holds it lightly with his thumb, his index and middle finger. His beat is very sharp, very short and, according to the musicians, easy to follow. For the most part, it is not seen by the audience, for he holds his right hand in front of him and seems to give swift, hard little pokes. And when he gives an unusually long poke there is, in the vernacular, "something doing" immediately. His left hand is seldom used, only when he is after extreme effects or wishes to emphasize a staccato passage.

In a word, he seems to be a conductor who believes that all work should be done in rehearsal, and that at a concert the orchestra should be able practically to take care of itself. Several times he stopped beating entirely, now and then emphasizing some point with his closed left hand. Solo passages for individual instruments are not hampered by his beat, for he allows them freedom. At one of the first rehearsals he told Mr. Longy to play a solo passage for the first oboe as he thought best.

All this, of course, is anticipatory, for Baltimore will soon have a chance to judge for itself. But certain things were so evident at the first concert that one cannot help mentioning them. His readings are broad and big and, to a certain extent, impersonal. Unquestionably a lover of sonority, he never seeks to gain this element at the expense of the component parts of the work, nor does he sacrifice the whole to details. His readings are not analytical, in the sense of a dissection, rather do they fall under the term of constructive analysis. He loves the middle voices of a work, and to Boston showed things in the symphony which had been forgotten, so long was it since they were heard, yet the whole performance was filled with the rich, red blood of life. It was the voice of Beethoven which spoke to the audience directly, undistorted by "personal interpretation."

HE SHATTERED TRADITIONS.

And yet tradition after tradition was shattered. The andante was taken more slowly than it has ever been heard in Boston. Most conductors are afraid of it—of making it sentimental. Dr. Muck turned it into a noble song and nobly the orchestra sang it. The scherzo, which most conductors, following the metronomic directions of the score—which did not come from Beethoven—usually take at the swiftest pace possible, is taken by Dr. Muck much more slowly, so that for once the wonderfully beautiful passages for the cellos were heard. And again, in the finale, that splendid song of triumph, Dr. Muck took a slower pace than we are accustomed to until the last accellerando, which went with a whirl.

On thing seems certain. Dr. Muck is going to let the orchestra play. Mr. Gericke, with all his good qualities, constantly exercised repression. It was good to hear once more the full glory of the brass. It is years since it has been allowed to show itself as it did in the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," and even then it seemed as if the conductor was not satisfied, as if he wanted more. And yet, all the time one saw only the quiet, slender black figure which stood almost motionless at the music rack.

In the end, the best judges of a conductor are the musicians that are under him. A noted singer in a moment of bitterness once spoke of the "cynics of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." All these men are loud in their praise of the new conductor. Some of them have played under him in Germany. "He knows what he wants, knows how to tell what he wants and knows how to get what he wants" was the way one put it the other day.

There seems to be little chance that Dr. Muck's stay in America will be for more than the present season. He looks on it as a change and a holiday. He possesses one of the two most desirable posts in all Europe. Socially his position in Berlin could not be bettered in this country and for him money seems not to be the chief end of life. He likes travel, likes to see new countries and new faces and in this he has the full sympathy of his very charming wife. Even now they are talking of returning to Germany by way of the Orient. They want to see the whole of this country, the Pacific Coast. Sometime ago a story was printed that he had decided to come to this country because then he could spend a week-end in South America. This caused him a vast amount of amusement. As a matter of fact, both he and his wife have the keenest curiosity about South America; and he asked Mr. Ellis if it were not much easier to get there from America than from Europe, learning for the first time that the quickest route from New York to Rio was by way of England.

Not the least fun he has had since his arrival has come from the caricatures of him, which have appeared in many papers, some of them most excellent; but, as his face lends itself easily to caricature, he sometimes needs the saving grace of humor to enjoy them. This he seems to have in great quantity. That is the gift of very few great musicians.

And finally, the inevitable "Do you like America?" He opens his hands and wears a pleading look.

"I have been in New York," he says, "three hours and in Boston 10 days lease!"

W. E. WALTER.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
OCTOBER 22, 1906

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.

Bach. Suit in B minor for Flute and Strings.
Soloist, Mr. Maquarre.
Haydn. Symphony in G minor.
Spohr. Concerto for Violin in D minor.
Soloist, Professor Willy Hess.
Mozart. Jupiter Symphony.

Saturday night the programme extended to two hours and was entirely in the old classical school, which former conductors have administered to the public in small and very careful doses. It was a very hopeful sign, therefore, to find the applause continuous and the interest sustained. It proves that the old well has not yet run dry; Haydn and Mozart have not been thrust upon the shelf by modern dealers in orchestra at wholesale. Yet we could have spared one of the symphonies very readily, in spite of the excellent reading of both.

Bach aroused the greatest enthusiasm. Von Buelow's arrangement of the work is effective, and the old intellectuality without the modern asceticism and crabbed ugliness seemed more beautiful than ever. It is possible that the modern plunges into "cerebral music" may, by comparison, result in causing a better appreciation of this more unstrained complexity,—a merit which we had not thought of in connection with the new school.

Of course Mr. Maquarre's playing had much to do with the appreciation of the work. He played as he always does, in a perfect manner, and in the delicious canon of the Sarabande (flute and violoncello), Mr. Warnke followed in beautiful imitation. The dignity of the Polonaise and the airy delicacy of the finale were points to praise especially. It might have been wise, however, to have omitted one or two of the movements (all in one key), and to have made a pause after the overture. It was a point of new and rather severe discipline, the giving of the seven (or with the "Doubles," etc., ten) movements without interruption. Latecomers must have gnashed their teeth as they grew gray with waiting in the outer corridors, for the work lasted about half-an-hour, during which no one was admitted to the hall.

The Haydn symphony took on new life in the excellent reading which Dr. Muck gave to it. He did not harass our expert musicians with too much time-beating in this, and sometimes allowed the orchestra to run on without any beats whatever. There was especial beauty in the lyrical manner in which he caused the Largo to be sung, and the Minuet with its Musette Trio had just the right tinge of contrast and an abundance of life. The finale was taken at a veritable Presto pace, which was not impossible for our orchestra, although we doubt if any band of Haydn's time could have sustained the pace. We do not believe that our forefathers could think as quick as that. But it made the jolly little folk-melody, which is the chief theme of the Rondo, very attractive, and the audience burst into the heartiest of applause at its end,—a tribute that was well-deserved.

Prof. Willy Hess was taken back to Boston's bosom as a prodigal son. The orchestra did not sing Foster's "Willie we have missed you," but they joined in the general applause at the reappearance of the gifted violinist. Spohr's Chesterfieldian music fitted perfectly to the very unstrained character of the entire programme. If there was emotion in the work it was of that kid-gloved, lace handkerchief kind which does not run close to the agony line. The limitations of the work were not to be charged to the account of the executant; Prof. Hess played the concerto like an artist of the first rank, which he certainly is. The cantilena of the Adagio was sung in the most perfect legato, and in matters of intonation, timbre, or surety of execution not a flaw could be found.

The finale, often omitted by soloists, was the most effective movement of the three, for here there was somthing of dramatic effect, and the purity of the double-stopping and the manner in which the many technical difficulties were overcome, were matters of admiration. Three hearty recalls testified to the appreciation of the audience.

It is to the credit of the artist that he did not in the least tamper with the spirit of the work; he did not attempt to introduce any sensational effects, but gave pure, suave, gentlemanly playing, such as suited to the conservative vein of Spohr.

The "Jupiter" symphony, which we have had frequently enough, was of course well read and well performed. Either this or the Haydn symphony could have been omitted to advantage. Parts of such works must necessarily grow threadbare,—the minuets and the repetitions in the slow movements, for example. The fairly trained concert-auditor of today knows ten measures ahead just what is going to occur, and the set formulas end by becoming tame

---

SUNDAY GLOBE—OCTOBER 21. 1906

THE LONGY CLUB.

Georges Longy, the leader of the Longy club, is planning to present a number of most interesting novelties at his concerts in the coming winter. These will be given in Potter hall Wednesday evenings, Nov 14, Jan 2 and Feb 6. The assisting artists will be Messrs Schuecker harpist, Kloepfel trumpet, Rettberg tympanist, and other members of the Boston symphony orchestra. The only change noted in the membership of the club is the presence of Mr Brooke as second flute. D. Maquarre has become first flute, A. Maquarre having retired.

Last evening the second concert of the Symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr Karl Muck was given. For the second time the new conductor observed that his musical judgment was enthusiastically indorsed by patrons of the concerts, and he was also made aware that in selecting his soloists from among the musicians of his organization his course meets the hearty approbation of his audience. For last evening Symphony goers were permitted to hear Prof Willy Hess, the concertmeister, and Andre Maquarre, flutist, in solo parts. Their reception justifies Dr Muck in frequently turning to his corps for individual performances.

Prof Hess played the somewhat spectacular Spohr concerto No. 9, written for the solo violin and orchestra, a work which had its last previous performance by the Symphony with Kneisel as soloist, so long ago that the occasion has been forgotten by many Symphony patrons. There is ample opportunity for the display of virtuosity in this composition, but it was by no means too pretentious an undertaking for the leading violinist of the orchestra. There are bits of brilliant contrast in the three measures and of the soloist is demanded precise technique, delicate fingering and broad, sturdy bowing.

In the opening passages of the first measure, the allegro, there is the quiet approach to the chief theme by the solo violin and Prof Hess compelled admiration thus early by the dexterity of his technique and the firm, clear-cut precision of his tones in the rapid scale. Under his bow the theme was developed with sympathetic fervor, and then came the simple melody of the second theme, followed by the florid passages which tax the flexibility of the artist. Here the versatility of the player was manifest, for the repetitions were played with cumulative strength and delicacy.

The second measure, adagio, fairly scintillates with runs and intricate phrasing in the interweave of the two themes which is the basis of the movement. There is much to dazzle the ear in these passages, and though glittering it serves principally as a preparation for the concluding movement, the allegretto.

Written in the major, the rondo brings out all of the latent vigor of the violinist, and Prof Hess reached the hights which have on many occasions been evaded by soloists who have attempted this concerto. The movement abounds in double stops with a frequency of florid writing. In the use of the double strings Prof Hess displayed not only distinctly accurate technique and brilliancy of execution, but the breadth and volume of his tones with deftness and virility brought out the light and shade of this arbitrary composition.

The orchestral numbers were the Bach suite No. 2 for flute and strings, Haydn's symphony in G major and the symphony in C major with fugue finale by Mozart. In the opening number Andre Maquarre sustained the prominence of the flute and the light, lilting passages the soloist played with the dexterity of the virtuoso.

Of the orchestral numbers the greatest credit to the organization must be given for its performance of Haydn's symphony, not because of greater excellence of execution, but because of the impression it made upon the audience. There was something appealing in the richness of the second movement, the largo, the strong, serious theme maintained by the violins and flute, then by 'cellos and oboes and carried to its full development by the complete orchestra. Here from his band Dr Muck extracted daintiness and virility, and the violins and 'cellos were marvelously true in the sonorous depths of the largo.

CAMILLE SAINT-SAENS.

The coming of Camille Saint-Saens to Boston Oct 30 under the auspices of the Symphony orchestra gives promise of being one of the most interesting musical events of the season. This remarkable old man, who is now in his 71st year, is coming to America for the first time, despite the tradition that once in his annual disappearances from Paris he spent some weeks in New York incognito. He himself asserts that he "disappeared" but once, which was in 1889, when he left Paris the night before the production of his opera, "Ascanio," and buried himself for three months in the Canary islands.

Of all the musicians of the past half-century Saint-Saens, to say the least, is the most versatile. His fame as a composer is known to all. In that branch of his art he unquestionably stands at the head of all men in France since Berlioz. His symphonies, symphonic poems, his concertos, his choral and operatic works and his chamber music are performed wherever music is made.

The concert which he will give with the assistance of the full Symphony orchestra is more in the nature of a tribute to him and to his achievements. It is impossible at this time to give the program, but in general it will consist exclusively of his own works, which he will conduct, and in addition to these it is expected that he will play his concerto for pianoforte in G minor.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The general season sale for the series of six concerts which the Boston symphony quartet will give in Chickering hall, beginning on Oct 29, will open tomorrow morning. The quartet seems steadily to grow in the appreciation of the Boston public, for this year the subscription sale has been much larger than ever before. The assisting artist at the first concert will be Heinrich Gebhard.

[41]

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 21, 1906.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S NEW GERMAN CONDUCTOR

A Close-Range Personal Sketch Of Karl Muck, Doctor Of Music.

Boston, Oct. 20.—A man of rather less than middle height, but slender and of a graceful build, which persuades one that he is considerably taller, whose gait and every action are filled with a tense, nervous strength which speaks of quick and final decision and of authority and power to command—such was the fleeting first impression made on the great audience which filled Boston's Symphony Hall last Saturday night, when Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, walked with a swift, springy step to the rostrum to conduct his first concert in America.

The next impression was of the charming modesty of the man. The orchestra rose to greet him. The hall was filled with the noise of clapping hands. The new conductor, baton in hand, bowed twice to the audience and then, facing his band, waited for the demonstration to cease. As the last sound died away, he lifted his right arm, with elbow sharply crooked, gave a quick, decisive beat and "fate was knocking at the door" in Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Dr. Muck, in Germany, is called "the aristocrat of conductors." This is partly due to his close relations with the German Emperor and with the Court in Berlin, where he is held in high favor, but chiefly it is his personality which has brought him his name. Although not born of the aristocracy, he comes of very good stock, that highly cultured upper middle class, which in all countries contributes the most to art and literature. Unlike too many musicians, Dr. Muck is an educated and cultured man. His interests do not stop with the art which he professes. His title of "doctor" was won by three years' hard work in the Universities of Heidelberg and Leipzig. Since then his life has placed him in close association not only with musicians, but with the men who are making Germany great in literature, in the drama, in art and in government, as well as in commerce and industry.

His interests are keen and wide reaching. He will talk music, shop, with a caller, if the caller insists, but he would much rather discuss the industrial and political development of this country, its manners and customs and tastes, its feeling for art and all kindred subjects. He confesses he knows little or nothing of America. He has not had time to learn. He speaks no English.

A MAN OF ENERGY.

"Had I known that I was to come to America, it would have been different," he said one day this week. "But my life has been so full that I seemed never to find the time to learn it, thinking, at best, it would be only an accomplishment. I left that to my wife. When I was a boy, I had little time to myself after the regular work in the gymnasium, with its extra course of French, and with my music, and it has been so ever since. Perhaps before I leave next spring I shall be able to make myself understood."

There is a very decided charm about the man, whether one sees him close at hand, talking to him or at a distance when he is conducting the orchestra. He seems to be the personification of nervous energy under complete and absolute control. His face is strongly marked and attractive, especially when it is lighted by his peculiarly fascinating smile, a smile which is full of good nature and full of humor. It is a face which once seen is not likely soon to be forgotten. The chin is long and strong. The mouth is small and firm, its sternness softened by little lines which show that laughter is never far away. The nose is big and masculine and exceedingly well modeled. The eyes are dark, bright and piercing, and look out from behind nose-glasses, which are rimmed with black rubber and are secured to his coat by a black silk ribbon. The forehead is rather low, and brushed back from it is fine, black, closely cropped hair. The head, while large, is well shaped and one notices no disproportion between it and the slender form which supports it.

One notices immediately another thing about Dr. Muck. He is well tailored and knows how to wear his clothes. He is no follower of the ancient tradition of musical slovenliness. It is difficult to believe that his coats have been cut by Berlin tailors; they smack too strongly of Bond street or Vienna. And he wears them with the easy grace of a man who has a good figure and is used to and takes pride in good clothes. In fact, there is just the least touch of the dandy about him. His cravts are rich in color and skillfully tied, and his scarfpins are always in taste. One sees that he likes jewelry, for he wears several handsomely jeweled rings and his watch guard is of rich workmanship.

Without the glint of humor in his eyes, his ready smile and the richness and carefulness of his dress the impression one would carry from him would be of austerity, even asceticism. These elements are in him, and betray themselves in his stern and unwavering devotion to the highest ideals of his art, but once away from his work he is almost boyish in his keen enjoyment of everything he meets with.

A BROAD CONSERVATIVE.

In music Dr. Muck must be classed among the broad conservatives. He does not hesitate to say that he finds little that is truly admirable in the music that is being written today.

"We put it on our program," he says, "and we play it, but in our search for beauty we must still go back to the masters. This is an age of criticism, of analysis, not of creation. Music should be more than technique and the music of today is little else."

This does not mean, however, that Dr. Muck is entirely out of sympathy with the modern movements in music. He is a friend and for many years has been a colleague of Richard Strauss and a friend and [illegible] of Mahler, but he confesses that [illegible] neither beauty nor coherency [illegible] Max Reger. He believes [illegible] reached its highest

Richard Wagner. He finds much that is interesting in the Russians.

"They are often bizarre," he says, "and often brutal, but they are sincere and write as they feel."

He likes the strong national note found in their music and envies the Russians their rich store of folk material. The modern Frenchmen are interesting, but theirs is too often the music of the head instead of the heart. Again, it is music written in the analytical spirit rather than in the truly creative. If asked who is his favorite composer, he merely smiles and asks why comparisons are necessary.

He frankly likes the theatre. He thinks it is strange that Shakespeare is so little played in this country. "I am told," he says, "that we in Berlin have more Shakespeare in a year than the whole of America. You do not seem to cherish your classics as we do."

Of opera, too, naturally he is very fond, for the greater part of his career has been spent in opera houses. Operatic conducting has been his work, orchestral merely his recreation. This fact caused much anxiety among the Boston musicians. Ignoring the fact that as guest he has conducted all the leading orchestras of Europe and for two years has been one of the two conductors of the Vienna Philharmonie, they thought it was a great risk to engage a man who had been so identified with opera, forgetting that none of the four previous conductors had had much orchestral experience. Henschel, the first, had had practically no experience of any kind. Gericke had been fourth conductor at the Vienna Opera. Nikisch and Paur, both of them, came from the Municipal Opera in Leipzig, a very minor institution.

HIS FIRST CONCERT.

The first concert set the minds of the fearful ones at rest. However great Dr. Muck may be as an operatic conductor, there remained no doubt of his ability to hold the baton over Boston's orchestra. His splendidly broad and tremendously passionate reading of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, a performance which compelled the conservative Bostonians to rise and cheer him at the end, was ample evidence that he was all that he should be.

And yet, as one watched him conduct, one wondered how he did it. No conductor, not even Theodore Thomas, has been less demontrative. There were no frenzied shaking of heads or wild gyrating of arms. He stood quietly on the rostrum, for the most of the time his weight thrown on his right leg and leaning lightly on his left hand, which rested on the music rack. His baton is long and very slender and he holds it lightly with his thumb, his index and middle finger. His beat is very sharp, very short and, according to the musicians, easy to follow. For the most part, it is not seen by the audience, for he holds his right hand in front of him and seems to give swift, hard little pokes. And when he gives an unusually long poke there is, in the vernacular, "something doing" immediately. His left hand is seldom used, only when he is after extreme effects or wishes to emphasize a staccato passage.

In a word, he seems to be a conductor who believes that all work should be done in rehearsal, and that at a concert the orchestra should be able practically to take care of itself. Several times he stopped beating entirely, now and then emphasizing some point with his closed left hand. Solo passages for individual instruments are not hampered by his beat, for he allows them freedom. At one of the first rehearsals he told Mr. Longy to play a solo passage for the first oboe as he thought best.

All this, of course, is anticipatory, for Baltimore will soon have a chance to judge for itself. But certain things were so evident at the first concert that one cannot help mentioning them. His readings are broad and big and, to a certain extent, impersonal. Unquestionably a lover of sonority, he never seeks to gain this element at the expense of the component parts of the work, nor does he sacrifice the whole to details. His readings are not analytical, in the sense of a dissection, rather do they fall under the term of constructive analysis. He loves the middle voices of a work, and to Boston showed things in the symphony which had been forgotten, so long was it since they were heard, yet the whole performance was filled with the rich, red blood of life. It was the voice of Beethoven which spoke to the audience directly, undistorted by "personal interpretation."

HE SHATTERED TRADITIONS.

And yet tradition after tradition was shattered. The andante was taken more slowly than it has ever been heard in Boston. Most conductors are afraid of it—of making it sentimental. Dr. Muck turned it into a noble song and nobly the orchestra sang it. The scherzo, which most conductors, following the metronomic directions of the score—which did not come from Beethoven—usually take at the swiftest pace possible, is taken by Dr. Muck much more slowly, so that for once the wonderfully beautiful passages for the cellos were heard. And again, in the finale, that splendid song of triumph, Dr. Muck took a slower pace than we are accustomed to until the last accellerando, which went with a whirl.

On thing seems certain. Dr. Muck is going to let the orchestra play. Mr. Gericke, with all his good qualities, constantly exercised repression. It was good to hear once more the full glory of the brass. It is years since it has been allowed to show itself as it did in the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," and even then it seemed as if the conductor was not satisfied, as if he wanted more. And yet, all the time one saw only the quiet, slender black figure which stood almost motionless at the music rack.

In the end, the best judges of a conductor are the musicians that are under him. A noted singer in a moment of bitterness once spoke of the "cynics of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." All these men are loud in their praise of the new conductor. Some of them have played under him in Germany. "He knows what he wants, knows how to tell what he wants and knows how to get what he wants" was the way one put it the other day.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
OCTOBER 22, 1906

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.

Bach. Suit in B minor for Flute and Strings.
Soloist, Mr. Maquarre.
Haydn. Symphony in G minor.
Spohr. Concerto for Violin in D minor.
Soloist, Professor Willy Hess.
Mozart. Jupiter Symphony.

Saturday night the programme extended to two hours and was entirely in the old classical school, which former conductors have administered to the public in small and very careful doses. It was a very hopeful sign, therefore, to find the applause continuous and the interest sustained. It proves that the old well has not yet run dry; Haydn and Mozart have not been thrust upon the shelf by modern dealers in orchestra at wholesale. Yet we could have spared one of the symphonies very readily, in spite of the excellent reading of both.

Bach aroused the greatest enthusiasm. Von Buelow's arrangement of the work is effective, and the old intellectuality without the modern asceticism and crabbed ugliness seemed more beautiful than ever. It is possible that the modern plunges into "cerebral music" may, by comparison, result in causing a better appreciation of this more unstrained complexity,—a merit which we had not thought of in connection with the new school.

Of course Mr. Maquarre's playing had much to do with the appreciation of the work. He played as he always does, in a perfect manner, and in the delicious canon of the Sarabande (flute and violoncello), Mr. Warnke followed in beautiful imitation. The dignity of the Polonaise and the airy delicacy of the finale were points to praise especially. It might have been wise, however, to have omitted one or two of the movements (all in one key), and to have made a pause after the overture. It was a point of new and rather severe discipline, the giving of the seven (or with the "Doubles," etc., ten) movements without interruption. Latecomers must have gnashed their teeth as they grew gray with waiting in the outer corridors, for the work lasted about half-an-hour, during which no one was admitted to the hall.

The Haydn symphony took on new life in the excellent reading which Dr. Muck gave to it. He did not harass our expert musicians with too much time-beating in this, and sometimes allowed the orchestra to run on without any beats whatever. There was especial beauty in the lyrical manner in which he caused the Largo to be sung, and the Minuet with its Musette Trio had just the right tinge of contrast and an abundance of life. The finale was taken at a veritable Presto pace, which was not impossible for our orchestra, although we doubt if any band of Haydn's time could have sustained the pace. We do not believe that our forefathers could think as quick as that. But it made the jolly little folk-melody, which is the chief theme of the Rondo, very attractive, and the audience burst into the heartiest of applause at its end,—a tribute that was well-deserved.

Prof. Willy Hess was taken back to Boston's bosom as a prodigal son. The orchestra did not sing Foster's "Willie we have missed you," but they joined in the general applause at the reappearance of the gifted violinist. Spohr's Chesterfieldian music fitted perfectly to the very unstrained character of the entire programme. If there was emotion in the work it was of that kid-gloved, lace handkerchief kind which does not run close to the agony line. The limitations of the work were not to be charged to the account of the executant; Prof. Hess played the concerto like an artist of the first rank, which he certainly is. The cantilena of the Adagio was sung in the most perfect legato, and in matters of intonation, timbre, or surety of execution not a flaw could be found.

The finale, often omitted by soloists, was the most effective movement of the three, for here there was somthing of dramatic effect, and the purity of the double-stopping and the manner in which the many technical difficulties were overcome, were matters of admiration. Three hearty recalls testified to the appreciation of the audience.

It is to the credit of the artist that he did not in the least tamper with the spirit of the work; he did not attempt to introduce any sensational effects, but gave pure, suave, gentlemanly playing, such as suited to the conservative vein of Spohr.

The "Jupiter" symphony, which we have had frequently enough, was of course well read and well performed. Either this or the Haydn symphony could have been omitted to advantage. Parts of such works must necessarily grow threadbare,—the minuets and the repetitions in the slow movements, for example. The fairly trained concert-auditor of today knows ten measures ahead just what is going to occur, and the set formulas end by becoming tame.

The next concert is to be wholly of a moderately radical character. As a witty auditor observed, if this concert is of the "extreme right," the next is to be of the "left centre"; a simile which followers of French politics and Boston music will easily understand.

Louis C. Elson.

[illegible] ellis if it were not much easier to get there from America than from Europe, learning for the first time that the quickest route from New York to Rio was by way of England.

Not the least fun he has had since his arrival has come from the caricatures of him, which have appeared in many papers, some of them most excellent; but, as his face lends itself easily to caricature, he sometimes needs the saving grace of humor to enjoy them. This he seems to have in great quantity. That is the gift of very few great musicians.

And finally, the inevitable "Do you like America?" He opens his hands and wears a pleading look.

"I have been in New York," he says, "three hours and in Boston 10 days [illegible]!"

W. E. W[illegible]

SUNDAY GLOBE—OCTOBER 21. 1906

THE LONGY CLUB.

Georges Longy, the leader of the Longy club, is planning to present a number of most interesting novelties at his concerts in the coming winter. These will be given in Potter hall Wednesday evenings, Nov 14, Jan 2 and Feb 6. The assisting artists will be Messrs Schuecker harpist, Kloepfel trumpet, Rettberg tympanist, and other members of the Boston symphony orchestra. The only change noted in the membership of the club is the presence of Mr Brooke as second flute. D. Maquarre has become first flute, A. Maquarre having retired.

Last evening the second concert of the Symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr Karl Muck was given. For the second time the new conductor observed that his musical judgment was enthusiastically indorsed by patrons of the concerts, and he was also made aware that in selecting his soloists from among the musicians of his organization his course meets the hearty approbation of his audience. For last evening Symphony goers were permitted to hear Prof Willy Hess, the concertmeister, and Andre Maquarre, flutist, in solo parts. Their reception justifies Dr Muck in frequently turning to his corps for individual performances.

Prof Hess played the somewhat spectacular Spohr concerto No. 9, written for the solo violin and orchestra, a work which had its last previous performance by the Symphony with Kneisel as soloist, so long ago that the occasion has been forgotten by many Symphony patrons. There is ample opportunity for the display of virtuosity in this composition, but it was by no means too pretentious an undertaking for the leading violinist of the orchestra. There are bits of brilliant contrast in the three measures and of the soloist is demanded precise technique, delicate fingering and broad, sturdy bowing.

In the opening passages of the first measure, the allegro, there is the quiet approach to the chief theme by the solo violin and Prof Hess compelled admiration thus early by the dexterity of his technique and the firm, clear-cut precision of his tones in the rapid scale. Under his bow the theme was developed with sympathetic fervor, and then came the simple melody of the second theme, followed by the florid passages which tax the flexibility of the artist. Here the versatility of the player was manifest, for the repetitions were played with cumulative strength and delicacy.

The second measure, adagio, fairly scintillates with runs and intricate phrasing in the interweave of the two themes which is the basis of the movement. There is much to dazzle the ear in these passages, and though glittering it serves principally as a preparation for the concluding movement, the allegretto.

Written in the major, the rondo brings out all of the latent vigor of the violinist, and Prof Hess reached the hights which have on many occasions been evaded by soloists who have attempted this concerto. The movement abounds in double stops with a frequency of florid writing. In the use of the double strings Prof Hess displayed not only distinctly accurate technique and brilliancy of execution, but the breadth and volume of his tones with deftness and virility brought out the light and shade of this arbitrary composition.

The orchestral numbers were the Bach suite No. 2 for flute and strings, Haydn's symphony in G major and the symphony in C major with fugue finale by Mozart. In the opening number Andre Maquarre sustained the prominence of the flute and the light, lilting passages the soloist played with the dexterity of the virtuoso.

Of the orchestral numbers the greatest credit to the organization must be given for its performance of Haydn's symphony, not because of greater excellence of execution, but because of the impression it made upon the audience. There was something appealing in the richness of the second movement, the largo, the strong, serious theme maintained by the violins and flute, then by 'cellos and oboes and carried to its full development by the complete orchestra. Here from his band Dr Muck extracted daintiness and virility, and the violins and 'cellos were marvelously true in the sonorous depths of the largo.

CAMILLE SAINT-SAENS.

The coming of Camille Saint-Saens to Boston Oct 30 under the auspices of the Symphony orchestra gives promise of being one of the most interesting musical events of the season. This remarkable old man, who is now in his 71st year, is coming to America for the first time, despite the tradition that once in his annual disappearances from Paris he spent some weeks in New York incognito. He himself asserts that he "disappeared" but once, which was in 1889, when he left Paris the night before the production of his opera, "Ascanio," and buried himself for three months in the Canary islands.

Of all the musicians of the past half-century Saint-Saens, to say the least, is the most versatile. His fame as a composer is known to all. In that branch of his art he unquestionably stands at the head of all men in France since Berlioz. His symphonies, symphonic poems, his concertos, his choral and operatic works and his chamber music are performed wherever music is made.

The concert which he will give with the assistance of the full Symphony orchestra is more in the nature of a tribute to him and to his achievements. It is impossible at this time to give the program, but in general it will consist exclusively of his own works, which he will conduct, and in addition to these it is expected that he will play his concerto for pianoforte in G minor.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The general season sale for the series of six concerts which the Boston symphony quartet will give in Chickering hall, beginning on Oct 29, will open tomorrow morning. The quartet seems steadily to grow in the appreciation of the Boston public, for this year the subscription sale has been much larger than ever before. The assisting artist at the first concert will be Heinrich Gebhard.

...R 22, 1906.

...k, Symphony Director, Provides Program of Ancient Classicism Which Was Made Profoundly Stirring.

As his second essay for the favor of Symphony audiences Conductor Muck arranged a concert of mild and ancient classicism. The program was all of one piece, so far as form went, for Bach, Haydn, Spohr and Mozart do not afford any especial variety. To many it was a novelty to hear all this unbroken beauty and refinement with never a thrill to change the current of musical thought, except perhaps in parts of the great "Jupiter" symphony. And yet such a plan has its uses and its pleasures. It impresses effectively the facts of style as pertaining to certain ages of composition, and it gives many the delight of satiety. But there is little need for a repetition of it. Let us admit that the four men of calm classicism are, or were, giants in their day, but let us also humbly petition Dr. Muck to forego this particular kind of program for a while, at least.

Again the readings by the new leader were marked by refined charm mingled with poetic force. There is nothing new to say with Haydn's G major symphony, for instance, nor can any fresh twist be given such a bit of elegance as the Bach suite for flute and strings. To say, therefore, that these were played with perfection of dynamics and tonal loveliness is to give all the praise possible. The Mozart symphony, however, has within it emotion and strength of a genuine, if old-fashioned, sort, and here was another real test of Dr. Muck's qualities as an interpreter. To declare that he made the work as profoundly stirring and fascinating as have any of his predecessors is to bestow as high praise as is possible to give.

Willy Hess was the soloist, playing Spohr's concerto in G major with as much expressive eloquence as the rather square-cut and formal work demanded.

THE BOSTON TRAVELER
OCTOBER 22, 1906

TWO solid hours of Bach, Haydn, Spohr and Mozart was Dr. Muck's offering for the second Symphony concert Saturday evening. It was a bold venture indeed, and affords still further evidence that the new leader does not intend to be bound down by tradition. Furthermore, the cordial reception accorded the exceptionally long programme demonstrated that Dr. Muck is feeling his way with the musical public most successfully.

The programme was Bach's Suite in B minor for flute and strings, Haydn's major symphony, a violin concerto in D minor, Spohr, and Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony. Mr. Willy Hess was the soloist. Whatever doubts the critical might have had regarding the wisdom of selecting such a programme, those doubts must have been speedily dispelled at the close of the first number, the Bach selection, for the audience became most enthusiastic, compelling conductor and Mr. Maquarre to repeatedly acknowledge its applause. It was just a bit beyond the ordinary for these concerts. Of course, Mr. Maquarre's remarkable playing was a most essential factor. It was simply delightful.

Dr. Muck's reading of the Haydn number seemed to open up beauties heretofore not fully appreciated. Considering the unusual length of the evening's programme it might have been a judicious move to have cut this selection, yet it must be allowed that there was not the slightest doubt of approval of the work in its entirety as given. The finale brought out some truly marvelous playing on the part of the orchestra and well merited the hearty recognition accorded it.

Spohr's concerto brought Willy Hess once more forward as the soloist, and enthusiastic as was the greeting accorded him it was tame in comparison with the enthusiasm aroused by his well-nigh peerless playing. It was artistic in the highest sense of the word and easily the feature of the concert. Mr. Hess, true artist that he is, plays as the composer wrote and does not strive for the unusual.

Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony might well have attached an explanation of the "Jupiter." Possibly because it came at the fall end of a long evening it was not as well received as it should have been. Certain it is that although well played, it did not create any particular impression. The third concert, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, this week, promises to make amends in the matter of length. The programme is a Brhams symphony, Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" and three movements from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

Boston Post,
October 23—06

CAMILLE SAINT-SAENS

Europe has sent no more interesting personality to this country than Camille Saint-Saens, the distinguished composer who is to conduct the Symphony Orchestra in a special concert of his own compositions on Tuesday evening, Oct. 30, [illegible] 1867, when he sent his "Noces de [illegible]" anonymously from London [illegible] the prize offered by the exposition, his productive power as a composer has never slackened.

...SDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1906

The Symphony Concert

To praise the fine qualities of the playing of the Symphony Orchestra makes an old story, and to repeat it too often is to be promptly told by some restless iconoclast that its public is living in a musical backwater of self-satisfaction. In fact, it is so used to those qualities that it does not fully appreciate them, and it needs the stimulating contrasts and comparisons that the visits of other orchestras—if only it would go to hear them—might bring. Not that our band has all the orchestral virtues, but it has the qualities that shine particularly through such a programme of eighteenth-century music as Dr. Muck repeated on Saturday evening. There is no hiding any technical slips in music that is so luminously clear. Every ear may hear, while not one in a thousand may detect what goes on underneath—so to say—in a tone-poem by Strauss or a symphony by Mahler. There is no other goal in this music of Bach, Haydn and Mozart than the beauty and the charm of formal sound, and they must find communicating voice in the beauty and the balance of tone, the pliancy of rhythm, the delicacy and the lightness of pattern-weaving that an orchestra brings to them. Without loveliness of tone, suppleness of rhythm and animated spontaneity, the music does seem thin, antiquated, stiff and monotonous. An orchestra must sing and dance in it. The very lightness and brightness of the task make it quite as difficult, if it is to be done delicately well, as the playing of ultra-modern music. Bright incisiveness, endless undulation and fanciful grace in music are more evasive than much of the tonal storm and stress that has come after them. Dr. Muck let all these qualities in the music speak for themselves, but it was his men who gave them their fitting voice, and therefore their lasting beauty.

There were the same adroit discrimination and delicate sympathy in the adapting of the means to the end in the playing of the two members of the orchestra who had solo parts. Mr. André Maquarre, when he chooses, can give his flute half the voice and twice the litheness of a coloratura singer sparkling through the ornaments of song. In the solo part of Bach's suite he was discerningly content with a tone that had suave beauty, graceful undulation and light life. Mr. Hess, in turn, played the violin part in Spohr's ninth concerto. He did not try to transfigure Spohr, to make him sound heroic, as Ysaye makes Vieuxtemps, for example, sound. Neither did he "walk through" the concerto, as the phrase runs of actors who neglect their parts, and play it as a glorified exercise in the higher technics of the violin. Mr. Hess has those technics under easy mastery, but he used them to serve and heighten the languorous grace or the fluent animation of Spohr's concerto. Here again was music that asked the flow of beautiful tone in long-drawn melody, that sought clearness of outline and softness of texture, a smooth and formal symmetry and a certain sweetness of idea and of fancy. It is very easy to emasculate Spohr and very stupid to inflate him. Mr. Hess took the music for exactly what it is and so for the half hour gave it life again.

H. T. P.

There are 100 concerts in the list of the Symphony Orchestra for the current season—in the smaller cities of New England, like Worcester, Portland and Providence, in the five cities—Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, New York and Brooklyn—that the band visits on its monthly trips, and in Rochester, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Indianapolis and Cincinnati for its Western journey at the end of January. As hitherto it will give two concerts at home in the course of the season for the increase of its pension fund, and at one of them Paderewski will play.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
From N. Y. EV'G SUN
Address
Date OCT 23 1906

The Boston Symphony Quartet, fresh from Willy Hess's summer home in Ogunquit, Me., have just made their first appearances in the Middle West, at Buffalo, Detroit and other cities. They will give three concerts in New York. Prof. Hess, in addition to bringing over a new concerto for violin and orchestra by Frédéric d'Erlanger, of Paris, has also provided quartet novelties. On his first New York programme, Nov. 9, is a quartet in B-flat, op. 11, by Joseph Suk, of the famous Bohemian Quartet.

Mr. Hess promises a serenade for strings by the Swiss, Emil Jacques-Dalcroze, whose concerto Henri Marteau played last winter; also a quartet in A, by Glière, the young Russian; a new quintet for strings, by Felix Weingartner, and an important quartet in D by Hugo Kaun.

There are also the Italian, Martucci's sonata for piano and o'ello and, lastly, a "sinfonia da camera" for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, horn, double bass, piano and string quartet, by Wolf-Ferrari. To dig these out last summer, Prof. Hess went through more than forty scores, mostly by what he described as "decomposers" of music.

...ress OCT 23 1906

A Boston critic has had some memorable experiences at the Muck Symphony concerts. We learn that "Bach's flute trod its measures . . . in and out among the courtesying and attendant strings." There were heard "glorified dance melodies and rhythms, pattering on the ear and the fancy like the falling of feet," and "beauty of sound for its own long-drawn and curving loveliness." But what was the conductor doing? "Did he a little miss the wistfulness and the tenderness that Mozart at least could put quivering underneath?" We fear that he did.

Boston Journal
October 23—06

SAINT-SAENS TO WIELD BATON FOR THE SYMPHONY

Europe has sent no more interesting personality to this country than Camille Saint-Saens, the distinguished composer, who is to conduct the Symphony Orchestra in a special concert of his own compositions, on Tuesday evening, Oct. 30. He has been a commanding figure on the French concert stage since 1846, when, at the age of 11, he gave his first concert in the Salle Pleyel, Paris. Since 1867, when he sent his "Noces de Promethee" anonymously from London and won the prize offered by the exposition, his productive power as a composer has never slackened. Only a few weeks ago he brought out in London a new sonata for 'cello and piano, which was highly praised for its freshness and originality.

This season, as hitherto, the Symphony Orchestra will give six concerts in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge on the evenings of Thursdays, Oct. 25, Dec. 13, Jan. 24, Feb. 28, April 4 and May 2, beginning at eight o'clock. The assisting artists comprise Miss Ormond and Miss Snelling, the contralto singers; Mme. Szumowska and Miss Radecki, the pianist, and Mr. Hess, the violinist of the orchestra itself. Subscribers to the concerts of last year may obtain the same seats for the new series by application to George H. Kent before next Thursday, Oct. 18. The general sale of seats begins the following Saturday at the University Book Store.

/ / + / /

Monday evening, Oct. 29, in Chickering Hall, first concert for the new season of the Symphony Quartet, with a new quartet for strings by Suk, a trio for strings by Beethoven and César Franck's quintet for piano and strings for the programme. Heinrich Gebhard is the pianist.

N. Y. EV'G SUN
OCT 24 1906
...ss

Symphony Hall wore a broad smile, they say, at the opening of the musical season in Boston the other day. There was no intention of putting a slight upon Handel, Haydn, Bach or Brahms. It happened this way: Prof. Willy Hess, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in succession to Kneisel and also the leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, has become popular at the Hub, both as a man and as a musician, and at a first concert he has always received "a hand" when he took his place at the head of the first violins. This year there was a delay before the applause began. A dark, slender, strange looking man appeared in Hess's chair. He looked at least ten years younger and at first the audience failed absolutely to recognize him, so changed was his appearance. In the course of the summer he had shaved his beard.

N. Y. EV'G SUN
OCT 24 1906
...ss

Dr. Karl Muck, who is to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, gave this interesting description of how his first sail into the port of New York impressed him: "I was awed—yes, awed—by the skyline of your city as the steamship slowly moved up the bay," he said. "It is gigantic, overwhelming, bewildering. It completely embodies the mental picture I had formed of it, the reality filling out magnificently the crevices of detail. The colossal structures, studded with innumerable windows, put me in mind of so many human beehives, the workers within bent on great accomplishment. This, then, is the energy that makes your country what it is. The sight is an inspiration—splendid! splendid! This may sound naive to you. Recollect, though, this is my first visit to your shores. Wait until I come again, then probably I shall assume that fashionable blasé indifference. Now I am interested in everything, everything."—Musical Age.

...ress OCT 24 1906

Dr. Carl Muck, the new conductor, already given his second pair of concerts. From the Wagner and "Fifth Symphony" of his début, he went back to a search of the antique to make a Boston matinée. Says the Transcript: "Not once did Dr. Muck try to force or to distort this music that it might sound for something different from what it is. He animated it with its spirit and life."

"For the moment the atmosphere of Symphony Hall became, with a little spring and settling of the imagination, like that of the minor court at Cöthen, for which Bach made his suite, or of the Concerts Spirituels in Paris, hearing the symphony commissioned from Haydn, or of the concert room at Prague, where Mozart felt the sunshine of favor. Bach's flute trod its measures through his stately dances in and out among the curtseying and attendant strings, or tripped through the light steps of his 'Badinage.' We who listened were content to ask no more of music than glorified dance melodies and rhythms, pattering on the ear and the fancy, like the fall of dancing feet.

"Then came the clamorous staccato chords of the beginning of Haydn's symphony. Could eighteenth-century music turn strenuous, after all? But it was only playful thumping. In a moment the music was as free from thunderbolts as lace; and was weaving its delicate patterns through a light allegro.

"Yet Haydn in his symphonies and Bach in this particular suite were writing no more than superficial music. It was Mozart's symphony that searched the heart of his time as well as his own. Here were perfection and even complexity of form, as complexity went in those days. Yet underneath was a shiver and quiver of passion. Here was the beauty of sound for its own long-drawn and curving loveliness, yet underneath was haunting and wistful melancholy—the melancholy of some of Watteau's pictures.

"Here was music that leapt out of the pretty bonds of the minuet into the tumultuous freedom of the finale. The 'Jupiter' symphony is indeed music with a life of its own, independent of all else but Mozart, yet in it also is the mood of its time. Mozart, in spite of his detachment, had begun to feel it and to smart under it."

...ss OCT 24 1906

SAINT-SAENS ILL AT SEA.

French Composer Seriously Stricken on Voyage to America.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 24.—Manager C. A. Elds of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to-day received this wireless message from the surgeon of the French liner La Provence, off Cape Race:

"Dr. Saint-Saens seriously sick. His presence at Boston Symphony concert delayed."

The message refers to Camille Saint-Saens, the French composer, who is on his way to America for a concert tour. He was to have appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Monday night, but in consequence of the message this event has been postponed.

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
SATURDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1906

SAINT-SAENS'S CONCERT NOV. 26

The Date and an Interesting Programme Settled in New York Today

This morning in New York it was definitely arranged that Saint-Saëns, the eminent French composer, conductor, pianist and organist, will give his concert in Boston, as the guest of the Symphony Orchestra, on Monday evening, Nov. 26, in Symphony Hall. The programme will consist entirely of his own music, viz.: The overture to his recent opera, "The Barbarians;" his familiar tone-poem "Omphale's Spinning Wheel;" the equally familiar "Danse Macabre," and his symphony in C-minor, as masterly a piece of instrumentation as ever came from a composer's hand and enlisting a piano and an organ as well as the usual orchestra. Mr. Saint-Saëns will conduct in all four of these compositions which virtually sum and individualize his music as a composer for orchestra. In the course of the concert he will also play three of his organ pieces—a prelude, a "Salutare" and a fantasy, and his note as the organist of Sainte-Méry and of La Madeleine in Paris has matched his celebrity as a pianist. Thus his audience here will have only the fuller and keener pleasure, though it was necessary to defer the concert from the date originally announced. Reservations of seats made for next Tuesday will hold good for Monday evening, Nov. 26.

[42]

The Boston Journal
OCTOBER 22, 1906.

Dr. Muck, Symphony Director, Provides Program of Ancient Classicism Which Was Made Profoundly Stirring.

As his second essay for the favor of Symphony audiences Conductor Muck arranged a concert of mild and ancient classicism. The program was all of one piece, so far as form went, for Bach, Haydn, Spohr and Mozart do not afford any especial variety. To many it was a novelty to hear all this unbroken beauty and refinement with never a thrill to change the current of musical thought, except perhaps in parts of the great "Jupiter" symphony. And yet such a plan has its uses and its pleasures. It impresses effectively the facts of style as pertaining to certain ages of composition, and it gives many the delight of satiety. But there is little need for a repetition of it. Let us admit that the four men of calm classicism are, or were, giants in their day, but let us also humbly petition Dr. Muck to forego this particular kind of program for a while, at least.

Again the readings by the new leader were marked by refined charm mingled with poetic force. There is nothing new to say with Haydn's G major symphony, for instance, nor can any fresh twist be given such a bit of elegance as the Bach suite for flute and strings. To say, therefore, that these were played with perfection of dynamics and tonal loveliness is to give all the praise possible. The Mozart symphony, however, has within it emotion and strength of a genuine, if old-fashioned, sort, and here was another real test of Dr. Muck's qualities as an interpreter. To declare that he made the work as profoundly stirring and fascinating as have any of his predecessors is to bestow as high praise as is possible to give.

Willy Hess was the soloist, playing Spohr's concerto in G major with as much expressive eloquence as the rather square-cut and formal work demanded.

THE BOSTON TRAVELER
OCTOBER 22, 1906.

TWO solid hours of Bach, Haydn, Spohr and Mozart was Dr. Muck's offering for the second Symphony concert Saturday evening. It was a bold venture indeed, and affords still further evidence that the new leader does not intend to be bound down by tradition. Furthermore, the cordial reception accorded the exceptionally long programme demonstrated that Dr. Muck is feeling his way with the musical public most successfully.

The programme was Bach's Suite in B minor for flute and strings, Haydn's major symphony, a violin concerto in D minor, Spohr, and Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony. Mr. Willy Hess was the soloist. Whatever doubts the critical might have had regarding the wisdom of selecting such a programme, those doubts must have been speedily dispelled at the close of the first number, the Bach selection, for the audience became most enthusiastic, compelling conductor and Mr. Maquarre to repeatedly acknowledge its applause. It was just a bit beyond the ordinary for these concerts. Of course, Mr. Maquarre's remarkable playing was a most essential factor. It was simply delightful.

Dr. Muck's reading of the Haydn number seemed to open up beauties heretofore not fully appreciated. Considering the unusual length of the evening's programme it might have been a judicious move to have cut this selection, yet it must be allowed that there was not the slightest doubt of approval of the work in its entirety as given. The finale brought out some truly marvelous playing on the part of the orchestra and well merited the hearty recognition accorded it.

Spohr's concerto brought Willy Hess once more forward as the soloist, and enthusiastic as was the greeting accorded him it was tame in comparison with the enthusiasm aroused by his well-nigh peerless playing. It was artistic in the highest sense of the word and easily the feature of the concert. Mr. Hess, true artist that he is, plays as the composer wrote and does not strive for the unusual.

Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony might well have attached an explanation of the "Jupiter." Possibly because it came at the tail end of a long evening it was not as well received as it should have been. Certain it is that although well played, it did not create any particular impression. The third concert, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, this week, promises to make amends in the matter of length. The programme is a Brhams symphony, Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" and three movements from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

Boston Post,
October 23-06

CAMILLE SAINT-SAENS

Europe has sent no more interesting personality to this country than Camille Saint-Saens, the distinguished composer who is to conduct the Symphony Orchestra in a special concert of his own compositions on Tuesday evening, Oct. 30. Since 1867, when he sent his "Noces de Promethee" anonymously from London and won the prize offered by the exposition, his productive power as a composer has never slackened.

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
MONDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1906

The Symphony Concert

To praise the fine qualities of the playing of the Symphony Orchestra makes an old story, and to repeat it too often is to be promptly told by some restless iconoclast that its public is living in a musical backwater of self-satisfaction. In fact, it is so used to those qualities that it does not fully appreciate them, and it needs the stimulating contrasts and comparisons that the visits of other orchestras—if only it would go to hear them—might bring. Not that our band has all the orchestral virtues, but it has the qualities that shine particularly through such a programme of eighteenth-century music as Dr. Muck repeated on Saturday evening. There is no hiding any technical slips in music that is so luminously clear. Every ear may hear, while not one in a thousand may detect what goes on underneath—so to say—in a tone-poem by Strauss or a symphony by Mahler. There is no other goal in this music of Bach, Haydn and Mozart than the beauty and the charm of formal sound, and they must find communicating voice in the beauty and the balance of tone, the pliancy of rhythm, the delicacy and the lightness of pattern-weaving that an orchestra brings to them. Without loveliness of tone, suppleness of rhythm and animated spontaneity, the music does seem thin, antiquated, stiff and monotonous. An orchestra must sing and dance in it. The very lightness and brightness of the task make it quite as difficult, if it is to be done delicately well, as the playing of ultra-modern music. Bright incisiveness, endless undulation and fanciful grace in music are more evasive than much of the tonal storm and stress that has come after them. Dr. Muck let all these qualities in the music speak for themselves, but it was his men who gave them their fitting voice, and therefore their lasting beauty.

There were the same adroit discrimination and delicate sympathy in the adapting of the means to the end in the playing of the two members of the orchestra who had solo parts. Mr. André Maquarre, when he chooses, can give his flute half the voice and twice the litheness of a coloratura singer sparkling through the ornaments of song. In the solo part of Bach's suite he was discerningly content with a tone that had suave beauty, graceful undulation and light life. Mr. Hess, in turn, played the violin part in Spohr's ninth concerto. He did not try to transfigure Spohr, to make him sound heroic, as Ysaye makes Vieuxtemps, for example, sound. Neither did he "walk through" the concerto, as the phrase runs of actors who neglect their parts, and play it as a glorified exercise in the higher technics of the violin. Mr. Hess has those technics under easy mastery, but he used them to serve and heighten the languorous grace or the fluent animation of Spohr's concerto. Here again was music that asked the flow of beautiful tone in long-drawn melody, that sought clearness of outline and softness of texture, a smooth and formal symmetry and a certain sweetness of idea and of fancy. It is very easy to emasculate Spohr and very stupid to inflate him. Mr. Hess took the music for exactly what it is and so for the half hour gave it life again.

H. T. P.

There are 100 concerts in the list of the Symphony Orchestra for the current season—in the smaller cities of New England, like Worcester, Portland and Providence, in the five cities—Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, New York and Brooklyn—that the band visits on its monthly trips, and in Rochester, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Indianapolis and Cincinnati for its Western journey at the end of January. As hitherto it will give two concerts at home in the course of the season for the increase of its pension fund, and at one of them Paderewski will play.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World

From

Address

Date

The Boston Symphony Quartet, fresh from Willy Hess's summer home in Ogunquit, Me., have just made their first appearances in the Middle West, at Buffalo, Detroit and other cities. They will give three concerts in New York. Prof. Hess, in addition to bringing over a new concerto for violin and orchestra by Frédéric d'Erlanger, of Paris, has also provided quartet novelties. On his first New York programme, Nov. 9, is a quartet in B-flat, op. 11, by Joseph Suk, of the famous Bohemian Quartet.

Mr. Hess promises a serenade for strings by the Swiss, Emil Jacques-Dalcroze, whose concerto Henri Marteau played last winter; also a quartet in A, by Glière, the young Russian; a new quintet for strings, by Felix Weingartner, and an important quartet in D by Hugo Kaun.

There are also the Italian, Martucci's sonata for piano and c'ello and, lastly, a "sinfonia da camera" for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, horn, double bass, piano and string quartet, by Wolf-Ferrari. To dig these out last summer, Prof. Hess went through more than forty scores, mostly by what he described as "decomposers" of music.

ress

A Boston critic has had some memorable experiences at the Muck Symphony concerts. We learn that "Bach's flute trod its measures . . . in and out among the courtesying and attendant strings." There were heard "glorified dance melodies and rhythms, pattering on the ear and the fancy like the falling of feet," and "beauty of sound for its own long-drawn and curving loveliness." But what was the conductor doing? "Did he a little miss the wistfulness and the tenderness that Mozart at least could put quivering underneath?" We fear that he did.

Boston Journal
October 23-06

SAINT-SAENS TO WIELD BATON FOR THE SYMPHONY

Europe has sent no more interesting personality to this country than Camille Saint-Saens, the distinguished composer, who is to conduct the Symphony Orchestra in a special concert of his own compositions, on Tuesday evening, Oct. 30. He has been a commanding figure on the French concert stage since 1846, when, at the age of 11, he gave his first concert in the Salle Pleyel, Paris. Since 1867, when he sent his "Noces de Promethee" anonymously from London and won the prize offered by the exposition, his productive power as a composer has never slackened. Only a few weeks ago he brought out in London a new sonata for 'cello and piano, which was highly praised for its freshness and originality.

This season, as hitherto, the Symphony Orchestra will give six concerts in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge on the evenings of Thursdays, Oct. 25, Dec. 13, Jan. 24, Feb. 28, April 4 and May 2, beginning at eight o'clock. The assisting artists comprise Miss Ormond and Miss Snelling, the contralto singers; Mme. Szumowska and Miss Radecki, the pianist, and Mr. Hess, the violinist of the orchestra itself. Subscribers to the concerts of last year may obtain the same seats for the new series by application to George H. Kent before next Thursday, Oct. 18. The general sale of seats begins the following Saturday at the University Book Store.

/ / + / /

Monday evening, Oct. 29, in Chickering Hall, first concert for the new season of the Symphony Quartet, with a new quartet for strings by Suk, a trio for strings by Beethoven and César Franck's quintet for piano and strings for the programme. Heinrich Gebhard is the pianist.

ess

Symphony Hall wore a broad smile, they say, at the opening of the musical season in Boston the other day. There was no intention of putting a slight upon Handel, Haydn, Bach or Brahms. It happened this way: Prof. Willy Hess, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in succession to Kneisel and also the leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, has become popular at the Hub, both as a man and as a musician, and at a first concert he has always received "a hand" when he took his place at the head of the first violins. This year there was a delay before the applause began. A dark, slender, strange looking man appeared in Hess's chair. He looked at least ten years younger and at first the audience failed absolutely to recognize him, so changed was his appearance. In the course of the summer he had shaved his beard.

ess

Dr. Karl Muck, who is to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, gave this interesting description of how his first sail into the port of New York impressed him: "I was awed—yes, awed—by the skyline of your city as the steamship slowly moved up the bay," he said. "It is gigantic, overwhelming, bewildering. It completely embodies the mental picture I had formed of it, the reality filling out magnificently the crevices of detail. The colossal structures, studded with innumerable windows, put me in mind of so many human beehives, the workers within bent on great accomplishment. This, then, is the energy that makes your country what it is. The sight is an inspiration—splendid! splendid! This may sound naïve to you. Recollect, though, this is my first visit to your shores. Wait until I come again, then probably I shall assume that fashionable blasé indifference. Now I am interested in everything, everything."—Musical Age.

N. Y. SUN.
ress OCT 24 1906

Dr. Carl Muck, the new conductor, has already given his second pair of concerts. From the Wagner and "Fifth Symphony" of his début, he went back to a search of the antique to make a Boston matinée. Says the Transcript: "Not once did Dr. Muck try to force or to distort this music that it might sound for something different from what it is. He animated it with its spirit and life."

"For the moment the atmosphere of Symphony Hall became, with a little spring and settling of the imagination, like that of the minor court at Cöthen, for which Bach made his suite, or of the Concerts Spirituels in Paris, hearing the symphony commissioned from Haydn, or of the concert room at Prague, where Mozart felt the sunshine of favor. Bach's flute trod its measures through his stately dances, in and out among the curtseying and attendant strings, or tripped through the light steps of his 'Badinage.' We who listened were content to ask no more of music than glorified dance melodies and rhythms, pattering on the ear and the fancy, like the fall of dancing feet.

"Then came the clamorous staccato chords of the beginning of Haydn's symphony. Could eighteenth-century music turn strenuous, after all? But it was only playful thumping. In a moment the music was as free from thunderbolts as lace, and was weaving its delicate patterns through a light allegro.

"Yet Haydn in his symphonies and Bach in this particular suite were writing no more than superficial music. It was Mozart's symphony that searched the heart of his time as well as his own. Here were perfection and even complexity of form, as complexity went in those days. Yet underneath was a shiver and quiver of passion. Here was the beauty of sound for its own long-drawn and curving loveliness, yet underneath was haunting and wistful melancholy—the melancholy of some of Watteau's pictures.

"Here was music that leapt out of the pretty bonds of the minuet into the tumultuous freedom of the finale. The 'Jupiter' symphony is indeed music with a life of its own, independent of all else but Mozart, yet in it also is the mood of its time. Mozart, in spite of his detachment, had begun to feel it and to smart under it."

ss

SAINT-SAENS ILL AT SEA.

French Composer Seriously Stricken on Voyage to America.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 24.—Manager C. A. Elds of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to-day received this wireless message from the surgeon of the French liner La Provence, off Cape Race:

"Dr. Saint-Saens seriously sick. His presence at Boston Symphony concert delayed."

The message refers to Camille Saint-Saens, the French composer, who is on his way to America for a concert tour. He was to have appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Monday night, but in consequence of the message this event has been postponed.

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
SATURDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1906

SAINT-SAENS'S CONCERT NOV. 26

The Date and an Interesting Programme Settled in New York Today

This morning in New York it was definitely arranged that Saint-Saëns, the eminent French composer, conductor, pianist and organist, will give his concert in Boston, as the guest of the Symphony Orchestra, on Monday evening, Nov. 26, in Symphony Hall. The programme will consist entirely of his own music, viz.: The overture to his recent opera, "The Barbarians;" his familiar tone-poem "Omphale's Spinning Wheel;" the equally familiar "Danse Macabre," and his symphony in C-minor, as masterly a piece of instrumentation as ever came from a composer's hand and enlisting a piano and an organ as well as the usual orchestra. Mr. Saint-Saëns will conduct in all four of these compositions which virtually sum and individualize his music as a composer for orchestra. In the course of the concert he will also play three of his organ pieces—a prelude, a "Salutare" and a fantasy, and his note as the organist of Sainte-Méry and of La Madeleine in Paris has matched his celebrity as a pianist. Thus his audience here will have only the fuller and keener pleasure, though it was necessary to defer the concert from the date originally announced. Reservations of seats made for next Tuesday will hold good for Monday evening, Nov. 26.

[42]

NEW YORK CITY
OCT 25

THE SUCCESSFUL DEBUT OF DR. MUCK

DR. Carl Muck of Berlin made his first appearance before an American audience at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, Friday afternoon, 12 October, and won an instantaneous success.

The concert was to begin at 2:30 P. M., and by high noon there was a line of determined looking women (each provided with a bag containing lunch, note book, and scores) that extended from Symphony Hall to the New England Conservatory. For days previous not a seat was to be had for love nor money. Every musician of any consequence in and about Boston, not to mention such famous artists as Gabrilowitch, Samaroff, Yvette Guilbert and Arthur Whiting, was included in the audience.

The programme at both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts was as follows: Beethoven's C minor symphony, and Wagner's Faust Overture, Siegfried Idyl and Meistersinger prelude.

The Boston musical critics, who are not easily pleased, expressed the warmest approval of the new conductor.

Mr. Philip Hale of the Herald said: "It is a pleasure to welcome this sincere and accomplished artist, who now makes Boston his dwelling place. His influence in the making towards musical righteousness will be all the more potent because it is not flamboyant; because his personality is not too personal. The deeply interested audience was quick to appreciate this."

Dr. Muck, who was forty-seven years old 22 October, is tall, dark, and slender, with clean-cut intellectual profile, and the general air of the man of the world, rather than the Bohemian. In conversation he is animated and decided. Unquestionably Dr. Muck is likely to prove a supremely important factor in the history of the coming musical season.

Meanwhile we of New York may look forward to the privilege of hearing him Thursday afternoon, 8 November, at Carnegie Hall.

IMPERIAL GLOBE
OCT 2

CAMILLE SAINT-SAENS, famous French composer, will make his first appearance in New York ... Saturday evening, Nov. 3, and Sunday afternoon, Nov. 4, ... solo pianist. The ... of the occasion is as follows: Geo... overture, "The Springtime of ... Fantasie for piano ... orchestra ... first time in New York); symphonic ... Ronet d'Ombrale," and piano solo, ... Appassionato" and "Wedding Cake" (first time in New York); Beethoven, symphony No. 3, "Eroica."

THE first concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on Friday afternoon, Nov. 9, at 3 o'clock. The assisting pianist will be Heinrich Gebhard of Boston, who, with the quartet, will play César Franck's quintet in F minor.

A Great C...

BOSTON AMERICAN—
OCTOBER 28, 1906.

Mme. Olive Fremstad will be the ... artist at the fourth Symphony programme next Friday and Saturday, the last to be given before the first regular monthly trip of the orchestra. Mme. Fromstad will create the name part in Richard Strauss's "Salome" during the season of grand opera in New York. The general scheme of Dr. Muck's programme is romantic. The orchestral numbers are Schumann's symphony in B major, No. 1, Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and the overture to "Der Freischutz." Mme. Fremstad will sing Agatha's aria from Der Freichutz "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," two songs with piano, Schumann's "Ich grolle nicht" and "Mondnacht" and Schubert's "Der Erlkonig," ... that Liszt's sonata in B ... the "Dante" sonata, so seldom ap... on recital programmes. Admittedly ... of the greatest works in its form, its ... performance is usually left to "Liszt's spe... Mme. Samaroff, at her first re... in Boston, which will be given in ... Hall on Monday afternoon, No... will play this sonata. Another ... programme is a ... Beautiful Blue ... Seats for the ... Symphony Hall.

... of the season's concerts by the ... Symphony Quartet will be given to... evening in Chickering Hall at 8 ... The quartet's season in Boston ... propitiously. The subscription ... larger than ever. The assisting ... concert ...

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, ... TOBER 27, 1906.

STRAUSS AND BRAHMS

INTELLECTUAL MUSIC FOR THE THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT

The "Don Juan" That Strauss Has Built Out of His Own Time for His Own Time and the Potent Appeal of It—A Performance of Brahms's First Symphony That Kept All Its Great Qualities—Concerts of Next Week and Next Month—

We listeners at the Symphony concerts can tune our ears and our fancies to the music of the eighteenth century and find pleasure even in two hours of it. We can honor the great and established classics of the first half of the nineteenth, and when conductor and band recall them to life rejoice in them. Most of us know the voices of Wagner and of Liszt and respond readily and fully to them. Yet near as they are to us in purpose and achievement, their music cannot quite make the appeal to us that does the music of our time, that has been written since Wagner put the last note of the last measure of "Parsifal" on the page—ultra-modern music if one will, as Strauss and Mahler and Reger, D'Indy, Debussy, Loeffler and Elgar have shaped it. Dr. Muck began the third Symphony concert yesterday afternoon with Brahms's first symphony, and ended with the two dances and the Rakoczy March from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." Between the two—it was a short concert—stood Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan," the first music of our own time to have a place on Dr. Muck's programmes. There was no resisting the call of it. The first glowing burst of it with the instruments speaking with the voices and in the fashion that are of our own and no other day, was as exhilarating as glorified champagne to a tongue that has half forgotten its peculiar savor. The swift passage into music that ran high and deep with passion was transporting. The whole tone-poem, because most of us had heard no such music for six months and none while we have been hungering for it since the concerts began, was finely intoxicating. Wander into past centuries and mighty classics as we may, here was music that was bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh, vital with the ideas, the moods and the expression of none but ourselves.

The learned programmist has made a long list of operas from 1713 to 1892 that find their dramatic material and musical inspiration in the trite old legend of Don Juan as the play-makers and the story-tellers began to recount it in the sixteenth century. Possibly since the days when music began to be descriptive there have been composers other than Strauss who tried to relate it with the orchestra alone. Yet what do we of this autumn of 1906 care for such a Don Juan—a mere insatiate and insatiable pursuer of the 103 women, more or less, of Leporello's catalogue, who finally met his just fate at the hands of a stone statue and whom little red imps duly pulled into an underworld of redder fire. For other times, other Don Juans. Ours should be no such banal, fleshly and material figure. Pursuer of women he must be, but let him pursue not one or twenty of them, but rather a feminine ideal that is always elusive and always vanishing. Die he must for his transgressions, but let his real punishment be his disgust, weariness and disillusion of spirit with them. Down to the underworld he must go, but let him be capable of sitting there, even as Mr. Shaw's Don Juan sits in "Man and Superman," in analytical and satirical discourse of himself, mankind and womankind; and if need be, let him adjourn the conversation, as does Shaw, to the side of a motor-car in the moonlit mists of the Spanish mountains. Such a Don Juan is of our time and no other, and it is of him that Strauss has really written his music. "Tone-poem after N. Lenau," says the laconic titlepage, and Nicholas Lenau died mad in 1850 and wrote his poem of "Don Juan" six years before when madness was already stealing upon him. Perhaps it was the madness of a man who was out of joint with his own romantic day and might have lived happier and saner in a later and subtler time.

Listen to Strauss's music to hear the voice of this Don Juan of the beginning of the twentieth century. Watch it with the eye of the imagination to see the composer limn his picture, or rather search his Juan's mind and heart. For only incidentally is Strauss interested in his hero's gallant bearing and all-conquering charm. They merely flash through the music. At best they can be no more than conventional, as the feasts and orgies that Strauss similarly suggests are the conventional background in or out of tones. His music deals with less tangible things. Deep goes the melody of passionate and inappeasable longing from almost the beginning of the tone-poem. High runs the love-song of the oboe when Don Juan seems almost to clasp the woman of his ideal. It is searching music, thrilling, enkindling ear and fancy, but it never quite attains its fullest heights or sounds its deepest depths. It is music, after all, of the ideal that Don Juan has reared in his imagination and that flees him when it seems closest and then turns and pursues him restlessly. Contrast with this melody the theme of disgust and disillusion, of weariness with the quest with himself, almost with the ideal. It is poignant with the psychologic poignancy that is one of Strauss's peculiar powers. It is bitter and acrid music, musk of thought as the other is music of passion. Hear the two in interplay, in contrast and conflict, in recoil upon each other as Strauss develops them from the fiery beginning to the wan close; and out of the tone-poem rises a Don Juan that is of our minds and moods, illusions and disillusions, as they go even in this Boston of October, 1906. It is a truism that the spirit of the passing centuries reshapes and recreates the figures of legend to suit its own imaginings. So Strauss has recreated and in music a Don Juan of the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth for us that live in them.

This recreation owed something yesterday to Dr. Muck and the orchestra. The conductor visibly toiled to gain from his men the lucidity and eloquence, the intensity and incisiveness that he sought. His conducting and their playing was exposition at its vividest and finest. It disclosed the intellectual design of the music in large outlines and in pregnant or in subtle details. It missed none of the contrasts and conflicts of the emotional design. It shaped and colored the figure of Don Juan before the listeners, seemingly as it stood before Strauss's imagination. It searched into Juan's mind and heart. Yet never once was it cool-blooded. From beginning to end the music went at white heat. Dr. Muck touched passionate eloquence whenever the music of the ideal demanded it. The eloquence turned bitter and sardonic when the music of the disillusion required it. Throughout he kept the peculiar restlessness and nervousness of the music. And Strauss was the more vivid and eloquent because the orchestra played his music with entire technical ease and because the conductor in all his zeal for exposition and emotion never slighted a purely musical requirement. Dr. Muck may not admire this ultra-modern music, but by every sign he cannot withstand the appeal of it. He plays it too well not to play more. The intellectual qualities in his temperament, if nothing else, bind him to Strauss.

The ideal, and the impossible, conductor is he that could approach any sort of music with full and sympathetic understanding of its contents and the transmitting power to bring all that is characteristic in it to as full and fitting expression. There is no such conductor, and there never will be, but within the range of his programme yesterday Dr. Muck came surprisingly close to such qualities. In his playing of "Don Juan" he brought the characteristic attributes of the music and of Strauss to vivid expression. His Berlioz was the thing of sound, fury and rhythmical delirium that the Rakoczy March is, and the thing of imaginatively calculated effects, harmonic, rhythmical, instrumental, that the two dances are. At moments he kept them tiny fragments of palpitating tone and once he and the band attained a pianissimo that the listener felt rather than heard. At others he laid on Berlioz's contrasts. His Brahms, in turn, summoned exceptionally the great and individual qualities of the music that too close a devotion to its letter often chokes and too little insight into its spirit often hides. Throughout, the music moved with a singularly deep and rich tonal splendor. Its stride was noble and its mood lofty. It kept its austerity and its reticence, and the austerity never became hardness and the reticence was of ordered and mastered power. Reflective and profound as the symphony is, Dr. Muck saved it from crabbedness or obscurity. He caught its calm, clear, cool beauty that is as intense as the light of an autumn day. Once and again he made some phrase or passage flash into the darker colorings and the sterner stress of the music like the glint of the same autumn sunshine. He kept what really is its tonal beauty. Rarely has the first movement sounded so large with austere passion and so deep with mystery; or the second seemed such serene and uplifted meditation, keeping the voice of song; or the last marched with more triumphant solemnity. There was the exaltation in the playing of the symphony that is in the music itself—the gravity of its beauty, the power of its calm, the depth of its ideas, the fulness of their expression. Brahms was a Viennese who lived a homely life there when he was writing his first symphony; but the voice that speaks in it is as ... as Sophocles. When it is played as it ... yesterday there is no more doubting it ... there is doubting the "Antigone."

T. P.

Concerts Next Week

Dr. Muck is apparently trying to give coherence of substance, mood and style to each of his programmes. Last week he chose only music of the eighteenth century, with a concerto of the first quarter of the nineteenth that was closely akin to it. Tonight his programme comprises music that makes its first appeal to the intellect, and in saying this we are not forgetting Berlioz's thoughtful and calculated dances. For the fourth pair of concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, romantic music makes the programme—Schumann's first symphony, the symphony of the spring that Mr. Gericke and Weingartner each played for us last winter; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and Weber's overture to his opera, "Der Freischütz." Mme. Fremstad of the Metropolitan Opera House will be the singer, and since she now believes that she has lifted her contralto voice into a high soprano, she will sing Agatha's familiar scena from Weber's opera. Her other numbers are Schubert's song, "The Erl-King," with orchestra, and Schumann's songs, "Ich Grolle Nicht" and "Mondnacht" with piano. Evidently Dr. Muck believes that a solo singer's music should be an integral part of the programme ...

The Symphony Quartet—Mr. Hess, Mr. Roth, Mr. Férir and Mr. Warnke of the string choir of the Symphony Orchestra—gives the first chamber concert of its new series on Monday evening at eight in Chickering Hall with the assistance of Heinrich Gebhard, the pianist. The programme consists of a new quartet in B-flat major by the young Bohemian composer, Josef Suk, who is the heir to Dvorak in sharp rhythms and bright instrumental color; Schubert's posthumous quartet piece in C-minor, and César Franck's quintet for piano and strings, best recalled by its brilliant finale, in the whole of which Mr. Gebhard's peculiar feeling for the newer French music should tell. Mr. Hess and his companions have been at work on their repertory for two months, and they are now playing together for a second year, so that they should be in better form than they were last season.

OCTOBER 27, 1906.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The first of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given Monday evening, Oct. 29, in Chickering Hall at 8 o'clock. The season in Boston of the quartet will open most propitiously. The subscription sale is larger than ever and greater interest in the work of the quartet is manifest on all sides. As for the quartet itself, its work ought to be better than ever. Messrs. Hess, Roth, Ferir and Warnke have been together since the first of September, having spent the whole of that month working on their season's repertoire. In the first week of October five concerts were given most successfully in the middle West. In every respect the quartet is better prepared for the opening of the season than it ever ... Heinrich Gebhard. The program will be as follows: Quartet for strings ... flat major, op. 11 (first ...) Josef Suk; quartet in C minor, op. Posth, Schubert; quintet for piano and strings in F minor, Cesar Franck.

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY.

Mme. Olive Fremstad will be the solo artist at the fourth Symphony program, the last to be given before the first regular monthly trip of the orchestra. Mme. Fremstad comes to this country primarily to "create" the name-part in Richard Strauss' 'Salome" during the season of grand opera in New York. The general scheme of Dr. Muck's program is romantic. The orchestral numbers are Schumann's symphony in B major, No. 1, Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and the overture to "Der Freischutz." Mme. Fremstad will sing Agatha's aria from "Der Freischutz," "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," two songs with piano, Schumann's "Ich grolle nicht" and "Mondnacht" and Schubert's "Der Erlkonig," with orchestral accompaniment.

Sunday Herald,
October 28—06

The first concert of the Boston Symphony quarter (Messrs. Hess, Roth, Ferir, Warnke) will be given in Chickering Hall on Monday at 8 P. M. The programme will include Josef Suk's quartet in B-flat major op. 11, which was first played in Boston by the Adamowski quartet, Dec. 22, 1903; Schubert's quartet movement in C minor (op. posth), and Cesar Franck's piano quintet, Mr. Heinrich Gebhard will be the pianist. The members of the quartet have been together in practice since the first of September. In the first week of October they gave five concerts in the middle West. The subscription sale for the series in Boston ... larger than ...

The Boston Post
The Representative Democratic Paper of New England
Issued Sunday by Post Publishing Co.
OCTOBER 28, 1906. NO. 4; VOL. 42

The first of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given tomorrow evening, Oct. 29, in Chickering Hall at 8 o'clock. The season in Boston of the quartet will open most propitiously. The subscription sale is larger than ever and greater interest in the work of the quartet is manifest on all sides.

As for the quartet itself, its work ought to be better than ever. Messrs. Hess, Roth, Ferir and Warnke have been together since the 1st of September, having spent the whole of that month working on their season's repertoire. The assisting artist at the first concert will be Mr. Heinrich Gebhard.

The first of the three concerts which the Longy Club will give in Potter Hall this season will take place on Wednesday evening, Nov. 14. A feature of the programme will be a concerto for horn ... R. Strauss, which has never ... here.

Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, saw M. Camille Saint-Saens in New York yesterday morning and made arrangements by which the concert which was to have been given in Symphony Hall on next Tuesday evening, Oct. 30, will take place on Monday evening, Nov. 26. M. Saint-Saens is recovering from a severe attack of tonsilitis and his appearance in Boston on Tuesday was quite out of the question.

TELEGRAP... ess PHILADELPHIA, I...
OCT 2...

SAINT-SAENS ... AT SE...

French Composer Seriously Stricken on Voyage to America.

Boston, Mass., Oct. 25.—Manager C. A. Ellis, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday received this wireless message from the surgeon of the French liner La Provence, off Cape Race:—

"Dr. Saint-Saens seriously sick. His presence at Boston Symphony concert delayed."

The message refers to Camille Saint-Saens, the French composer, who is on his way to America for a concert tour. He was to have appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Monday night, but in consequence of the message the event has been postponed.

[43]

1906

s NEW YORK CITY

THE SUCCESSFUL DEBUT OF DR. MUCK

DR. Carl Muck of Berlin made his first appearance before an American audience at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, Friday afternoon, 12 October, and won an instantaneous success.

The concert was to begin at 2:30 P. M., and by high noon there was a line of determined looking women (each provided with a bag containing lunch, note book, and scores) that extended from Symphony Hall to the New England Conservatory. For days previous not a seat was to be had for love nor money. Every musician of any consequence in and about Boston, not to mention such famous artists as Gabrilowitch, Samaroff, Yvette Guilbert and Arthur Whiting, was included in the audience.

The programme at both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts was as follows: Beethoven's C minor symphony, and Wagner's Faust Overture, Siegfried Idyl and Meistersinger prelude.

The Boston musical critics, who are not easily pleased, expressed the warmest approval of the new conductor.

Mr. Philip Hale of the Herald said: "It is a pleasure to welcome this sincere and accomplished artist, who now makes Boston his dwelling place. His influence in the making towards musical righteousness will be all the more potent because it is not flamboyant; because his personality is not too personal. The deeply interested audience was quick to appreciate this."

Dr. Muck, who was forty-seven years old 22 October, is tall, dark, and slender, with clean-cut intellectual profile, and the general air of the man of the world, rather than the Bohemian. In conversation he is animated and decided. Unquestionably Dr. Muck is likely to prove a supremely important factor in the history of the coming musical season.

Meanwhile we of New York may look forward to the privilege of hearing him Thursday afternoon, 8 November, at Carnegie Hall.

s

CAMILE SAINT-SAENS, famous French composer, [illegible] make his first appearance in New [illegible] ing pe[illegible] Symphony [illegible] Saturday evening, Nov. 3, and Sun[illegible] afternoon, Nov. 4, [illegible] be the solo pianist. The comp[illegible]e of the occasion is as follows: Geo[illegible] overture, "The Springtime of [illegible]" fantasie for piano [illegible] orches[illegible] first time in N[illegible] York); symphonic [illegible] Ronet d'Ophale," and piano solos, "Allegro Appassionato" and "Wedding Cake" (first time in New York); Beethoven, symphony No. 3, "Eroica."

THE first concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given in Mendelssohn Hall on Friday afternoon, Nov. 9, at 3 o'clock. The assisting pianist will be Heinrich Gebhard of Boston, who, with the quartet, will play César Franck's quintet in F minor.

A Great C[illegible]

BOSTON AMERICAN—
OCTOBER 28, 1906.

Mme. Olive Fremstad will be the solo artist at the fourth Symphony programme next Friday and Saturday, the last to be given before the first regular monthly trip of the orchestra. Mme. Fromstad will create the name part in Richard Strauss's "Salome" during the season of grand opera in New York. The general scheme of Dr. Muck's programme is romantic. The orchestral numbers are Schumann's symphony in B major, No. 1, Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and the overture to "Der Freischutz." Mme. Fremstad will sing Agatha's aria from Der Freichutz "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," two songs with piano, Schumann's "Ich grolle nicht" and "Mondnacht" and Schubert's "Der Erlkonig" with orchestral accompaniment.

[illegible]ods that Liszt's sonata in B minor, the "Dante" sonata, so seldom appears on recital programmes. Admittedly one of the greatest works in its form, its performance is usually left to "Liszt's specialists." Mme. Samaroff, at her first recital in Boston, which will be given in Chickering Hall on Monday afternoon, November 5, will play this sonata. Another interesting [illegible] programme is a concert[illegible] the beautiful Blue Danube waltz. Seats for the [illegible] are selling at Symphony Hall.

The first of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given tomorrow evening in Chickering Hall at 8 o'clock. The quartet's season in Boston opens most propitiously. The subscription sale is larger than ever. The assisting [illegible] at the first concert [illegible]

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, OCTOBER 27, 1906

STRAUSS AND BRAHMS

INTELLECTUAL MUSIC FOR THE THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT

The "Don Juan" That Strauss Has Built Out of His Own Time for His Own Time and the Potent Appeal of It—A Performance of Brahms's First Symphony That Kept All Its Great Qualities—Concerts of Next Week and Next Month—

We listeners at the Symphony concerts can tune our ears and our fancies to the music of the eighteenth century and find pleasure even in two hours of it. We can honor the great and established classics of the first half of the nineteenth, and when conductor and band recall them to life rejoice in them. Most of us know the voices of Wagner and of Liszt and respond readily and fully to them. Yet near as they are to us in purpose and achievement, their music cannot quite make the appeal to us that does the music of our time, that has been written since Wagner put the last note of the last measure of "Parsifal" on the page—ultra-modern music if one will, as Strauss and Mahler and Reger, D'Indy, Debussy, Loeffler and Elgar have shaped it. Dr. Muck began the third Symphony concert yesterday afternoon with Brahms's first symphony; and ended with the two dances and the Rakoczy March from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." Between the two—it was a short concert—stood Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan," the first music of our own time to have a place on Dr. Muck's programmes. There was no resisting the call of it. The first glowing burst of it with the instruments speaking with the voices and in the fashion that are of our own and no other day, was as exhilarating as glorified champagne to a tongue that has half forgotten its peculiar savor. The swift passage into music that ran high and deep with passion was transporting. The whole tone-poem, because most of us had heard no such music for six months and none while we have been hungering for it since the concerts began, was finely intoxicating. Wander into past centuries and mighty classics as we may, here was music that was bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh, vital with the ideas, the moods and the expression of none but ourselves.

The learned programmist has made a long list of operas from 1713 to 1892 that find their dramatic material and musical inspiration in the trite old legend of Don Juan as the play-makers and the story-tellers began to recount it in the sixteenth century. Possibly since the days when music began to be descriptive there have been composers other than Strauss who tried to relate it with the orchestra alone. Yet what do we of this autumn of 1906 care for such a Don Juan—a mere insatiate and insatiable pursuer of the 103 women, more or less, of Leporello's catalogue, who finally met his just fate at the hands of a stone statue and whom little red imps duly pulled into an underworld of redder fire. For other times, other Don Juans. Ours should be no such banal, fleshly and material figure. Pursuer of women he must be, but let him pursue not one or twenty of them, but rather a feminine ideal that is always elusive and always vanishing. Die he must for his transgressions, but let his real punishment be his disgust, weariness and disillusion of spirit with them. Down to the underworld he must go, but let him be capable of sitting there, even as Mr. Shaw's Don Juan sits in "Man and Superman," in analytical and satirical discourse of himself, mankind and womankind; and if need be, let him adjourn the conversation, as does Shaw, to the side of a motor-car in the moonlit mists of the Spanish mountains. Such a Don Juan is of our time and no other, and it is of him that Strauss has really written his music. "Tone-poem after N. Lenau," says the laconic titlepage, and Nicholas Lenau died mad in 1850 and wrote his poem of "Don Juan" six years before, when madness was already stealing upon him. Perhaps it was the madness of a man who was out of joint with his own romantic day and might have lived happier and saner in a later and subtler time.

Listen to Strauss's music to hear the voice of this Don Juan of the beginning of the twentieth century. Watch it with the eye of the imagination to see the composer limn his picture, or rather search his Juan's mind and heart. For only incidentally is Strauss interested in his hero's gallant bearing and all-conquering charm. They merely flash through the music. At best they can be no more than conventional, as the feasts and orgies that Strauss similarly suggests are the conventional background in or out of tones. His music deals with less tangible things. Deep goes the melody of passionate and inappeasable longing from almost the beginning of the tone poem. High runs the love-song of the oboe when Don Juan seems almost to clasp the woman of his ideal. It is searching music, thrilling, enkindling ear and fancy, but it never quite attains its fullest heights or sounds its deepest depths. It is music, after all, of the ideal that Don Juan has reared in his imagination and that flees him when it seems closest and then turns and pursues him restlessly. Contrast with this melody the theme of disgust and disillusion, of weariness with the quest with himself, almost with the ideal. It is poignant with the psychologic poignancy that is one of Strauss's peculiar powers. It is bitter and acrid music, must of thought as the other is music of passion. Hear the two in interplay, in contrast and conflict, in recoil upon each other as Strauss develops them from the fiery beginning to the wan close; and out of the tone-poem rises a Don Juan that is of our minds and moods, illusions and disillusions, as they go even in this Boston of October, 1906. It is a truism that the spirit of the passing centuries reshapes and recreates the figures of legend to suit its own imaginings. So Strauss has recreated and in music a Don Juan of the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth for us that live in them.

This recreation owed something yesterday to Dr. Muck and the orchestra. The conductor visibly toiled to gain from his men the lucidity and eloquence, the intensity and incisiveness that he sought. His conducting and their playing was exposition at its vividest and finest. It disclosed the intellectual design of the music in large outlines and in pregnant or in subtle details. It missed none of the contrasts and conflicts of the emotional design. It shaped and colored the figure of Don Juan before the listeners, seemingly as it stood before Strauss's imagination. It searched into Juan's mind and heart. Yet never once was it cool-blooded. From beginning to end the music went at white heat. Dr. Muck touched passionate eloquence whenever the music of the ideal demanded it. The eloquence turned bitter and sardonic when the music of the disillusion required it. Throughout he kept the peculiar restlessness and nervousness of the music. And Strauss was the more vivid and eloquent because the orchestra played his music with entire technical ease and because the conductor in all his zeal for exposition and emotion never slighted a purely musical requirement. Dr. Muck may not admire this ultra-modern music, but by every sign he cannot withstand the appeal of it. He plays it too well not to play more. The intellectual qualities in his temperament, if nothing else, bind him to Strauss.

The ideal, and the impossible, conductor is he that could approach any sort of music with full and sympathetic understanding of its contents and the transmitting power to bring all that is characteristic in it to as full and fitting expression. There is no such conductor, and there never will be, but within the range of his programme yesterday Dr. Muck came surprisingly close to such qualities. In his playing of "Don Juan" he brought the characteristic attributes of the music and of Strauss to vivid expression. His Berlioz was the thing of sound, fury and rhythmical delirium that the Rakoczy March is, and the thing of imaginatively calculated effects, harmonic, rhythmical, instrumental, that the two dances are. At moments he kept them tiny fragments of palpitating tone and once he and the band attained a pianissimo that the listener felt rather than heard. At others he laid on Berlioz's contrasts. His Brahms, in turn, summoned exceptionally the great and individual qualities of the music that too close a devotion to its letter often chokes and too little insight into its spirit often hides. Throughout, the music moved with a singularly deep and rich tonal splendor. Its stride was noble and its mood lofty. It kept its austerity and its reticence, and the austerity never became hardness and the reticence was of ordered and mastered power. Reflective and profound as the symphony is, Dr. Muck saved it from crabbedness or obscurity. He caught its calm, clear, cool beauty that is as intense as the light of an autumn day. Once and again he made some phrase or passage flash into the darker colorings and the sterner stress of the music like the glint of the same autumn sunshine. He kept what really is its tonal beauty. Rarely has the first movement sounded so large with austere passion and so deep with mystery; or the second seemed such serene and uplifted meditation, keeping the voice of song; or the last marched with more triumphant solemnity. There was the exaltation in the playing of the symphony that is in the music itself—the gravity of its beauty, the power of its calm, the depth of its ideas, the fulness of their expression. Brahms was a Viennese who lived a homely life there when he was writing his first symphony; but the voice that speaks in it is as old as Sophocles. When it is played as it was yesterday there is no more doubting it than there is doubting the "Antigone."

T. P.

Concerts Next Week

Dr. Muck is apparently trying to give coherence of substance, mood and style to each of his programmes. Last week he chose only music of the eighteenth century, with a concerto of the first quarter of the nineteenth that was closely akin to it. Tonight his programme comprises music that makes its first appeal to the intellect, and in saying this we are not forgetting Berlioz's thoughtful and calculated dances. For the fourth pair of concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, romantic music makes the programme—Schumann's first symphony, the symphony of the spring that Mr. Gericke and Weingartner each played for us last winter; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and Weber's overture to his opera, "Der Freischütz." Mme. Fremstad of the Metropolitan Opera House will be the singer, and since she now believes that she has lifted her contralto voice into a high soprano, she will sing Agatha's familiar scena from Weber's opera. Her other numbers are Schubert's song, "The Erl-King," with orchestra, and Schumann's songs, "Ich Grolle Nicht" and "Mondnacht" with piano. Evidently Dr. Muck believes that a solo singer's music should be an integral part of the programme of th[illegible]

The Symphony Quartet—Mr. Hess, Mr. Roth, Mr. Férir and Mr. Warnke of the string choir of the Symphony Orchestra—gives the first chamber concert of its new series on Monday evening at eight in Chickering Hall with the assistance of Heinrich Gebhard, the pianist. The programme consists of a new quartet in B-flat major by the young Bohemian composer, Josef Suk, who is the heir to Dvorak in sharp rhythms and bright instrumental color; Schubert's posthumous quartet piece in C-minor, and César Franck's quintet for piano and strings, best recalled by its brilliant finale, in the whole of which Mr. Gebhard's peculiar feeling for the newer French music should tell. Mr. Hess and his companions have been at work on their repertory for two months, and they are now playing together for a second year, so that they should be in better form than they were last season.

[43]

BOSTON JOURNAL, OCTOBER 27, 1906.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The first of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given Monday evening, Oct. 29, in Chickering Hall at 8 o'clock. The season in Boston of the quartet will open most propitiously. The subscription sale is larger than ever and greater interest in the work of the quartet is manifest on all sides. As for the quartet itself, its work ought to be better than ever. Messrs. Hess, Roth, Ferir and Warnke have been together since the first of September, having spent the whole of that month working on their season's repertoire. In the first week of October five concerts were given most successfully in the middle West. In every respect the quartet is better prepared for the opening of the season than it ever [illegible] will be assisting artist [illegible] Heinrich Gebhard. The program will be as follows: Quartet for strings in B flat major, op. 11 (first time), Josef Suk; quartet in C minor, op. Posth, Schubert; quintet for piano and strings in F minor, Cesar Franck.

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY.

Mme. Olive Fremstad will be the solo artist at the fourth Symphony program, the last to be given before the first regular monthly trip of the orchestra. Mme. Fremstad comes to this country primarily to "create" the name-part in Richard Strauss' 'Salome" during the season of grand opera in New York. The general scheme of Dr. Muck's program is romantic. The orchestral numbers are Schumann's symphony in B major, No. 1, Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and the overture to "Der Freischutz." Mme. Fremstad will sing Agatha's aria from "Der Freischutz," "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," two songs with piano, Schumann's "Ich grolle nicht" and "Mondnacht" and Schubert's "Der Erlkonig," with orchestral accompaniment.

Sunday Herald,

October 28–06

The first concert of the Boston Symphony quarter (Messrs. Hess, Roth, Ferir, Warnke) will be given in Chickering Hall on Monday at 8 P. M. The programme will include Josef Suk's quartet in B-flat major op. 11, which was first played in Boston by the Adamowski quartet, Dec. 22, 1903; Schubert's quartet movement in C minor (op. posth), and Cesar Franck's piano quintet. Mr. Heinrich Gebhard will be the pianist. The members of the quartet have been together in practice since the first of September. In the first week of October they gave five concerts in the middle West. The subscription sale for the series in Boston [illegible]en larger than before.

The Boston Post

The Representative Democratic Paper of New England

Issued Sunday by Post Publishing Co.
OCTOBER 28, 1906. NO. 4; VOL. 42

The first of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Quartet will be given tomorrow evening, Oct. 29, in Chickering Hall at 8 o'clock. The season in Boston of the quartet will open most propitiously. The subscription sale is larger than ever and greater interest in the work of the quartet is manifest on all sides.

As for the quartet itself, its work ought to be better than ever. Messrs. Hess, Roth, Ferir and Warnke have been together since the 1st of September, having spent the whole of that month working on their season's repertoire. The assisting artist at the first concert will be Mr. Heinrich Gebhard.

The first of the three concerts which the Longy Club will give in Potter Hall this season will take place on Wednesday evening, Nov. 14. A feature of the programme will be a concerto for horn [illegible] R. Strauss, which has never [illegible] here.

* * * *

Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, saw M. Camille Saint-Saens in New York yesterday morning and made arrangements by which the concert which was to have been given in Symphony Hall on next Tuesday evening, Oct. 30, will take place on Monday evening, Nov. 26. M. Saint-Saens is recovering from a severe attack of tonsilitis and his appearance in Boston on Tuesday was quite out of the question.

[illegible]

ess [illegible]

SAINT-SAENS ILL AT SEA

French Composer Seriously Stricken on Voyage to America.

Boston, Mass., Oct. 25.—Manager C. A. Elds, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday received this wireless message from the surgeon of the French liner La Provence, off Cape Race:—

"Dr. Saint-Saens seriously sick. His presence at Boston Symphony concert delayed."

The message refers to Camille Saint-Saens, the French composer, who is on his way to America for a concert tour. He was to have appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Monday night, but in consequence of the message this event has been postponed.

...ton Transcript, October 27, 1906.

CAMILLE SAINT-SAENS

COMPOSER, PIANIST, MAN OF LETTERS AND OF SOCIETY

The Visit to America That He Begins Today—A Brilliant and Many-Sided Personality—The Alertness and Pliancy of His Mind and Temperament—His Early Feats as a Musical Prodigy—His Place in the World of Paris and His Noted "Mondays"—Some Anecdotes of His Later Years and of His Traits in Work and Play—A Similar Visit to London

No bald repetition of the facts of Saint-Saëns's life, out of a musical or a biographical dictionary; and no general survey of his music, such as the Transcript printed a few weeks ago, does full justice to the composer, conductor, pianist and organist, who, as soon as his health permits, is to be the guest of our Symphony Orchestra. He is equally interesting as a many-sided, contradictory and brilliant man, a genuine celebrity that Paris has possessed and acknowledged for forty years. The wonder is that he has never visited the United States before. He was seventy-one a fortnight ago, and he has been travelling about Europe, Asia and Africa as an eminent pianist and composer since he was in his twenties. He has journeyed from the Canaries on the West to Cochin-China in the East. He has played the piano or conducted his own orchestral compositions in every capital of Europe and on all sorts of occasions. Last summer he was playing a concerto by Mozart, whose music he has always cherished, at the anniversary festival in that composer's honor at his native Salzburg. Three weeks ago he was overlooking in Paris the rehearsals of one of his early operas, "The Yellow Princess," that the Opéra Comique is soon to revive. A fortnight ago he was playing one of his own piano concertos at an orchestral concert in the Berlin that twenty years before had hisses and catcalls for him because he was one of the Frenchmen who could not forget the Franco-Prussian War and made no secret of his long memory. (As soon as Paris was in danger in 1870 Saint-Saëns joined the army, fought through the siege, and in the intervals of active service amused and heartened his comrades by giving concerts with the regimental band.) Last Saturday he left Havre for New York; and today he will be in America for the beginning of a long tour in which he will play and conduct with our chief orchestras and a few choral societies. Yet physcially Saint-Saëns is not a strong man. To see he even suggests one that has had the gout in his time and expects to have it again. But from the days when he was a prodigy of eleven playing the piano in concerts in Paris, he has been tense with nervous energy. From early manhood his love of travel, his curiosity over new lands, new men and new manners have been insatiable.

Moreover, wherever Saint-Saëns has gone, almost from the beginning, the note of his music, his traits and his attainments has preceded him. Not for nothing does one write a symphony at eighteen, submit it anonymously to a conductor and have it accepted, played, and well-received—better, indeed, than many of the compositions with which he quickly followed it under his own name. Stamaty, the pianist, and Malinden, the professor of the theory of music, who were his first teachers, marvelled at his assimilative powers, though he was the merest lad. Prodigy of the piano that they made him, he was one of the rare prodigies that did not put off his talents with his curls and his velvet knickerbockers. A few years later at the Conservatory, Halévy and his other teachers wondered equally at his ease in composition, his adaptability and his retentive memory. Von Bülow knew him first in 1859, when he was twenty-four years old and was making a tour of Germany as a virtuoso. "I was astonished," Bülow wrote in his notebook, "to hear him reproduce Schumann's symphonies on the piano with an ease and exactitude that dumfounded me when I compared his prodigious memory with my own. . . . In talking with him I saw that nothing was unknown to him, and what made him appear still greater in my eyes was the sincerity of his enthusiasm and his great modesty." Some years later Berlioz who was sitting on a jury to judge cantatas for the Paris exhibition of 1867 was equally impressed: "I have had the pleasure," he scribbled in a letter, "of seeing the award go unanimously to my young friend—Camille Saint-Saëns, one of the greatest musicians of our time. The whole incident stirred me. I knew how it would please Saint-Saëns and I rushed off to his house to tell him; but he had gone out with his mother. He is a stunning pianist, and here at last is something sensible accomplished in the musical world."

By this time Saint-Saëns had composed much in many forms, and for thirty years he was to continue at work with tireless energy and unfailing zest for almost every sort of music. Operas, better known in France than elsewhere; oratorios that have gone the world over; ballets and theatre music; symphonies, tone-poems, concertos, chamber-music in much variety, choral music of the church, piano pieces, organ pieces, violin pieces, 'cello pieces, occasional music for exhibitions and fetes—all stand in the long list of his compositions. Wherever there are concerts, there is the music of Saint-Saëns known. To his very latest piece, finished last summer for the 'cellist Hollmann, he has composed with the ease and certainty that impressed his teachers in the fifties at the Conservatory. His acquaintances in Paris are full of tales of his facility. There is scarcely an erasure, they say, in his manuscripts. His musical ideas come quickly and precisely. He puts them as rapidly to paper, developing and modulating them, making them fertile with subsidiary suggestions, without seeming thought or effort. He will chat while he is scoring, and yet in that instrumentation there are sure to be felicitious "finds." He needs no piano, as so many composers do, to assist him as he works. He wrote his opera of "Proserpine" without an instrument in reach, with the mere music paper before him as one might write a letter, or, as his harsher critics might say, solve a mathematical or mechanical problem. A few years ago he had promised to write a little scene of operetta for an entertainment at his club in Paris, and then quite forgotten his pledge. Four days before the evening of the fete, the anxious committee sent for the score. "I quite forgot it," Saint-Saëns answered gayly, "but it 's not too late now," and in two hours he had filled twenty long pages of music paper. He can write in the fashion of Bach, Mozart, Rossini, Verdi, Schumann, Wagner, whom you will. But, say his detractors, there is no Saint-Saëns himself, with an individuality of his own. "As you like," retorts the composer, who loves controversy for its own sake. "I have studied the music of all these men, but I am not the prophet of any one of them. I can see the good and the bad, the strong and the weak in them all." In fact Saint-Saëns has steadily been a man of irritable enthusiasms that gradually turn into irritable dislikes. He is fond of making musical discoveries, and then, when the rest of the world has also opened its eyes, heartily renouncing them. For years, for example, he could not praise Schumann's quintet for piano and strings often or loudly enough. Then he could not endure the hearing of it. He was the apostle of Wagner when Wagner had still to conquer France. He deplored his influence when that conquest was well under way.

Perhaps there are some mischief, caprice and love of disputation for its own sake in such changing views, and Saint-Saëns comes honestly by these qualities out of his Norman descent and his early life in the Latin Quarter of Paris. His family were Normans from Dieppe, and he spent his youth in the Latin Quarter. As a boy he was a gamin, who loved to bear his part in every mischief that happened to be going, and he can be gamin still in the cast of his mind and speech. His mother and his great-aunt, who had a discriminating taste and a deep knowledge of music, first trained him, and when he was still a child he showed the nicety of his ear and his general musical aptitude. One afternoon, as Mme. Saint-Saëns used to tell the story, she had a caller who limped. Camille was listening attentively in the next room. "Ah!" he commented after the guest had departed, "that gentleman walks in crotchets and quavers." Another story of her son's childhood that Mme. Saint-Saëns liked to tell when she was the mistress of his household first in the Faubourg St. Honoré and then in the Rue Monsieur-le-Prince, recalled his early aptness to distinguish and imitate tonalities. One day she so set all the clocks within his hearing that they would strike twelve in succession and without interruption. Camille listened eagerly, and then promptly reproduced the different sounds with his voice in the nicest gradations and distinctions of tone. From the beginning there was no question of his musical career.

Mme. Saint-Saëns, a very simple and dignified figure with courtly manners and a fondness for old fashions in dress, was long the hostess at her son's "Mondays" He liked society, and as soon as he had gained his place in the world of Paris an interesting, alert and cultivated company came every week to his salon—not only musicians and amateurs of music, but men and women of distinction in the other arts and in the finer life of Paris generally. By nine the rooms were pleasantly full and the guests usually lingered past midnight. There was much good and sprightly talk about music and many other things. Saint-Saëns himself had a hundred interests; everything with intelligence in it or behind it appealed to him. He loved the other arts as well as music, and he was familiar with them. He wrote as well as he talked, and talked as well as he composed. He had written much musical criticism and plied his pen often in musical controversy. He had a taste for science from boyhood, and he mastered the formal part of music with surprising speed and exactitude. He had dabbled in mathematics and played with astronomy. He had written an archæological treatise on the Greek theatre and contributed to scientific magazines. All this many-sidedness animated and broadened the talk at these "Mondays." The host's memory was long and took fire at a spark, so that he was fertile in anecdotes—mischievous and little sarcastic tales that he pointed with a half smile of malice and a queer, quick settling of his glasses on his nose. Sooner or later the conversation drifted to music, and there was talk of composers, new and old, and of their work. Saint-Saëns was always buying or receiving new music from Germany, from Russia, from anywhere. Soon he went to the piano and began to play it, however intricate or unfamiliar, with the clearness, precision, purity of tone and plasticity of ornament that are the best traits in his playing and that offset a measure of dryness and a lack of largeness and of warm emotion. He wrote verses, too, occasional sonnets and what the anthologies call poems of travel, and now and then he would repeat them. Sometimes these evenings passed in gay nonsense. One Monday long ago, there was a fantastic performance of Offenbach's Homeric travesty of "La Belle Hélène" with Bizet, the composer of "Carmen," to sing and act that coquettish heroine, while Saint-Saëns himself took the part of the sour and grumbling Calchas. For another Monday he wrote his parody of a certain sort of grewsome Italian opera that pushed the text to fantastic extremes of melodrama, while the music capered through sugary or inflated melody. "Gabriella di Vergy" was the title of the burlesque, and it was a "lyric tragedy" of the faithless wife of a crusader, who took a lover while her husband was in Palestine, and was duly compelled to devour his heart when her angry liege lord returned and slew him—all appropriately scored for piano and harp only.

Two years ago last summer Saint-Saëns went to London on a somewhat similar errand to that which now brings him to America. Covent Garden was about to mount his pseudo-classic opera, "Paris and Helen," that he had written for Mme. Melba and he was supervising the rehearsals. There were two or three concerts of his chamber music as well and he took the piano or the organ and sometimes both at each. It was the height of the season and Saint-Saëns went from dinner to the opera and from the opera to some evening party with a vitality and an evident eagerness and pleasure unusual in a man of his years. Everywhere he was the man of the world who loved the world and knew its ways—the world of cultivated people. There was not a trace in him of the affectations, the eccentricities or the natural under-breeding of many a musician. There was not a mark in his appearance of his profession. He might have been a banker, a lawyer, a man of letters—of any calling so long as he was man of the world. His bright eyes sparkled mischievously through his glasses. There was a touch of mockery in the curve of his mouth and the lines about it. He liked to caress his square silky beard and his soft moustache, white in comparison with the circle of gray hair about his head. His forehead was broad and high and his nose sharp, prominent and aquiline. He was pale of face, and his movements hinted at his years, but his figure was still trim and straight and his shoulders firm and square. Whether he talked or whether he listened, he was alert with nervous energy and quick sensitiveness to each new impression and newcomer. A certain dryness of speech and of manner suited the lurking innuendo and the touch of cynical observation and reflection in his talk. It ranged far and wide. It touched many things and many men lightly and adroitly. It flickered with spontaneous and amusing paradox. And it was never "musical shop."

H. T. P.

October 28-06.

GIVE NOBLE READING OF BRAHMS' WORK

Orchestra's Performance of Great Symphony Never Surpassed Here.

DR. MUCK'S ANALYSIS FULL OF LIFE AND FIRE

Heroic Conception of the Grand Finale—Strauss, Berlioz Played.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The programme of the third Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck conductor, was as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 1.....Brahms
Tone poem, "Don Juan".....Strauss
Three excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust".....Berlioz

Mr. Arthur Whiting, in the course of his remarks last week on the employment of the damper pedal of the piano to gain color effects, took occasion to say that Brahms was at times sensuous in his music, although he has been called austere and dry. Mr. Whiting believes that the reproach of dryness is due usually to the performance of Brahms' music rather than to the music itself. It is true that when Mr. Whiting played piano pieces of Brahms in illustration of his theories concerning the damper pedal the music was anything but sensuous.

There are various kinds of sensuousness in music as in human life. Some years ago Josephin Peladan, the fantastical Sar of dark corners, likened the music of Brahms to a gypsy woman dancing in tight-fitting corsets. He detected latent heat beneath the formal exterior.

The sensuousness of Brahms is cerebral. It might be called Platonic. However, he regulated the conduct of his private life; no woman disturbed his musical landscape. Even in songs with words of an amatory nature, his music is contemplative rather than emotional. There is no frank outburst of passionate longing or sensuous regret.

Now sensuousness alone does not make a composer great. Some of the most distinguished have not been sensuous in the meaning of the word as understood by such widely different men as Wagner and Massenet. There is a noble sensuousness in which spirit and not matter alone enters. Such sensuousness vitalizes pages of Beethoven and Cesar Franck. This quality is of close kin to mysticism. The lives of certain saints reveal this. This species of sensuousness is not dependent on color effects. It may be observed in the line of musical thought without consideration of the harmonic or the orchestral dress.

Neither the earthly nor the spiritual kind is to be observed in the music of Johannes Brahms. Like the master in the parable, he was an austere man. His two chief and distinguishing characteristics are a depressing pessimism—for there may be a reassuring and stimulating pessimism, as in the counsels and maxims of Schopenhauer—and an unusual mastery over the structure and architecture of music.

Dr. Muck could, of course, not bring out of his first symphony anything that is not contained within it; but he gave a most illuminative interpretation of the work, an interpretation that shed light on the admirable qualities of the composer and also on his limitations.

I have never heard in this country or in Germany a more intelligent and masterly performance of this much discussed work. The manner in which Dr. Muck analyzed before the audience the structure of the first movement was inimitable. His analysis was not didactic; it was not that of a person who is eager to die in defence of the sonata form. On the contrary, it was full of life, imagination and enthusiasm. It was, furthermore, remarkably elastic, and all this may be said of his interpretation of the other movements. His whole conception of the finale was on a grand and heroic scale, and he forced, in his quiet, modest manner, this impression on the audience. He mastered his hearers by something more than overwhelming sonority and realization of a superb climax. He sang his lyric orchestral passages as a skilled singer, with understanding and soul. He did not forget to prepare cunningly his backgrounds. He was not too anxious over that which is comparatively unimportant.

And the interpretation of these two movements was the crowning glory of an engrossing concert.

In the andante, which in spite of certain passages of meditative beauty is on the whole inherently uninteresting and tedious, he displayed his qualities of leadership and his insistence on a lyrical performance with the liberties in rhythm and in accentuation that are taken by all poetical and creative interpreters. The third movement might well be omitted in all performances of this symphony. Even the saddest-eyed Brahmsite can find few words in excuse of its dryness.

Strauss' "Don Juan" was fresh in the memory of the audience. The performance was highly spirited, but the music itself has produced a greater effect on former occasions. The intensity was too seldom relieved; the contrasts were not always sharply defined. What Disraeli said of the conversation of a certain colonel or captain in "Tancred" might be applied to the greater portion of the work as it was played last night: "Nothing could have been more noisy in a genteel way." Yet the section with the oboe solo was finely imagined, and the whole performance was one of great force and dash.

The excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust" are perhaps too well known, nor was the performance in any way unusual.

The audience was enthusiastic after the symphony and warmly applausive after the other selections.

The programme of the concert this week will include the overture to "Der Freischuetz," Schubert's "unfinished" symphony and Schumann's symphony in B flat major. Mme. Olive Fremstad will sing Agathe's scene and aria from Boston Sunday ...

44

October 28, 1906.

...me. Fremstad will sing at the Symphony concert this week. Born in Norway, about 25 years ago, she came to this country when she was 12 years old. Her parents settled in Minnesota. In her own country she had played the piano in public as a child wonder. Her first appearance in this country was as a singer at a Seidl concert. She went to Germany to study with Lilli Lehmann. In 1895 she sang in the "Ring" at Bayreuth, as one of the Rhine daughters. She was engaged at the Cologne Opera House until Neissart engaged her for Munich. Her first appearance at the Metropolitan, New York, was on Nov. 25, 1903, as Sieglinde. Mme. Fremstad sang in Boston as early as May 9, 1892, in a performance of Bruch's "Arminius." She made her first appearance here as an opera singer April 7, 1904, as Sieglinde. She afterward appeared as Venus (April 15). She appeared here as Kundry, March 9, 1906.

Miss Katharine Goodson, who will play here at a Symphony concert in January, is a young Englishwoman who studied in Vienna under Leschetitzki. Returning home she made her debut at a popular concert in St. James' Hall. She then made a tour of English provincial towns and of the Netherlands. In 1900 she went to Berlin and there and also in Paris she met with much success. During the last five years she has led the life of a virtuoso, and played in Germany, Austria, the Netherlands, France and Italy. She has been successful both in orchestral concerts led by Nikisch, Richter, Steinbach, Wood and in chamber music with Ysaye, Gerardy, Thomson, Becker, Kubelik, Marsick, the Bohemian quartet and others.

SUNDAY GLOBE—OCTOBER 28, 1906.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Dr Muck gave Boston for his third program a delightful walk—or perhaps dance—through modern music, beginning with Brahm's symphony No. 1, in C minor, which Dr von Buelow called the "Tenth symphony, not as though it should be put after the Ninth; I should put it between the Second and Eroics." Then came Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" tone poem, feverish and sensuous, and finally Berlioz' three bits of "The Damnation of Faust," the minuet of the will o' the wisps, the ballet of sylphs and the Rakoczy march—a different Rakoczy march from that purveyed by so-called Hungarians with a tzimballon.

The effect of this arrangement was, after tearing his audience to pieces with the wonderful Brahms music, delighting them a little fearsomely through the scenes of Don Juan's hunt for the perfect woman, the conductor sent them from his presence delighting over the delicate melodies of the Faust dances, and with the marching rhythms of the famous old Magyar melody beating below their footsteps. It was a good order.

Dr Muck grows on one. He has his men in better touch with himself already, and has inspired the orchestra with some of his own electric, dramatic feeling. The performance is not so smooth, not so rigid either; there is perhaps a hairsbreadth visible in the attacks, but there is more fervor and abandon, and the result is more inspiring, except perhaps to the precisan.

His reading made the Brahms symphony seem like the exposition of the character and life of a great robust, masculine, uncouth woman, never understood, constantly striving to the finer things she perceived, but of which nobody believed her capable; constantly surprising one by revelations of unsuspected tendernesses, womanliness, even religious feeling, and at the end doomed to die still without the sympathy of a single soul, but triumphant in her own self-knowledge. The finale went with indescribable fire.

The "Don Juan" music was playing with great unisons, and swift appreciations of sudden, inconsequent thoughts, and the audience applauded at its close as though they had just waked up to Dr Muck for the first time. Best of all, however—O, cultured Boston—they liked the deliciously delicate humor of the fading ballet of sylphs, expiring on the soft night air.

Miss Olive Fremstad is to be the soloist this week; she will sing the "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer" aria from Weber's "Freischuetz," the overture to which begins the concert. She will also sing a group of songs, with [illegible] Schubert unfinished, [illegible] Schumann No. [illegible] complete the pro-

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

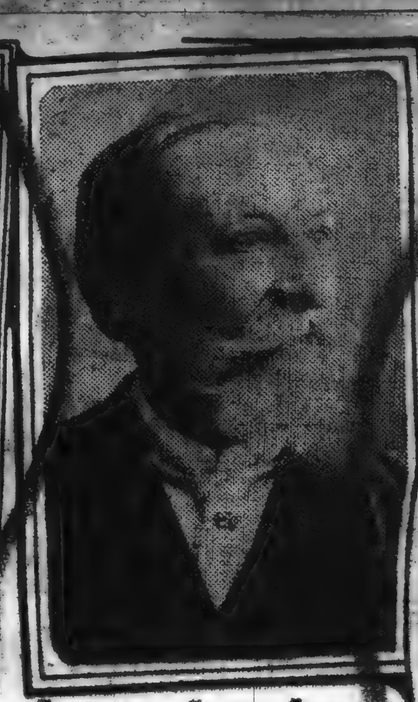
The first of the season's concerts by the Boston symphony quartet will be given tomorrow evening in Chickering hall at 8 o'clock. The season in Boston will open propitiously, for great interest in the work of the quartet is manifest. Messrs Hess, Roth, Ferir and Warnke have been together since the first of September, having spent the whole of that month working on their season's repertory. In the first week of October five concerts were given successfully in the middle west.

The assisting artist at the first concert will be Mr Heinrich Gebhard. The program will be as follows: Josef Suk, quartet for strings, B-flat major, Op 11 (first time); Schubert, quartet in C minor, Op Posth; Cesar Franck, quintet for piano and strings, F minor.

MUSIC NOTES.

The concert of Camille Saint-Saens and the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced for next Tuesday night has been postponed, on account of the composer's sickness, till Monday evening, Nov. 26. Seats that have already been engaged will be reserved unless notice be given to the contrary. The programme will be made up of the following works of Saint-Saens: Overture to "The Barbarians," "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," "Danse Macabre"; three organ pieces played by the composer—prelude and fugue, "O Salutaris" and Fantasia in B flat major; symphony in C minor, No. 3.

KATHARINE GOODSON
PIANIST



CAMILLE SAINT-SAENS

OLIVE FREMSTAD
SOPRANO

Writer of Operas, Master of Piano, A Creative Artist And Man of World

BY PHILIP HALE.

Camille Saint-Saens, the illustrious Frenchman who now visits the United States for the first time, is more than a musician. He himself would be the first to smile blandly at the remarks of Angelo de Gubernatis in his "Zoological Mythology"; "Midas, the musical critic, the predestined ass"; and he would smile, pondering this statement of the high-priest pantheism: "The ass as a musician, the ass as a musical critic, Pan the musician, and Pan preferred by the ass are the same person."

For Saint-Saens has not been satisfied with the making of music or the career of a virtuoso. An enemy—and Saint-Saens naturally, inevitably has enemies, for he speaks and writes bongstly and with a frankness that is sometimes appalling—might quote with reference to him the words of Juvenal:

Grammarian, painter, augur, rhetorician,
Rope dancer, conjurer, fiddler, and physician,
All trades his own, your hungry Greekling counts;
And bid him mount the sky—the sky he mounts!

Organist, pianist, caricaturist, dabbler in science, amateur of art, enamored of mathematics and astronomy, playwright and comedian, feuilletonist, traveller, archeologist—Saint-Saens is truly an indefatigable, restless man. Now he examines into the scenery of the ancient theatres, and now he discusses the problems and mysteries of life. He does not hesitate to say that Gounod will live by his oratorios, not by his operas; he refuses to aid in the erection of a statue to his old friend Cesar Franck on the ground that Franck's music is not purely French in spirit; he astonishes Paris by unstinted praise of ultra-modern Italian operas performed by Sonzogno's visiting company. Now he speculates concerning some astronomical phenomenon, and only a few weeks ago he described in the Figaro his attempt to tame spiders in spite of his lifelong aversion to them. No one can excel him in eulogy, and he is a formidable adversary. What could be neater than his attack on the Parisian audience for its indifference toward Bizet's "Djamileh"? Witness these lines from a sonnet published in a volume of his poems: "The bourgeois, ruminating in his narrow stall, pot-bellied, ugly, separated to his regret from the horde, opens a glassy eye, eats a sugar plum, then settles himself again for sleep believing that the orchestra is still a-tuning."

A Biographical Note.

Saint-Saens is now in his 72d year. He was born at Paris Oct. 9, 1835, in the Latin Quarter, and his familiar speech is still distinguished by the chaff of that famous district. He is of a Norman family—and is there not a strong dash of Hebrew blood in his veins? He did not have his father for a long time, and he was reared and educated by his mother, a painter, and his great-aunt, an excellent pianist, who gave him his first lessons.

He has told us in a charming essay that his ear was unusually sensitive; that he delighted in naming the precise tone of any sonorous object, glass, sconce, clock; that when he was asked the note of a bell he answered: "It has more than one." Tales have been told to prove that he was an infant phenomenon. He described a man walking in an adjoining room as making a quarter note and an eighth as he moved.

The boy's health was delicate, and he spent much time in the woods of Clamart and Meudon, listening to the voices of nature. He began to take piano lessons when he was 3 years old. When he was 7 years old he took lessons of Stamaty and lessons in composition of Maleden—two teachers unknown to fame. They encouraged his good taste and a love of Saint-Saens made his first appearance in public as a pianist on May 6, 1846, when he was in his 11th year. There was an orchestra. He played concertos by Mozart and Beethoven, and pieces by Handel, Bach and Kalkbrenner.

He entered the conservatory and studied with Halevy and Benoist. He took the first prize for organ playing, but he twice competed in vain for the Prix de Rome. His successful rivals were Leonce Cohen and Sieg. Who knows of them today? In 1853 he was appointed organist of Saint-Merry, and from 1858 to 1877 he was organist of the Madeleine. In 1861 he was piano teacher at the Niedermeyer school. His fame as a pianist and an organist was established throughout Europe, indeed to his injury as a composer. In 1870 he served in the national guard; in 1881 he was chosen member of the institute. The 50th anniversary of his first appearance as a pianist was celebrated in 1896 with pomp and ceremony, and for the occasion he brought out his fifth piano concerto and second sonata for piano and violin.

As a virtuoso he has been applauded in the chief European cities, from the time of his first visit to St. Petersburg in 1875 to that of his triumph in Berlin only a few days ago. For his recreation and his health he has spent winters from the Canaries to Cochin China. His face is as familiar in Cairo as in Algiers.

His Personality.

The man himself is of less than average height, thin, nervous, with large and exposed forehead. His hair was worn habitually short even when it was thicker. His eyes are almost level with his face. His eagle-beak would have excited the admiration of Sir Charles Napier, who once exclaimed: "Ah, a man with plenty of nose."

Irritable, whimsical, ironical, paradoxical, indulging himself in sudden changes of opinion, he is faithful toward friends, appreciative, as a rule, of the merits of rivals, kindly disposed toward young composers and zealous in practical assistance. He is a man who knows the world and shines in conversation; he is fond of society, but without any illusions concerning it; he is at ease and on equal terms with leaders in art, literature, politics.

His Monday receptions were famous in Paris and "All Paris" was eager to attend them; yet he was never so happy as in the Bohemian days when he took the part of Calchias to Bizet's or Regnault's Helen in Offenbach's delightful version of the tale of the injured Menelaus, or impersonating, in extraordinary costume, Marguerite surprised by the jewels. When he was in Moscow in 1875 he and Tschaikowsky brought out a little ballet "Pygmaleon and Galatea" on the stage of the Conservatory. Saint-Saens danced Galatea; Tschaikowsky was the amorous sculptor; Nicholas Rubinstein was the orchestra. There were no spectators. A scene for the Historical Painter!

An untiring student of Bach, he parodied Italian opera in "Gabriella di Vergy" and in "Carnaval des Animaux" he reproduced the cries, songs, howls, grunts, cluckings, bellowings of the animal kingdom.

A born Parisian and a Parisian from crown to sole, he is a nomad at heart.

As a Pianist.

When Liszt, Rubinstein, Von Buelow were all living, they considered Saint-Saens their equal. They marvelled at certain gifts and acquirements.

But he is now over 70, you say. Some months ago he played in London, and Mr. Baughan then wrote: "To the marvels of his quick wits and penetrating knowledge of all styles of music, he has now added the miracle of a pianist who has kept his fluency of technic at the age of 72. * * * And not only does he play with fluent technic and a wonderful [illegible] resources of his instrument, but with the spirit of enjoyment [illegible] concert in which he takes part is ever dull. He is full of a nervous force which has a direct effect upon his audience."

Mr. Vernon Blackburn, also hearing him, paid a remarkable tribute to him in the course of an excellent study of Saint-Saens, which was published in the New Music Review of last September. The tribute should be known to all who are interested in music.

"He is a great and very attractive pianist. To say so much is to aver that he is in his own way a great interpreter. His fingers are nimble; he has the elastic feeling for music which carries him through period upon period of varying schools of musical art. So rapid, so volatile, so quick is his playing that, as we all know, even so stern a critic as Hector Berlioz gave him for this reason, especial praise; and although Berlioz was constantly under the immediate impression of his own emotions, his general criticism on music has lasted through so many years that one can really place him side by side with Wagner as a writer upon the highest plan of musical criticism. One would think that, for a pianist with any ambitions, a simple hearing of Saint-Saens in his piano interpretations [illegible] education. These rapid fingers, that slender manner of playing which is now (alas!) too quickly dying out of the world, that exquisite classic art, have come, since Saint-Saens first made his great and impressive debut as a piano player. In these days we are not content, unless some child of 15 summers is able to attract our attention by blustering on the piano; in fact, we are up in arms on the side of the youthful prodigy. Now, if there is one artist in the world who should be able to destroy this most pernicious modern idea, his name is Saint-Saens. He brings as a pianist an experience and a delicate talent which cannot easily be overpraised, and which is so peaceful in its results, and so charming in execution that he seems to lift a forefinger warning the future against violence, and bidding us to remember that art is not to be gained by the storming of any capitol, but is to be gained only by realizing, within a certain circle, the fulness and the richness of one's own musical temperament. This has been the work of Saint-Saens as a player of the piano."

His Operas.

The ambition of the average French musician is, first [illegible], to win glory in the opera house. After the death of Gossec, how many Frenchmen tried their hand at symphonic or chamber music before Saint-Saens made it reputable, fashionable, even enviable in Paris? Lalo was a conspicuous exception. Of late years many composers have written for orchestra and for chamber-clubs, but when his colleagues in youth and middle-age thought only of the theatre Saint-Saens hankered after a reputation as a composer of both absolute and programme music. His first important work was not an opera, not an operetta; it was a symphony, and his second important work was also a symphony; then followed church music, another symphony, chamber music, a violin concerto, etc. Not until 1865 did he begin work on an opera, "Le Timbre d'Argent," which was not produced until 1877. "L'Ancetre," his latest opera, was produced at Monte Carlo last February.

Saint-Saens has composed a dozen or more operas, but only "Samson and Delilah" is known to music lovers in the United States and to the majority of them the work is an oratorio. Another opera may have been performed in New Orleans, but, if so, only for a night or two.

His reputation, in all probability, will rest upon his pieces for orchestra, his concertos, his chamber music.

An opera of Saint-Saens is an epitome of his career; infinite interest in thematic development that is of no avail in dramatic and emotional moments; infinite pains in the detail of instrumentation; extreme care for the expression rather than for the thought itself. It is highly characteristic of this composer that one of the most effective moments in "Samson and Delilah" is when the woman of Sorek and the High Priest sing a prayer in canon form to a persistent orchestral figure.

The word "cleverness" is overworked. All young English composers are now described as "clever," and after this word is applied, the critic begins his catalogue of musical faults, offences, crimes, sins with the familiar "but." Yet the word "clever" may be often justly applied to the music of Saint-Saens in operatic as in absolute form. There is "Phryne," composed for Sibyl Sanderson, the interpreter of Massenet's more erotic, one might say pornographic, muse. The opera won little or no favor outside of Paris, and there the one marked impression was that made by the frank exposure of the voluptuous body of the prima donna. In this opera the peculiar irony of the composer is displayed in the bassoon theme which accentuates the exhortation of Discephile urging his wild nephew to lead a virtuous life: this theme returns when the nephew realizes the hypocrisy of the old Satyr and defiles the bust erected to him by applauding citizens. When in the same opera the composer tries to write in the vein of Offenbach, as in the finale of the first act, the hearer longs for Offenbach himself, whose "canaillerie" is honest and human, whose melody is spontaneous, whose rhythm is irresistible, whose setting of music to the text is more pertinent.

The Musician.

In 1867 Berlioz called Saint-Saens "one of the greatest musicians of our epoch." The same opinion was pronounced by sane judges in 1897, and it has been more recently pronounced. On the other hand, there are some who say that he is too much of a musician to be a great composer or creator. The praise of Gounod, "Saint-Saens will write at will work a la Rossini, a la Verdi, a la Schumann, a la Wagner," is reckoned by them as a reproach, as a courteous manner of saying, "Saint-Saens has the unfortunate faculty of assimilation." The late Hugues Imbert, in a careful study of this composer, admits that there is no graver censure than to say of an artist: "He is incapable of being himself."

As far as an intimate knowledge of the science of music is concerned, as far as fluency and ease in expressing musically this knowledge, Saint-Saens is beyond doubt the greatest of French musicians. His nearest rival is Vincent d'Indy. The scientific knowledge of Berlioz was not wide or deep-rooted; he sank when he was not buoyed up by some intense poetic idea, as he rose far above the great majority of composers in wildness and splendor of imagination. The nature of Cesar Franck was more spiritual and mystical; it was more emotional, and it rose to sublime heights known to Beethoven, but Franck had not always the exquisite sense of proportion which characterizes the music of Saint-Saens. For purely mechanical beauty and elegance in the expression of thoughts which are very seldom emotional or dramatic, Saint-Saens is unrivalled.

He has been influenced greatly by predecessors and contemporaries. First of all by Bach, whose influence is to be observed in unexpected moments; his wig is seen even among the Grecian scenic accessories in "Phryne." Saint-Saens is saturated with this old music. There is no sedulous aping. He has studied Bach so deeply and so persistently that it is natural for him to use the same language, to mould sentences in the same fashion; and sometimes, as in the majestic opening of the piano concerto in G minor, you would swear that Bach himself had penned the measures, for spirit and form here work together.

There is also the influence of Beethoven, Schumann, Berlioz, Liszt, Wagner. Schumann gave him hints which he elaborated, especially in the treatment of rhythm. Liszt taught him the symphonic poem.

There is a certain unmistakable individuality that rises above these influences. There is the presence of a nature [illegible] intelligent, peculiarly elegant, cynically fastidious; so studied in dress, manner, speech, that you suspect an utter absence of emotion, and you would forgive solecisms, carelessness or eccentricity in dress, bursts of native coarseness, if there were only one direct and overwhelming appeal, if there were a revelation of elemental qualities.

The Symphonic Poems.

The symphonic poems of Saint-Saens were inspired by admiration for Liszt and by close friendship and example. Some look skew-eyed at these admirable compositions. There is Gustave Kahn, a born verbal melodist, a poet singularly susceptible to color impressions, a poet, to quote George Moore, "who takes the French language as a violin, and lets the bow of his emotion run at wild will upon it, producing strange acute strains, unpremeditated harmonies comparable to nothing but some Hungarian rhapsody." Well, Kahn found little in "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" but "singular music, a sort of protest against ordinary evening music, mixed with protests of the double-bass unkindly received by the cymbals—but why insist on the mistake of a musician who has had so many fine hours?" A French music critic of repute insists that the popularity of the "Danse Macabre" rests wholly on the waltz rhythm.

The symphonic poems do not reveal large imagination; the composer is not a highly imaginative person; they are remarkable instances of musical ingenuity and shrewdness, the majority of them are made with unsurpassable skill; they also display a sense of irony, and this sense is as a saving salt in programme music. The composer of symphonic poems is often like unto the man you hear Hercules grunting in rage?" he asks you. "You are welcome to the pleasure, if you do hear him. Is the oboe the mocking voice of Omphale? Just as you please. There are many things in this piece of mine: name them if it suits you." He smiles at you; he smiles still more genially if you cry out against his cynicism.

In "Phaeton" he starts the rash youth on the arrogant ride, but he himself does not jump into the chariot; on the contrary, he shakes his head, prophesies, watches curiously for the end.

In a safe place he observes the skeletons dancing the infernal jig while Death fiddles, and he does not forget to tell the cock the time to crow. The shudder of the hearer is one of cerebral appreciation. There is no goose flesh, no sinking of heart and stomach, no turning of knees to water, as when the Ghost stalks in Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet," or the gong in the "Pathetic" symphony announces annihilation.

Has He Melody?

Saint-Saens has been accused of poverty in melody. The charge is in a way unjust.

There are abundant instances of sharply defined and individual melody, which is drawn rather than colored. This melody is generally without perfume, and without passion. Strains like those in the mouth of the wooing Delilah are seldom found in the complete works of this composer.

The melody of Saint-Saens too often resembles an opening at chess. It is valuable chiefly for contrapuntal complications that may result. The technical skill of the composer is so great that he jauntily takes thematic material of small signicance and develops it in a too scholastic mood and fashion. There is play of mere abstract intellect, a solving of problems that interest only the propounder. The element of surprise enters only into the workmanship. The programme might state: "Camille Saint-Saens will now work out an exercise in the sight of the audience."

When Saint-Saens is dry, the dryness is not that of second-rate makers of music; it is the dryness of a man whose wit and intelligence are unusual and recognized, but he insists on abstruse thought and delights in self-absorption.

Mr. Baughan has well considered this point. "As a creative artist, he is Protean. He can write in any style you will, even borrowing something from Wagner, and yet catching the spirit of 18th century music. In all his compositions the technical workmanship is of the neatest, and has many ingenious touches, and he is a master of sauve, pleasant melody, which would be highly original if it had something more saliently characteristic." But when Mr. Baughan adds that Saint-Saens lacks a "strong individuality, which has prevented him from being a very great composer," he neglects to praise the inimitable elegance, the rare polish, the unerring sense of proper distribution, shown both in structure and in orchestration, which set Saint-Saens apart from other composers.

An Honorable Career.

As Mr. Blackburn puts it, Saint-Saens has "loomed largely in the eye of the world, and his fame has gone out to many lands."

"He is an exquisite; possibly just as we remember in these days Beau Brummel or George IV. as exquisites of their time, so Saint-Saens may hand down a reputation of the same kind. Beau Brummel designed the fashions of his time, and George IV. countersigned them. The fashions are gone; everything which is not modern—and only eternal art is modern—comes and goes with the springtime, with the summer, with the autumn, with the winter; we can never renew our fashions; that is the pathos of living just for one's own generation. It is a pathos that sometimes goes beyond the sense of tragedy and seems to belong to the eternal darkness of which Belial spoke in Milton's immortal phrase:

Sad cure! For who would lose, though full of pain,
This intellectual being; those thoughts that wander
Through Eternity or to perish rather,
Swallowed up and lost in the dark womb
Of Uncrested Night.

"Alas! it is the tragedy of the artist whose creative power can never be equal to his ambitions. The thought of Saint-Saens will never wander through eternity; but one may in respect of his honorable and fine career remember that his influence may continue where his actual thought must perish."

Here is Mr. Blackburn at his best, as far as literary expression is concerned; but may not something more be said in appreciation of the long and honorable career of the distinguished man who will soon honor the city by his visit.

Saint-Saens is a musician of uncommon technical equipment, clearness in expression, logic, fine taste. He is a master of rhythm and a rare appreciator of tonal color. With him form is more than thought. His wit and brilliance dazzle; but he seldom touches the heart or sweeps away the judgment. He is not a great creator.

A name always to be memtioned with affectionate respect! In the face of practical difficulties, discouragements, misunderstandings, sneers, he has worked constantly to the best of his unusual ability for musical righteousness in its pure form.

Although he built on the foundations of German music, he never denied his own nationality, and in the best qualities of his art, clearness and taste, he is essentially French.

During years when Frenchmen were contributing little concert music of significance or worth, when purely orchestral music and chamber music had few admirers in the concert hall, Saint-Saens was tireless in raising the standard of French music, and in leading audiences to the understanding and the enjoyment of the higher forms of musical expression.

Nor was he ashamed to endeavor to introduce German thoughtfulness in music for the advantage and the glory of the country which he dearly loves.

The young are irreverent, even when they are musicians. It is the fashion for a few of the young French writers to mention Saint-Saens flippantly or as with a pat on the back, and the careless remark: "Good old man! Now go to bed!"

They forget that the success of d'Indy, Faure, Debussy was made possible by the labor and the talent of Saint-Saens. They do not stop to think that the symphony in C minor, the piano concerto in G minor, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" will long en-

The Baltimore Sun,
October 1 1906.

[illegible] Boston is [illegible] scornful, Chauncey-like, concerning this metropolis. From Boston we hear that "Saint-Saëns, who is coming to this country for twenty concerts, is to make his début in America in Boston at a special concert which the Symphony Orchestra will give in Symphony Hall on Oct. 31. "It has," continues our authority, "been generally announced that he would make his American début in New York, but Manager C. A. Ellis has made other arrangements possible."

So Saint-Saëns, like Carl Muck, must see the Hub first and our more speedy Rim of Creation afterward.

Conductor Muck made a successful début in Boston. He was, said the Transcript in an editorial broadside, "So quiet, even so stiff, yet tense with nervous energy." And the audience's behavior was enthusiastic. "It would be considered enthusiasm even in New York."

Dr. Muck, so his friends Down East say, is an enthusiastic traveller, and in this he has the warm support of Mrs. Muck. He is considering a plan of return to Germany next spring by way of the Pacific, stopping at the Philippines, and going even so far as Australia.

The only thing that makes him doubtful is the awful heat one encounters in the Red Sea in the summer. Paderewski, when he went to Australia three years ago, went through the Red Sea in May, and he has told Dr. Muck that the memory of it is a nightmare to him.

Mrs. Muck is tremendously interested in the various Polar expeditions. She says that the only reason she regrets being a woman is that she cannot hope to go far into the North. On the orchestra's first trip this winter she might profit by the opportunity to meet Mrs. Robert E. Peary and the Snow Baby, who know the high latitudes as well as they do their home in Washington.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date OCT 27 1906

HAD things gone as they ought in the way of hurrying to completion the proposed Academy of Music the forthcoming series of Philharmonic concerts would have taken place in a superb new edifice—with society donning its best bib and tucker for the occasion and the great foyer having all the appearance of an evening reception. But alas! it is back to the Baptist Temple again. Fortunately Brooklyn society has stood nobly by the Philharmonics since fire drove them out of their accustomed place and the concerts will again be given, under the fashionable auspices so essential to the success of most musical undertakings in the metropolis of the new world. The opening concert, on the evening of Friday November ninth will be unusual in that there will be no soloist, the idea being that there shall be nothing to detract from the interest in Dr. Karl Muck, the distinguished German conductor who will then make his first appearance here at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of ninety-four musicians. At the third concert, January eleventh, Paderewski will make one of his very few scheduled appearances in this country; Mrs. Samaroff, the wife of the great Russian conductor, will be heard at the second concert December seventh; Adamowski will play at the fourth, on the twenty-second of February, while for the last in the series, March twenty-second, the soloist is not yet announced. The time for the renewal of subscriptions expired last Saturday and places are now being assigned to new subscribers for the season.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date OCT 27 1906

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which has just been issued, shows that a total of 109 concerts have already been arranged for the present season. In this total are included the two special pension fund concerts in Boston and the special concert in honor of Saint-Saens, which will be given in Symphony Hall on Next Tuesday evening, October 30, the distinguished French composer making his American debut in Boston. Twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts will be given in Boston, ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, three each in Hartford, Providence and Worcester, two in Portland, Me., and one each in Rochester, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Bridgeport, Springfield, Poughkeepsie, Fitchburg and Northampton. It is probable that several more concerts will be arranged for the latter part of the season. The first concert here will be on Friday night, November 9.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date OCT 27 1906

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which has just been issued shows that a total of 109 concerts have already been arranged for the present season. In this total are included the two special pension fund concerts in Boston and the special concert in honor of Saint-Saens, which will be given in Symphony Hall on next Tuesday evening, Oct. 30, the distinguished French composer making his American debut in Boston. Twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts will be given in Boston, ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, three each in Hartford, Providence and Worcester, two in Portland, Me., and one each in Rochester, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Bridgeport, Springfield, Poughkeepsie, Fitchburg and Northampton. It is probable that several more concerts will be arranged for the latter part of the season. The first concert here will be on Friday night, Nov. 9.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date OCT 27 1906

Professor Willy Hess, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is very popular and is always assured of hearty applause when he takes his place. There was a delay before the applause began this year at the opening concert. During the summer he has shaved his beard, with the result that he looked at least ten years younger, and at first the audience failed absolutely to recognize him, so changed was his appearance.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date OCT 28 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been issued, shows that a total of 109 concerts have already been arranged for the present season. In this total are included the two special pension fund concerts in Boston and the special concert in honor of Saint Saens. Twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts will be given in Boston, ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, three each in Hartford, Providence and Worcester, two in Portland, Me., and one each in Rochester, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Bridgeport, Springfield, Poughkeepsie, Fitchburg and Northampton. It is probable that several more concerts will be arranged for the latter part of the season. The first concert here will be on Monday night, November 5.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date OCT 28 1906

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra shows that a total of 109 concerts have already been arranged for the present season. In this total are included the two special pension fund concerts in Boston and the special concert in honor of Saint-Saens, which will be given in Symphony Hall on next Tuesday evening, October 30. Twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts will be given in Boston, ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn; three each in Hartford, Providence and Worcester; two in Portland, Me., and one each in Rochester, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Bridgeport, Springfield, Poughkeepsie, Fitchburg and Northampton. It is probable that several more concerts will be arranged for the latter part of the season. The first concert here will be on Monday night, November 5.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date OCT 27 1906

Professor Willy Hess, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is very popular and is always assured of hearty applause when he takes his place. There was a delay before the applause began this year at the opening concert. During the summer he has shaved his beard, with the result that he looked at least ten years younger, and at first the audience failed absolutely to recognize him, so changed was his appearance.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date OCT 28 1906

Among Mme. Nelson's concert engagements for the coming season are three appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra—two in Boston and one in Baltimore; one with the Pittsburg Orchestra in Pittsburg, and one with the Cincinnati Orchestra in Cleveland.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date NOV 1 1906

MUSIC

THE opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season is an event of unusual interest owing to the first appearance of its new leader, Dr. Muck. His musical reputation, the other side of the water, has long been established, and a warm welcome is practically a foregone conclusion. Mr. Gericke's departure was deeply regretted, for he was largely responsible, as we all know, for bringing this orchestra to its present perfection. It is well that his baton has fallen to such an able successor.

Le roi est mort, vive le roi!

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address PHILADELPHIA

Date OCT 28

Saint-Saens Changes Plans.

NEW YORK, Oct. 27.—M. Camille Saint-Saens, the French composer and pianist, is still confined to his apartments at the Hotel Gotham with throat trouble. He will be unable to make his American debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as he intended, but will make his first appearance in this city on November 3.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date OCT 28 1906

Professor Willy Hess, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, is very popular in Boston, both as a man and a musician, and at the first concert he always received "a hand" when he took his place at the head of the first violins. This year there was a delay before the applause began. During the summer he has shaved his beard, with the result that he looked at least ten years younger, and at first the audience failed absolutely to recognize him, so changed was his appearance.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Date OCT 27 1906

Professor Willy Hess, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is very popular and is always assured of hearty applause when he takes his place. There was a delay before the applause began this year at the opening concert. During the summer he has shaved his beard, with the result that he looked at least ten years younger, and at first the audience failed absolutely to recognize him, so changed was his appearance.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Date OCT 29 1906

PEN PICTURE OF CARL MUCK.

New Boston Symphony Orchestra Leader, Who will be Heard in Brooklyn.

Clearly Dr. Muck would have us try him at the very start as a conductor of Wagner, but only one of the three Wagnerian numbers on the first programme is operatic, says a writer in the Boston Evening Transcript. Willing, too, he seems to mount to stalking horses of many conductors—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Mozart's "Jupiter," Brahm's First and Schumann's First. Apparently he has no overmastering ardor for the tone-poem, or for the freer modern forms generally. Distinctly the four programmes are the programmes of a classicist.

Dr. Muck, as he sits in the orchestra pit of the Royal Opera House at Berlin or in the semi-darkness of the Baireuth sanctuary, is a man in his 40s, clean shaven, dark skinned, dark haired, strong of jaw, sharply cut of feature, short-sighted to the need of glasses, but with eyes sparkling brightly through them; slim as a boy, lithe, buoyant, alert and nervous in all that he does. In his leisure he talks much (and he smokes much) with a humorous vivacity and recurring touches of sarcasm that long ago commended his society to his Emperor at Berlin.

Distinctly he is a man of clear and critical intellect—qualities that have a just place, along with many others of many sorts, in a conductor. At his work, either in rehearsal or in public performance, in the concert room or at the opera house, Dr. Muck is all for the task in hand. His diligence is as unflagging, his conscientiousness as persistent, as Mr. Gericke's own. His beat is precision itself, and his sense of rhythm of the keenest.

For twenty years and more he has been studying his scores and playing the music that they contain with unwearying acuteness. He knows it to the last detail; he insists that each detail shall have its due place in the whole tonal fabric, and yet he does not lose the larger proportions of the web. His ear is as acute as his mind, and he has a keen sense for beautiful, delicately graduated and entirely euphonic tone such as for years has been the characteristic virtue of our orchestra. He has studied the secrets of instruments and voices.

Birth and youth in a household of the cultivated German middle class gave Dr. Muck intellectual and artistic tastes and bent. His training at the universities of Leipsic and Heidelberg—he is a doctor of philosophy by degree earned, and not a doctor of music by honorary title—confirmed and strengthened them. He labored as a chorus master at Zurich, as a conductor at minor Austrian opera houses with a traveling opera company, before the call to the Opera in Berlin gave him an established position.

At first he was fain to be a wandering virtuoso of the piano. His father insisted upon the prosaic work at Zurich. The chance illness of the regular conductor there disclosed the young Muck's aptitude for conducting. It was Angelo Neumann, discoverer of musicians of promise, that commended him to the Berlin Opera. There he has worked for fourteen years. Hénschel, Gericke, Nikisch and Paur all came first to our orchestra comparatively untried and unpracticed, with their finer skill to gain, their fuller way to make.

Dr. Muck comes with a career achieved, with long-standing reputation earned and with entire mastery of the technique and the routine of his art. Every orchestra that has played under him, if only for a single concert, has respected the man and the conductor. His players at Berlin have added personal devotion. His assistants at Baireuth are loyalty itself.

The duties of the chief conductor at the Berlin Opera are confining, but from time to time Dr. Muck has visited the musical capitals of Europe, in the new fashion of the "star" conductor. He has taken a Wagner "cycle" or two at Covent Garden; Paris has heard him; he has wandered as far East as Moscow, and the Philharmonic Society of Vienna—an orchestra more akin to ours than any other band in Europe—has cherished him. Why, then—not to burke the question that has been raised steadily in Boston since Dr. Muck was chosen to succeed Mr. Gericke—why, then, has he not attained the celebrity of Weingartner, Nikisch, Mahler or Strauss as a "virtuoso" conductor? The answer is the simplest to those that know Dr. Muck's temperament, traits and standards. Half the stock in trade of the glorified "virtuoso" conductor is his personality. Display it he must, if he would keep his standing and his following. He cannot be impersonal, if he would.

Whether he smokes a cigarette or "interprets" a huge tone-poem, whether he conducts a Wagner cycle or buys a new cravat, he must be subjective. If he unfolds a handkerchief or a principal theme he must do it in an individual way. Of intense and unflagging subjectivity, "virtuoso" conductors, with all their great qualities, are really made.

In contrast, Dr. Muck has the objective temperament, an objective mind, and objective standards. No man of his eminence is more averse to personal exploitation. No conductor of his rank is less for himself or more for the work in hand. Dr. Muck, all fidelity to the music before him, all zeal to impart fully and faithfully the form and the substance of it, the design that the composer purposed in it, the mood in which he wrote, the emotions he would summon. The conductor is but the guiding medium; his band but the means; the rest is all the composer's.

Yet this objective and intellectual temperament has some of the defects of its virtues. "If only he would calculate a little less coolly," said one of the companions at Baireuth, this summer, "if only he pursued absolute accuracy a little less passionately, if only"—and he ended abruptly. Muck has always proved

[46]

The Baltimore Sun,

October---1906.

Now Boston is "thinking scornful," Mulvaney-like, concerning this metropolis. From Boston we hear that "Saint-Saëns, who is coming to this country for twenty concerts, is to make his début in America in Boston at a special concert which the Symphony Orchestra will give in Symphony Hall on Oct. 31. "It has," continues our authority, "been generally announced that he would make his American début in New York, but Manager C. A. Ellis has made other arrangements possible."

So Saint-Saëns, like Carl Muck, must see the Hub first and our more speedy Rim of Creation afterward.

Conductor Muck made a successful début in Boston. He was, said the Transcript in an editorial broadside, "So quiet, even so stiff, yet tense with nervous energy." And the audience's behavior was enthusiastic. "It would be considered enthusiasm even in New York."

Dr. Muck, so his friends Down East say, is an enthusiastic traveller, and in this he has the warm support of Mrs. Muck. He is considering a plan of return to Germany next spring by way of the Pacific, stopping at the Philippines, and going even so far as Australia.

The only thing that makes him doubtful is the awful heat one encounters in the Red Sea in the summer. Paderewski, when he went to Australia three years ago, went through the Red Sea in May, and he has told Dr. Muck that the memory of it is a nightmare to him.

Mrs. Muck is tremendously interested in the various Polar expeditions. She says that the only reason she regrets being a woman is that she cannot hope to go far into the North. On the orchestra's first trip this winter she might profit by the opportunity to meet Mrs. Robert E. Peary and the Snow Baby, who know the high latitudes as well as they do their home in Washington.

From

Address

Date

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which has just been issued, shows that a total of 109 concerts have already been arranged for the present season. In this total are included the two special pension fund concerts in Boston and the special concert in honor of Saint-Saens, which will be given in Symphony Hall on Next Tuesday evening, October 30, the distinguished French composer making his American debut in Boston. Twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts will be given in Boston, ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, three each in Hartford, Providence and Worcester, two in Portland, Me., and one each in Rochester, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Bridgeport, Springfield, Poughkeepsie, Fitchburg and Northampton. It is probable that several more concerts will be arranged for the latter part of the season. The first concert here will be on Friday night, November 9.

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which has just been issued shows that a total of 109 concerts have already been arranged for the present season. In this total are included the two special pension fund concerts in Boston and the special concert in honor of Saint-Saens, which will be given in Symphony Hall on next Tuesday evening, Oct. 30, the distinguished French composer making his American debut in Boston. Twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts will be given in Boston, ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, three each in Hartford, Providence and Worcester, two in Portland, Me., and one each in Rochester, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Bridgeport, Springfield, Poughkeepsie, Fitchburg and Northampton. It is probable that several more concerts will be arranged for the latter part of the season. The first concert here will be on Friday night, Nov. 9.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Prof. Willy Hess, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is very popular and is always assured of much applause when he takes his place. There was a delay before the applause began this year at the opening concert, because during the Summer he shaved his beard, with the result that he looked ten years younger and at first the audience failed absolutely to recognize him.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

HAD things gone as they ought in the way of hurrying to completion the proposed Academy of Music the forthcoming series of Philharmonic concerts would have taken place in a superb new edifice—with society donning its best bib and tucker for the occasion and the great foyer having all the appearance of an evening reception. But alas! it is back to the Baptist Temple again. Fortunately Brooklyn society has stood nobly by the Philharmonics since fire drove them out of their accustomed place and the concerts will again be given, under the fashionable auspices so essential to the success of most musical undertakings in the metropolis of the new world. The opening concert, on the evening of Friday November ninth will be unusual in that there will be no soloist, the idea being that there shall be nothing to detract from the interest in Dr. Karl Muck, the distinguished German conductor who will then make his first appearance here at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of ninety-four musicians. At the third concert, January eleventh, Paderewski will make one of his very few scheduled appearances in this country; Mrs. Samaroff, the wife of the great Russian conductor, will be heard at the second concert December seventh; Adamowski will play at the fourth, on the twenty-second of February, while for the last in the series, March twenty-second, the soloist is not yet announced. The time for the renewal of subscriptions expired last Saturday and places are now being assigned to new subscribers for the season.

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been issued, shows that a total of 109 concerts has already been arranged for the present season. Twenty-four public rehearsals and 24 concerts will be given in Boston, 10 concerts in New York, 6 in Cambridge, 5 each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, 3 each in Hartford, Providence and Worcester, 2 in Portland, Me., and 1 each in Rochester, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Bridgeport, Springfield, Poughkeepsie, Fitchburg and Northampton. It is probable that several more concerts will be arranged for the latter part of the season. The first concert here will be on Monday night of next week.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

---

ss

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been issued, shows that a total of 109 concerts have already been arranged for the present season. In this total are included the two special pension fund concerts in Boston and the special concert in honor of Saint Saens. Twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts will be given in Boston, ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, three each in Hartford, Providence and Worcester, two in Portland, Me., and one each in Rochester, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Bridgeport, Springfield, Poughkeepsie, Fitchburg and Northampton. It is probable that several more concerts will be arranged for the latter part of the season. The first concert here will be on Monday night, November 5.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

---

ess

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra shows that a total of 109 concerts have already been arranged for the present season. In this total are included the two special pension fund concerts in Boston and the special concert in honor of Saint-Saens, which will be given in Symphony Hall on next Tuesday evening, October 30. Twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts will be given in Boston, ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn; three each in Hartford, Providence and Worcester; two in Portland, Me., and one each in Rochester, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Bridgeport, Springfield, Poughkeepsie, Fitchburg and Northampton. It is probable that several more concerts will be arranged for the latter part of the season. The first concert here will be on Monday night, November 5.

---

ess

Among Mme. Melba's concert engagements for the coming season are three appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra—two in Boston and one in Baltimore; one with the Pittsburg Orchestra in Pittsburg, and one with the Cincinnati Orchestra in Cleveland.

[46]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Saint-Saens Changes Plans.

NEW YORK, Oct. 27.—M. Camille Saint-Saens, the French composer and pianist, is still confined to his apartments at the Hotel Gotham with throat trouble. He will be unable to make his American debut but with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as he intended, but will make his first appearance in this city on November 3.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Professor Willy Hess, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, is very popular in Boston, both as a man and a musician, and at the first concert he always received "a hand" when he took his place at the head of the first violins. This year there was a delay before the applause began. During the summer he has shaved his beard, with the result that he looked at least ten years younger, and at first the audience failed absolutely to recognize him, so changed was his appearance.

MUSIC

THE opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season is an event of unusual interest owing to the first appearance of its new leader, Dr. Muck. His musical reputation, the other side of the water, has long been established, and a warm welcome is practically a foregone conclusion. Mr. Gericke's departure was deeply regretted, for he was largely responsible, as we all know, for bringing this orchestra to its present perfection. It is well that his baton has fallen to such an able successor.

Le roi est mort, vive le roi!

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Saint-Saens Changes Plans.

NEW YORK, Oct. 27.—M. Camille Saint-Saens, the French composer and pianist, is still confined to his apartments at the Hotel Gotham with throat trouble. He will be unable to make his American debut but with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as he intended, but will make his first appearance in this city on November 3.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

---

music before him, all zeal to impart fully and faithfully the form and the substance of it, the design that the composer purposed in it, the mood in which he wrote, the emotions he would summon. The conductor is but the guiding medium; his band but the means; the rest is all the composer's.

Yet this objective and intellectual temperament has some of the defects of its virtues. "If only he would calculate a little less coolly," said one of the companions at Baireuth, this summer, "if only he pursued absolute accuracy a little less passionately, if only"—and he ended abruptly—"but Muck has always proved equal to the occasion and he will to yours in Boston."

First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Brooklyn, N. Y.

PEN PICTURE OF CARL MUCK.

New Boston Symphony Orchestra Leader, Who will be Heard in Brooklyn.

Clearly Dr. Muck would have us try him at the very start as a conductor of Wagner, but only one of the three Wagnerian numbers on the first programme is operatic, says a writer in the Boston Evening Transcript. Willing, too, he seems to mount to stalking horses of many conductors—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Mozart's "Jupiter," Brahm's First and Schumann's First. Apparently he has no overmastering ardor for the tone-poem, or for the freer modern forms generally. Distinctly the four programmes are the programmes of a classicist.

Dr. Muck, as he sits in the orchestra pit of the Royal Opera House at Berlin, or in the semi-darkness of the Baireuth sanctuary, is a man in his 40s, clean shaven, dark skinned, dark haired, strong of jaw, sharply cut of feature, short-sighted to the need of glasses, but with eyes sparkling brightly through them; slim as a boy, lithe, buoyant, alert and nervous in all that he does. In his leisure he talks much (and he smokes much) with a humorous vivacity and recurring touches of sarcasm that long ago commended his society to his Emperor at Berlin.

Distinctly he is a man of clear and critical intellect—qualities that have a just place, along with many others of many sorts, in a conductor. At his work, either in rehearsal or in public performance, in the concert room or at the opera house, Dr. Muck is all for the task in hand. His diligence is as unflagging, his conscientiousness as persistent, as Mr. Gericke's own. His beat is precision itself, and his sense of rhythm of the keenest.

For twenty years and more he has been studying his scores and playing the music that they contain with unwearying acuteness. He knows it to the last detail; he insists that each detail shall have its due place in the whole tonal fabric, and yet he does not lose the larger proportions of the web. His ear is as acute as his mind, and he has a keen sense for beautiful, delicately graduated and entirely euphonic tone such as for years has been the characteristic virtue of our orchestra. He has studied the secrets of instruments and voices.

Birth and youth in a household of the cultivated German middle class gave Dr. Muck intellectual and artistic tastes and bent. His training at the universities of Leipsic and Heidelberg—he is a doctor of philosophy by degree earned, and not a doctor of music by honorary title—confirmed and strengthened them. He labored as a chorus master at Zurich, as a conductor at minor Austrian opera houses, with a traveling opera company, before the call to the Opera in Berlin gave him an established position.

At first he was fain to be a wandering virtuoso of the piano. His father insisted upon the prosaic work at Zurich. The chance illness of the regular conductor there disclosed the young Muck's aptitude for conducting. It was Angelo Neumann, discoverer of musicians of promise, that commended him to the Berlin Opera. There he has worked for fourteen years. Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch and Paur all came first to our orchestra comparatively untried and unpracticed, with their finer skill to gain, their fuller way to make.

Dr. Muck comes with a career achieved, with long-standing reputation earned and with entire mastery of the technique and the routine of his art. Every orchestra that has played under him, if only for a single concert, has respected the man and the conductor. His players at Berlin have added personal devotion. His assistants at Baireuth are loyalty itself.

The duties of the chief conductor at the Berlin Opera are confining, but from time to time Dr. Muck has visited the musical capitals of Europe, in the new fashion of the "star" conductor. He has taken a Wagner "cycle" or two at Covent Garden; Paris has heard him; he has wandered as far East as Moscow, and the Philharmonic Society of Vienna—an orchestra more akin to ours than any other band in Europe—has cherished him. Why, then—not to burke the question that has been raised steadily in Boston since Dr. Muck was chosen to succeed Mr. Gericke—why, then, has he not attained the celebrity of Weingartner, Nikisch, Mahler or Strauss as a "virtuoso" conductor? The answer is the simplest to those that know Dr. Muck's temperament, traits and standards. Half the stock in trade of the glorified "virtuoso" conductor is his personality. Display it he must, if he would keep his standing and his following. He cannot be impersonal, if he would.

Whether he smokes a cigarette or "interprets" a huge tone-poem, whether he conducts a Wagner cycle or buys a new cravat, he must be subjective. If he unfolds a handkerchief or a principal theme, he must do it in an individual way. Of intense and unflagging subjectivity, "virtuoso" conductors, with all their great qualities, are really made.

In contrast, Dr. Muck has the objective temperament, an objective mind, and objective standards. No man of his eminence is more averse to personal exploitation. No conductor of his rank is less for himself or more for the work in hand. Dr. Muck, all fidelity to the

PHILADELPHIA, PA
OCT 29 1906

BOSTON'S FAMOUS ORCHESTRA NOW LED BY DR. KARL MUCK, ITS NEW CONDUCTOR

For Years Connected With Berlin Royal Opera House, He Occupies High Place in World of Music.

Under His Direction Famous Aggregation From the Hub Has Reached Higher Standard Than it Held in Years.

By William R. Lester

WHEN the Boston Orchestra opens its season here, on November 5, another conductor will be seen in place of Gericke, the "faultily faultless, icily regular."

He is Karl Muck, of Berlin, son of a Councilor, Heidelberg University graduate and musical pupil at Leipsic of Richter and Reinecke.

Dr. Muck has been conductor at the Berlin Royal Opera House since 1892, having attained that high distinction when but 33 years old. The other conductor is Richard Strauss. Dr. Muck directs in Berlin the oratorio concerts of the Royal Opera Chorus and the concerts of the Wagner Society. Since 1894 he has been the conductor of the Silesian Music Festivals.

DR. CARL MUCK

As a guest he has conducted philharmonic concerts in St. Petersburg, Moscow, Copenhagen and Paris; in Bremen eight stage performances of Rubenstein's "Christus" (1895); concerts of the Royal Court Orchestra in Madrid and Budapest; and in London philharmonic concerts and performances of Wagner's music dramas in Covent Garden.

He conducted performances of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth in 1901, 1902, 1904 and 1906. In recent seasons he has been one of the conductors of the Vienna philharmonic concerts.

All this convincing show of primacy has a solid foundation, as appears from the admiring comment of the Boston press on Dr. Muck's handling of the big Boston band—an orchestral force capable of answering any and all artistic demands of the most exacting of conductors.

Under his direction, it appears, the ninety-six musicians play with extraordinary spirit, vitality, verve, fire and all that sort of thing. It is a novel experience for concertgoers at the Hub—the director is alive and not a mere human metronome. For the first time since Arthur Nikisch drifted away, Symphony Hall, in Boston, is resounding to the music of the future.

Almost boyish in his enthusiasm, Muck contemplates with delight the prospect of a tour of 125 concerts that might appal even the phlegmatic Thomas. He speaks no English at that.

But he draws a bank president's salary and loves his work—a fortunate collocation of affairs.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is already booked for one hundred and nine concerts this season, including twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, ten concerts in New York, and [illegible] in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Address

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been issued, shows that a total of 109 concerts have already been arranged for the present season. In this total are included the two special pension fund concerts in Boston and the special concert in honor of Saint-Saens, which will be given in Symphony Hall on next Tuesday evening, October 30, the distinguished French composer making his American debut in Boston. The first concert here will occur on Tuesday afternoon, November 6.

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
MONDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1906

The Symphony Concert

Muck's reading and the orchestra's playing of Brahms's symphony in C-minor transcended all else in the Symphony concert on Saturday night. Even Strauss's "Don Juan," which seemed less nervously and intensely played than it was on Friday, was tame for the moment in comparison. Nothing that Dr. Much has done since he came here, not even his performance of Beethoven's fifth symphony at the first concert, matched this re-creation of Brahms's music. His listeners heard it as they have never heard the symphony before. The familiar qualities that we have come now to know in Dr. Muck's conducting shone through it—a lucidity that disclosed every detail and every subtlety of development and yet adjusted each to its place in the whole musical design; an elasticity that gave a life and a freshness that were re-creating to almost every measure; a songful quality of tone, as the Germans say, that changed the slow movement, parts of the first allegro and the noted transition into the finale with a very deep and potent beauty; and a superb sonority that lifted that finale into a mighty hymn. Greater and rarer qualities than these went besides, into the performance. Dr. Muck saw and felt the music objectively, as he does all music, but the directness of his vision and the intensity of his feeling seemed to bring the very imaginings, the very emotion, with which Brahms wrote. Here was the exaltation of mood, idea and speech that are in the music; the high aloofness rising now to grandeur or content again with serener meditation; the power that is mighty because it is so calm and so sure; the weight of thought and the warmth of feeling as the thought takes life in the tones; and the sublimity—there is no milder word—that the symphony becomes at moments when a conductor and orchestra so rear it before the ears, the imagination and the emotions of their hearers. The structure and the beauty of the performance followed the thought and the passion—and greater—that it would express, positive utterance and

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address

Boston Orchestra's Concerts.

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been issued, shows that a total of 100 concerts have been arranged for the season. In this total are included the two special pension fund concerts in Boston and the special concert in honor of St. Saens, which will be given in Symphony Hall next Tuesday evening, the distinguished French composer making his American debut in Boston.

Twenty-four public rehearsals and 24 concerts will be given in Boston, 10 concerts in New York, 6 in Cambridge, 5 each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, 3 each in Hartford, Providence and Worcester, 2 in Portland, Maine, and 1 each in Rochester, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Bridgeport, Springfield, Poughkeepsie, Fitchburg and Northampton. It is probable that several more concerts will be arranged for the latter part of the season. The first concert here will be on Wednesday night, November 7.

TRAVELER,
OCTOBER 29, 1906.

BRAHMS, Strauss and Berlioz numbers made up the programme for the third Symphony concert, said programme being Brahms' C minor symphony, the Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan" and selections from "Damnation of Faust." It was an evening where the good things came first and came in such abundance as to fairly sweep the auditor off his feet. Dr. Muck's interpretation of the Brahms' symphony was a revelation even to the most ardent Brahms' enthusiast and must have brought hundreds of new worshippers to the foot of the throne. It not only polished up the old and well-recognized beauties until they assumed new lustre, but brought out heretofore hidden and unappreciated beauties until the whole number seemed simply wonderful. Small wonder indeed that the audience was carried away with enthusiasm and recalled and recalled Dr. Muck. After the concert Saturday night Dr. Muck will have to be placed in first place as a reader of Brahms. Nothing equal to it has been seen in this city.

Naturally enough, after such a feast the Strauss number seemed tame. Truth to tell, the orchestra did not seem to get as much out of the number as heretofore. But then, the exceptional rendering of the symphony had so stirred its hearers that perhaps they were not in quite the right frame of mind to thoroughly appreciate the lesser work. The magnetism of the opening selection still ruled.

Dr. Muck's reading of the Berlioz number was clearly his own. It was quite differnt from what we have heard and did not do the work full justice. But here again it was a case of the lesser following the greater and possibly suffering from the comparison.

ADVERTISER
OCTOBER 29, 1906

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.

Brahms. Symphony No. 1, C minor.
Strauss. Tone Poem. "Don Juan."
Berlioz. Minuet, Ballet of Sylphs and Rakoczy March, from "Damnation of Faust."

After Saturday's concert no one can doubt for an instant that Dr. Karl Muck, in certain schools, is as great as any conductor in the world. Nothing but superlatives can present to the reader the absolute triumph achieved by the reading of Brahms' C minor Symphony. One must bear in mind that this is the most intricate of the composer's four symphonies, that the first movement contains some of the subtlest figure development that exists in symphony. Yet, on this occasion, the work became clear, its coherency manifest, its beauty overwhelming.

For the time this intellectual composition swept all the other modern "tone-poets" out of sight. How futile Mahler's keyless musical stories seemed, or the figure jugglery of D'Indy, after such a feast! Not that one school of composition can abolish another, but many of the moderns only attempt what Brahms has entirely accomplished. We only wished that the programme-book contained D'Indy's recent attack on Germans in Music and that the second symphony of that composer might have followed as a practical commentary.

There was no soloist upon the programme, nor was one necessary. Dr. Muck is teaching us to appreciate orchestral music "per se." The interest was continuous from the very first measures, and the introduction to the symphony was authoritative even from its first notes.

The slow movement seemed less powerful than the other three, for this is the purely emotional part of a symphony, and in direct pathos or intensity of emotion Brahms is not the rival of a Tschaikowsky or a Grieg. Yet there is far more depth of feeling in the work than one would at first concede. The scherzo, the weakest movement, made greater effect than ever before.

But the great finale was the glory of the performance and of the concert. There were many new points of reading here. There was a different tempo in the pizzicato effects from that which we have had and the horn theme was made much broader.

The summing up at the end, where the salient points of the entire work pass in review, was inexpressibly powerful. Yet there was not the slightest eccentricity or sensationalism apparent in the reading; there was no effort to inject "personality" into the interpretation; there was simply a faithful, intelligent and poetic endeavor to make all the subtleties of the symphony clear. And the result was that the audience went fairly wild over the work.—and its conductor. Dr. Muck was recalled to the platform amid a frenzy of enthusiasm.

The rest of the concert was less remarkable. Even with the interval of corridor-promenading between, the Strauss work suffered by the giant power of the symphony. We may say, in parenthesis, that the placing of such an earnest work at the beginning of a programme is a distinct advantage, since the auditor comes unjaded to its complexities; yet the Gerickan idea that the effect of a masterpiece ought not to be disturbed by any following numbers, had also its confirmation by the comparative tepidity of the numbers which succeeded, although these were the most sensational of the programme.

The tone-picture of the amatory experimentalist, Don Juan, who is given over to wine, woman, but only occasionally to song, and who finally dies of paresis, was not done as perfectly as we have had it in the recent past.

The horns blew their theme till their lips were almost bleeding, and Mr. Longy played the beautiful love-theme on the oboe to perfection, but Hasheesh was not as attractive as usual after the healthy food of the first part of the feast.

Berlioz (like Bizet and Franck in other directions) is one of the French composers who has something to say. Like Richard Strauss he does not allow either sensationalism or complexity to be his sole object. Wagner's sneer that he "ciphered with notes" has long since been recognized as unjust. We have had some of the most perfect orchestral interpretations of Berlioz, in Boston, that can be imagined, and therefore the good execution of the three last numbers of the concert was by no means a revelation, in spite of very good performance. Compliments must be paid to the flute and piccolo (in the Mephisto theme of the minuet) to Mr. Schuecker's exquisite harp harmonics, and to the muted violin passages of the Ballet.

The Rakoczy march was well interpreted, yet we have heard more effect made with that final mysterious crescendo with its portentous bass-drum strokes. An extended crescendo with perfect gradation of power, such as is here demanded, is a most difficult thing to execute.

But as regards the force of the strong passages nothing was left to be desired. If the Hungarians played like that when they advanced to battle they were evidently not planning to surprise their enemies, for they would certainly attract notice some 10 miles away. But since Berlioz wanted this triumphal racket we suppose conductors must allow it to him.

Louis C. Elson.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
AMERICA

BOSTON'S FAMOUS ORCHESTRA NOW LED BY DR. KARL MUCK, ITS NEW CONDUCTOR

For Years Connected With Berlin Royal Opera House, He Occupies High Place in World of Music.

Under His Direction Famous Aggregation From the Hub Has Reached Higher Standard Than it Held in Years.

By William R. Lester

WHEN the Boston Orchestra opens its season here, on November 5, another conductor will be seen in place of Gericke, the "faultily faultless, icily regular."

He is Karl Muck, of Berlin, son of a Councilor, Heidelberg University graduate and musical pupil at Leipsic of Richter and Reinecke.

Dr. Muck has been conductor at the Berlin Royal Opera House since 1892, having attained that high distinction when but 33 years old. The other conductor is Richard Strauss. Dr. Muck directs in Berlin the oratorio concerts of the Royal Opera Chorus and the concerts of the Wagner Society. Since 1894 he has been the conductor of the Silesian Music Festivals.

DR. CARL MUCK

As a guest he has conducted philharmonic concerts in St. Petersburg, Moscow, Copenhagen and Paris; in Bremen eight stage performances of Rubenstein's "Christus" (1895); concerts of the Royal Court Orchestra in Madrid and Budapest; and in London philharmonic concerts and performances of Wagner's music dramas in Covent Garden.

He conducted performances of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth in 1901, 1902, 1904 and 1906. In recent seasons he has been one of the conductors of the Vienna philharmonic concerts.

All this convincing show of primacy has a solid foundation, as appears from the admiring comment of the Boston press on Dr. Muck's handling of the big Boston band—an orchestral force capable of answering any and all artistic demands of the most exacting of conductors.

Under his direction, it appears, the ninety-six musicians play with extraordinary spirit, vitality, verve, fire and all that sort of thing. It is a novel experience for concertgoers at the Hub—the director is alive and not a mere human metronome. For the first time since Arthur Nikisch drifted away, Symphony Hall, in Boston, is resounding to the music of the future.

Almost boyish in his enthusiasm, Muck contemplates with delight the prospect of a tour of 125 concerts that might appal even the phlegmatic Thomas. He speaks no English at that.

But he draws a bank president's salary and loves his work—a fortunate collocation of affairs.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is already booked for one hundred and nine concerts this season including twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, ten concerts in New York, and five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Address .....

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been issued, shows that a total of 109 concerts have already been arranged for the present season. In this total are included the two special pension fund concerts in Boston and the special concert in honor of Saint-Saens, which will be given in Symphony Hall on next Tuesday evening, October 30, the distinguished French composer making his American debut in Boston. The first concert here will occur on Tuesday afternoon, November 6.

Boston Transcript
224 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
MONDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1906

The Symphony Concert

Dr. Muck's reading and the orchestra's playing of Brahms's symphony in C-minor transcended all else in the Symphony concert on Saturday night. Even Strauss's "Don Juan," which seemed less nervously and intensely played than it was on Friday, was tame for the moment in comparison. Nothing that Dr. Much has done since he came here, not even his performance of Beethoven's fifth symphony at the first concert, matched this re-creation of Brahms's music. His listeners heard it as they have never heard the symphony before. The familiar qualities that we have come now to know in Dr. Muck's conducting shone through it—a lucidity that disclosed every detail and every subtlety of development and yet adjusted each to its place in the whole musical design; an elasticity that gave a life and a freshness that were re-creating to almost every measure; a songful quality of tone, as the Germans say, that changed the slow movement, parts of the first allegro and the noted transition into the finale with a very deep and potent beauty; and a superb sonority that lifted that finale into a mighty hymn. Greater and rarer qualities than these went besides, into the performance. Dr. Muck saw and felt the music objectively, as he does all music, but the directness of his vision and the intensity of his feeling seemed to bring the very imaginings, the very emotion, with which Brahms wrote. Here was the exaltation of mood, idea and speech that are in the music; the high aloofness rising now to grandeur or content again with serener meditation; the power that is mighty because it is so calm and so sure; the weight of thought and the warmth of feeling as the thought takes life in the tones; and the sublimity—there is no milder word—that the symphony touches at moments when a conductor and his men so rear it before the ears, the minds and the emotions of their hearers. The power and the beauty of the performance matched the thought and the passion—at its purest and whitest—that it would express. The fusion of matter, utterance and [illegible] was complete. The symphony be[illegible] and an epic that had

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...ess .....

Boston Orchestra's Concerts.

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been issued, shows that a total of 109 concerts have been arranged for the season. In this total are included the two special pension fund concerts in Boston and the special concert in honor of St. Saens, which will be given in Symphony Hall next Tuesday evening, the distinguished French composer making his American debut in Boston.

Twenty-four public rehearsals and 24 concerts will be given in Boston, 10 concerts in New York, 6 in Cambridge, 5 each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, 3 each in Hartford, Providence and Worcester, 2 in Portland, Maine, and 1 each in Rochester, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Bridgeport, Springfield, Poughkeepsie, Fitchburg and Northampton. It is probable that several more concerts will be arranged for the latter part of the season. The first concert here will be on Wednesday night, November 7.

TRAVELER, OCTOBER 29, 1906.

BRAHMS, Strauss and Berlioz numbers made up the programme for the third Symphony concert, said programme being Brahms' C minor symphony, the Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan" and selections from "Damnation of Faust." It was an evening where the good things came first and came in such abundance as to fairly sweep the auditor off his feet. Dr. Muck's interpretation of the Brahms' symphony was a revelation even to the most ardent Brahms' enthusiast and must have brought hundreds of new worshippers to the foot of the throne. It not only polished up the old and well-recognized beauties until they assumed new lustre, but brought out heretofore hidden and unappreciated beauties until the whole number seemed simply wonderful. Small wonder indeed that the audience was carried away with enthusiasm and recalled and recalled Dr. Muck. After the concert Saturday night Dr. Muck will have to be placed in first place as a reader of Brahms. Nothing equal to it has been seen in this city.

Naturally enough, after such a feast the Strauss number seemed tame. Truth to tell, the orchestra did not seem to get as much out of the number as heretofore. But then, the exceptional rendering of the symphony had so stirred its hearers that perhaps they were not in quite the right frame of mind to thoroughly appreciate the lesser work. The magnetism of the opening selection still ruled.

Dr. Muck's reading of the Berlioz number was clearly his own. It was quite differnt from what we have heard and did not do the work full justice. But here again it was a case of the lesser following the greater and possibly suffering from the comparison.

ADVERTISER, OCTOBER 29, 1906

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.

Brahms. Symphony No. 1, C minor.
Strauss. Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Berlioz. Minuet, Ballet of Sylphs and Rakoczy March, from "Damnation of Faust."

After Saturday's concert no one can doubt for an instant that Dr. Karl Muck, in certain schools, is as great as any conductor in the world. Nothing but superlatives can present to the reader the absolute triumph achieved by the reading of Brahms' C minor Symphony. One must bear in mind that this is the most intricate of the composer's four symphonies, that the first movement contains some of the subtlest figure development that exists in symphony. Yet, on this occasion, the work became clear, its coherency manifest, its beauty overwhelming.

For the time this intellectual composition swept all the other modern "tone-poets" out of sight. How futile Mahler's keyless musical stories seemed, or the figure jugglery of D'Indy, after such a feast! Not that one school of composition can abolish another, but many of the moderns only attempt what Brahms has entirely accomplished. We only wished that the programme-book contained D'Indy's recent attack on Germans in Music and that the second symphony of that composer might have followed as a practical commentary.

There was no soloist upon the programme, nor was one necessary. Dr. Muck is teaching us to appreciate orchestral music "per se." The interest was continuous from the very first measures, and the introduction to the symphony was authoritative even from its first notes.

The slow movement seemed less powerful than the other three, for this is the purely emotional part of a symphony, and in direct pathos or intensity of emotion Brahms is not the rival of a Tschaikowsky or a Grieg. Yet there is far more depth of feeling in the work than one would at first concede. The scherzo, the weakest movement, made greater effect than ever before.

But the great finale was the glory of the performance and of the concert. There were many new points of reading here. There was a different tempo in the pizzicato effects from that which we have had and the horn theme was made much broader.

The summing up at the end, where the salient points of the entire work pass in review, was inexpressibly powerful. Yet there was not the slightest eccentricity or sensationalism apparent in the reading; there was no effort to inject "personality" into the interpretation; there was simply a faithful, intelligent and poetic endeavor to make all the subtleties of the symphony clear. And the result was that the audience went fairly wild over the work,—and its conductor. Dr. Muck was recalled to the platform amid a frenzy of enthusiasm.

The rest of the concert was less remarkable. Even with the interval of corridor-promenading between, the Strauss work suffered by the giant power of the symphony. We may say, in parenthesis, that the placing of such an earnest work at the beginning of a programme is a distinct advantage, since the auditor comes unjaded to its complexities; yet the Gerickan idea that the effect of a masterpiece ought not to be disturbed by any following numbers, had also its confirmation by the comparative tepidity of the numbers which succeeded, although these were the most sensational of the programme.

The tone-picture of the amatory experimentalist, Don Juan, who is given over to wine, woman, but only occasionally to song, and who finally dies of paresis, was not done as perfectly as we have had it in the recent past.

The horns blew their theme till their lips were almost bleeding, and Mr. Longy played the beautiful love-theme on the oboe to perfection, but Hasheesh was not as attractive as usual after the healthy food of the first part of the feast.

Berlioz (like Bizet and Franck in other directions) is one of the French composers who has something to say. Like Richard Strauss he does not allow either sensationalism or complexity to be his sole object. Wagner's sneer that he "ciphered with notes" has long since been recognized as unjust. We have had some of the most perfect orchestral interpretations of Berlioz in Boston, that can be imagined, and therefore the good execution of the three last numbers of the concert was by no means a revelation, in spite of very good performance. Compliments must be paid to the flute and piccolo (in the Mephisto theme of the minuet) to Mr. Schuecker's exquisite harp harmonics, and to the muted violin passages of the Ballet.

The Rakoczy march was well interpreted, yet we have heard more effect made with that final mysterious crescendo with its portentous bass-drum strokes. An extended crescendo with perfect gradation of power, such as is here demanded, is a most difficult thing to execute.

But as regards the force of the strong passages nothing was left to be desired. If the Hungarians played like that when they advanced to battle they were evidently not planning to surprise their enemies, for they would certainly attract notice some 10 miles away. But since Berlioz wanted this triumphal racket we suppose conductors must allow it to him.

Louis C. Elson.

BRAHMS' BEAUTIES SHOWN BY DR. MUCK

Symphony Auditors Treated to a Positive Revelation by Magic of Famed Conductor.

The third Symphony concert proved the mettle of Conductor Muck in an entirely new and fascinating way. For it was as an interpreter of Brahms that he suddenly flashed out as the one of most brilliant musical lights Boston has ever known. He took the "austere," the "crabbed," the "unlovely"—such are the words of the Brahmsophobes—first Symphony, and made it rich, glowing, poetic, thrilling. Even the opening movement, which is on the whole long-winded and severely intellectual, was read with such beautiful clarity, such skilful contrasting of what color effects there were inherent, that it was not only not tedious, but eminently a thing to like. No less fine were the readings of the second and third movements, but the crowning glory was the finale, which Dr. Muck made so full of fire, so eloquent with tremendous crescendos, so steadily working to the last splendidly sonorous climax, that the most hardened habitues of Symphony Hall on Saturday evenings were carried away with the excitement and made to rub their eyes when it was all over and ask themselves if this were really Brahms. However, preconceived theories vanished completely against the great fact that one of the most overwhelming musical effects Boston has known had just been produced.

From that point the interest declined. Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" actually suffered after the Brahms revelation. With all its amazing uproar, its rich ornamentation and its purple tones, it seemed empty of ideas for once. It was read and played with much skill, but not with superlative power or poetry, which was rather surprising, as Dr. Muck was thought to be a great interpreter of the Strauss idea.

The performance of the Berlioz "Damnation of Faust" excerpa was brilliant, yet not altogether truthful. For instance, the will-o'-the-wisps made an unnatural amount of noise in their minuet, which was turned into a showpiece for orchestral fireworks. The famous march went with fine swing and fervor.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
OCTOBER 30, 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTETTE

The first concert by the Symphony Quartette for the season, was heard last evening in Chickering Hall. Mr. Heinrich Gebhard was the assisting artist. The members of the quartette, Prof. Willy Hess, Mr. Otto Roth, Mr. Emile Ferir and Mr. Heinrich Warnke, are the same as last season. The Symphony Quartette since its inception has been associated with Jordan Hall, but there is evidently enough of the nomad among its members to occasionally spur them to "want to move," and in consequence, Chickering Hall will harbor them until that spirit is again made manifest.

The evening's programme brought in effective contrast, Bohemian, German and French compositions. Josef Suk, Schubert and Cæsar Franck sharing the honors. Josef Suk, a Bohemian, whose B-flat major quartette was the first programme number, has been for many years second violin in the celebrated Bohemian string quartette. He first studied with his father, who was an excellent musician; afterwards attended the Prague Conservatory, graduating from it as a pupil of Dvorak, who, not content with being his instructor, later became his father-in-law. Suk has written a symphony, much chamber music and compositions for piano and voice. His suite, "A Fairy Tale," was played here in 1902 by the Symphony Orchestra. The first movement of the quartette, more involved in treatment, was least understood at first hearing than the other three. The Intermezzo, crisp and concise, with much charming and skilful treatment, was followed by An Adagio, full of lyric beauty.

The last movement "Allegro giocoso" made a fit climax to the whole. Suk's music is leniently human, as is the Russian, which the Bohemian closely resembles. Its merrymaking suggests peasant dances, and through it all is a tinge of sombreness. Mr. Suk is one of the gifted present day composers, although having been a disciple of Dvorak, his work now rests wholly upon its own merit.

The manscript of Schubert's unfinished quartette, written in 1820, which consists of but the first movement, opening with a beautiful melody for violin, was in the possession of Brahms up to the time it was published in 1868. It was played for the first time in Boston by the Kneisels in the season of 1890-91.

The special feature of the evening was Caesar Franck's quintette, with Mr. Gebhard at the piano. It is interesting to know that, at its first hearing in Paris, in 1880, Saint Saens, who is about to visit with us, was the pianist. This quintette in F minor, one of Franck's best known compositions, is by present day critics considered one of the noblest pieces of chamber music. This sweeping commendation would have meant much to Franck at an earlier time, when his genius—though ripe enough to produce such a work—was struggling for recognition.

In the Lento are haunting reminders of the melody in Franck's sonata for piano and violin (1st movement), which resemblance is drowned in the crashing chords that follow, however. The quintette does not allow for a display of piano virtuocisity—a background—if massive chord work and subdued arpeggio seem to prove its mission on this occasion to be a "filling in" rather than a "showing off."

It is needless to cite Mr. Gebhard's artistic qualifications; he is, without question, one of finest most respected pianists, and his ensemble playing is of the highest [illegible]

Chickering Hall: The Symphony [illegible]

The Boston Symphony Quartet [illegible] first concert of the season last night in Chickering Hall, with the following programme:

Quartet in B-flat major, Op. 11.....Josef Suk
Quartet movement in C minor.....Schubert
Quintet for piano and strings.....César Franck
Piano, Mr. Heinrich Gebhard.

Josef Suk, the second violin of the famous Bohemian Quartet, pupil and son-in-law of the late Antonin Dvorak, is a young composer of some versatility, having tried his hand at a piano quartet, a piano trio, a serenade for strings, a dramatic overture, an overture to Shakspeare's "The Winter's Tale," suites for piano, choruses for men's voices and mixed voices, in addition to the symphony and suite given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His latest work is a eulogy of Prague in symphonic poem form; there are themes typical of the city in interpretation of the prophecy of Libussa, the first Bohemian princess, of the affection and pride which the inhabitants of Prague feel for their city, of Prague ravaged by the Hussite wars, and finally of the smiling metropolis when peace and prosperity are once more with her. All this reminds one of Mr. Joseph Bennett's analysis of Elgar's overture, "Cockaigne." Suk's string quartet introduced here by the Adamowski Quartet Dec. 22, 1903, is pleasant, agreeable music, in which the influence of his teacher is frequently apparent. The workmanship is excellent, but the music for the most part is prettily conventional and unoriginal, rising to its greatest height of sentiment and beauty in the slow movement. The performance, in spite of occasional trifling uncertainties in the ensemble, was admirable.

The Schubert movement, a fragment of an unfinished quartet, might undoubtedly possess interest to the Schubert enthusiast, especially on account of a slight passing reminiscence in the second theme from the slow movement of Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, an avowed favorite with the younger master, but its intrinsic merit hardly warrants a place upon the programme except in the guise of an intermezzo between more important works. It was played, nevertheless, with exquisite finish.

César Franck's quintet was played for the sixth time in this city, the previous pianists have been Mr. Aimé Lachaume, Mr. Harold Bauer (twice), Mr. Felix Fox and Mr. Feruccio Busoni. This quintet requires no analysis of its qualities, no argument to point out the solidity, grace of outline, and unity of its construction, to convince one of the human eloquence, the exalted spirituality or the poignant melancholy of its voices, to prepare the listener alike for the rare beauty and individual character of its melody, the idiomatic and striking harmonic treatment, or for the intense dramatic feeling which characterizes the whole. The product of the master's ripest style, it has only needed performance to assure it a secure position in that immortal list of the greatest chamber music. It is not a simple matter to interpret César Franck. Indisputably Gallic in his artistic principles and personal standpoint, he is quintessentially Gallic in his chamber-music, the standpoint of which is totally different from the Teutonic. The French conception of chamber music style demands the dramatic instinct, a different order of ensemble, a more emotional atmosphere, and in the case of Franck that lofty mysticism which is often the logical outcome of a sensuous temperament. It is not derogatory to the artistic intelligence of Professor Hess and his associates to assert that for a complete interpretation of this work the performers must possess more than versatility, more than breadth of view, more than faculty for assimilation, they must have an instinctive predelection for the French style. César Franck, in common with other great men, is universal, but he is also distinctively French. To recreate his individuality, to utter his personal message is a task for the initiated. The performance of the quintet showed evident sincerity, patient devotion, and there were moments of undeniable effectiveness, but on the whole there was an approximation of the spirit rather than a reproduction of it. But inasmuch as inborn temperament and environment are the chief elements in a sympathetic interpretation, it is highly creditable to Professor Hess and his quartet that they were so far in accord with the sentiment of the composer.

Mr. Gebhard has a deservedly high reputation as a pianist in recital and with orchestra, but his choice of the César Franck quintet of necessity forces comparison with the interpretation of other pianists. Meritorious as his performance was in many respects, he did not always convince that his interpretation was authentic. He does not seem at home in the Franckian idiom. He showed due appreciation of contrasts, of the dramatic feeling so palpably in evidence, but he did not enthrall the imagination, he did not show Franck the mystic, absorbed in his dream of unearthly beauty, oblivious to worldy glory. His sense of ensemble, lapsed at intervals, his tone did not always blend harmoniously with the strings. Long reflection and patient meditation are necessary to do justice to this singularly noble work. There must be intellectual maturity as well as the technical ease which Mr. Gebhard now possesses. He was at his best in the first movement in which his sense of dramatic climax had fullest opportunity.

E. B. H.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wo

m

ress

te

N. Y. EVG WO

NOV 3 - 1906

[illegible] The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, gives its first concert of the season in New York at [illegible] Thursday evening, and repeats it on Saturday afternoon.

TUESDAY, OCT. 30, 1906.

Symphony Quartet Concert.

The Boston Symphony Quartet (Messrs. Hess, Roth, Ferir, Warnke) gave its first concert this season last night in Chickering Hall. Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, pianist, assisted. The programme was as follows: Suk's quartet in B flat major, op. 11; Schubert's quartet-Satz in C minor (op. posth.); Cesar Franck's piano quintet in F minor.

Suk's work was composed for the Bohemian Quartet, of which he is the second violinist. A Bohemian by birth and education, a son-in-law of Dvorak, who taught him composition, he naturally wrote in the Bohemian spirit, proud of his country, unlike certain Italians, who, when they attempt to compose music in a serious form, deny their birthright and look for inspiration, but in vain, across the Alps.

The first movement is fresh and attractive. There is varied and interesting thematic presentation, rather than deep thought or uncommon skill, in the development of the themes. The intermezzo is piquant, and the adagio, the most ambitiously emotional portion of the work, rises to intensity in rhapsodic manner. The finale is national in spirit, but not perfunctorily so. The quartet was produced here by the Adamowskis, Dec. 22, 1903.

Schubert's fragment, which was probably written when he was 17 years old, and Franck's quintet were more familiar to the audience. The former is played usually as a "filler," in place of a more important work that would lengthen unduly the programme. The latter is one of the chief glories of chamber music. In depth of emotion, in its mixture of towering sublimity and intimate human expression, it is approached only by the later chamber music of Beethoven. Mr. Gebhard, the pianist, was in sympathy with his associates and the composer.

The Symphony quartet began a season that promises much enjoyment. Several new works of interest will be produced and both the classic and romantic schools will be well represented. The quartet's ensemble steadily improves under the intelligent and enthusiastic leadership of Mr. Hess. Last evening's audience was of good size, and showed keen appreciation of both programme and performance. The second concert will be on Monday evening, Nov. 19.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the W

n

ress

e

The first of a series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give at the Lyric during the present season will take place next Wednesday evening, November 7, at 8:15 o'clock. Interest in these concerts has never run so high at it has this year, and its practical manifestation has been found in the largest subscription sale that the orchestra has ever enjoyed in Baltimore. This is due partly, of course, to the fact that at two of the concerts such supreme artists as Paderewski and Melba will be the soloists, but it may mainly be attributed to the presence of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who comes to America this year on a special leave of absence from the German Emperor to conduct Boston's great orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n

ress

The only new conductor we shall be called upon to judge is Dr. Muck, the leader, for a year, of the Boston Orchestra. Though one of the "Parsifal" pilots at Bayreuth for a number of years, Dr. Muck is understood to be rather conservative and unemotional. He will thus serve as a foil to the fiery Safonoff, who is to conduct the Philharmonic Society for three years. Mr. Safonoff, however, is by no means always ablaze, or suggestive of the impetuous Cossack; he knows when calmness is called for.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

LOBE

ess

N. YORK COMMERCIAL

NOV 2 - 1906

Musical Notes.

DR. KARL MUCK of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has made known the programmes which he will conduct at the Boston band's first pair of concerts in New York this season, when he will make his local début as a conductor and be, so to say, his own soloist. Next Thursday night he will present the programme that he chose for his Boston début — Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Wagner's "Faust Overture," "Siegfried Idyl," and "Meistersinger" prelude. The following Saturday afternoon he will conduct Brahms's First Symphony, Weber's overture to "Oberon," Richard Strauss's "Don Juan," and Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz."

Here in Boston

Dr. Muck makes his first appearance in New York as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, next Thursday evening and the following Saturday afternoon. At the first of the two concerts, he will repeat the programme that he made for his début here—Beethoven's fifth symphony, and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," "A Siegfried Idyl" and a "Faust" overture out of Wagner. At the second concert, he takes Brahms's first symphony and Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan," out of his programme here last week, and adds to them Weber's overtures to his operas, "Der Freischütz" and "Oberon." The two symphonies will disclose Dr. Muck's amplest and finest powers as a conductor, and by the compositions from Wagner and by Strauss's tone-poem, New York may judge his feeling and capacity for the music of our own generation.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Brooklyn, N.

The orchestral season of 1906-1907 will open on next Friday evening, Nov. 9, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its first visit of the year to Brooklyn and gives its concert in the Baptist Temple. Interest in the coming series of concerts is running higher than it has in many years, and it has found practical manifestation in an extremely large subscription sale for the series. Undoubtedly this increase may be attributed to the presence, as conductor of the orchestra, of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who has come to this country to be at the head of the orchestra for the present season, through special permission given him by the German Emperor.

If it was true early in the season to say that the coming of Dr. Muck was to be regarded as the most important feature of the present musical season, it is still more so to-day, after he has conducted four programmes in Boston and shown his quality as a musician, as a scholar and as a man. Boston has unquestionably the most conservative musical public in this country, a public which has its training in the twenty-five years of concerts its orchestra has given. It has become almost a tradition that nothing can arouse a Symphony audience in that city to wilder enthusiasm than that which finds its expression in the polite tapping together of hands. This is one of the several traditions which Dr. Muck broke on his first appearance there on Friday evening, Oct. 12, and Saturday evening, Oct. 13.

At both of these performances, at the finish of Beethoven's C minor symphony, he was roundly cheered. And again, the following week, his performance of the Haydn Symphony roused enthusiasm to a pitch which usually comes only from the highly emotional music of modern composers. And this again was repeated at the third concert, after the performance of Brahms' C minor symphony, which is to be played here in Brooklyn, the conviction having been generally expressed in Boston that for the first time they were realizing what Brahms meant. Dr. Muck, to use the vernacular, has "made good" in every sense of the word.

So far in his programme Dr. Muck has not ventured far from the beaten path, thinking it best to get thoroughly en rapport with his men before venturing into the realm of the highly colored music of to-day. His programme for Brooklyn contains nothing new, but it is promised that the familiar works will be presented in a new way. The programme is as follows: Brahms, Symphony in C Minor, No. 1; Weber, Overture to "Oberon"; Richard Strauss, Tone-Poem "Don Juan"; Weber, Overture to Der Freischuetz.

The first of a series of five recitals or the Philharmonic programmes as given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is to take place on Wednesday afternoon, at 4 o'clock, at Association Hall. The programme interpreted will be that of the first concert, on Friday evening next, with William J. Henderson, music editor of the New York "Sun," as lecturer, and Mme. Stoffregen, as pianist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

The first of a series of five lecture recitals on the Philharmonic programmes as given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is to take place on Wednesday afternoon, at 4 o'clock, at Association Hall. The programme interpreted will be that of the first concert, on Friday evening next, with William J. Henderson, music editor of the New York Sun, as lecturer, and Mme. Stoffregen as pianist.

[48]

The Boston Journal
OCTOBER 29, 1906.

BRAHMS' BEAUTIES SHOWN BY DR. MUCK

Symphony Auditors Treated to a Positive Revelation by Magic of Famed Conductor.

The third Symphony concert proved the mettle of Conductor Muck in an entirely new and fascinating way. For it was as an interpreter of Brahms that he suddenly flashed out as the one of most brilliant musical lights Boston has ever known. He took the "austere," the "crabbed," the "unlovely"—such are the words of the Brahmsophobes—first Symphony, and made it rich, glowing, poetic, thrilling. Even the opening movement, which is on the whole long-winded and severely intellectual, was read with such beautiful clarity, such skilful contrasting of what color effects there were inherent, that it was not only not tedious, but eminently a thing to like. No less fine were the readings of the second and third movements, but the crowning glory was the finale, which Dr. Muck made so full of fire, so eloquent with tremendous crescendos, so steadily working to the last splendidly sonorous climax, that the most hardened habitues of Symphony Hall on Saturday evenings were carried away with the excitement and made to rub their eyes when it was all over and ask themselves if this were really Brahms. However, preconceived theories vanished completely against the great fact that one of the most overwhelming musical effects Boston has known had just been produced.

From that point the interest declined. Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" actually suffered after the Brahms revelation. With all its amazing uproar, its rich ornamentation and its purple tones, it seemed empty of ideas for once. It was read and played with much skill, but not with superlative power or poetry, which was rather surprising, as Dr. Muck was thought to be a great interpreter of the Strauss idea.

The performance of the Berlioz "Damnation of Faust" excerpt was brilliant, yet not altogether truthful. For instance, the will-o'-the-wisps made an unnatural amount of noise in their minuet, which was turned into a showpiece for orchestral fireworks. The famous march went with fine swing and fervor.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
OCTOBER 30, 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTETTE

The first concert by the Symphony Quartette for the season, was heard last evening in Chickering Hall. Mr. Heinrich Gebhard was the assisting artist. The members of the quartette, Prof. Willy Hess, Mr. Otto Roth, Mr. Emile Ferir and Mr. Heinrich Warnke, are the same as last season. The Symphony Quartette since its inception has been associated with Jordan Hall, but there is evidently enough of the nomad among its members to occasionally spur them to "want to move," and in consequence, Chickering Hall will harbor them until that spirit is again made manifest.

The evening's programme brought in effective contrast, Bohemian, German and French compositions. Josef Suk, Schubert and Caesar Franck sharing the honors. Josef Suk, a Bohemian, whose B-flat major quartette was the first programme number, has been for many years second violin in the celebrated Bohemian string quartette. He first studied with his father, who was an excellent musician; afterwards attended the Prague Conservatory, graduating from it as a pupil of Dvorak, who, not content with being his instructor, later became his father-in-law. Suk has written a symphony, much chamber music and compositions for piano and voice. His suite, "A Fairy Tale," was played here in 1902 by the Symphony Orchestra. The first movement of the quartette, more involved in treatment, was least understood at first hearing than the other three. The Intermezzo, crisp and concise, with much charming and skilful treatment, was followed by An Adagio, full of lyric beauty.

The last movement "Allegro giocoso" made a fit climax to the whole. Suk's music is leniently human, as is the Russian, which the Bohemian closely resembles. Its merrymaking sugggests peasant dances, and through it all is a tinge of sombreness. Mr. Suk is one of the gifted present day composers, although having been a disciple of Dvorak, his work now rests wholly upon its own merit.

The manscript of Schubert's unfinished quartette, written in 1820, which consists of but the first movement, opening with a beautiful melody for violin, was in the possession of Brahms up to the time it was published in 1868. It was played for the first time in Boston by the Kneisels in the season of 1890-91.

The special feature of the evening was Caesar Franck's quintette, with Mr. Gebhard at the piano. It is interesting to know that, at its first hearing in Paris, in 1880, Saint Saens, who is about to visit with us, was the pianist. This quintette in F minor, one of Franck's best known compositions, is by present day critics considered one of the noblest pieces of chamber music. This sweeping commendation would have meant much to Franck at an earlier time, when his genius—though ripe enough to produce such a work—was struggling for recognition.

In the Lento are haunting reminders of the melody in Franck's sonata for piano and violin (1st movement), which resemblance is drowned in the crashing chords that follow, however. The quintette does not allow for a display of piano virtuocisity—a background—if massive chord work and subdued arpeggio seem to prove its mission on this occasion to be a "filling in" rather than a "showing off."

It is needless to cite Mr. Gebhard's artistic qualifications; he is, without question, one of finest most respected pianists, and his ensemble playing is of the highest order. His musical playing, balance of tone and appreciation of parts was most

J. K. H.

TRANSCRIPT,
OCTOBER 30, 1906

Chickering Hall: The Symphony Quartet

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave its first concert of the season last night in Chickering Hall, with the following programme:

Quartet in B-flat major, Op. 11.....Josef Suk
Quartet movement in C minor.....Schubert
Quintet for piano and strings.....César Franck
Piano, Mr. Heinrich Gebhard.

Josef Suk, the second violin of the famous Bohemian Quartet, pupil and son-in-law of the late Antonin Dvorak, is a young composer of some versatility, having tried his hand at a piano quartet, a piano trio, a serenade for strings, a dramatic overture, an overture to Shakspeare's "The Winter's Tale," suites for piano, choruses for men's voices and mixed voices, in addition to the symphony and suite given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His latest work is a eulogy of Prague in symphonic poem form; there are themes typical of the city in interpretation of the prophecy of Libussa, the first Bohemian princess, of the affection and pride which the inhabitants of Prague feel for their city, of Prague ravaged by the Hussite wars, and finally of the smiling metropolis when peace and prosperity are once more with her. All this reminds one of Mr. Joseph Bennett's analysis of Elgar's overture, "Cockaigne." Suk's string quartet introduced here by the Adamowski Quartet Dec. 22, 1903, is pleasant, agreeable music, in which the influence of his teacher is frequently apparent. The workmanship is excellent, but the music for the most part is prettily conventional and unoriginal, rising to its greatest height of sentiment and beauty in the slow movement. The performance, in spite of occasional trifling uncertainties in the ensemble, was admirable.

The Schubert movement, a fragment of an unfinished quartet, might undoubtedly possess interest to the Schubert enthusiast, especially on account of a slight passing reminiscence in the second theme from the slow movement of Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, an avowed favorite with the younger master, but its intrinsic merit hardly warrants a place upon the programme except in the guise of an intermezzo between more important works. It was played, nevertheless, with exquisite finish.

César Franck's quintet was played for the sixth time in this city, the previous pianists have been Mr. Aimé Lachaume, Mr. Harold Bauer (twice), Mr. Felix Fox and Mr. Feruccio Busoni. This quintet requires no analysis of its qualities, no argument to point out the solidity, grace of outline, and unity of its construction, to convince one of the human eloquence, the exalted spirituality or the poignant melancholy of its voices, to prepare the listener alike for the rare beauty and individual character of its melody, the idiomatic and striking harmonic treatment, or for the intense dramatic feeling which characterizes the whole. The product of the master's ripest style, it has only needed performance to assure it a secure position in that immortal list of the greatest chamber music. It is not a simple matter to interpret César Franck. Indisputably Gallic in his artistic principles and personal standpoint, he is quintessentially Gallic in his chamber-music, the standpoint of which is totally different from the Teutonic. The French conception of chamber music style demands the dramatic instinct, a different order of ensemble, a more emotional atmosphere, and in the case of Franck that lofty mysticism which is often the logical outcome of a sensuous temperament. It is not derogatory to the artistic intelligence of Professor Hess and his associates to assert that for a complete interpretation of this work the performers must possess more than versatility, more than breadth of view, more than faculty for assimilation, they must have an instinctive predelection for the French style. César Franck, in common with other great men, is universal, but he is also distinctively French. To recreate his individuality, to utter his personal message is a task for the initiated. The performance of the quintet showed evident sincerity, patient devotion, and there were moments of undeniable effectiveness, but on the whole there was an approximation of the spirit rather than a reproduction of it. But inasmuch as inborn temperament and environment are the chief elements in a sympathetic interpretation, it is highly creditable to Professor Hess and his quartet that they were so far in accord with the sentiment of the composer.

Mr. Gebhard has a deservedly high reputation as a pianist in recital and with orchestra, but his choice of the César Franck quintet of necessity forces comparison with the interpretation of other pianists. Meritorious as his performance was in many respects, he did not always convince that his interpretation was authentic. He does not seem at home in the Franckian idiom. He showed due appreciation of contrasts, of the dramatic feeling so palpably in evidence, but he did not enthrall the imagination, he did not show Franck the mystic, absorbed in his dream of unearthly beauty, oblivious to worldy glory. His sense of ensemble, lapsed at intervals, his tone did not always blend harmoniously with the strings. Long reflection and patient meditation are necessary to do justice to this singularly noble work. There must be intellectual maturity as well as the technical ease which Mr. Gebhard now possesses. He was at his best in the first movement in which his sense of dramatic climax had fullest opportunity.

E. B. H.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wc

m.....

ress.....

te.....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, gives its first concert of the season in New York at Carnegie Hall, next Thursday evening, repeating it on Saturday afternoon.

BOSTON HERALD
Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXX., No. 122.

TUESDAY, OCT. 30, 1906.

Symphony Quartet Concert.

The Boston Symphony Quartet (Messrs. Hess, Roth, Ferir, Warnke) gave its first concert this season last night in Chickering Hall. Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, pianist, assisted. The programme was as follows: Suk's quartet in B flat major, op. 11; Schubert's quartet-Satz in C minor (op. posth.); Cesar Franck's piano quintet in F minor.

Suk's work was composed for the Bohemian Quartet, of which he is the second violinist. A Bohemian by birth and education, a son-in-law of Dvorak, who taught him composition, he naturally wrote in the Bohemian spirit, proud of his country, unlike certain Italians, who, when they attempt to compose music in a serious form, deny their birthright and look for inspiration, but in vain, across the Alps.

The first movement is fresh and attractive. There is varied and interesting thematic presentation, rather than deep thought or uncommon skill, in the development of the themes. The intermezzo is piquant, and the adagio, the most ambitiously emotional portion of the work, rises to intensity in rhapsodic manner. The finale is national in spirit, but not perfunctorily so. The quartet was produced here by the Adamowskis, Dec. 22, 1903.

Schubert's fragment, which was probably written when he was 17 years old, and Franck's quintet were more familiar to the audience. The former is played usually as a "filler," in place of a more important work that would lengthen unduly the programme. The latter is one of the chief glories of chamber music. In depth of emotion, in its mixture of towering sublimity and intimate human expression, it is approached only by the later chamber music of Beethoven. Mr. Gebhard, the pianist, was in sympathy with his associates and the composer.

The Symphony quartet began a season that promises much enjoyment. Several new works of interest will be produced and both the classic and romantic schools will be well represented. The quartet's ensemble steadily improves under the intelligent and enthusiastic leadership of Mr. Hess. Last evening's audience was of good size, and showed keen appreciation of both programme and performance. The second concert will be on Monday evening, Nov. 19.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the W

n.....

ress.....

e.....

The first of a series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give at the Lyric during the present season will take place next Wednesday evening, November 7, at 8:15 o'clock. Interest in these concerts has never run so high at it has this year, and its practical manifestation has been found in the largest subscription sale that the orchestra has ever enjoyed in Baltimore. This is due partly, of course, to the fact that at two of the concerts such supreme artists as Paderewski and Melba will be the soloists, but it may mainly be attributed to the presence of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who comes to America this year on a special leave of absence from the German Emperor to conduct Boston's great orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n.....

ress.....

The only new conductor we shall be called upon to judge is Dr. Muck, the leader, for a year, of the Boston Orchestra. Though one of the "Parsifal" pilots at Bayreuth for a number of years, Dr. Muck is understood to be rather conservative and unemotional. He will thus serve as a foil to the fiery Safonoff, who is to conduct the Philharmonic Society for three years. Mr. Safonoff, however, is by no means always ablaze, or suggestive of the impetuous Cossack; he knows when calmness is called for.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess.....

Musical Notes.

DR. KARL MUCK of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has made known the programmes which he will conduct at the Boston band's first pair of concerts in New York this season, when he will make his local début as a conductor and be, so to say, his own soloist. Next Thursday night he will present the programme that he chose for his Boston début — Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Wagner's "Faust Overture," "Siegfried Idyl," and "Meistersinger" prelude. The following Saturday afternoon he will conduct Brahms's First Symphony, Weber's overture to "Oberon," Richard Strauss's "Don Juan," and Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz."

EVENING TRANSCRIPT
NOVEMBER 2, 1906

Here in Boston

Dr. Muck makes his first appearances in New York as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, next Thursday evening, and the following Saturday afternoon. At the first of the two concerts, he will repeat the programme that he made for his début here—Beethoven's fifth symphony, and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," "A Siegfried Idyl" and a "Faust" overture out of Wagner. At the second concert, he takes Brahms's first symphony and Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan," out of his programme here last week, and adds to them Weber's overtures to his operas, "Der Freischütz" and "Oberon." The two symphonies will disclose Dr. Muck's amplest and finest powers as a conductor, and by the compositions from Wagner and by Strauss's tone-poem, New York may judge his feeling and capacity for the music of our own generation.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss.....

The orchestral season of 1906-1907 will open on next Friday evening, Nov. 9, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its first visit of the year to Brooklyn and gives its concert in the Baptist Temple. Interest in the coming series of concerts is running higher than it has in many years, and it has found practical manifestation in an extremely large subscription sale for the series. Undoubtedly this increase may be attributed to the presence, as conductor of the orchestra, of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who has come to this country to be at the head of the orchestra for the present season, through special permission given him by the German Emperor.

If it was true early in the season to say that the coming of Dr. Muck was to be regarded as the most important feature of the present musical season, it is still more so to-day, after he has conducted four programmes in Boston and shown his quality as a musician, as a scholar and as a man. Boston has unquestionably the most conservative musical public in this country, a public which has its training in the twenty-five years of concerts its orchestra has given. It has become almost a tradition that nothing can arouse a Symphony audience in that city to wilder enthusiasm than that which finds its expression in the polite tapping together of hands. This is one of the several traditions which Dr. Muck broke on his first appearance there on Friday evening, Oct. 12, and Saturday evening, Oct. 13.

At both of these performances, at the finish of Beethoven's C minor symphony, he was roundly cheered. And again, the following week, his performance of the Haydn Symphony roused enthusiasm to a pitch which usually comes only from the highly emotional music of modern composers. And this again was repeated at the third concert, after the performance of Brahms' C minor symphony, which is to be played here in Brooklyn, the conviction having been generally expressed in Boston that for the first time they were realizing what Brahms meant. Dr. Muck, to use the vernacular, has "made good" in every sense of the word.

So far in his programme Dr. Muck has not ventured far from the beaten path, thinking it best to get thoroughly en rapport with his men before venturing into the realm of the highly colored music of to-day. His programme for Brooklyn contains nothing new, but it is promised that the familiar works will be presented in a new way. The programme is as follows: Brahms, Symphony in C Minor, No. 1; Weber, Overture to "Oberon"; Richard Strauss, Tone-Poem "Don Juan"; Weber, Overture to Der Freischuetz.

The first of a series of five recitals or the Philharmonic programmes as given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is to take place on Wednesday afternoon, at 4 o'clock, at Association Hall. The programme interpreted will be that of the first concert, on Friday evening next, with William J. Henderson, music editor of the New York "Sun," as lecturer, and Mme. Stoffregen, as pianist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From.....

Address.....

The first of a series of five lecture recitals on the Philharmonic programmes, as given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is to take place on Wednesday afternoon, at 4 o'clock, at Association Hall. The programme interpreted will be that of the first concert, on Friday evening next, with William J. Henderson, music editor of the New York Sun, as lecturer, and Mme. Stoffregen as pianist.

[48]

N. Y.

The orchestral season of 1906-1907, will open on next Friday evening, November 9, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its first visit of the year to Brooklyn and gives its concert in the Baptist Temple. Interest in the coming series of concerts is running higher than it has in many years and it has found practical manifestation in an extremely large subscription sale for the series. Undoubtedly this increase may be attributed to the presence, as conductor of the orchestra, of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who has come to this country to be at the head of the orchestra for the present season through special permission given him by the German Emperor. The impression he has already made in Boston promises to be a lasting one.

So far in his programmes, Dr. Muck has not ventured far from the beaten path, thinking it best to get thoroughly en rapport with his men before venturing into the realm of the highly colored music of to-day. His programme for Brooklyn contains nothing new but it is promised that the familiar works will be presented in a new way. The programme is as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 1.....Brahms
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Tone poem, "Don Juan".....Richard Strauss
Overture to "Der Freischuetz".....Weber

om N. Y. Ev'g Sun

dress

te

Dr. Carl Muck, who had agreed to yield his own new conductor's stick to Dr. Saint-Saëns before the wireless message from Newfoundland upset a Boston concert this week, is coming to town himself on Thursday as the next distinguished visitor of the year. Presently the two men will get together for another date in Boston. Dr. Muck has come from Germany under a release for one year of his Berlin Royal Opera contract. He is known to some Americans as a "Parsifal" conductor at Bayreuth.

No star but the new conductor will be seen on the Boston orchestra's return. His début, will be, as already announced, in the Beethoven and Wagner programme on Thursday night and the Brahms, Weber and Strauss on Saturday afternoon. The first bill, by the way, is a repetition of Muck's American début, when Mr. W. E. Walter wrote: "Boston audiences are not the most demonstrative in the world, but the new Symphony Hall now knows what cheers are at a symphony concert." The Carnegie Hall sale has already broken records for ten concerts here.

Brooklyn has the first of five Boston Symphony concerts on Friday next in the Baptist Temple. The music will be the Brahms symphony No. 1, Weber's "Oberon" overture and Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

s

BROOKLYN INSTITUTE NOTES.

First Philharmonic Concert and Opening Service—Illustrated Lectures Features of Weekly Calendar.

Musically, the week in Brooklyn Institute affairs is to be up to the high standard so far maintained during this season. The first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts under the joint auspices of the Broklyn Philharmonic Society and the Institute is to be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening. Dr. Karl Muck will direct in person and the evening's feature will be a musical reception to the distinguished leader. No soloist will be heard in this concert.

[illegible] in interest for the music

Tribune

[illegible]

As visitors to Boston know often to their sorrow, it is absolutely impossible to secure seats for the public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which are held on Friday afternoons and unless one speaks far ahead it is equally impossible to get any of the two-score seats for the Saturday evening concerts which are held out from the by the management for the benefit of who do not buy seats for the season. some condition now exists in Washington, where five concerts are given during the in the New National Theatre. Practically the entire theatre is sold out by subscription [illegible]

[illegible] YORK SUN

ss

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will take place at Mendelssohn Hall on November 9 at 8 P. M. The programme will consist of Suk's B flat quartet, which will be heard for the first time, Schubert's quartet movement in C minor and Franck's piano quintet. Heinrich Gebhard will be the pianist.

[49]

N. Y.

NOV 8 - 1906

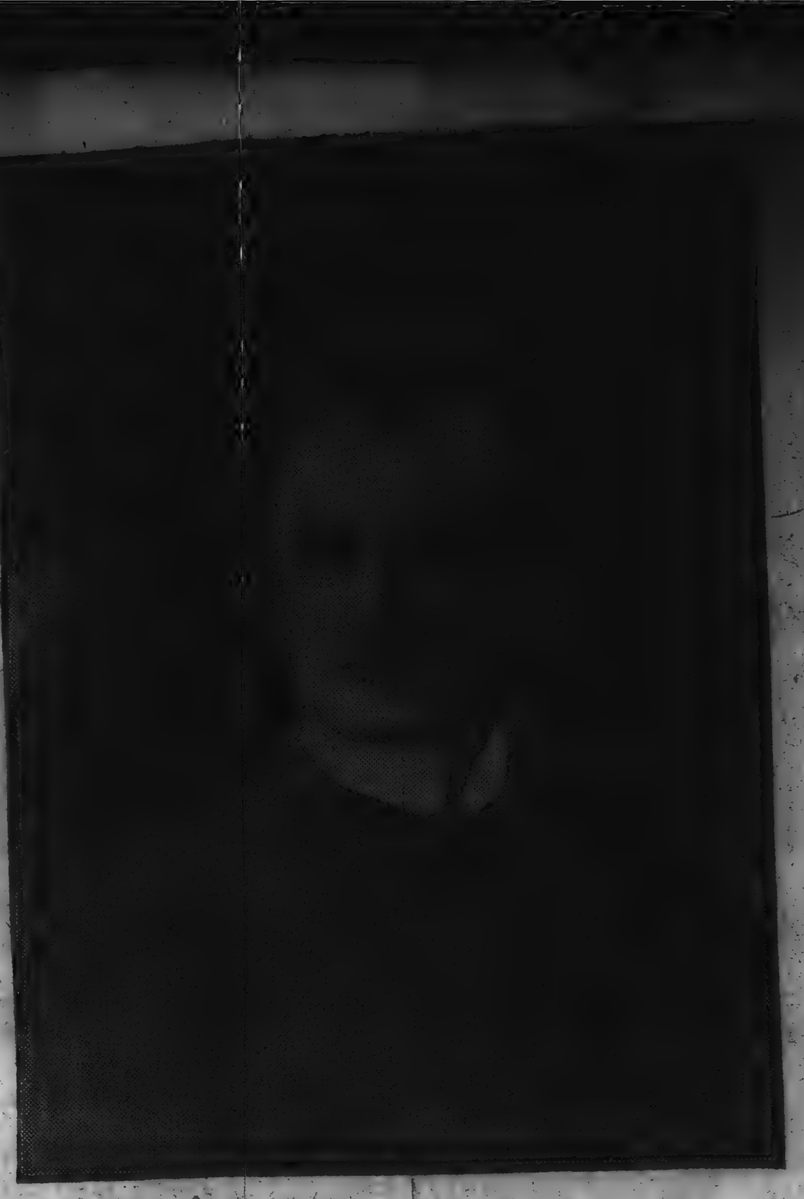
Brooklyn's first orchestral concert of the season will occur next Friday evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open their series here. The occasion will be marked by the appearance of a new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, concerning whose coming enough reference has been made to cause more than the usual anticipation of these concerts. Dr. Muck is of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and comes here for a season, through special permission of the German Emperor. In the prime of life, 47 years old, Dr. Muck is backed by a fine European record and reports from Boston state that he has made a fine impression there, where he appeared at the first concert of the season on October 12. Boston frankly admits that it is conservative. We are told that it has become almost a tradition that nothing can arouse a Symphony audience in that city to wilder enthusiasm than that which finds its expression in the polite tapping together of hands. This is one of the several traditions which Dr. Muck broke on his first appearance there on Friday evening, October 12, and Saturday evening, October 13. At both of these performances, at the finish of Beethoven's C minor Symphony, he was roundly cheered. And again, the following week, his performance of the Haydn Symphony roused enthusiasm to a pitch which usually comes from the highly emotional music of modern composers. And this again was repeated at the third concert, after the performance of Brahm's C minor Symphony, which is to be played here in Brooklyn, the conviction having been generally expressed in Boston that for the first time they were realizing what Brahms meant. To use the vernacular, Dr. Muck has "made good," we are told, in every sense of the word. Thus says Boston. So far in his programmes Dr. Muck has not ventured far from the beaten path, thinking it best to get thoroughly en rapport with his men before venturing into the realm of the highly colored music of to-day. His programme for Brooklyn contains nothing new, but it is promised that the familiar works will be presented in a new way. There will be no soloist at the opening concert here, orchestral music alone being permitted to make its own eloquent appeal. The programme is as follows: Brahms's Symphony in C Minor, No. 1, Weber Overture to Oberon, Richard Strauss' Tone-Poem Don Juan, Weber Overture to Der Freischuetz.

ss

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its first visit of the season to Brooklyn and gives its concert in the Baptist Temple next Friday evening. Interest in the coming series of concerts is running higher than it has in many years, and it has found practical manifestation in an extremely large subscription sale for the series. Undoubtedly this increase may be attributed to the presence, as conductor of the orchestra, of Dr. Karl Muck, in succession to Mr. Gericke.

Boston has unquestionably the most conservative musical public in this country, a public which has its training in the twenty-five years of concerts its orchestra has given. It has become almost a tradition that nothing can arouse a Symphony audience in that city to wilder enthusiasm than that which finds its expression in the polite tapping together of hands. This is one of the several traditions which Dr. Muck broke on his first appearance there on Friday evening, Oct. 12, and Saturday evening, Oct. 13. At both of these performances, at the finish of Beethoven's C minor Symphony, he was roundly cheered. And again, the following week, his performance of the Haydn Symphony roused enthusiasm which again was repeated at the third concert, after the performance of Brahms' C minor Symphony, which is to be played here in Brooklyn.

So far in his programmes Dr. Muck has not ventured far from the beaten path, thinking it best to get thoroughly en rapport with his men before venturing into the realm of the highly colored music of to-day. His programme for Brooklyn contains nothing new, but it is promised that the familiar works will be presented in a new way. The programme is as follows: Symphony in C minor, No. 1, Brahms; Overture to "Oberon," Weber; tone-poem, "Don Juan," Richard Strauss; Overture to "Der Freischuetz," Weber.



DR. KARL MUCK.
New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

s

ess

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, with Dr. Karl Muck making his New York debut as its conductor. Dr. Muck, who has secured a year's leave from the Berlin Royal Opera, has been warmly welcomed in Boston. There will be no soloist at either concert to divide honors with him. The programmes:

THURSDAY EVENING.
Symphony in C minor, No. 5....Beethoven
Eine Faust Overture.....Wagner
Siegfried Idyll.....Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg".....Wagner

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.
Symphony in C minor, No. 1.....Brahms
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Tone Poem "Don Juan".....R. Strauss
Overture to "Der Freischuts".....Weber

Besides Dr. Muck there will apparently be another important newcomer on the Boston Symphony platform—but only apparently, for the first violinist is still Prof. Willy Hess, although he has transformed his face by removing his beard. Good; a bearded concert master is not inspiring.

m

dress

te

The first of three concerts of chamber music by the Boston Symphony Quartet will take place next Friday afternoon, November 9, in Mendelssohn Hall. The quartet is the same as last year, Prof. Willy Hess being first violin, Otto Roth second, Emile Ferir viola and Heinrich Warnke violoncello. The four members have had daily rehearsal since September.

The pianist at the first concert will be Heinrich Gebhard, of Boston. The programme:

Quartet in B flat major, op. 11 (first time).....Josef Suk
Quartet satz in C minor, op. Posth.....Schubert
Quintet for piano and strings in F minor.....Franck

om NEW YORK SUN

dress

The first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 8, and Saturday afternoon, November 10. The soloist will be the new conductor, Carl Muck, or in other words there will be no soloist. The programme at the evening concert will be Beethoven's fifth symphony and three Wagner numbers—"Eine Faust" overture, "Siegfried Idyll" and "Meistersinger" prelude. On Saturday afternoon the orchestra will play Brahms's C minor symphony, Weber's "Oberon" overture, Strauss's "Don Juan" and Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz."

MUSICAL NEWS AND GOSSIP

Debut of Dr. Muck—Operatic Reform in Paris—Caruso's Record—Paris Concert Halls—Berlin Programmes—Talking Machines and Pianos

The first two Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These will be the introductory appearances in New York of Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, having come to America on a special leave of absence, granted him last spring by the German Emperor after a long series of negotiations. The Thursday programme includes Beethoven's fifth symphony and three Wagner numbers—the "Faust Overture," "Siegfried Idyll," and "Meistersinger" prelude. On Saturday the pieces will be the first Brahms symphony, Strauss's "Don Juan," and Weber's overtures to "Oberon" and "Freischütz."

From

Address

Date

The first two Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening at 8:15 o'clock and Saturday afternoon at 2:30 o'clock respectively. These will be the introductory appearances in New York of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, having come to America on a special leave of absence granted him last spring by the German Emperor after a long series of negotiations. As these concerts are planned primarily to introduce Dr. Muck to the New York patrons of the Boston Symphony, there will be no solo performer at either concert. The programme for Thursday night will be the same as that used by Dr. Muck for his first concert in Boston. It is as follows:

Symphony in C Minor, No. 5.....Beethoven
Eine Faust Overture.....Wagner
Siegfried Idyll.....Wagner
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner

The second programme—that for Saturday afternoon—is as follows:

Symphony in C Minor, No. 1.....Brahms
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Tone Poem, "Don Juan".....R. Strauss
Overture to "Der Freischütz".....Weber

The orchestral season of 1906-1907, will open on next Friday evening, November 9, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its first visit of the year to Brooklyn and gives its concert in the Baptist Temple. Interest in the coming series of concerts is running higher than it has in many years and it has found practical manifestation in an extremely large subscription sale for the series. Undoubtedly this increase may be attributed to the presence, as conductor of the orchestra, of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who has come to this country to be at the head of the orchestra for the present season through special permission given him by the German Emperor. The impression he has already made in Boston promises to be a lasting one.

So far in his programmes, Dr. Muck has not ventured far from the beaten path, thinking it best to get thoroughly en rapport with his men before venturing into the realm of the highly colored music of to-day. His programme for Brooklyn contains nothing new but it is promised that the familiar works will be presented in a new way. The programme is as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 1.....Brahms
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Tone poem, "Don Juan".....Richard Strauss
Overture to "Der Freischuetz".....Weber

om

dress

te

Dr. Carl Muck, who had agreed to yield his own new conductor's stick to Dr. Saint-Saëns before the wireless message from Newfoundland upset a Boston concert this week, is coming to town himself on Thursday as the next distinguished visitor of the year. Presently the two men will get together for another date in Boston. Dr. Muck has come from Germany under a release for one year of his Berlin Royal Opera contract. He is known to some Americans as a "Parsifal" conductor at Bayreuth.

No star but the new conductor will be seen on the Boston orchestra's return. His début, will be, as already announced, in the Beethoven and Wagner programme on Thursday night and the Brahms, Weber and Strauss on Saturday afternoon. The first bill, by the way, is a repetition of Muck's American début, when Mr. W. E. Walter wrote: "Boston audiences are not the most demonstrative in the world, but the new Symphony Hall now knows what cheers are at a symphony concert." The Carnegie Hall sale has already broken records for ten concerts here.

Brooklyn has the first of five Boston Symphony concerts on Friday next in the Baptist Temple. The music will be the Brahms symphony No. 1, Weber's "Oberon" overture and Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BROOKLYN INSTITUTE NOTES.

First Philharmonic Concert and Opening Service—Illustrated Lectures Features of Weekly Calendar.

Musically, the week in Brooklyn Institute affairs is to be up to the high standard so far maintained during this season. The first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts under the joint auspices of the Broklyn Philharmonic Society and the Institute is to be given in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening. Dr. Karl Muck will direct in person and the evening's feature will be a musical reception to the distinguished leader. No soloist will be heard in this concert.

Almost equal in interest for the music

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

As visitors to Boston know often to their sorrow, it is absolutely impossible to secure seats for the public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which are held on Friday afternoons and unless one speaks far ahead it is equally impossible to get any of the two-score seats for the Saturday evening concerts which are held out from the sale by the management for the benefit of those who do not buy seats for the season. This same condition now exists in Washington where five concerts are given during the winter in the New National Theatre. Practically the entire theatre is sold out by subscription for the whole series. Nor are any of the tickets in the hands of speculators.

Brooklyn's first orchestral concert of the season will occur next Friday evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open their series here. The occasion will be marked by the appearance of a new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, concerning whose coming enough reference has been made to cause more than the usual anticipation of these concerts. Dr. Muck is of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and comes here for a season, through special permission of the German Emperor. In the prime of life, 47 years old, Dr. Muck is backed by a fine European record and reports from Boston state that he has made a fine impression there, where he appeared at the first concert of the season on October 12. Boston frankly admits that it is conservative. We are told that it has become almost a tradition that nothing can arouse a Symphony audience in that city to wilder enthusiasm than that which finds its expression in the polite tapping together of hands. This is one of the several traditions which Dr. Muck broke on his first appearance there on Friday evening, October 12, and Saturday evening, October 13. At both of these performances, at the finish of Beethoven's C minor Symphony, he was roundly cheered. And again, the following week, his performance of the Haydn Symphony roused enthusiasm to a pitch which usually comes from the highly emotional music of modern composers. And this again was repeated at the third concert, after the performance of Brahm's C minor Symphony, which is to be played here in Brooklyn, the conviction having been generally expressed in Boston that for the first time they were realizing what Brahms meant. To use the vernacular, Dr. Muck has "made good," we are told, in every sense of the word. Thus says Boston. So far in his programmes Dr. Muck has not ventured far from the beaten path, thinking it best to get thoroughly en rapport with his men before venturing into the realm of the highly colored music of to-day. His programme for Brooklyn contains nothing new, but it is promised that the familiar works will be presented in a new way. There will be no soloist at the opening concert here, orchestral music alone being permitted to make its own eloquent appeal. The programme is as follows: Brahm's Symphony in C Minor, No. 1, Weber Overture to Oberon, Richard Strauss' Tone-Poem Don Juan, Weber Overture to Der Freischuetz.

ss

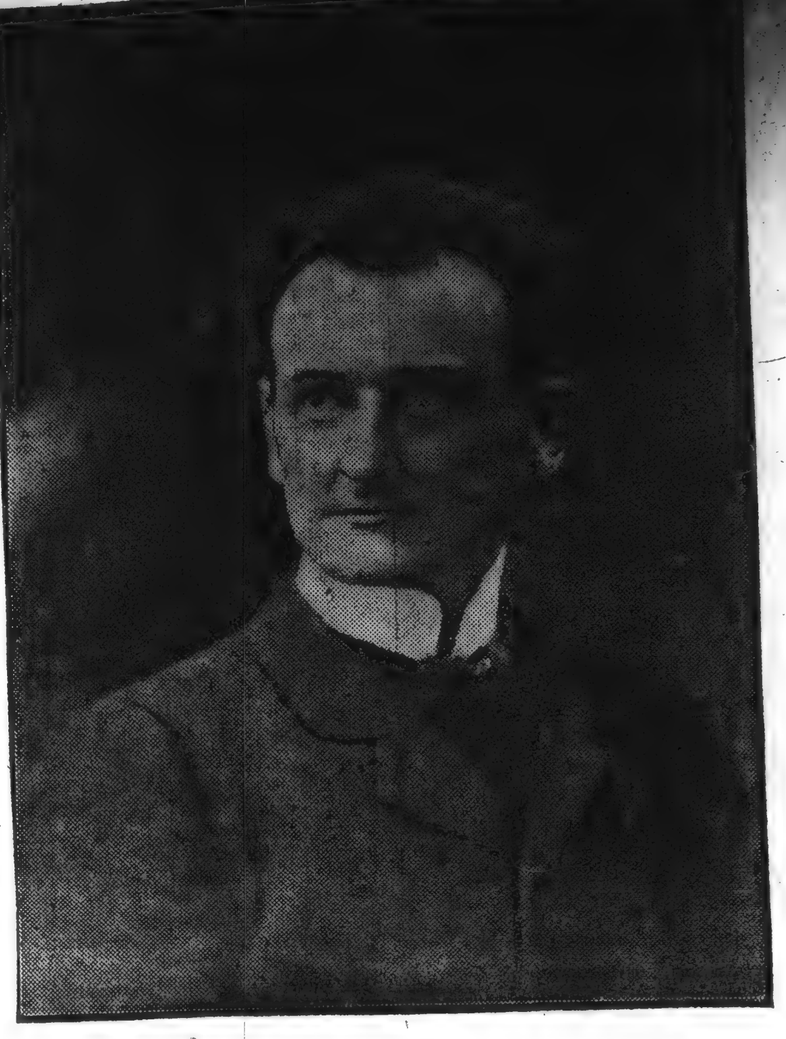
The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its first visit of the season to Brooklyn and gives its concert in the Baptist Temple next Friday evening. Interest in the coming series of concerts is running higher than it has in many years, and it has found practical manifestation in an extremely large subscription sale for the series. Undoubtedly this increase may be attributed to the presence, as conductor of the orchestra, of Dr. Karl Muck, in succession to Mr. Gericke.

Boston has unquestionably the most conservative musical public in this country, a public which has its training in the twenty-five years of concerts its orchestra has given. It has become almost a tradition that nothing can arouse a Symphony audience in that city to wilder enthusiasm than that which finds its expression in the polite tapping together of hands. This is one of the several traditions which Dr. Muck broke on his first appearance there on Friday evening, Oct. 12, and Saturday evening, Oct. 13. At both of these performances, at the finish of Beethoven's C minor Symphony, he was roundly cheered. And again, the following week, his performance of the Haydn Symphony roused enthusiasm which again was repeated at the third concert, after the performance of Brahms' C minor Symphony, which is to be played here in Brooklyn.

So far in his programmes Dr. Muck has not ventured far from the beaten path, thinking it best to get thoroughly en rapport with his men before venturing into the realm of the highly colored music of to-day. His programme for Brooklyn contains nothing new, but it is promised that the familiar works will be presented in a new way. The programme is as follows: Symphony in C minor, No. 1, Brahms; Overture to "Oberon," Weber; tone-poem, "Don Juan," Richard Strauss; Overture to "Der Freischuetz," Weber.

ss

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Quartet will take place at Mendelssohn Hall on November 9 at 8 P. M. The programme will consist of Suk's B flat quartet, which will be heard for the first time, Schubert's quartet movement in C minor and Franck's piano quintet. Heinrich Gebhard will be the pianist.



DR. KARL MUCK.
New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

s

ss

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, with Dr. Karl Muck making his New York debut as its conductor. Dr. Muck, who has secured a year's leave from the Berlin Royal Opera, has been warmly welcomed in Boston. There will be no soloist at either concert to divide honors with him. The programmes:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Symphony in C minor, No. 5....Beethoven
Eine Faust Overture.....Wagner
Siegfried Idyll .....Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .....Wagner

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Symphony in C minor, No. 1.....Brahms
Overture to "Oberon" .....Weber
Tone Poem "Don Juan" .....R. Strauss
Overture to "Der Freischutz" .....Weber

Besides Dr. Muck there will apparently be another important newcomer on the Boston Symphony platform—but only apparently, for the first violinist is still Prof. Willy Hess, although he has transformed his face by removing his beard. Good; a bearded concert master is not inspiring.

m

dress

te

The first of three concerts of chamber music by the Boston Symphony Quartet will take place next Friday afternoon, November 9, in Mendelssohn Hall. The quartet is the same as last year, Prof. Willy Hess being first violin, Otto Roth second, Emile Ferir viola and Heinrich Warnke violoncello. The four members have had daily rehearsal since September.

The pianist at the first concert will be Heinrich Gebhard, of Boston. The programme:

Quartet in B flat major, op. 11 (first time .....Josef Suk
Quartet satz in C minor, op. Posth, ...Schubert
Quintet for piano and strings in F minor .....Franck

om

dress

The first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 8, and Saturday afternoon, November 10. The soloist will be the new conductor, Carl Muck, or in other words there will be no soloist. The programme at the evening concert will be Beethoven's fifth symphony and three Wagner numbers—"Eine Faust" overture, "Siegfried Idyll" and "Meistersinger" prelude. On Saturday afternoon the orchestra will play Brahms's C minor symphony, Weber's "Oberon" overture, Strauss's "Don Juan" and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

ss

MUSICAL NEWS AND GOSSIP

Debut of Dr. Muck—Operatic Reform in Paris—Caruso's Record—Paris Concert Halls—Berlin Programmes—Talking Machines and Pianos

The first two Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. These will be the introductory appearances in New York of Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, having come to America on a special leave of absence, granted him last spring by the German Emperor after a long series of negotiations. The Thursday programme includes Beethoven's fifth symphony and three Wagner numbers—the "Faust Overture," "Siegfried Idyll," and "Meistersinger" prelude. On Saturday the pieces will be the first Brahms symphony, Strauss's "Don Juan," and Weber's overtures to "Oberon" and "Freischütz."

From

Address

Date

The first two Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening at 8:15 o'clock and Saturday afternoon at 2:30 o'clock respectively. These will be the introductory appearances in New York of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, having come to America on a special leave of absence granted him last spring by the German Emperor after a long series of negotiations. As these concerts are planned primarily to introduce Dr. Muck to the New York patrons of the Boston Symphony, there will be no solo performer at either concert. The programme for Thursday night will be the same as that used by Dr. Muck for his first concert in Boston. It is as follows:

Symphony in C Minor, No. 5.....Beethoven
Eine Faust Overture.....Wagner
Siegfried Idyll .....Wagner
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner

The second programme—that for Saturday afternoon—is as follows:

Symphony in C Minor, No. 1.....Brahms
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Tone Poem, "Don Juan".....R. Strauss
Overture to "Der Freischütz".....Weber

Strings, Wood, Wind and Brasses

THE first two Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, November 8, at quarter past eight, and Saturday afternoon, November 10, at half-past two, respectively. There will be the introductory appearances in New York of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, having come to America on a special leave of absence, granted him last spring by the German Emperor after a long series of negotiations.

As these concerts are planned primarily to introduce Dr. Muck to the New York patrons of the Boston Symphony, there will be no solo artist at either concert, as it is deemed undesirable to divide the interest. The programme for Thursday night will be the same as that used by Dr. Muck for his first concert in Boston. It is as follows:—

Symphony in C minor, No. 5	Beethoven
Eine Faust Overture	Wagner
Siegfried Idyll	Wagner
Prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremburg,"	Wagner

The second programme—that for Saturday afternoon, November 10—is as follows:—

Symphony in C minor, No. 1	Brahms
Overture to "Oberon"	Weber
Tone-Poem "Don Juan"	R. Strauss
Overture to "Der Freischutz"	Weber

The first of the three concerts of chamber music which the Boston Symphony Quartet will give in New York during the present season will take place next Friday afternoon, November 9, in Mendelssohn Hall at three o'clock.

The assisting artist at the first concert will be Heinrich Gebhard, of Boston. Joseph Suk's quartet in B flat major, op. 11 (first time); Schubert's quartet Satz in C minor, op. Posth, and Frank's quintet for piano and strings in F major, will make up the programme.

The New Conductor of the Boston Symphony

MORE than ordinary interest is attached to the Boston Symphony concerts this season, due to the presence of Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, who has come to America on a year's leave of absence from the Royal Opera of that city to be the conductor of Boston's orchestra.

It is thirteen years since the Boston Symphony brought a new conductor to New York—if the visit, last year, of Vincent d'Indy be excepted—the last one having been Emil Paur, now of the Pittsburg Orchestra. When the orchestra first came to this city to give a concert in Steinway Hall, Mr. Gericke, then in his first term of service, was at its head.

During the last three years of Mr. Gericke's first engagement the orchestra became firmly established in the affections of New York's music lovers, and under Nikisch, Paur and, again, Gericke, its patronage here has grown steadily until, indeed, New York has come to regard it as partly its own.

There is no reason to doubt that the brilliant achievements of the past will be duplicated under Dr. Muck. He comes to this country with a splendid reputation won in a career of twenty-six years in some of the most exacting posts of Europe. Beginning at the bottom round of the ladder as chorus master in the opera in Zürich, his advancement was so rapid that in twelve years he was appointed one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera in Berlin, which post he now holds.

While it is true that he is best known as an operatic conductor his experience in concert work has been very thorough and in Europe he is esteemed as highly in concert as in opera. In the early years of his career, when he was the chief conductor of Graz, he began to make a name for himself in symphonic music. In Prague, where he was principal conductor of the German Opera from 1886 to 1892, he was also the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts and gave them a standing which they had never had before. Later, when he went to Berlin, he began to receive invitations from the leading orchestras of Europe, and to-day he is one of the most sought after of the "star" conductors.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NORTH AMERICA
PHILADELPHIA,
NOV 4 - 1906

The first Boston symphony concert of the season is to be given at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. This will be the introductory appearance in Philadelphia of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, having come to America on a special leave of absence granted him last spring by the German Emperor after a long series of negotiations.

The programme for tomorrow night will be the same as that used by Dr. Muck for the first concert in Boston. It is as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 5	Beethoven
Eine Faust Overture	Wagner
Siegfried Idyll	Wagner
Prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremburg"	Wagner

The second programme—that for Saturday afternoon, Nov. 10, is as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 1	Brahms
Overture to "Oberon"	Weber
Tone-Poem "Don Juan"	R. Strauss
Overture to "Der Freischutz"	Weber

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PHILADELPHIA PRESS
NOV 4 - 1906

I had the honor last Saturday to be the guest of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at one of its concerts. I was deeply impressed, as any one who goes to these concerts cannot fail to be, by the attitude of the audience. It can only be described as reverent, earnest and scholarly.

In the first place, the whole audience was quietly seated several minutes before the entrance of that masterly musician who now directs the orchestra, probably one of the finest means of musical exppression that could be put into the hands of a master musician.

The symphony performed was Brahm's First, a work austere in outline, classic and bridled in its manipulation of high emotion, but still infused with the strongest and deepest feeling. Dr. Muck has proved himself in Boston to be neither a faddist nor a reactionary. He is neither the eulogist nor the resurrectionist of styles and schools long since dead, nor is he an apostle of a new wangel. He is sound, genial, scholarly, broad, illuminate and self mastered, and in all senses a most welcome addition to the vigorous American music life of ours.

There are no boxes in Symphony Hall. This unifies the audience, and prevents that display of self and clothes which in so many places mars the enjoyment and irritates the temper of those who take their serious music for what it is, the most uplifting, impersonal and ennobling of all the arts. It is also the practice in Boston to remain silent for a few moments before the commencement of a symphony, a practice well calculated to put the auditor in a receptive frame of mind.

The first two Boston symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, Nov. 8, at 8.15, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 10, at 2.30, respectively. These will be the introductory appearances in New York of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, having come to America on a special leave of absence, granted him last Spring by the German Emperor after a long series of negotiations. Really extraordinary interest has been manifested in his coming to New York.

As these concerts are planned primarily to introduce Dr. Muck to the New York patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there will be no soloist at either concert. The programme for Thursday night will be the same as that used by Dr. Muck for his first concert in Boston. It is as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 5	Beethoven
Eine Faust Overture	Wagner
Siegfried Idyll	Wagner
Prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremburg"	Wagner

The second programme—that for Saturday afternoon, Nov. 10, is as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 1	Brahms
Overture to "Oberon"	Weber
Tone-Poem "Don Juan"	R. Strauss
Overture to "Der Freischutz"	Weber

om
ddress
te

The first of the three concerts of chamber music which the Boston Symphony Quartette will give in New York during the present season will take place next Friday afternoon, in Mendelssohn Hall. The composition of the quartette is the same as last year, Prof. Willy Hess being the first violin; Otto Roth, the second; Emile Ferir, the viola, and Heinrich Warnke, the violoncello. Programme: Quartets by Schubert (C minor) and Suk (B flat major); quintet by Franck (E minor).

ss

Musical Notes.

The first two Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, November 8, at 8.15, and Saturday afternoon, November 10, at 2.30, respectively. These will be the introductory appearances in New York of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As these concerts are planned primarily to introduce Dr. Muck to the New York patrons of the Boston Symphony, there will be no solo artists at either concert.

ss
NOV 4 - 1906

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been issued, shows that a total of 109 concerts have already been arranged for the present season. Ten concerts will be given in New York.

London, 1881; New York,

rom NEW YORK HE
ddress
NOV 4
ate

The first of its three concerts of chamber music will be given by the Boston Symphony Quartet in Mendelssohn Hall on Friday afternoon, with Heinrich Gebhard, of Boston, pianist, as the assisting artist. Professor Willy Hess announces the following programme:—Josef Suk's B flat major quartet, opus 11; Schubert's posthumous "Quartet Satz," in C minor, and Cesar Franck's quintet in F minor.

NEW YORK
NOV 4 - 1906

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its present New York season on Thursday night when its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, will be seen for the first time in New York. Dr. Muck comes from the Royal Opera in Berlin, where he holds a prominent position. He is also counted among the famous "star" conductors who tour Europe, and so great is his prominence that, during the first brace of New York concerts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have no soloist other than its conductor. For the Thursday evening concert at Carnegie Hall the following programme will be played: Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and three Wagner numbers—"Faust" overture, "Siegfried Idyll" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." At the Saturday matinee concert Brahms's First Symphony, Weber's overtures to "Oberon" and "Freischuetz," and Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" will be presented.

om NEW YORK HERALD
dress
te 1906

With the first Boston Orchestra concerts taking place on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week, the musical season can fairly be said to have opened. These entertainments will be especially interesting as introducing Dr. Karl Muck, of Dresden, the organization's new conductor. It is said that the local subscription list is the largest this series of concerts has had since Mr. Arthur Nikisch's conductorship of the orchestra.

Thursday night's programme will be the same with which Dr. Muck made his début in Boston. It consists of Beethoven's C minor symphony and three Wagner numbers, the "Faust" overture, "Siegfried Idyll" and "Meistersinger" overture. Saturday's programme will contain the First Symphony of Brahms, Weber's overture to "Oberon," Richard Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan," and Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz."

om
dress
te

Das Boston Symphonie Orchester wird in dieser Saison 108 Concerte geben, und die Concerttour wird sich von Portland, Me., bis Chicago ausdehnen. In New York wird sich das Orchester Dienstag Abend, 8. November, und Samstag Nachmittag, 10. November, hören lassen. Dem Debut Dr. Karl Muck's, des neuen Leiters des Orchesters, wird mit ganz besonderem Interesse entgegengesehen.

n N. Y. EV'G SU
ress
NOV 1 - 1906
e

Here are Dr. Carl Muck's Boston symphony programmes for his debuts as conductor in New York next week:

Beethoven's symphony in C minor, No. 5, will open the first concert next Thursday night. The rest of the music is Wagner's, including "A Faust Overture," "Siegfried Idyll" and prelude to "Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The second programme, for Saturday afternoon, Nov. 10, is as follows: Brahms symphony in C minor, No. 1; Weber, overture to "Oberon"; R. Strauss, tone-poem, "Don Juan," and Weber, overture to "Der Freischütz."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wo
om
ldress
ate

Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra made their first appearance in town about sunrise this morning, in transferring from Grand Central to Jersey Central on their first tour out of Boston this season. They play here on

[50]

Issued Sunday by Post Publishing Co.
NOVEMBER 4, 1906. NO. 5; VOL 42

The sale of season tickets for the three concerts which the Longy Club will give in Potter Hall this season will open at the box office of Symphony Hall tomorrow morning, Nov. 5. The dates of the concerts are Wednesday evening, Nov. 14, Jan. 2 and Feb. 6.

The public sale of seats for the Saint-Saens concert in Symphony Hall, postponed from Oct. 30 to Monday evening, Nov. 26, will open at the box office of Symphony Hall on Friday, Nov. 9. A considerable number of seats had already been allotted on mail orders when the unexpected postponement of the concert was announced. These will be held at the box-office at the pleasure of the owners.

SUNDAY HERALD
NOVEMBER 4, 1906

The Symphony orchestra will make its first trip this week. It will therefore give no concerts here on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The programme of the concerts Nov. 16-17 will be as follows: Weber's overture to "Oberon"; Chopin's piano concerto in E minor, No. 1 (Mme. Szumowska, pianist); Sinding's symphony in D minor.

The programme of the Boston Symphony quartet's second concert in Chickering Hall, Monday evening, the 19th, will include Beethoven's quartet in F minor, op. 95; Hugo Kaun's quartet in D major, op. 41, No. 2 (first time); Dvorak's piano quartet in E flat major, op. 87. Mr. H. G. Tucker will be the pianist.

The sale of season tickets for the three concerts which the Longy Club will give in Potter Hall this season will open at the box office of Symphony Hall tomorrow morning. The dates of the concerts are Wednesday evening, Nov. 14, Jan. 2 and Feb. 6.

The public sale of seats for the Saint-Saens concert in Symphony Hall, postponed from Oct. 30 to Monday evening, Nov. 26, will open at the box office of Symphony Hall on Friday, the 9th. A considerable number of seats had already been allotted on mail orders when the unexpected postponement of the concert was announced. These will be held at the box office at the pleasure of the owners. Those that so desire may have their money back. Others will have the seats which would have gone to them had the concert been given.

s

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first two Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, Nov. 8, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 10, at 2:30. These will be the first appearances in New York of Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, having come to America on a special leave of absence, granted him last Spring by the German Emperor after a long series of negotiations.

As these concerts are planned primarily to introduce Dr. Muck to the New York patrons of the Boston Symphony, there will be no solo artist at either concert. The programme for Thursday night will be the same as that used by Dr. Muck for his first concert in Boston. It is as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 5	Beethoven
Eine Faust Overture	Wagner
Siegfried Idyll	Wagner
Prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg"	Wagner

The second programme, that for Saturday afternoon, Nov. 10, is as follow:

Symphony in C minor, No. 1	Brahms
Overture to "Oberon"	Weber
Tone-Poem, "Don Juan"	R. Strauss
Overture to "Der Freischutz"	Weber

W YORK PR
ss
NOV 6 - 1906

BROOKLYN INSTITUTE.—A concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening. On Saturday at 3 and 8.15 Garrett P. Serviss will lecture with color pictures in Asso

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Strings, Wood, Wind and Brasses

THE first two Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, November 8, at quarter past eight, and Saturday afternoon, November 10, at half-past two, respectively. There will be the introductory appearances in New York of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, having come to America on a special leave of absence, granted him last spring by the German Emperor after a long series of negotiations.

As these concerts are planned primarily to introduce Dr. Muck to the New York patrons of the Boston Symphony, there will be no solo artist at either concert, as it is deemed undesirable to divide the interest. The programme for Thursday night will be the same as that used by Dr. Muck for his first concert in Boston. It is as follows:—

Symphony in C minor, No. 5.....Beethoven
Eine Faust Overture.....Wagner
Siegfried Idyll.....Wagner
Prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremburg."
Wagner

The second programme—that for Saturday afternoon, November 10—is as follows:—

Symphony in C minor, No. 1.....Brahms
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Tone-Poem "Don Juan".....R. Strauss
Overture to "Der Freischutz".....Weber

The first of the three concerts of chamber music which the Boston Symphony Quartet will give in New York during the present season will take place next Friday afternoon, November 9, in Mendelssohn Hall at three o'clock.

The assisting artist at the first concert will be Heinrich Gebhard, of Boston. Joseph Suk's quartet in B flat major, op. 11 (first time); Schubert's quartet Satz in C minor, op. Posth, and Frank's quintet for piano and strings in F major, will make up the programme.

The New Conductor of the Boston Symphony

MORE than ordinary interest is attached to the Boston Symphony concerts this season, due to the presence of Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, who has come to America on a year's leave of absence from the Royal Opera of that city to be the conductor of Boston's orchestra.

It is thirteen years since the Boston Symphony brought a new conductor to New York—if the visit, last year, of Vincent d'Indy be excepted—the last one having been Emil Paur, now of the Pittsburg Orchestra. When the orchestra first came to this city to give a concert in Steinway Hall, Mr. Gericke, then in his first term of service, was at its head.

During the last three years of Mr. Gericke's first engagement the orchestra became firmly established in the affections of New York's music lovers, and under Nikisch, Paur and, again, Gericke, its patronage here has grown steadily until, indeed, New York has come to regard it as partly its own.

There is no reason to doubt that the brilliant achievements of the past will be duplicated under Dr. Muck. He comes to this country with a splendid reputation won in a career of twenty-six years in some of the most exacting posts of Europe. Beginning at the bottom round of the ladder as chorus master in the opera in Zürich, his advancement was so rapid that in twelve years he was appointed one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera in Berlin, which post he now holds.

While it is true that he is best known as an operatic conductor his experience in concert work has been very thorough and in Europe he is esteemed as highly in concert as in opera. In the early years of his career, when he was the chief conductor of Graz, he began to make a name for himself in symphonic music. In Prague, where he was principal conductor of the German Opera from 1886 to 1892, he was also the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts and gave them a standing which they had never had before. Later, when he went to Berlin, he began to receive invitations from the leading orchestras of Europe, and to-day he is one of the most sought after of the "star" conductors.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NORTH AMERICA, PHILADELPHIA,

The first Boston symphony concert of the season is to be given at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. This will be the introductory appearance in Philadelphia of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, having come to America on a special leave of absence granted him last spring by the German Emperor after a long series of negotiations.

The programme for tomorrow night will be the same as that used by Dr. Muck for his first concert in Boston. It is as follows:

Beethoven.....Symphony in C minor, No. 5
Wagner.....Eine Faust Overture
Wagner.....Siegfried Idyll
Wagner.....Prelude to "The Meistersingers of Nuremberg"

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

I had the honor last Saturday to be the guest of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at one of its concerts. I was deeply impressed, as any one who goes to these concerts cannot fail to be, by the attitude of the audience. It can only be described as reverent, earnest and scholarly.

In the first place, the whole audience was quietly seated several minutes before the entrance of that masterly musician who now directs the orchestra, probably one of the finest means of musical exppression that could be put into the hands of a master musician.

The symphony performed was Brahm's First, a work austere in outline, classic and bridled in its manipulation of high emotion, but still infused with the strongest and deepest feeling. Dr. Muck has proved himself in Boston to be neither a faddist nor a reactionary. He is neither the eulogist nor the resurrectionist of styles and schools long since dead, nor is he an apostle of a new wangel. He is sound, genial, scholarly, broad, illuminate and self mastered, and in all senses a most welcome addition to the vigorous American music life of ours.

There are no boxes in Symphony Hall. This unifies the audience, and prevents that display of self and clothes which in so many places mars the enjoyment and irritates the temper of those who take their serious music for what it is, the most uplifting, impersonal and ennobling of all the arts. It is also the practice in Boston to remain silent for a few moments before the commencement of a symphony, a practice well calculated to put the auditor in a receptive frame of mind.

The first two Boston symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, Nov. 8, at 8.15, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 10, at 2.30, respectively. These will be the introductory appearances in New York of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, having come to America on a special leave of absence, granted him last Spring by the German Emperor after a long series of negotiations. Really extraordinary interest has been manifested in his coming to New York.

As these concerts are planned primarily to introduce Dr. Muck to the New York patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there will be no soloist at either concert. The programme for Thursday night will be the same as that used by Dr. Muck for his first concert in Boston. It is as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 5.....Beethoven
Eine Faust Overture.....Wagner
Siegfried Idyll.....Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"
Wagner

The second programme—that for Saturday afternoon, Nov. 10, is as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 1.....Brahms
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Tone-Poem "Don Juan".....R. Strauss
Overture to "Der Freischutz".....Weber

Musical Notes.

The first two Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, November 8, at 8.15, and Saturday afternoon, November 10, at 2.30, respectively. These will be the introductory appearances in New York of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As these concerts are planned primarily to introduce Dr. Muck to the New York patrons of the Boston Symphany, there will be no solo artists at either concert.

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been issued, shows that a total of 109 concerts have already been arranged for the present season. Ten concerts will be given in New York.

London, 1881; New York,

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

The first of its three concerts of chamber music will be given by the Boston Symphony Quartet in Mendelssohn Hall on Friday afternoon, with Heinrich Gebhard, of Boston, pianist, as the assisting artist. Professor Willy Hess announces the following programme:—Josef Suk's B flat major quartet, opus 11; Schubert's posthumous "Quartet Satz," in C minor, and Cesar Franck's quintet in F minor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its present New York season on Thursday night when its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, will be seen for the first time in New York. Dr. Muck comes from the Royal Opera in Berlin, where he holds a prominent position. He is also counted among the famous "star" conductors who tour Europe, and so great is his prominence that during the first brace of New York concerts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have no soloist other than its conductor. For the Thursday evening concert at Carnegie Hall the following programme will be played: Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and three Wagner numbers—"Faust" overture, "Siegfried Idyll" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." At the Saturday matinee concert Brahms's First Symphony, Weber's overtures to "Oberon" and "Freischuetz," and Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" will be presented.

* * *

With the first Boston Orchestra concerts taking place on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of this week, the musical season can fairly be said to have opened. These entertainments will be especially interesting as introducing Dr. Karl Muck, of Dresden, the organization's new conductor. It is said that the local subscription list is the largest this series of concerts has had since Mr. Arthur Nikisch's conductorship of the orchestra.

Thursday night's programme will be the same with which Dr. Muck made his début in Boston. It consists of Beethoven's C minor symphony and three Wagner numbers, the "Faust" overture, "Siegfried Idyll" and "Meistersinger" overture. Saturday's programme will contain the First Symphony of Brahms, Weber's overture to "Oberon," Richard Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan," and Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz."

The first of the three concerts of chamber music which the Boston Symphony Quartette will give in New York during the present season will take place next Friday afternoon, in Mendelssohn Hall. The composition of the quartette is the same as last year. Prof. Willy Hess being the first violin; Otto Roth, the second; Emile Ferir, the viola, and Heinrich Warnke, the violoncello. Programme: Quartets by Schubert (C minor) and Suk (B flat major); quintet by Franck (F minor).

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wo

Das Boston Symphonie Orchester wird in dieser Saison 108 Concerte geben, und die Concerttour wird sich von Portland, Me., bis Chicago ausdehnen. In New York wird sich das Orchester Dienstag Abend, 8. November, und Samstag Nachmittag, 10. November, hören lassen. Dem Debut Dr. Karl Muck's, des neuen Leiters des Orchesters, wird mit ganz besonderem Interesse entgegengesehen.

* * *

Here are Dr. Carl Muck's Boston symphony programmes for his débuts as conductor in New York next week:

Beethoven's symphony in C minor, No. 5; will open the first concert next Thursday night. The rest of the music is Wagner's, including "A Faust Overture," "Siegfried Idyll" and prelude to "Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The second programme, for Saturday afternoon, Nov. 10, is as follows: Brahms symphony in C minor, No. 1; Weber, overture to "Oberon"; R. Strauss, tone-poem, "Don Juan," and Weber, overture to "Der Freischütz."

Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra made their first appearance in town about sunrise this morning, in transferring from Grand Central to Jersey Central on their first tour out of Boston this season. They play here on Thurs-

The Boston Post
The Representative Democratic Paper of New England
Issued Sunday by Post Publishing Co.
NOVEMBER 4, 1906. NO. 5; VOL 42

The sale of season tickets for the three concerts which the Longy Club will give in Potter Hall this season will open at the box office of Symphony Hall tomorrow morning, Nov. 5. The dates of the concerts are Wednesday evening, Nov. 14, Jan. 2 and Feb. 6.

* * * *

The public sale of seats for the Saint-Saens concert in Symphony Hall, postponed from Oct. 30 to Monday evening, Nov. 26, will open at the box office of Symphony Hall on Friday, Nov. 9. A considerable number of seats had already been allotted on mail orders when the unexpected postponement of the concert was announced. These will be held at the box-office at the pleasure of the owners.

SUNDAY HERALD NOVEMBER 4, 1906.

The Symphony orchestra will make its first trip this week. It will therefore give no concerts here on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The programme of the concerts Nov. 16-17 will be as follows: Weber's overture to "Oberon"; Chopin's piano concerto in E minor, No. 1 (Mme. Szumowska, pianist); Sinding's symphony in D minor.

The programme of the Boston Symphony quartet's second concert in Chickering Hall, Monday evening, the 19th, will include Beethoven's quartet in F minor, op. 95; Hugo Kaun's quartet in D major, op. 41, No. 2 (first time); Dvorak's piano quartet in E flat major, op. 87. Mr. H. G. Tucker will be the pianist.

The sale of season tickets for the three concerts which the Longy Club will give in Potter Hall this season will open at the box office of Symphony Hall tomorrow morning. The dates of the concerts are Wednesday evening, Nov. 14, Jan. 2 and Feb. 6.

The public sale of seats for the Saint-Saens concert in Symphony Hall, postponed from Oct. 30 to Modnay evening, Nov. 26, will open at the box office of Symphony Hall on Friday, the 9th. A considerable number of seats had already been allotted on mail orders when the unexpected postponement of the concert was announced. These will be held at the box office at the pleasure of the owners. Those that so desire may have their money back. Others will have the seats which would have gone to them had the concert been given

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first two Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, Nov. 8, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 10, at 2:30. These will be the first appearances in New York of Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, having come to America on a special leave of absence, granted him last Spring by the German Emperor after a long series of negotiations.

As these concerts are planned primarily to introduce Dr. Muck to the New York patrons of the Boston Symphony, there will be no solo artist at either concert. The programme for Thursday night will be the same as that used by Dr. Muck for his first concert in Boston. It is as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 5.....Beethoven
Eine Faust Overture.....Wagner
Siegfried Idyll.....Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg".....Wagner

The second programme, that for Saturday afternoon, Nov. 10, is as follow:

Symphony in C minor, No. 1.....Brahms
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Tone-Poem, "Don Juan".....R. Strauss
Overture to "Der Freischutz".....Weber

NOV 6 - 1906

BROOKLYN INSTITUTE.—A concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening. On Saturday at 3 and 8.15 Garrett P. Serviss will lecture, with color pictures, in Asso-

[50]

...ER 4, 1906.

...any program con... novelties, familiar ... by Weber, Schubert and ...Schumann being the selections. ...Olive Fremstad was the soloist. ...uck was on safe and conservative ...ound with this program, for the ...r compositions could be classed as ...yable to the general concert at- ...nt who finds scant pleasure in ...ve musical—or nonmusical—prob- ...and the orchestra could play them ...stand" and felt at ease following the ...nductor's baton. The numbers were ...overture to Weber's opera, "Der ...schuta," and a scene and aria from ...me work; Schubert's unfinished B ...inor symphony and his "Erlking" ...ng; two songs by Schumann and the ...me composer's first symphony.

Mme Fremstad's voice shows the rich ...uality of the contralto through most ...the registers and, excepting in some ...ttle passages, the tone was clear, true ...nd sweet. The Weber aria was sung ...ith splendid expression and dramatic ...ffect, although not in an operatic vein. ...The mezzo voice was used in Schu- ...mann's "Mondnacht" with great skill, ...and in the "Erlking" the vocal con- ...trasts were defined admirably. It was ...only in sustained high soprano work ...that Mme Fremstad failed to give satis- ...faction, and that was more by contrast ...than by actual performance. Her re- ...ception was very cordial.

The long program was made thor- ...oughly enjoyable by the seemingly per- ...fect work of the orchestra and its thor- ...ough sympathy with Dr Muck's read- ...ings. There were no "surprises" in the ...interpretations, and nothing radical in ...the performance of any number. The ...beauty of the horn passages in the We- ...ber overture calls for special mention in ...that piece. The unfinished Schubert ...symphony was played, as it always is ...by the orchestra, with exquisite refine- ...ment and sentiment, and Schumann's ...symphony was little, if any, less worthy ...of commendation. Mr Zach played the ...piano parts to the songs in his usual ef- ...fective manner. The orchestra will ...play this week. Mme Szumowska ...is the soloist at the fifth rehears... ...concert.

SAINT-SAENS CONCERT.

The public sale of seats for the Saint-Saens concert in Symphony hall, post- poned from Oct 30 to Monday evening, Nov 26, will open Friday, Nov 9. A con- siderable number of seats had already been allotted on mail orders when the unexpected postponement of the concert was announced. These will be held at the box office at the pleasure of the owners. Those that so desire may se- cure the money back. Others will have the seats which would ha... ...to them had the concert be... ...on the ...

THE LONGY CLUB.

The sale of season tickets for the three concerts which the Longy club will give in Potter hall this season will open at Symphony hall tomorrow morn- ing. The dates of the concerts are Wednesday evening, Nov 14, Jan ... ...

BOSTON AMERICAN—
NOVEMBER 4, 1906.

By Kent Perkins.

It was a lyric evening at the fourth Symphony concert of the season in Sym- phony Hall last night. For those good folk to whom tuneful melody is all in all, the programme was one long uninterrupt- ed pleasure.

They were unvexed by any staid classi- cism that, according to their view, leans too far backward in its dignity to be pleasing; they were untroubled by any geometric figuration or brazen blare of the ultra-modern striving for novelty. They drank deep drafts of glorious song from Weber, Schubert and Schumann, and were content without surfeit.

Now Dr. Muck dearly loves a song—a real song—and it delights his soul to help the Symphony Orchestra sing it with all the moving force that high artistry can command. So he threw himself into the work of last evening with a fervor and illumination of interpretation that de- veloped new beauties in the well-known melodies given forth by the musicians.

The "popular" character of the pro- gramme and the presence of Mme. Olive Fremstad as soloist served to fill every seat in the hall.

First came Weber's ever gratifying overture to "Der Freischutz." Then Mme. Fremstad sang the lovely recitative and aria from the same opera, "How tranquilly I slumbered" and "Softly sighing." Her dramatic expression was satisfying and not overdrawn, while her singing of the air made familiar by immemorial use as a church hymn gave extreme pleasure.

Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B minor, in which if in any human song the music of the spheres may be heard, was played with uplifting effect.

Mme. Fremstad sang Schumann's "Ich Grolle Nicht" and "Mondnacht" and Schu- bert's "Erlking." She was accompanied only with the piano and it seemed more like a recital at this point than a Symphony Concert. She was at her best in the "Erlking" with its dramatic possi- bilities and was recalled repeatedly by a hearty applause.

Schumann's Symphony No. 1, wherein the hope and beauty and glory of Spring are pictured in matchless melody and har- mony, called forth the highest efforts both of Dr. Muck and the orchestra with re- sults that will long be remembered by their hearers.

Next Friday and Saturday the orchestra will be on tour; so there will be neither rehearsal nor concert.

SUNDAY HERALD---BOSTON, NOVEMBER 4, 1906.

FREMSTAD APPEARS AS SOPRANO

Contralto Is a Victim to Her Misplaced Ambition.

BY PHILIP HALE

The programme of the fourth Sym- phony concert, Dr. Muck, conductor, in Symphony Hall last evening, was as follows:

Overture to "Der Freischuetz"..... Weber
Scene and aria from "Der Freischuetz" Weber
Unfinished symphony in B minor..Schubert
Songs—"Schumann's "Ich Grolle Nicht" and "Mondnacht" and Schubert's "Erl- koenig."
Symphony in B flat major, No 1..Schumann

There are some who say, and not without reason, that the appearance of a singer or violinist, or pianist, or violoncellist, at a Symphony concert is an intrusion unless the individual display of art be necessary to the en- semble, as in the finale of the Ninth symphony or in Vincent d'Indy's sym- phony on a mountain folksong for piano and orchestra.

Whenever a commanding personal- ity comes between orchestral pieces the interest of the great majority of the audience is centred on the singer, pianist, violinist. The expectant pay little attention to the opening over- ture or symphony, and the composi- tion that stands between the two ap- pearances of the man or woman serves for rest or for the accumula- tion of fresh enthusiasm which will soon be expended.

The audience is especially curious about opera singers, for these singing women even while they are in the exer- cise of their calling are enveloped in a legendary mist. The fact that an opera singer of more than ordinary dramatic ability disappoints the hearer as a rule when she ventures upon the platform of a concert hall is not considered by the audience, which has eyes and not ears alone. There is the distinguished prima donna, Mme. X., not Mme. X. as Sieg- linde, or Carmen, or Aida, but Mme. X. without a make-up. There is pleasant speculation as to her age, the cost of her gown and the dwelling place of her dressmaker. Incidentally the audience hears her sing. Accustomed to make dramatic points in the opera house without a fine regard for the niceties of vocal art, she often forgets that dramatic animation in song seems ex- travagant or grotesque in the concert hall.

The force of an operatic situation, the intensity of dramatic action, the sump- tuousness of scenery and costumes, the encouraging and abetting orchestra— these conceal in a large measure vocal deficiencies which in concert are only too apparent. Few distinguished prima- donnas excel in concert. Still fewer shine in an intimate song-recital.

The public demands the presence of soloists in the course of a season of symphony concerts, whether the city be Berlin or Boston, Paris or New York. The managers, wise in their generation, gratify this demand. The list of solo- ists in the preliminary announcement excites more comment than would a complete list of the orchestral pieces to be played.

When the distinguished singer does ap- pear the programme is usually disar- ranged for her, and it is without coher- ent plan, without significance. Mme. X. gives a concert assisted by the or- chestra.

Mme. Olive Fremstad was the singer last night, and it may at once be said than is generally the case. than is generally is generally the case.

The programme arranged by Dr. Muck before he left Berlin was one of very familiar pieces, so familiar that to dis- cuss their character would be an act of impertinence toward the reader.

The overture to "Der Freischuetz" might well be shelved for a few seasons. At the next concert we are to have the equally familiar overture to "Oberon." One—two—then let the overture to "Euryanthe" be played Nov. 24, and let Carl Maria von Weber be retired on three strikes.

Inasmuch as Dr. Muck felt that the overture to "Der Freischuetz" should be played once more in Boston—was the performance the 11th or 15th at these Saturday night concerts?—what more fit- ting than that Mme. Fremstad should sing Agathe's scene and aria from the same esteemed opera?

Inasmuch as familiar symphonies by Schubert and Schumann were chosen by Dr. Muck—they were played ex- tremely well last season—what more appropriate than songs by Schumann and Schubert? Evenings with the old masters! Weber and Weber! Schubert and Schubert! Schumann and Schu- mann!

Mme. Fremstad, who won her repu- tation as a contralto, has of late years grown uneasy. The laurels of so- pranos would not let her sleep. Hav- ing tried flights in the higher vocal aether, she now announces herself as a dramatic soprano.

She chose for an aria the one from "Der Freischuetz." The allegro of this aria is inherently unvocal. It is clum- sily written for the voice, and certain passages are of a purely instrumental character. The music taxes any true soprano. Last night there was the con- stant suggestion during the perform- ance of a singer laboring to achieve something which was beyond her nat- ural limitations. And so in the "Mond- nacht" of Schumann and in the "Erl- king" there was laborious expression. The pity of it, and the more the pity be- cause this ineffective exhibition was all unnecessary. Mme. Fremstad was gifted by nature with a voice of surpassing beauty. Her ambition has led her to dis- dain this natural beauty in the desire to achieve an impossible triumph. As a result she has lost in a measure the rich and imposing quality of the lower tones, and the upper tones are not mu- sical or of any true dramatic force. As her voice now is it seems prematurely worn and uneven. This much may be said in praise of her performance: that she respected the limitations of the con- cert stage, and was not extravagantly dramatic. While her delivery of the "Erl King"—a song, by the way, that was sung for many years only by men—was not by any means masterly, it was never, as is now too often the case, a mere exhibition of ventriloquism.

Dr. Muck was not wholly in the vein. The first movement of the overture was taken so slowly that the horn song suf- fered from lack of continuity, nor was the rest of the overture demoniacally sinister and irresistibly triumphant. Schubert's symphony has been better played here. The reading was ove- laborate, mannered and at times senti- ment fell into sentimentalism. Dr. Muck was more fortunate with Schumann's symphony, for the first movement was played with much spirit. All in all an uninteresting concert.

Orchestra Gives Numbers Well Worn by Repetition.

The Boston Journal
NOVEMBER 5, 1906.

GERMAN CLASSICS AT THE SYMPHONY

"Der Freischutz" Saturday and "Oberon" Announced for Next Performance.

The fourth Symphony concert was evi- dently devised by Dr. Muck as an edu- cator. Boston was to be given a good, wholesome dose of the German classi- cists, something pleasant to take, and at the same time eminently helpful to the musical system. So he began with the overture to "Freischutz." No sym- phony-goer need be told how ancient, how hackneyed, how almost completely uninspiring this work is. Unless it is read with consummate poetic art—as Weingartner read it here last season—it is nowadays perilously close to being a bore. Dr. Muck and his men failed to breathe into it any extraordinary vitality or beauty and it left its hearers indifferent. The program book an- nounces another Weber warhorse, the "Oberon" overture, for the next con- cert. It should be accompanied by a lecture on the beauty and power of this suddenly rediscovered composer.

The two beautiful fragments of Schu- bert's B minor symphony are always full of pathetic charm, no matter under what conductor, if he be adequate at all. In this case the movements were more roughly played and less coherent- ly outlined than we have been used to hearing them. They made their way by their own great charm, but they have been given with more nobility at these concerts. The Schumann "Spring" sym- phony, with its irrepressible spirit and fascinating romanticism, went much better. The conductor evidently felt the meaning of the music to the full, and his interpretation of it, while not invariably bringing out the crystalline purity of the music, was full of fire and joyous abandon. The third move- ment, especially, with its complexity of rythm and phrase, was particularly well done.

Mme. Olive Fremstad was the soloist, and her choice of songs seemed modeled on Dr. Muck's choice of orchestral pieces. She first gave the familiar Weber aria from "Freischutz," a thing that now arouses no emotion in the hearer save that of ennui, unless some singer of consummate ability presents it. Mme. Fremstad, excellent and im- pressive as she is in grand opera, has not now the voice nor the style for concert singing, and she lent no distinc- tion to the work. She was at her best in the Schubert song, "Ich grolle nicht."

Phila. Inquirer,
November 6, 1906.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Its First Concert for the Season at the Academy Last Night

The Boston Symphony Orchestra open- ed its twenty-second local season at the Academy of Music last evening, when it gave its first concert in this city under the direction of its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. There was a fair sized audience present, which extended the newcomer a polite welcome, and which followed the performance with a re- spectful and seemingly interested atten- tion, but it cannot be said that the pro- ceedings were marked by anything at all suggestive of enthusiasm, whether on the stage or in the audience. Dr. Muck had boldly challenged all kinds of compari- sons by selecting Beethoven's C-minor symphony as the leading feature of his program, but the sequel left some doubt as to the prudence as well as the bold- ness of the challenge.

His interpretation of that well-known work was thoroughly competent, capable and business-like. It was sane, sound and safe, bringing out all the details of the score with appreciative intelligence and admirable lucidity, showing a fine sense of tone colors and dynamic propor- tion, and carefully refraining from any kind of exaggeration or eccentricity. Dr. Muck not only did not at all obtrude his own personality; he appeared to be sedulous to efface it and to exhibit noth- ing more and nothing less than the beau- ty and significance of the music. These are qualities to be commended and they entitle Dr. Muck to a hearty meed of praise. Yet there must have been many in the audience whom his carefully cor- rect performance must have left unsatis- fied and who could recall other perform- ances, less polished and refined, perhaps, but preferable by reason of their greater eloquence, of their own impressive power of their more poignant pathos.

Dr. Muck may have some emotion con- cealed about his person, but it is too carefully disguised to be easily detected, and the impression which he communi- cates is that of an impassibility on which sentiment has no hold. Yet there is no denying the fineness and finish of his work, and his rendering of the symphony, if less than convincing, was more than respectable. The other numbers on the program were Wagner's incoherent and inconsequential "Faust" overture, the same composer's "Siegfried Idyll," which, although it contains much that is exquisite, becomes tiresome through its interminable length and its multi- plied repetitions, and the "Meistersinger" prelude, all of which were rendered with the utmost loveliness of tone and an ab- solute impeccability of execution.

TRANSCRIPT,
NOVEMBER 6, 1906

Dr. Muck in Philadelphia

The Symphony Orchestra began its monthly visit to other cities in Phila- delphia last evening when Dr. Muck con- ducted for the first time there. His pro- gramme was that in which he made his debut here—Beethoven's fifth symphony, and, from Wagner, a "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers." Here are some of the comments of the Philadelphia news- papers this morning:

The Ledger—Dr. Muck is, of course, entirely master of the orchestra, and is not afraid to let it play out. There was little suppression, except in the very soft passages which were extremely sup- pressed. Otherwise the accent was near- ly constant, and, while the symphony was played with the utmost precision and with a noble volume of sound, there was no marked suggestion of poetic insight and the emotional appeal was rather ob- scured by the prevailing vehemence. The general impression made by the con- ductor at this first hearing was not so much temperamental as authoritative, as befits the official dignity at Berlin. It is very likely that this impression may be altogether changed by better acquaint- ance when we have heard him in a wider range, but we are probably safe in con- cluding that he has also a Prussian re- spect for authority, and will not be a dangerous innovator. The personal im- pression was entirely pleasing and won the cordial recognition of the large audience.

The Press—The programme was essen- tially a Wagner programme, in which music the conductor and the orchestra were at home and thoroughly as one, yet the reading of the symphony was inevitably the touchstone of judgment. And Dr. Muck's inspired and poetic interpretation placed him among those who believe the colossus of the old school had a message which should be revealed and not distorted in the light of modern utterance. Hence the symphony was wrought in a noble manner as befits it. All was lucidly sung from first to last and the climax was su- perb.

The Record—All who are familiar with classical music know the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven almost by heart and most people have their own conceptions of how it should be played; nor are the "Faust" overture of Wagner, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," by the same composer, by any means stran- gers to music patrons. By making such a selection Dr. Muck directly challenged comparison with other conductors, and it must be admitted the result justified his intent. There can be no doubt that Dr. Muck is a great conductor. The applause which greeted his appearance was perfunc- tory and the audience was a little apathetic during the first two movements of the sym- phony. As Beethoven's immortal work progressed, however, the orchestra warmed up and the audience grew more enthusias- tic and less critical; and with good reason. Seldom if ever has a finer rendition of the last two movements of this symphony been heard in this city.

The North American—The programme in- cluded Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, ren- dered somewhat conventionally and with the academic precision of expert instru- mentalists, and Wagner's "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the "Meistersinger" overture—the last a revelation in musical interpretation. This prelude to Wagner's only opera comique has never been played here with the grace, vitality, rhythmic fidel- ity and tonal sonority imparted to it by the Boston players under Dr. Muck's baton. The rendering of the "Meistersinger" music was all the more surprising in view of the conventionality of the previous numbers. Conductor Muck presented the Beethoven symphony reverentially and with classical conventionality, but his interpretations of the Wagner [illegible] independently, in- dependent [illegible]

[51]

SUNDAY GLOBE—
NOVEMBER 4, 1906.

The fourth Symphony program contained no musical novelties, familiar compositions by Weber, Schubert and Robert Schumann being the selections. Mme Olive Fremstad was the soloist. Dr Muck was on safe and conservative ground with this program, for the larger compositions could be classed as enjoyable to the general concert attendant who finds scant pleasure in abtruse musical—or nonmusical—problems, and the orchestra could play them "offhand" and felt at ease following the conductor's baton. The numbers were the overture to Weber's opera, "Der Freischutz," and a scene and aria from the same work; Schubert's unfinished B minor symphony and his "Erlking" aria; two songs by Schumann and the same composer's first symphony.

Mme Fremstad's voice shows the rich quality of the contralto through most of the registers and, excepting in some forte passages, the tone was clear, true and sweet. The Weber aria was sung with splendid expression and dramatic effect, although not in an operatic vein. The mezzo voice was used in Schumann's "Mondnacht" with great skill, and in the "Erlking" the vocal contrasts were defined admirably. It was only in sustained high soprano work that Mme Fremstad failed to give satisfaction, and that was more by contrast than by actual performance. Her reception was very cordial.

The long program was made thoroughly enjoyable by the seemingly perfect work of the orchestra and its thorough sympathy with Dr Muck's readings. There were no "surprises" in the interpretations, and nothing radical in the performance of any number. The beauty of the horn passages in the Weber overture calls for special mention in that piece. The unfinished Schubert symphony was played, as it always is by the orchestra, with exquisite refinement and sentiment, and Schumann's symphony was little, if any, less worthy of commendation. Mr Zack played the piano parts to the songs in his usual efficient manner. The orchestra will [illegible] away this week. Mme Szumowska [illegible] be the soloist at the fifth rehearsal concert.

SAINT-SAENS' CONCERT.

The public sale of seats for the Saint-Saens concert in Symphony hall, postponed from Oct 30 to Monday evening, Nov 26, will open Friday, Nov 9. A considerable number of seats had already been allotted on mail orders when the unexpected postponement of the concert was announced. These will be held at the box office at the pleasure of the owners. Those that so desire may secure the money back. Others will have the seats which would have [illegible] to them had the concert been given on the [illegible]

THE LONGY CLUB.

The sale of season tickets for the three concerts which the Longy club will give in Potter hall this season will open at Symphony hall tomorrow morning. The dates of the concerts are Wednesday evening, Nov 14, Jan 9, Feb 6.

S BOSTON AMERICAN—
NOVEMBER 4, 1906.

By Kent Perkins.

It was a lyric evening at the fourth Symphony concert of the season in Symphony Hall last night. For those good folk to whom tuneful melody is all in all, the programme was one long uninterrupted pleasure.

They were unvexed by any staid classicism that, according to their view, leans too far backward in its dignity to be pleasing; they were untroubled by any geometric figuration or brazen blare of the ultra-modern striving for novelty. They drank deep drafts of glorious song from Weber, Schubert and Schumann, and were content without surfeit.

Now Dr. Muck dearly loves a song—a real song—and it delights his soul to help the Symphony Orchestra sing it with all the moving force that high artistry can command. So he threw himself into the work of last evening with a fervor and illumination of interpretation that developed new beauties in the well-known melodies given forth by the musicians.

The "popular" character of the programme and the presence of Mme. Olive Fremstad as soloist served to fill every seat in the hall.

First came Weber's ever gratifying overture to "Der Freischutz," Then Mme. Fremstad sang the lovely recitative and aria from the same opera, "How tranquilly I slumbered" and "Softly sighing." Her dramatic expression was satisfying and not overdrawn, while her singing of the air made familiar by immemorial use as a church hymn gave extreme pleasure.

Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B minor, in which if in any human song the music of the spheres may be heard, was played with uplifting effect.

Mme. Fremstad sang Schumann's "Ich Grolle Nicht" and "Mondnacht" and Schubert's "Erlking." She was accompanied only with the piano and it seemed more like a recital at this point than a Symphony Concert. She was at her best in the "Erlking" with its dramatic possibilities and was recalled repeatedly by a hearty applause.

Schumann's Symphony No. 1, wherein the hope and beauty and glory of Spring are pictured in matchless melody and harmoney, called forth the highest efforts both of Dr. Muck and the orchestra with results that will long be remembered by their hearers.

Next Friday and Saturday the orchestra will be on tour; so there will be neither rehearsal nor concert.

SUNDAY HERALD---BOSTON, NOVEMBER 4, 1906.

FREMSTAD APPEARS AS SOPRANO

Contralto Is a Victim to Her Misplaced Ambition.

BY PHILIP HALE

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert, Dr. Muck, conductor, in Symphony Hall last evening, was as follows:

Overture to "Der Freischuetz".....Weber
Scene and aria from "Der Freischuetz" Weber
Unfinished symphony in B minor..Schubert
Songs—"Schumann's "Ich Grolle Nicht" and "Mondnacht" and Schubert's "Erlkoenig."
Symphony in B flat major, No 1.Schumann

There are some who say, and not without reason, that the appearance of a singer or violinist, or pianist, or violoncellist, at a Symphony concert is an intrusion unless the individual display of art be necessary to the ensemble, as in the finale of the Ninth symphony or in Vincent d'Indy's symphony on a mountain folksong for piano and orchestra.

Whenever a commanding personality comes between orchestral pieces the interest of the great majority of the audience is centred on the singer, pianist, violinist. The expectant pay little attention to the opening overture or symphony, and the composition that stands between the two appearances of the man or woman serves for rest or for the accumulation of fresh enthusiasm which will soon be expended.

The audience is especially curious about opera singers, for these singing women even while they are in the exercise of their calling are enveloped in a legendary mist. The fact that an opera singer of more than ordinary dramatic ability disappoints the hearer as a rule when she ventures upon the platform of a concert hall is not considered by the audience, which has eyes and not ears alone. There is the distinguished prima donna, Mme. X., not Mme. X. as Sieglinde, or Carmen, or Aida, but Mme. X. without a make-up. There is pleasant speculation as to her age, the cost of her gown and the dwelling place of her dressmaker. Incidentally the audience hears her sing. Accustomed to make dramatic points in the opera house without a fine regard for the niceties of vocal art, she often forgets that dramatic animation in song seems extravagant or grotesque in the concert hall.

The force of an operatic situation, the intensity of dramatic action, the sumptuousness of scenery and costumes, the encouraging and abetting orchestra—these conceal in a large measure vocal deficiencies which in concert are only too apparent. Few distinguished primadonnas excel in concert. Still fewer shine in an intimate song-recital.

The public demands the presence of soloists in the course of a season of symphony concerts, whether the city be Berlin or Boston, Paris or New York. The managers, wise in their generation, gratify this demand. The list of soloists in the preliminary announcement excites more comment than would a complete list of the orchestral pieces to be played.

When the distinguished singer does appear the programme is usually disarranged for her, and it is without coherent plan, without significance. Mme. X. gives a concert assisted by the orchestra.

Mme. Olive Fremstad was the singer last night, and it may at once be said than is generally the case.
than is generally is generally the case.

The programme arranged by Dr. Muck before he left Berlin was one of very familiar pieces, so familiar that to discuss their character would be an act of impertinence toward the reader.

The overture to "Der Freischuetz" might well be shelved for a few seasons. At the next concert we are to have the equally familiar overture to "Oberon." One—two—then let the overture to "Euryanthe" be played Nov. 24, and let Carl Maria von Weber be retired on three strikes.

Inasmuch as Dr. Muck felt that the overture to "Der Freischuetz" should be played once more in Boston—was the performance the 14th or 15th at these Saturday night concerts?—what more fitting than that Mme. Fremstad should sing Agathe's scene and aria from the same esteemed opera?

Inasmuch as familiar symphonies by Schubert and Schumann were chosen by Dr. Muck—they were played extremely well last season—what more appropriate than songs by Schumann and Schubert? Evenings with the old masters! Weber and Weber! Schubert and Schubert! Schumann and Schumann!

Mme. Fremstad, who won her reputation as a contralto, has of late years grown uneasy. The laurels of sopranos would not let her sleep. Having tried flights in the higher vocal aether, she now announces herself as a dramatic soprano.

She chose for an aria the one from "Der Freischuetz." The allegro of this aria is inherently unvocal. It is clumsily written for the voice, and certain passages are of a purely instrumental character. The music taxes any true soprano. Last night there was the constant suggestion during the performance of a singer laboring to achieve something which was beyond her natural limitations. And so in the "Mondnacht" of Schumann and in the "Erlking," there was laborious expression. The pity of it, and the more the pity because this ineffective exhibition was all unnecessary. Mme. Fremstad was gifted by nature with a voice of surpassing beauty. Her ambition ahs led her to disdain this natural beauty in the desire to achieve an impossible triumph. As a result she has lost in a measure the rich and imposing quality of the lower tones, and the upper tones are not musical or of any true dramatic force. As her voice now is it seems prematurely worn and uneven. This much may be said in praise of her performance: that she respected the limitations of the concert stage, and was not extravagantly dramatic. While her delivery of the "Erl King"—a song, by the way, that was sung for many years only by men—was not by any means masterly, it was never, as is now too often the case, a mere exhibition of ventriloquism.

Dr. Muck was not wholly in the vein. The first movement of the overture was taken so slowly that the horn song suffered from lack of continuity, nor was the rest of the overture demoniacally sinister and irresistibly triumphant. Schubert's symphony has been better played here. The reading was over elaborate, mannered and at times sentiment fell into sentimentalism. Dr. Muck was more fortunate with Schumann's symphony, for the first movement was played with much spirit. All in all an uninteresting concert.

Orchestra Gives Numbers Well Worn by Repetition.

The Boston Journal
NOVEMBER 5, 1906.

GERMAN CLASSICS AT THE SYMPHONY

"Der Freischutz" Saturday and "Oberon" Announced for Next Performance.

The fourth Symphony concert was evidently devised by Dr. Muck as an educator. Boston was to be given a good, wholesome dose of the German classicists, something pleasant to take, and at the same time eminently helpful to the musical system. So he began with the overture to "Freischutz." No symphony-goer need be told how ancient, how hackneyed, how almost completely uninspiring this work is. Unless it is read with consummate poetic art—as Weingartner read it here last season—it is nowadays perilously close to being a bore. Dr. Muck and his men failed to breathe into it any extraordinary vitality or beauty and it left its hearers indifferent. The program book announces another Weber warhorse, the "Oberon" overture, for the next concert. It should be accompanied by a lecture on the beauty and power of this suddenly rediscovered composer.

The two beautiful fragments of Schubert's B minor symphony are always full of pathetic charm, no matter under what conductor, if he be adequate at all. In this case the movements were more roughly played and less coherently outlined than we have been used to hearing them. They made their way by their own great charm, but they have been given with more nobility at these concerts. The Schumann "Spring" symphony, with its irrepressible spirit and fascinating romanticism, went much better. The conductor evidently felt the meaning of the music to the full, and his interpretation of it, while not invariably bringing out the crystalline purity of the music, was full of fire and joyous abandon. The third movement, especially, with its complexity of rythm and phrase, was particularly well done.

Mme. Olive Fremstad was the soloist, and her choice of songs seemed modeled on Dr. Muck's choice of orchestral pieces. She first gave the familiar Weber aria from "Freischutz," a thing that now arouses no emotion in the hearer save that of ennui, unless some singer of consummate ability presents it. Mme. Fremstad, excellent and impressive as she is in grand opera, has not now the voice nor the style for concert singing, and she lent no distinction to the work. She was at her best in the Schubert song, "Ich grolle nicht," later.

Phila. Inquirer,
November 6, 1906.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Its First Concert for the Season at the Academy Last Night

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its twenty-second local season at the Academy of Music last evening, when it gave its first concert in this city under the direction of its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. There was a fair sized audience present, which extended the newcomer a polite welcome, and which followed the performance with a respectful and seemingly interested attention, but it cannot be said that the proceedings were marked by anything at all suggestive of enthusiasm, whether on the stage or in the audience. Dr. Muck had boldly challenged all kinds of comparisons by selecting Beethoven's C-minor symphony as the leading feature of his program, but the sequel left some doubt as to the prudence as well as the boldness of the challenge.

His interpretation of that well-known work was thoroughly competent, capable and business-like. It was sane, sound and safe, bringing out all the details of the score with appreciative intelligence and admirable lucidity, showing a fine sense of tone colors and dynamic proportion, and carefully refraining from any kind of exaggeration or eccentricity. Dr. Muck not only did not at all obtrude his own personality; he appeared to be sedulous to efface it and to exhibit nothing more and nothing less than the beauty and significance of the music. These are qualities to be commended and they entitle Dr. Muck to a hearty meed of praise. Yet there must have been many in the audience whom his carefully correct performance must have left unsatisfied and who could recall other performances, less polished and refined, perhaps, but preferable by reason of their greater eloquence, of their own impressive power, of their more poignant pathos.

Dr. Muck may have some emotion concealed about his person, but it is too carefully disguised to be easily detected, and the impression which he communicates is that of an impassibility on which sentiment has no hold. Yet there is no denying the fineness and finish of his work, and his rendering of the symphony, if less than convincing, was more than respectable. The other numbers on the program were Wagner's incoherent and inconsequential "Faust" overture, the same composer's "Siegfried Idyll," which, although it contains much that is exquisite, becomes tiresome through its interminable length and its multiplied repetitions, and the "Meistersinger" prelude, all of which were rendered with the utmost loveliness of tone and an absolute impeccability of execution.

TRANSCRIPT, NOVEMBER 6, 1906

Dr. Muck in Philadelphia

The Symphony Orchestra began its monthly visit to other cities in Philadelphia last evening when Dr. Muck conducted for the first time there. His programme was that in which he made his début here—Beethoven's fifth symphony, and, from Wagner, a "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers." Here are some of the comments of the Philadelphia newspapers this morning:

The Ledger—Dr. Muck is, of course, entirely master of the orchestra, and is not afraid to let it play out. There was little suppression, except in the very soft passages which were extremely suppressed. Otherwise the accent was nearly constant, and, while the symphony was played with the utmost precision and with a noble volume of sound, there was no marked suggestion of poetic insight and the emotional appeal was rather obscured by the prevailing vehemence. The general impression made by the conductor at this first hearing was not so much temperamental as authoritative, as befits the official dignity at Berlin. It is very likely that this impression may be altogether changed by better acquaintance when we have heard him in a wider range, but we are probably safe in concluding that he has also a Prussian respect for authority, and will not be a dangerous innovator. The personal impression was entirely pleasing and won the cordial recognition of the large audience.

The Press—The programme was essentially a Wagner programme, in which music the conductor and the orchestra were at home and thoroughly as one, yet the reading of the symphony was inevitably the touchstone of judgment. And Dr. Muck's inspired and poetic interpretation placed him among those who believe the colossus of the old school had a message which should be revealed and not distorted in the light of modern utterance. Hence the symphony was wrought in a noble manner as befits it. All was lucidly sung from first to last and the climax was superb.

The Record—All who are familiar with classical music know the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven almost by heart and most people have their own conceptions of how it should be played; nor are the "Faust" overture of Wagner, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," by the same composer, by any means strangers to music patrons. By making such a selection Dr. Muck directly challenged comparison with other conductors, and it must be admitted the result justified his intent. There can be no doubt that Dr Muck is a great conductor. The applause which greeted his appearance was perfunctory and the audience was a little apathetic during the first two movements of the symphony. As Beethoven's immortal work progressed, however, the orchestra warmed up and the audience grew more enthusiastic and less critical; and with good reason. Seldom if ever has a finer rendition of the last two movements of this symphony been heard in this city.

The North American—The programme included Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, rendered somewhat conventionally and with the academic precision of expert instrumentalists, and Wagner's "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the "Meistersinger" overture—the last a revelation in musical interpretation. This prelude to Wagner's only opera comique has never been played here with the grace, vitality, rhythmic fidelity and tonal sonority imparted to it by the Boston players under Dr. Muck's baton. The rendering of the "Meistersinger" music was all the more surprising in view of the conventionality of the previous numbers. Conductor Muck presented the Beethoven symphony reverentially and with classical conventionality; but his interpretations of the Wagner numbers evinced originality, independence and absolute command of the vast resources of a modern orchestra.

[51]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Weber. "Freischutz Overture."
Wagner. Prayer scene from "Der Freischutz."
Schubert. Unfinished Symphony.
Schumann. "Moonlight and "Ich grolle nicht."
Schubert. "Erl-king."
Schumann. Symphony in B flat.
Soloist, Mme. Olive Fremstadt.

It was at least a consistent programme, all good, all of the early romantic school, and nothing new or incendiary. Dr. Muck runs to symphonies. He has given Boston two at a single concert, and Cambridge heard three at a sitting. At this concert we had one and a half. It was not too much, for the Schumann symphony is short, both symphonies above-named are beautiful and they are well contrasted.

There was no such suprise and triumph, on this occasion, as when a week before, the great performance of the Brahms symphony took place. We have had the best possible performances and readings of the two symphonic works of this programme, and the present interpretation seemed rather careful and intelligent than inspired. The Weber overture was read somewhat after the Weingartner manner, all contrasts being made as sharp as possible, and the slow portions drawn out to an extreme length. The horn quartette was excessively slow, and scarcely gained by this. But the pizzicato effects on the contrabasses and the theatrical phrases which follow were powerful and the entire reading, if not the reviewer's ideal of the number, was striking and neither affected nor experimental; the conductor evidently knew exactly what he was aiming at, and had succeeded in imparting his views to his orchestra.

It was quite logical to follow the overture with an aria which contained one of its themes. But we may confess that we no longer become very enthusiastic about the mild-mannered Agatha and her target-shooting sweetheart. In the field of dramatic and theatrical power the world has passed beyond Weber, although his overtures, because of their conciseness, and because they combine good development with their melodious themes, will probably never be superseded.

Mme. Fremstadt was unequal in her execution; at times tepid and making the linked sweetness too long drawn out, and at times vehement rather than broad-toned. Her group of three songs did not seem to fit the orchestral surroundings, although Mr. Zach "did his possible" with the piano accompaniments. "Ich Grolle Nicht" is not a female song. Its bitter denunciation, its fury of triumph (a musical amplification of Tennyson line—"Perish in thy self-contempt!" are entirely masculine, and while Mme. Fremstadt evidently had an artistic ideal of the scope of the work, she could not attain it.

"The Erl-king," too, in spite of the greatness of Mme. Schroeder-Devrient in its measures, is not properly a female song. Here the artist deflected from pitch once or twice, and gave a remarkable "Parlando" effect to the statement that the child was dead—in the last measure.

If ever there was a musical picture of a calm, still moonlight night, it is in the "Mondnacht" of Schumann, and if ever there was a song that was unfitted to a Symphony concert in Symphony Hall, it is this one. Mme. Fremstadt sang it artistically, with full comprehension of its delicacy and subtleness, but, to use a commercial metaphor, this composition belongs to the retail, not to the wholesale, trade.

There are many orchestral works in the same predicament. We fancy that some of the Mozart and Haydn symphonies, some even of the Mendelssohn overtures, and certainly all of the Bach orchestral numbers, would gain greatly if they could be heard performed by a smaller orchestra in a much smaller hall. Such an organisation can yet be established in Boston, without trenching upon the field of our great Symphony Orchestra, and we hope that it may soon come into existence.

Everything seemed a trifle slow at this concert, and the unfinished Symphony formed no exception. Schubert charms by his melodic directness, and only gains by simplicity of interpretation. Here, if ever, it is impossible to gild refined gold or add a perfume to the violet.

The Schumann symphony was the finest part of the concert. It is a work that can never grow old; and familiarity only increases enthusiasm in this case. Its charm perhaps lies in the fact that it appeals both to emotion and intellect. Its melodies are beautiful, natural and unstrained, yet symphonic shape and symphonic development are there in full measure. The scoring is very simple, compared with the vivid hues of the present, but we would gladly exchange all the tone-colors of Strauss or Mahler for a little more of the tune-instinct of Schumann or Schubert.

Louis C. Elson.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

GLOBA

n

ress

...LA YORK COMMERCIAL

NOV 6-

DR. KARL MUCK of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was well known as a pianist before he became famous as a conductor, and shortly after he arrived in Boston Prof. Willy Hess, concertmeister of the orchestra and leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, asked him to play the piano in one of the modern works which the quartet is to give in Boston this season. Dr. Muck looked doubtful and asked to see the score. He read it over and then said: "Yes; I will if you put it into your last concert. These young fellows that are writing music ask so much of the poor pianist. Only virtuosos will suit them, and, ach Gott! my fingers are getting stiff. I'll have to take a course of scales before the concert and you must give me time."

SONGS AND SINGERS.

Again we are on the brink of a musical season. Indeed, this community already has taken a step into the musical ocean, preparing to make the final leap into its depths. The swim will be a long and fatiguing one, with two operatic tides to cross, many orchestral currents to battle with, and almost innumerable solo whirlpools to brave. Having so vast an expanse of sound to traverse, it is not surprising if we should hesitate on the edge, should shudder and draw back at the first contact with the chilling deep. Unquestionably a few will become exhausted before even the surface has been left behind. Others will turn back after struggling with a few breakers, and many, overcome by the musical elements, will cry for help midway on their journey. But most of us are facing the voyage bravely, with senses alert for the delights to come. Let us hope that the journey will be as invigorating and refreshing as the prospect leads one to believe and that no icebergs will retard the passage. Of one thing we may be sure: Whether the season of musical voyaging does or does not prove uniformly interesting, there will be several affairs of absorbing interest—ones that would compensate for a multitude of shortcomings.

This week may fairly be called the opening week of the musical year, though the New York Symphony Orchestra began its season in Carnegie Hall on last Saturday night and no less a man was introduced to the public than Camille Saint-Saens, veteran French composer. One of the most important affairs in every year of New York's musical life—the opening of the Boston Orchestra's season—marks the coming seven days as the time for this city's musical cohorts to assemble. Besides, the appearance of that Mephistophelian virtuoso of the keyboard, Moris Rosenthal, acts as a call to the thousands who are worshipers of the hero of the piano. There will be special interest in the pair of Boston Symphony concerts on account of the first appearance here of the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, who has won enthusiastic approval in Boston. Most of us have read much and heard much about Muck—a muckle of Muck—since the engagement of Gericke's successor was announced. From the opinions of others we have gained a distinct impression of the man and the musician. But our personal feeling as to his interpretations may be at variance with the prevailing feeling in Boston, Berlin and other musical centres, though our estimate of the man should not differ essentially from that formed elsewhere.

Dr. Muck has arranged programmes for his two appearances this week, which are not only excellent in themselves but well adapted for displaying his power and personality. By placing Beethoven's fifth symphony at the beginning of his first programme Dr. Muck steps boldly to the front, ready to accept the verdict of his listeners immediately, without trying to influence them in his favor by some introductory offering less formidable. There are few auditors at concerts of the Boston orchestra who are not thoroughly familiar with Beethoven's symphonies, and few who have not their own or somebody else's idea of the way in which those symphonies should be interpreted. That the C minor symphony is one of the most familiar of the nine need hardly be said. Dr. Muck, therefore, has elected to introduce himself in a work exacting in its demands and in which it will be hard to meet the requirements of a sophisticated audience. He does not shirk the crucial moment; he invites it. It is a point in his favor. Beethoven's symphony, by way of agreeable contrast, is followed by Wagner's ever welcome "Eine Faust Overture." This work, with its swirling outburst of cumulative passion, cannot fail to throw light on Muck's temperamental make-up. New Yorkers have heard it from many a conductor, from the calmest to the most fiery wielder of the baton, and from many an orchestra, good, bad, mediocre.

No less indicative of his traits as a leader than Beethoven's symphony and Wagner's overture should be Muck's performance of the "Siegfried Idyll," the third number on Thursday night's programme. This exquisite composition should give to the leader an opportunity to reveal some of the characteristics his admirers have praised in him as a conductor of "Parsifal." Certainly we shall be disappointed if he fails to give us a more poetically felt, pliant, reposeful interpretation of this little masterpiece than Weingartner gave last season at the head of the New York Symphony Orchestra. We await, too, with suspense, Muck's performance of the "Meistersinger" prelude, which will close the Boston orchestra's first programme. Will he take it at the slow-plodding, cut-and-dried tempo that Theodore Thomas adopted so many years ago; in the over-exuberant, propulsive fashion dear to Alfred Hertz and other latter-day composers; or shall we hear this incomparable work of genius once more as Anton Seidl used to let us hear it—not dragging in tempo, not hasty and nervous, but sedate, serious, grave, rhythmically incisive, and at the same time full of life, energy and romantic enthusiasm? We doubt whether Muck will follow Hertz's tactics. Judging from what we hear from Europe he is prone to take his tempi slow—sometimes more so than is satisfactory to his critics. We may hope, then, that he will follow in Seidl's footsteps rather than in those of Thomas.

In one respect at least Dr. Muck already has forged ahead of his predecessor, Gericke, so far as New Yorkers are concerned. He has chosen a good, solid programme for Saturday afternoon—one calculated to satisfy the judicious lover of music. It was Gericke's custom to arrange light, frothy musical concoctions for his matinees. For this he was criticised often, but the invariable answer was to the effect that nothing else would meet the approval of a matinee audience. The change which Muck seems to have begun in that respect may solve the question practically. Brahms's Symphony in C minor, No. 1, which will open the Saturday concert, will give still another fine chance to study the new leader. If, besides proving satisfactory as a Beethoven and Wagner leader, he wins laurels as a reader of Brahms in a city where that composer is honored and cultivated, his will be an unusual achievement. Weber's "Oberon" and "Freischuts" overtures will add further evidence pointing one way or another to that already collected, besides letting the audience enjoy two pieces of music the divine inspiration of which becomes more and more evident at every hearing. The name of Richard Strauss, Muck's fellow worker in the Berlin Opera House, also has been incorporated in this excellent afternoon programme. That extraordinary composer will have something to say through the medium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Dr. Muck, in his irresistible "Don Juan" tone-poem, which will be played (a good arrangement it seems) between the two Weber overtures.

In Berlin, where he appeared recently with the local Philharmonic Orchestra under Nikisch, Saint-Saens created much the same impression as he did here on Saturday night. His "Africa" fantaisie is characterised by Spanuth as a "veritable Sahara" in respect of invention; his fifth piano concerto as composed only of "elegant, though at times cleverly conceived phrases," and his overture to "The Barbarians" as "empty of meaning." Saint-Saens, this critic comments, "appears to be quite unconscious of the fact that he has long since outlived his usefulness as a composer." As a pianist, we are informed, he is still "very energetic and useful. There is no trace of senility in his performance. He has strength and temperament, only one never finds the soft, singing tone in Saint-Saens's playing."

MAX SMITH.

Philadelphia Ledger,

November 6, 1906.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Dr. Karl Muck, the New Conductor, Presents a Programme of Beethoven and Wagner.

Dr. Karl Muck, of the Berlin Opera, who is engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, made his first appearance here in that capacity at the Academy of Music last evening at the opening concert of the orchestra's twenty-second annual series. During the many years that this fine organization has been under the direction of Mr. Gericke, to whose intelligent and careful discipline it owes so much, both of its unexcelled richness and beauty of tone and its exactness of execution, there has been a constant desire to hear it play under a conductor of more elastic method and temperamental enthusiasm. How far Doctor Muck is likely to satisfy this desire one may perhaps hesitate to say after a single concert, although last night's programme was made up of music so entirely familiar that the individual contribution of the conductor should not be hard to appraise.

The C minor symphony, indeed, is one of the works that a conductor, whether conservative or radical, is very apt to select as an example of his own mode of treatment—one of those big works that admit of widely varied interpretation according to the intellectual or emotional conception of the interpreter. Doctor Muck, who is a slight, young man of attractive appearance, quiet in manner, but very alert, with a sharp, decisive beat, played the symphony with authority and emphasis, without any attempt to give to the music other significance than the written notes express. He is, of course, entirely master of the orchestra, and is not afraid to let it play out. There was little suppression, except in the very soft passages, which were extremely suppressed. Otherwise the accent was nearly constant, and, while the symphony was played with the utmost precision and with a noble volume of sound, there was no marked suggestion of poetic insight, and the emotional appeal was rather obscured by the prevailing vehemence.

Doctor Muck has the very highest reputation as an operatic conductor, and the clearness and sharpness of his orchestral work must be of great value in a Wagnerian performance, though the Wagner music he played last night was for the orchestra only—the "Faust Overture," the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Meistersinger," all recently familiar. The performance of the overture was also strongly accented, clean cut and forceful, rather than graceful or poetically interpretative. The general impression made by the conductor at this first hearing was not so much temperamental as authoritative, as befits the official dignity at Berlin. It is very likely that this impression may be altogether changed by better acquaintance when we have heard him in a wider range, but we are probably safe in concluding that he has also a Prussian respect for authority, and will not be a dangerous innovator. The personal impression was entirely pleasing, and won the cordial recognition of the large audience.

Phila. No. American,

November 6, 1906.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SCORES AT ACADEMY

First Concert Under New Director, Dr. Karl Muck, is Big Success.

WAGNER AND BEETHOVEN

ORCHESTRAL music of excellent quality was heard at the Academy of Music last evening—the first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new director, Dr. Karl Muck.

The programme included Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, rendered conventionally and with the somewhat academic precision of expert instrumentalists, and Wagner's "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried" idyl and the "Meistersinger" overture—the last a revelation in musical interpretation.

This prelude to Wagner's only opera comique has never been played here with the grace, vitality, rhythmic fidelity and tonal sonority imparted to it by the Boston players under Dr. Muck's baton.

The rendering of the "Meistersinger" music was all the more surprising in view of the conventionality of the previous numbers. Conductor Muck presented the Bethoven symphony reverentially, and with classical conventionality; but his interpretations of the Wagner numbers evinced originality, independence and absolute command of the vast resources of a modern orchestra.

There was lack of balance at times between strings and brass choirs—as in the third movement of the symphony—but for the most part the technical proficiency of the orchestral force was conspicuous. In the more familiar passages the conductor's baton was unused and unnecessary.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1906.

The Boston Orchestra.

New York gave a handsome greeting to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, at the first concert of its twenty-first New York season in Carnegie Hall last night. The vast room was crowded, pleasurable anticipation was on tiptoe, and the newcomer was made to feel that a warm place was established for him in the hearts of the thousands who have admired the organization over which he is to preside this season for a long and happy time. The list of pieces was the same that Dr. Muck had chosen to introduce himself in Boston a fortnight ago. Familiar music all of it—Beethoven's C minor symphony, Wagner's "Faust" overture, "Siegfried Idyl" and "Meistersinger" prelude. It is with such music that most of the foreign conductors who visit us choose to invite attention to their methods and ideals. If they come to proclaim new readings they can do it in these familiar strains; if they come to testify their adherence to time-hallowed tradition, they can do it also. Dr. Muck, it would seem from last night's exposition has no desire to play the iconoclast or instigate a revolution. He made no effort to make new disclosures or find strange philosophies in familiar texts. His band was brilliant, as of yore. It struck like a thunderbolt when called upon to do so, and its euphony fell delightfully into the ear. There were moments in the symphony when it seemed as if conservatism and convention were receiving a little more than their due, but, strangely enough, this was in the very movement that evoked the warmest enthusiasm from the hearers—the second. In the first there was something which might be set down as a new reading, or, at least, like a reading not hit upon by any of Dr. Muck's predecessors. Beethoven's indication and Wagner's plea for a stern and grim performance of the hold on the last note of the characteristic theme were respected, in a manner, but no sooner had the note been sounded than there was a breathless and precipitate continuation of the theme. Though sustained, the effect was not that of a fermata at all. It seemed to be measured off, played by rule of thumb, and therefore was unimpressive. A pause, no matter how slight, would have presented the figure in its naked, stark puissance, enforced its physiognomy, proclaimed its significance as the central thought of the whole magnificent work. The singular precipitancy, studiously compelled by Dr. Muck, robbed the movement of the lofty and essential quality of repose, which beautified all the rest of the music of the evening. The fact that the second movement seemed to give greater pleasure than the immeasurably finer and greater first indicated that the audience felt the deficiency. The "Faust" overture was played with superb warmth and poetry, and received a full measure of appreciation. There was in the concert the promise of a

[52]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
NOVEMBER 5, 1906

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Weber. "Freischuetz Overture."
Weber. Prayer scene from "Der Freischuetz."
Schubert. Unfinished Symphony.
Schumann. "Moonlight and "Ich grolle nicht."
Schubert. "Erl-king."
Schumann. Symphony in B flat.
Soloist, Mme. Olive Fremstadt.

It was at least a consistent programme, all good, all of the early romantic school, and nothing new or incendiary. Dr. Muck runs to symphonies. He has given Boston two at a single concert, and Cambridge heard three at a sitting. At this concert we had one and a half. It was not too much, for the Schumann symphony is short, both symphonies above-named are beautiful and they are well contrasted.

There was no such suprise and triumph, on this occasion, as when a week before, the great performance of the Brahms symphony took place. We have had the best possible performances and readings of the two symphonic works of this programme, and the present interpretation seemed rather careful and intelligent than inspired. The Weber overture was read somewhat after the Weingartner manner, all contrasts being made as sharp as possible, and the slow portions drawn out to an extreme length. The horn quartette was excessively slow, and scarcely gained by this. But the pizzicato effects on the contrabasses and the theatrical phrases which follow were powerful and the entire reading, if not the reviewer's ideal of the number, was striking and neither affected nor experimental; the conductor evidently knew exactly what he was aiming at, and had succeeded in imparting his views to his orchestra.

It was quite logical to follow the overture with an aria which contained one of its themes. But we may confess that we no longer become very enthusiastic about the mild-mannered Agatha and her target-shooting sweetheart. In the field of dramatic and theatrical power the world has passed beyond Weber, although his overtures, because of their conciseness, and because they combine good development with their melodious themes, will probably never be superseded.

Mme. Fremstadt was unequal in her execution; at times tepid and making the linked sweetness too long drawn out, and at times vehement rather than broad-toned. Her group of three songs did not seem to fit the orchestral surroundings, although Mr. Zach "did his possible" with the piano accompaniments. "Ich Grolle Nicht" is not a female song. Its bitter denunciation, its fury of triumph (a musical amplification of Tennyson line—"Perish in thy self-contempt!" are entirely masculine, and while Mme. Fremstadt evidently had an artistic ideal of the scope of the work, she could not attain it.

"The Erl-king," too, in spite of the greatness of Mme. Schroeder-Devrient in its measures, is not properly a female song. Here the artist deflected from pitch once or twice, and gave a remarkable "Parlando" effect to the statement that the child was dead—in the last measure.

If ever there was a musical picture of a calm, still moonlight night, it is in the "Mondnacht" of Schumann, and if ever there was a song that was unfitted to a Symphony concert in Symphony Hall, it is this one. Mme. Fremstadt sang it artistically, with full comprehension of its delicacy and subtleness, but, to use a commercial metaphor, this composition belongs to the retail, not to the wholesale, trade.

There are many orchestral works in the same predicament. We fancy that some of the Mozart and Haydn symphonies, some even of the Mendelssohn overtures, and certainly all of the Bach orchestral numbers, would gain greatly if they could be heard performed by a smaller orchestra in a much smaller hall. Such an organization can yet be established in Boston, without trenching upon the field of our great Symphony Orchestra, and we hope that it may soon come into existence.

Everything seemed a trifle slow at this concert, and the unfinished Symphony formed no exception. Schubert charms by his melodic directness, and only gains by simplicity of interpretation. Here, if ever, it is impossible to gild refined gold or add a perfume to the violet.

The Schumann symphony was the finest part of the concert. It is a work that can never grow old; and familiarity only increases enthusiasm in this case. Its charm perhaps lies in the fact that it appeals both to emotion and intellect. Its melodies are beautiful, natural and unstrained, yet symphonic shape and symphonic development are there in full measure. The scoring is very simple, compared with the vivid hues of the present, but we would gladly exchange all the tone-colors of Strauss or Mahler for a little more of the tune-instinct of Schumann or Schubert.

Louis C. Elson.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n

ress

e

NOV 6-

DR. KARL MUCK of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was well known as a pianist before he became famous as a conductor, and shortly after he arrived in Boston Prof. Willy Hess, concertmeister of the orchestra and leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, asked him to play the piano in one of the modern works which the quartet is to give in Boston this season. Dr. Muck looked doubtful and asked to see the score. He read it over and then said: "Yes; I will if you put it into your last concert. These young fellows that are writing music ask so much of the poor pianist. Only virtuosos will suit them, and, ach Gott! my fingers are getting stiff. I'll have to take a course of scales before the concert and you must give me time."

NEW YORK TIMES

SONGS AND SINGERS.

Again we are on the brink of a musical season. Indeed, this community already has taken a step into the [illegible]al ocean, preparing to make the final leap into its depths. The swim will be a long and fatiguing one, with two operatic tides to cross, many orchestral currents to battle with, and almost innumerable solo whirlpools to brave. Having so vast an expanse of sound to traverse, it is not surprising if we should hesitate on the edge, should shudder and draw back at the first contact with the chilling deep. Unquestionably a few will become exhausted before even the surface has been left behind. Others will turn back after struggling with a few breakers, and many, overcome by the musical elements, will cry for help midway on their journey. But most of us are facing the voyage bravely, with senses alert for the delights to come. Let us hope that the journey will be as invigorating and refreshing as the prospect leads one to believe and that no icebergs will retard the passage. Of one thing we may be sure: Whether the season of musical voyaging does or does not prove uniformly interesting, there will be several affairs of absorbing interest—ones that would compensate for a multitude of shortcomings.

This week may fairly be called the opening week of the musical year, though the New York Symphony Orchestra began its season in Carnegie Hall on last Saturday night and no less a man was introduced to the public than Camille Saint-Saens, veteran French composer. One of the most important affairs in every year of New York's musical life—the opening of the Boston Orchestra's season—marks the coming seven days as the time for this city's musical cohorts to assemble. Besides, the appearance of that Mephistophelian virtuoso of the keyboard, Moriz Rosenthal, acts as a call to the thousands who are worshipers of the hero of the piano. There will be special interest in the pair of Boston Symphony concerts on account of the first appearance here of the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, who has won enthusiastic approval in Boston. Most of us have read much and heard much about Muck—a muckle of Muck—since the engagement of Gericke's successor was announced. From the opinions of others we have gained a distinct impression of the man and the musician. But our personal feeling as to his interpretations may be at variance with the prevailing feeling in Boston, Berlin and other musical centres, though our estimate of the man should not differ essentially from that formed elsewhere.

Dr. Muck has arranged programmes for his two appearances this week, which are not only excellent in themselves but well adapted for displaying his power and personality. By placing Beethoven's fifth symphony at the beginning of his first programme Dr. Muck steps boldly to the front, ready to accept the verdict of his listeners immediately, without trying to influence them in his favor by some introductory offering less formidable. There are few auditors at concerts of the Boston orchestra who are not thoroughly familiar with Beethoven's symphonies, and few who have not their own or somebody else's idea of the way in which those symphonies should be interpreted. That the C minor symphony is one of the most familiar of the nine need hardly be said. Dr. Muck, therefore, has elected to introduce himself in a work exacting in its demands and in which it will be hard to meet the requirements of a sophisticated audience. He does not shirk the crucial moment; he invites it. It is a point in his favor. Beethoven's symphony, by way of agreeable contrast, is followed by Wagner's ever welcome "Eine Faust Overtuere." This work, with its swirling outburst of cumulative passion, cannot fail to throw light on Muck's temperamental make-up. New Yorkers have heard it from many a conductor, from the calmest to the most fiery wielder of the baton, and from many an orchestra, good, bad, mediocre.

No less indicative of his traits as a leader than Beethoven's symphony and Wagner's overture should be Muck's performance of the "Siegfried Idyll," the third number on Thursday night's programme. This exquisite composition should give to the leader an opportunity to reveal some of the characteristics his admirers have praised in him as a conductor of "Parsifal." Certainly we shall be disappointed if he fails to give us a more poetically felt, pliant, reposeful interpretation of this little masterpiece than Weingartner gave last season at the head of the New York Symphony Orchestra. We await, too, with suspense, Muck's performance of the "Meistersinger" prelude, which will close the Boston orchestra's first programme. Will he take it at the slow-plodding, cut-and-dried tempo that Theodore Thomas adopted so many years ago; in the over-exuberant, propulsive fashion dear to Alfred Hertz and other latter-day composers; or shall we hear this incomparable work of genius once more as Anton Seidl used to let us hear it—not dragging in tempo, not hasty and nervous, but sedate, serious, grave, rhythmically incisive, and at the same time full of life, energy and romantic enthusiasm? We doubt whether Muck will follow Hertz's tactics. Judging from what we hear from Europe he is prone to take his tempi slow—sometimes more so than is satisfactory to his critics. We may hope, then, that he will follow in Seidl's footsteps rather than in those of Thomas.

In one respect at least Dr. Muck already has forged ahead of his predecessor, Gericke, so far as New Yorkers are concerned. He has chosen a good, solid programme for Saturday afternoon—one calculated to satisfy the judicious lover of music. It was Gericke's custom to arrange light, frothy musical concoctions for his matinees. For this he was criticised often, but the invariable answer was to the effect that nothing else would meet the approval of a matinee audience. The change which Muck seems to have begun in that respect may solve the question practically. Brahms's Symphony in C minor, No. 1, which will open the Saturday concert, will give still another fine chance to study the new leader. If, besides proving satisfactory as a Beethoven and Wagner leader, he wins laurels as a reader of Brahms in a city where that composer is honored and cultivated, his will be an unusual achievement. Weber's "Oberon" and "Freischutz" overtures will add further evidence pointing one way or another to that already collected, besides letting the audience enjoy two pieces of music the divine inspiration of which becomes more and more evident at every hearing. The name of Richard Strauss, Muck's fellow worker in the Berlin Opera House, also has been incorporated in this excellent afternoon programme. That extraordinary composer will have something to say through the medium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Dr. Muck, in his irresistible "Don Juan" tone-poem, which will be played (a good arrangement it seems) between the two Weber overtures.

In Berlin, where he appeared recently with the local Philharmonic Orchestra under Nikisch, Saint-Saens created much the same impression as he did here on Saturday night. His "Africa" fantaisie is characterized by Spanuth as a "veritable Sahara" in respect of invention; his fifth piano concerto as composed only of "elegant, though at times cleverly conceived phrases," and his overture to "The Barbarians" as "empty of meaning." Saint-Saens, this critic comments, "appears to be quite unconscious of the fact that he has long since outlived his usefulness as a composer." As a pianist, we are informed, he is still "very energetic and useful. There is no trace of senility in his performance. He has strength and temperament, only one never finds the soft, singing tone in Saint-Saens's playing."

MAX SMITH.

Philadelphia Ledger,

November 6, 1906.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Dr. Karl Muck, the New Conductor, Presents a Programme of Beethoven and Wagner.

Dr. Karl Muck, of the Berlin Opera, who is engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, made his first appearance here in that capacity at the Academy of Music last evening at the opening concert of the orchestra's twenty-second annual series. During the many years that this fine organization has been under the direction of Mr. Gericke, to whose intelligent and careful discipline it owes so much, both of its unexcelled richness and beauty of tone and its exactness of execution, there has been a constant desire to hear it play under a conductor of more elastic method and temperamental enthusiasm. How far Doctor Muck is likely to satisfy this desire one may perhaps hesitate to say after a single concert, although last night's programme was made up of music so entirely familiar that the individual contribution of the conductor should not be hard to appraise.

The C minor symphony, indeed, is one of the works that a conductor, whether conservative or radical, is very apt to select as an example of his own mode of treatment—one of those big works that admit of widely varied interpretation according to the intellectual or emotional conception of the interpreter. Doctor Muck, who is a slight, young man of attractive appearance, quiet in manner, but very alert, with a sharp, decisive beat, played the symphony with authority and emphasis, without any attempt to give to the music other significance than the written notes express. He is, of course, entirely master of the orchestra, and is not afraid to let it play out. There was little suppression, except in the very soft passages, which were extremely suppressed. Otherwise the accent was nearly constant, and, while the symphony was played with the utmost precision and with a noble volume of sound, there was no marked suggestion of poetic insight, and the emotional appeal was rather obscured by the prevailing vehemence.

Doctor Muck has the very highest reputation as an operatic conductor, and the clearness and sharpness of his orchestral work must be of great value in a Wagnerian performance, though the Wagner music he played last night was for the orchestra only—the "Faust Overture," the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Meistersinger," all recently familiar. The performance of the overture was also strongly accented, clean cut and forceful, rather than graceful or poetically interpretative. The general impression made by the conductor at this first hearing was not so much temperamental as authoritative, as befits the official dignity at Berlin. It is very likely that this impression may be altogether changed by better acquaintance when we have heard him in a wider range, but we are probably safe in concluding that he has also a Prussian respect for authority, and will not be a dangerous innovator. The personal impression was entirely pleasing, and won the cordial recognition of the large audience.

Phila. No. American,

November 6, 1906.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SCORES AT ACADEMY

First Concert Under New Director, Dr. Karl Muck, is Big Success.

WAGNER AND BEETHOVEN

ORCHESTRAL music of excellent quality was heard at the Academy of Music last evening—the first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new director, Dr. Karl Muck.

The programme included Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, rendered somewhat conventionally and with the academic precision of expert instrumentalists, and Wagner's "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried" idyl and the "Meistersinger" overture—the last a revelation in musical interpretation.

This prelude to Wagner's only opera comique has never been played here with the grace, vitality, rhythmic fidelity and tonal sonority imparted to it by the Boston players under Dr. Muck's baton.

The rendering of the "Meistersinger" music was all the more surprising in view of the conventionality of the previous numbers. Conductor Muck presented the Bethoven symphony reverentially, and with classical conventionality; but his interpretations of the Wagner numbers evinced originality, independence and absolute command of the vast resources of a modern orchestra.

There was lack of balance at times between strings and brass choirs—as in the third movement of the symphony—but for the most part the technical proficiency of the orchestral force was conspicuous. In the more familiar passages the conductor's baton was unused and unnecessary.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1906.

The Boston Orchestra.

New York gave a handsome greeting to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, at the first concert of its twenty-first New York season in Carnegie Hall last night. The vast room was crowded, pleasurable anticipation was on tiptoe, and the newcomer was made to feel that a warm place was established for him in the hearts of the thousands who have admired the organization over which he is to preside this season for a long and happy time. The list of pieces was the same that Dr. Muck had chosen to introduce himself in Boston a fortnight ago. Familiar music all of it—Beethoven's C minor symphony, Wagner's "Faust" overture, "Siegfried Idyl" and "Meistersinger" prelude. It is with such music that most of the foreign conductors who visit us choose to invite attention to their methods and ideals. If they come to proclaim new readings they can do it in these familiar strains; if they come to testify their adherence to time-hallowed tradition, they can do it also. Dr. Muck, it would seem from last night's exposition has no desire to play the iconoclast or instigate a revolution. He made no effort to make new disclosures or find strange philosophies in familiar texts. His band was brilliant, as of yore. It struck like a thunderbolt when called upon to do so, and its euphony fell delightfully into the ear. There were moments in the symphony when it seemed as if conservatism and convention were receiving a little more than their due, but, strangely enough, this was in the very movement that evoked the warmest enthusiasm from the hearers—the second. In the first there was something which might be set down as a new reading, or, at least, like a reading not hit upon by any of Dr. Muck's predecessors. Beethoven's indication and Wagner's plea for a stern and grim performance of the hold on the last note of the characteristic theme were respected, in a manner, but no sooner had the note been sounded than there was a breathless and precipitate continuation of the theme. Though sustained, the effect was not that of a fermata at all. It seemed to be measured off, played by rule of thumb, and therefore was unimpressive. A pause, no matter how slight, would have presented the figure in its naked, stark puissance, enforced its physiognomy, proclaimed its significance as the central thought of the whole magnificent work. The singular precipitancy, studiously compelled by Dr. Muck, robbed the movement of the lofty and essential quality of repose, which beautified all the rest of the music of the evening. The fact that the second movement seemed to give greater pleasure than the immeasurably finer and greater first indicated that the audience felt the deficiency. The "Faust" overture was played with superb warmth and poetry, and received a full measure of appreciation. There was in the concert the promise of a gracious season.

[52]

Philadelphia Press,
November 6, 1906.

DR. MUCK'S DEBUT

The Boston Orchestra Heard at the Academy Under the New Director.

Beethoven .....Symphony in C Minor, No. 5
Wagner .....Eine Faust Overture
Wagner .....Siegfried Idyll
Wagner .....
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"
Conductor, Dr. Carl Muck.

A wonder-child, violinist, composer, pianist and what not at 11, a conductor at 21, at 33 director of the Royal Opera House at Berlin, a Wagner specialist with the Bayreuth hallmark, and at the same time a well-rounded musician who knows all phases of his art, aged 47, but not looking 37, or, for that matter, even 27, Dr. Carl Muck appeared for the first time before a Philadelphia audience last evening at the Academy of Music as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Whether, as the phrase goes, the appearance is "significant of much" depends on the viewpoint. The orchestra, as ever a virtuoso organization, is a familiar possession and survives many conductorships; but, naturally, the appearance of a leader of such unquestioned gifts as Muck, with such personal magnetism, marks a new era for the orchestra. The old lovely quality of tone was there in all its opulence last evening, but there seemed an accentuation of the dynamic range of the stresses, both in the choirs and in the orchestra as a whole, without unnecessary extravagances of interpretation, but which resulted in the symphony in a triumphant climax for all concerned; nothing finer than the reading having been heard here in years!

Of course the style and character of the interpretation was not visibly embodied by any violent acts of Dr. Muck on the stand, for he belongs, in a large measure, to the school of Thomas. He believes that it is at the rehearsals the leader should impress his ideas on the orchestra even to the hair-raising pitch, leaving for the concert the very decided if not continuous hint, the friendly fillip to the imagination through lift or wave of hand or impressive beat of baton. There is moreover in Dr. Muck's magnetic way at times a certain metronomic primness and precision that almost conceals the fire within and the inspiration which gets at the intent and content of the composer.

The program was essentially a Wagner program, in which music the conductor and orchestra were at home and thoroughly as one, yet the reading of the symphony was inevitably the touchstone of judgment. And Dr. Muck's inspired and poetic interpretation placed him among those who believe the colossus of the old school had a message which should be revealed and not distorted in the light of modern utterance. Hence the symphony was wrought in a noble manner as befits it. Fate neither thumped too heavily on the door with mailed hand nor hysterically threatened in more frenetic manner. All was lucidly sung from first to last and the climax was superb. The orchestra is very evidently in safe hands and 'tis a pity Dr. Muck has only a year's leave of absence. Such work as that at the close of the andante of the symphony was uplifting. Dapper, elegant, scholarly, all through the evening the effect of the new master hand was notable and the recognition by the audience was immediate and most enthusiastic, repeated applause giving his recall the suggestion of a night with a prima donna soloist.

The Sun.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1906.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Its First Concert Introduces a New Work by Suk.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave the first concert of its present season in Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon. The programme consisted of Josef Suk's B flat major quartet, opus 11, Schubert's quartet movement in C minor, and César Franck's piano quintet in F minor The assisting pianist was Heinrich Gebhard of Boston. The concert, regarded in its entirety, was not an entertainment to be remembered with unmixed delight, though it was filled with manifestations of artistic intention and careful preparation.

Josef Suk is the leader of the famous Bohemian Quartet, which wisely enjoys its European reputation and does not come to America. He has one excellent quality, namely, that he does not try to write like Brahms. This is one of the things that altogether too many composers attempt in these days. Suk prefers to try to compose after the manner of his admired master, Antonin Dvorak, and this also is not easy to do.

The quartet heard yesterday is rich in suggestions of Bohemian nationality but poor in almost everything else that goes to make chamber music of lasting value. Its best movement is the second, an intermezzo, that later substitute for the classic scherzo. This is written judiciously for the four instruments and is cheerful and ingratiating in style. The other three movements are laboriously constructed and in spite of some tuneful thematic matter are, in plain language, dull.

The playing of Prof. Willy Hess and his three associates has not altered in any material trait. It is still vigorous, warmly colored and ambitious, but it still shows the same tendency to wander from the pitch. Prof. Hess is the leader of the quartet in this as well as in other respects.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1906.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

FIRST APPEARANCE HERE OF DR. CARL MUCK.

New Conductor Makes Favorable Impression—Unobtrusive but Commanding, He Interprets Without Sensationalism—Beethoven and Wagner on Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its twenty-first season in this city at Carnegie Hall last night. The concert introduced to this public the new conductor of the orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck, who came lately from the Vienna Philharmonic. Dr. Muck is especially noted for his conducting at Bayreuth, where he was for several seasons the principal assistant of Frau Cosima Wagner in the festival productions of her famous husband's creations. There was, therefore, some natural curiosity among the knowing to hear the new conductor's interpretetions of the Wagner numbers on the programme, for it was in the impassioned music of the ultra modern school that Wilhelm Gericke, late conductor in Boston, often fell short of public expectation.

Dr. Muck, however, was prepared also to meet the inevitable inquiry as to his attitude toward the classics. His programme began with Beethoven's fifth symphony, after which came three Wagner numbers, "Eine Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The new conductor met the demands of the evening with composure. His appearance is that of a polished man of thought, a scholar and a gentleman. His manner of conducting is unobtrusive, but firm and assured. He does nothing to furnish the public eye with pictures. His business is with the orchestra and the music. He is anything but a poseur. This is comforting. His predecessor was also retiring, and a fear that there might be a disagreeable change in this matter was removed last night.

These facts are recorded in dereference to the readiness of many music lovers too formulate their verdicts on conductors by what they see quite as much as by what they hear. Those who rely too largely on sight will get an impression that Dr. Muck is not what is somewhat indefinitely described as a temperamental conductor. But we often have somewhat too much of the temperament which exploits itself in wild wavings of the arms and contortions of the body. Let us be thankful that we have a new conductor who does not divert consideration from the music to himself.

In so far as the impressions of a first concert may be trusted we are likely to find that Dr. Muck will not in the deeper qualities of conducting lead us away from the composition to the sensational interpretation. While there were certain personal idiosyncrasies in the reading of Beethoven's fifth symphony, there was nothing disturbing. Everything was sane and well regulated. Everything showed reverence for the master and a sincere desire to present his noble work chastely and honestly. It was a straightforward, vigorous, yet polished performance that Dr. Muck conducted. There was much care in the elaboration of the adante and plenty of boldness in the attack of the finale. We have all heard more tragedy in the first movement and more mystery in the scherzo, but the unfailing beauty of style and the exquisite balance, transparency and richness of tone of the Boston organization were in full evidence.

For those who hungered for temperamental interpretation there was satisfying food in the reading of the "Faust "overture. It was superbly conceived and its poignant emotions were voiced in telling tones. The orchestra played up to the conductor magnificently. The "Siegfried Idyl" was somewhat deficient in contrast and the climax seemed unusually tame, but the finesse of the performance was admirable. The "Meistersinger" prelude was of course well played, but New York music lovers have often heard it given in more stirring fashion.

On the whole, however, Dr. Muck made an excellent impression. That he is a conductor of the first rank has long been conceded in Germany and it will not be questioned here after his interpretations of last night. His second concert, which is set down for to-morrow afternoon, will be awaited with interest. As for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is the same splendid body as of old and the glories of its tone do not seem likely to be dimmed under the new baton.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
NOVEMBER 10, 1906

The fifth Symphony programme, which will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will bring a symphony which is not familiar to the patrons of the Symphony concerts, having been played here but once, in January, 1899. It is Sinding's in D minor, No. 1. The solo artist will be Mme. Antoinette S[illegible] favorite pianist in Bost[illegible]

The first of the three concerts which the Longy Club will give this season will take place in Potter Hall Wednesday at 8:15 p.m. As ever, Mr. Longy has discovered a number of interesting novelties, and has resurrected a number of older works, which, so far as the present day audiences are concerned, are as new as those which have been written within the last few years. The programme for this first concert is particularly interesting, and is of unusual variety.

The World
Published every day in the year by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 Park Row, New York.
FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1906.

DR. MUCK KINDLES GREAT ENTHUSIASM.

New Conductor of Boston Symphony Produces Exquisite Effects with Brass and String.

Dr. Karl Muck, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new conductor, appeared for the first time in New York last night at the opening concert of this orchestra's twenty-first season. Carnegie Hall was crowded, and there was more enthusiasm than has attended any Boston Symphony concert in recent years.

Dr. Muck, who comes from the Berlin Royal Opera-House, was a great conductor long before Boston and New York made the discovery. He is slight and tall, with black hair, a pronounced chain and is free from affectations. He is very undemonstrative with his baton, indulging in as few movements as possible, but is graceful and commanding

There can be no doubt about his temperament, for that was clearly proven in th eprelude to Wagner's "The Mastersingers," there is no lack of poetic feeling—that fact was shown in the "Siegfried Idyl;" and h has reverence for the clasics without indulging in dry-as-dus treadings—and that was made clear in his interpretation of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

He did nothing sensational, l save in the "Mastersingers" prelude when he allowed the orchestra to play while he refrained from beating time for a brief space. This is a common trick abroad, and it is usually regarded as a pretty compliment to the virtuosity of the orchestra players.

How that band from Boston did play last night! Dr. Muck unleashed the brass choir so that it was a joy to the ear. And the strings—probably the most wonderful set of orchestral string instruments in the world—were agai exquisite.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the opening number of the programme, was impressively read. Dr. Muck departed from the conventional in several of his tempi, and he emphasized some details with stunning effect. The fact that there was no soloist did not in the leas create the feeling of a vacancy in the programme.

THE WORLD
NOVEMBER 10, 1906.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET HEARD AGAIN.

Players Show Marked Improvement Over Last Season—Programme Contains Novelty.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave the first of this season's string concerts yesterday afternoon at Mendelssohn Hall. The quartet is composed of Prof. Willy Hess, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Emile Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, 'cello.

This ensemble is the same as it was last year, but the work of the quartet yesterday showed a marked improvement in the playing. There was not so much impetuousness or corresponding roughness, and at times the playing was delightful.

The programme contained a novelty—a quartet by Joseph Suk—which was played here for the first time. It proved to be an interesting work with charmingg second and third movements. It is full of emotional moments, and its final movement is full of dash and swing.

The next number was a posthumous quartet movement by Schubert, which showed the work of the quartet to the best advantage. The programme concluded with Cesar Frank's quintet, the piano part of which was played by Heinrich Gebhard.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, FRIDAY, NOV. 9, 1906.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S NEW CONDUCTOR

Dr. Karl Muck Makes His First Appearance in New York.

NO SOLOISTS ON PROGRAMME

A Strong and Impressive Reading of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Selections by Wagner.

An important part of the activities of the New York musical season began last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra has gained friends and adherents even over last year, and the hall held nearly as many people as it can accommodate. Last evening's performance was of special moment to all its friends in New York, because it brought about the first appearance here of Dr. Karl Muck, and it made the first disclosure as to what manner of man and musician it is who is to guide the work of the organization the coming season.

Dr. Muck was hospitably greeted and accepted the greeting with dignity and reserve. He is tall and spare, almost ascetic in the lines of his strong face, and looks more the doctor of philosophy he is than the musician. The least of his concerns is, to all appearances, the audience behind him, and there is little or nothing in his conducting that is calculated for effect in this direction. His manner toward the orchestra is straightforward and explicit; his beat is rarely graceful; it is sometimes angular. It certainly has none of the eloquence and suggestiveness that some suppose to reside in the conductor's stick. Whatever effect Dr. Muck's conducting has upon the audience comes through the ear and not through the eye. He is clearly a man of authority and intellectual force, and he has that classical merit in a conductor of knowing what he wants and getting it. He is an analyst and a thinker about his art. He had taken strongly about every measure that he played last evening, and what he had thought was realized in the performance. Whether he is also a man of warm and convincing temperament who can rise on occasion to glowing powers of eloquence as an interpreter was not so clearly established last evening. Yet there was not lacking that which stirred the audience to enthusiasm.

The programme was that which he gave at his first performance in Boston in October, unrelieved or uninterpreted by the offices of a solo performer, comprising Beethoven's fifth symphony, and, by Wagner, "A Faust Overture," the Sigfried Idyl, and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." It was a performance in respect of finish, of elaboration of detail, of the general adjustment of the lesser proportions to the whole, that at every point compelled admiration. It may also be said that it was more finely and definitely finished than it was a few weeks ago in Boston, whence it may be inferred that Dr. Muck is not satisfied with first results, and that he is imbued with something of that "passion for perfection" that is a tradition with the Boston Orchestra.

There can only be praise for his readings of the several numbers of his programme. The performance of the symphony was an admirable one, full of the spirit and robustness of the music, elastic in tempo, minutely shaded in nuance, with all its climaxes and contrasts skillfully prepared. It was not a "Wagnerized" version, even in the treatment of the "motto" or detached theme with which the symphony opens; nor does Dr. Muck seek for inner voices in the orchestration to be exploited at the expense of the symmetry of the whole. He is not afraid to let the more powerful instruments of the orchestra be heard powerfully when occasion requires; yet he has a sense, if not the highest sense, of balance of orchestral tone and beauty of orchestral color. He did nothing startling in the symphony, for there is nothing startling to be done by him who is only for eliciting its beauty and who holds to the text and its plain mandates. But it seemed, at last, with all the skill expended upon it, that it was not a performance that imparted everything the symphony has to say.

Dr. Muck gave a superbly dramatic reading of the "Faust" overture, capturing its spirit of gloomy passion entirely and filling it with an infinity of strongly wrought details, which were never allowed to stop the coursing of the dramatic blood. It may be imagined that his leanings are to the dramatic. He put a deal of patience into the "Siegfried Idyl," whose charms, undeniable and delectable though they are, are mercilessly long. And in the "Meistersinger" prelude he was again more in his element. He takes the tempo faster than most, with a loss of perhaps something of the most characteristic spirit of the work, though there is a splendidly propulsive energy gained by doing as he does. He has no superabundance of lingering verbatos in this piece, and he brings out with the utmost clearness the contrapuntal complications in the middle of it that are sometimes mud rather than a pelluoid stream of many-voiced melody. There was much enthusiasm aroused by this performance, and there was apparently a feeling that Mr. Higginson had intrusted his men to safe hands.

[53]

Transcript
324 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.
FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1906

MUSIC AND DRAMA

DR. MUCK MAKES HIS FIRST APPEARANCE IN NEW YORK

A Crowded Hall and an Enthusiastic Audience—What the Reviewers Say—Hearty Praise for the Conductor in Wagner's Music and Varying Views of His Reading of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony—Familiar Qualities and a New Vitality in the Orchestra

Dr. Muck conducted for the first time, last evening, in New York—the test that he has most dreaded and by which he has set most store since he made his first appearance here. Carnegie Hall was filled almost to the last seat, and the audience that the Symphony Orchestra attracts in New York is of exceptional musical intelligence and discrimination. It received Dr. Muck warmly, and its applause continued general and hearty. Again the conductor repeated the programme of his first concert here—Beethoven's fifth symphony and, from Wagner, the "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Again, too, his men did their utmost for him. This morning the principal reviewers have favorable impressions to record. The Sun, for example, says:

"In so far as the impressions of a first concert may be trusted we are likely to find that Dr. Muck will not in the deeper qualities of conducting lead us away from the composition to the sensational interpretation. While there were certain personal idiosyncrasies in the reading of Beethoven's fifth symphony, there was nothing disturbing. Everything was sane and well regulated. Everything showed reverence for the master and a sincere desire to present his noble work chastely and honestly. It was a straightforward, vigorous, yet polished performance that Dr. Muck conducted. There was much care in the elaboration of the andante and plenty of boldness in the attack of the finale. We have all heard more tragedy in the first movement and more mystery in the scherzo, but the unfailing beauty of style and the exquisite balance, transparency and richness of tone of the Boston organization were in full evidence. For those who hungered for temperamental interpretation there was satisfying food in the reading of the 'Faust' overture. It was superbly conceived and its poignant emotions were voiced in telling tones. The orchestra played up to the conductor magnificently. The 'Siegfried Idyl' was somwhat deficient in contrast and the climax seemed unusually tame, but the finesse of the performance was admirable. The 'Meistersinger' prelude was of course well played, but New York music lovers have often heard it given in more stirring fashion. On the whole, however, Dr. Muck made an excellent impression. That he is a conductor of the first rank has long been conceded in Germany, and it will not be questioned here after his interpretations of last night. As for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is the same splendid body as of old, and the glories of its tone do not seem likely to be dimmed under the new baton."

The Times—Dr. Muck is clearly a man of authority and intellectual force, and he has that classical merit in a conductor of knowing what he wants and getting it. He is an analyst and a thinker about his art. He had taken thought strongly about every measure that he played last evening, and what he had thought was realized in the performance. Whether he is also a man of warm and convincing temperament who can rise on occasion to glowing powers of eloquence as an interpreter was not so clearly established last evening. Yet there was not lacking that which stirred the audience to enthusiasm. His was a performance in respect of finish, of elaboration of detail, of the general adjustment of the lesser proportions to the whole that at every point compelled admiration. It may also be said that it was more finely and definitely finished than it was a few weeks ago in Boston, whence it may be inferred that Dr. Muck is not satisfied with first results, and that he is imbued with something of that "passion for perfection" that is a tradition with the Boston Orchestra.

There can only be praise for his readings of the several numbers of his programme. The performance of the symphony was an admirable one, full of the spirit and robustness of the music, elastic in tempo, minutely shaded in nuance, with all its climaxes and contrasts skilfully prepared. It was not a "Wagnerized" version, even in the treatment of the "motto" or detached theme with which the symphony opens; nor does Dr. Muck seek for inner voices in the orchestration to be exploited at the expense of the symmetry of the whole. He is not afraid to let the more powerful instruments of the orchestra be heard powerfully when occasion requires; yet he has a sense, if not the highest sense, of balance of orchestral tone and beauty of orchestral color. He did nothing startling in the symphony, for there is nothing startling to be done by him who is only for eliciting its beauty and who holds to the text and its plain mandates. But it seemed, at last, with all the skill expended upon it, that it was not a performance that imparted everything the symphony has to say.

Dr. Muck gave a superbly dramatic reading of the "Faust" overture, capturing its spirit of gloomy passion entirely and filling it with an infinity of strongly wrought details, which were never allowed to stop the coursing of the dramatic blood. It may be imagined that his leanings are to the dramatic. He put a deal of patience into the "Siegfried Idyl," whose charms, undeniable and delectable though they are, are mercilessly long. And in the "Meistersinger" prelude he was again more in his element. He takes the tempo faster than most, with a lee[illegible] characteristic [illegible] of [illegible] there is a splendidly propulsive energy gained by doing as he does. He has no superabundance of lingering rubatos in this piece, and he brings out with the utmost clearness the contrapuntal complications in the middle of it that are sometimes mud rather than a pellucid stream of many-voiced melody. There was much enthusiasm aroused by this performance, and there was apparently a feeling that Mr. Higginson had intrusted his men to safe hands.

The Herald, which fondly fancies that Dr. Muck comes from Dresden, has its reserves: It would have been hard to select a programme, it says, better calculated to disclose the new conductor's personality, aims and methods. In some respects he disappointed expectations by his treatment of it; in others he satisfied them. That the orchestra would be governed by other ideals than those of Mr. Gericke was made plain in the Beethoven symphony. Dr. Muck aimed at a bigger tone and a more dashing manner than Mr. Gericke ever allowed his men. He got it, but at the price of some lost refinement and elegance of technique. There are many Boston orchestra patrons who were forever complaining that they never really heard the brass. These will now be in clover, for the brass instruments are unleashed by Dr. Muck. There are others who set store by the wonderful polish of detail which has recently marked the orchestra's playing. These were the disappointed ones last night, for much of it was lacking. One even suspected the woodwind choir of being out of tune. On the other hand, Dr. Muck showed himself a Wagner conductor of great imagination. He made the scores of the "Idyl" and the "Faust" overture pulsate with life and interest, even when they departed from tradition.

In the Tribune, Mr. Krehbiel is decidedly short-breathed. A "hold" in the first movement of the symphony absorbs him nearly to the exclusion of all else: Dr. Muck, it would seem from last night's exposition, he writes, has no desire to play the iconoclast, or instigate a revolution. He made no effort to make new disclosures or find strange philosophies in familiar texts. His band was brilliant, as of yore. It struck like a thunderbolt when called upon to do so, and its euphony fell delightfully into the ear. There were moments in the symphony when it seemed as if conservatism and convention were receiving a little more than their due, but, strangely enough, this was in the very movement that evoked the warmest enthusiasm from the hearers—the second. In the first there was something which might be set down as a new reading, or, at least, like a reading not hit upon by any of Dr. Muck's predecessors. Beethoven's indication and Wagner's plea for a stern and grim performance of the hold on the last note of the characteristic theme were respected, in a manner, but no sooner had the note been sounded than there was a breathless and precipitate continuation of the theme. Though sustained, the effect was not that of a fermata at all. It seemed to be measured off, played by rule of thumb, and therefore was unimpressive. A pause, no matter how slight, would have presented the figure in its naked, stark puissance, enforced its physiognomy, proclaimed its significance as the central thought of the whole magnificent work. The singular precipitancy, studiously compelled by Dr. Muck, robbed the movement of the lofty and essential quality of repose, which beautified all the rest of the music of the evening. The fact that the second movement seemed to give greater pleasure than the immeasurably finer and greater first indicated that the audience felt the deficiency. The "Faust" overture was played with superb warmth and poetry, and received a full measure of appreciation. There was in the concert the promise of a gracious season.

The World continues: There can be no doubt about Dr. Muck's temperament, for that was clearly proven in the prelude to Wagner's "The Mastersingers," there is no lack of poetic feeling—that fact was shown in the "Siegfried Idyl"; and he has reverence for the classics without indulging in dry-as-dust readings—that was made clear in his interpretation of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. He did nothing sensational, save in the "Mastersingers" prelude when he allowed the orchestra to play while he refrained from beating time for a brief space. This is a common trick abroad, and it is usually regarded as a pretty compliment to the virtuosity of the orchestra players. How that band from Boston did play last night! Dr. Muck unleashed the brass choir so that it was a joy to the ear. And the strings—probably the most wonderful set of orchestral string instruments in the world—were again exquisite. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the opening number of the programme, was impressively read. Dr. Muck departed from the conventional in several of his tempi, and he emphasized some details with stunning effect.

The Globe says: It was soon evident that another and a contrasting temperament was ruling the virtuoso orchestra. Here was a man that took an almost epicurean delight in the different choirs and their several voices. He won from the strings a tone that dropped honey; to the woodwind, he allowed in solo passages the freedom of movement and style, that go by inalienable right to the greatest artists in the world of song; and as for the brass, he gloried in its strength and brilliance, as his predecessor did, and its mellowness and depth. Never probably had the orchestra included color and shading in such variety, from a pianissimo fairly saturated in sweetness to a fortissimo overwhelming in its penetrating sonority. Striking as these changes were they were not without their drawbacks. In this same fortissimo, one missed the perfectly blended richness of Mr. Gericke's fortissimo; one had more than a glimpse of the "Grain" so to say, running through its sheeny strength of texture.

In Dr. Muck's conducting, one felt first all the enormous energy that expressed itself as a rule in a short, sharp, angular beat, for Dr. Muck is almost as sparing [illegible] of [illegible] Weingartner. His other dominant traits are a keen analytical grasp of the elements in the music before him and a vivid sense of effectiveness. One misses in him, to some extent, the unity of conception, as well as the somewhat ascetic dignity that gave singular coherency and strength to a performance directed by Mr. Gericke. Nor did Dr. Muck reveal that subtle insistent vitality that Mr. Weingartner injects into a reading by its seeming inevitableness causing phrase to rise from phrase and period to emerge into period as if determined by the impulse of life itself.

Again and again, Dr. Muck seemed essentially a conductor of opera. He made his points with an evident feeling for dramatic effectiveness, with much the same care and emphasis with which an actor of solid training makes his. At times, this very sense of effectiveness tended to defeat itself. In the finale of Beethoven's fifth symphony, for instance, the music would have been even more eloquent if left to tell its own story. But by a too "expressive" reading the conductor perceptibly missed the goal he sought.

DR. MUCK'S DEBUT IN NEW YORK

A Dissenting Voice from the Evening Post

Too late for insertion with the other comment of the New York papers upon Dr. Muck's first appearance there last night, the Evening Post sends us these fragments of its review of the concert:

A glance at the programme showed that it would not be possible to estimate Dr. Muck's powers and peculiarities at one hearing, because only two composers were represented. As regards the Beethoven symphony, it is useless to deny that many of us are rather tired of it; not that we have changed our minds as to its being a very great work, but simply because we have heard it too often. We expect a conductor to invest it with new interest by an individual reading—by a revelation of hidden beauties, and by novel details of phrasing, by a use of that tempo rubato to which Beethoven himself was addicted, and which Wagner and his followers have still further emphasized. From this point of view Dr. Muck was disappointing. There was little individuality in his reading, while he leaned toward the metronomic manner rather than to the Beethoven-Wagner rubato. And yet, with the aid of the admirable playing of the Boston men, he made the symphony sound fresh and interesting. It was like rejuvenating a somewhat faded bouquet by dipping it into water. How did he do it? Chiefly by an animation which seems to be his characteristic, and which he knows how to impart to his men.

Dr. Muck being one of Cosima Wagner's staff, his Wagner readings were looked forward to with special interest. When it was announced that Dr. Muck would take the place of Mr. Gericke, the thought that probably first occurred to many was: "At last the Boston folk will have a chance to hear the brass in Wagner's scores." And no doubt the new conductor is in this respect more satisfactory than his predecessor. Yet climax building, such as Seidl, Mottl and Hertz have been wont to thrill us with, does not appear to be his strong point. This was particularly noticeable in the "Meistersinger" prelude, which was also taken too fast for our taste and with insufficient contrasting of motives; the pomp and grandeur were not sufficiently revealed. In the "Faust" overture the serene, meditative portions, with their exquisite modulations, were the most impressively rendered. The kaleidoscopic beauties of the "Siegfried Idyll" were not shown to their best advantage; there was a lack of the subtle contrasts, the miniature climaxes, as one might say, by means of which Seidl used to make this sinfonietta domestica seem so divinely beautiful that one wished it would go on forever.

POLICE AT THE SYMPHONIES

Carriage Patrons Have Created a Condition Dangerous to Other Attendants

Each succeeding Symphony concert finds the number of vehicles at the hall greatly increased and some of those attendants who have approached the hall on foot have complained to Police Commissioner O'Meara of the danger to which they are subjected in tracing their way across the connecting avenues to the building. These complaints seem to have been made without a realization of the police arrangements which are already in force at the hall on concert nights and the commissioner took occasion today to make explanation. As he observes, the concerts were not instituted for the purpose of affording the opportunity of display which some attendants have a fondness for making with their equipages, but as this condition is one which the police must treat as they find it the department is doing its best to cope with the crush of vehicles, unnecessary as the latter may be.

The commissioner says:

"Complaint has been received of the danger on account of the great number of carriages and automobiles, encountered by persons leaving the Symphony concerts Saturday nights and seeking to enter street cars in Huntington and Massachusetts avenues. Because of the new conductor, or the higher price of tickets, or the flush times, or the love of display which the founder and supporter of the concerts publicly deprecated this week, the carriage patrons and especially the automobile patrons have increased in number this year far beyond the previous experience of the police. So that from the beginning of this year's series a sergeant and seven patrolmen have been assigned to Symphony Hall for every concert; and that is a liberal detail for such a purpose in the busiest hours for the police on the busiest night of the week. This detail will be continued for the present under the direction of the captain of the division; but meanwhile foot passengers should remember this: That if they ignore the police protection which is afforded at regular crossings, and in their eagerness to catch particular cars, push through the lines of carriages at unguarded ponts, they run their own risk."

NEW YORK HERALD
NEW YORK, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1906.

DR. KARL MUCK'S NEW YORK DEBUT

Dresden Conductor Leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

MR. GERICKE'S SUCCESSOR

Gets Bigger Tone and More Dashing Manner at the Expense of Some Loss of Refinement.

Under the baton of its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, of Dresden, and before a brilliant audience which filled Carnegie Hall to overflowing, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened last night its twenty-first season in New York.

The return of this admirable organization is always a matter of great interest to local concert goers and it held out special inducements last night. Through the opportunity given to make the acquaintance of a noted European conductor, and to witness the inauguration of his régime.

Attention was the better focussed on Dr. Muck since there was no soloist and because the programme contained music which has been made thoroughly familiar to Boston Symphony Orchestra audiences.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony opened the list, and this was followed by a strongly contrasted group of Wagner numbers, the "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

It would have been hard to select a programme better calculated to disclose the new conductor's personality, aims and methods. In some respects he disappointed expectations by his treatment of it; in others he satisfied them. That the orchestra would be governed by other ideals than those of Mr. Gericke was made plain in the Beethoven Symphony. Dr. Muck aimed at a bigger tone and a more dashing manner than Mr. Gericke ever allowed his men. He got it, but at the price of some lost refinement and elegance of technique.

There are many Boston orchestra patrons who were forever complaining that they never really heard the brass. These will now be in clover, for the brass instruments are unleashed by Dr. Muck. There are others who set store by the wonderful polish of detail which has recently marked the orchestra's playing. These were the disappointed ones last night, for much of it was lacking. One even suspected the wood wind choir of being out of tune.

On the other hand Dr. Muck showed himself a Wagner conductor of great imagination. He made the scores of the "Idyl" and the "Faust" overture pulsate with life and interest even when they departed from tradition.

In person the Dresden musician proved to be a man of slight figure, commanding manner and dignified gesture. He was heartily welcomed and warmly applauded.

BOSTON JOURNAL—NOVEMBER 10, 1906

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY.

The fifth Symphony program, which will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will bring a symphony which is not familiar to the patrons of the Symphony concerts, having been played here but once, in January, 1899. It is Sinding's in D minor, No. 1. The solo artist will be Mme. Antoinette Szumowska, a favorite pianist in Boston. The program will be:

Overture, "Oberon".....Weber
Concerto for pianoforte in E minor, No. 1.....Chopin
Symphony in D minor.....Sinding

THE LONGY CLUB CONCERTS.

The first of the three concerts which the Longy Club will give this season will take place in Potter Hall next Wednesday evening, Nov. 14, at 8.15 o'clock. As ever, Mr. Longy has discovered a number of interesting novelties and has resurrected a number of older works, which, so far as the present day audiences are concerned are as new as those which have been written within the last few years. The program for this first concert is particularly interesting and is of unusual variety. It is as follows:

Quintet in E major, on French popular themes, for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon.....Woollett
Air Varie (Suite 5).....Handel
Menuetto.....Weber
Four Small Pieces.....Grieg
(For flute, oboe, two clarinets and two bassoons.)
Allegro from Sonata No 2 in E flat major.....Bach
Romance.....Schumann
Highlander's March (from Scotch scenes).....Godard
Messrs. G. Longy and A. de Voto.
Octet (op. 103) in E flat major, for two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.....

[54]

...SATURDAY, NOV. 10, 1906.

...SYMPHONY QUARTET

...Its Third New York Season ...Concert in Mendelssohn Hall.

...Boston Symphony Quartet began its ...d season in New York yesterday aft...noon. The personnel of the quartet re...s as it was last season; with Prof. ...Hess are Messrs. Otto Roth, Emile ...ric, and Heinrich Warnke, all leading ...yers of their respective instruments ...the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and ...ence all admirable players. They have ...devoted hard work to perfecting their ...aying together in quartet—for a ...tring quartet party is not made ...by the immediate assemblage of four ...players, however excellent. And New ...ork music lovers have had the op...portunity to observe the progress they ...ave made toward finish and euphony. ...There was occasion yesterday to observe ...t, for their playing showed more of those ...qualities than it has in the past.

The programme consisted of a new string quartet by Josef Suk, the single movement in C minor from a quartet that Schubert projected, but never carried further, and César Franck's pianoforte quintet, in which M. Heinrich Gebhard of Boston played the pianoforte part. Suk's quartet is an agreeable though scarcely an important addition to the list of modern works in this form. It is, as is natural in the work of a composer who is also a quartet player, well made, well put together for the four instruments, and the part writing is fluent and effective. As is likewise natural in a composer who is the son-in-law of Antonin Dvorak, it shows some of the traits of that master's music; some of the melodic turns, some of the harmonic devices. Yet it may be that the influence is more Bohemian than personal, and that Mr. Suk drew the spirit of his mournful first movement and some of his rhythmic fancies that appear in the march movement, the intermezzo, and elsewhere, from the circumambient Bohemian atmosphere. But the work lacks distinction and individuality.

César Franck's quintet had not been heard here for several years. And repeated hearing of it does not enforce the lesson of the supreme greatness that Franck's admirers find in it—they who would put it by the side of Beethoven's greatest chamber music in originality and loftiness of conception. That there are passages of profound beauty in it, of mystical elevation, of fine and strongly original harmonic color, is true. But the work as a whole contains much that is dry and even labored; tedious elaboration and reworking of arid thematic material, sometimes at wearisome length. For the noble and strongly appealing passages in which the quintet abounds the listener has to pay by stretches of dullness. The quintet was played with devotion and enthusiasm by Prof. Hess and his comrades, and to the whole Mr. Gebhard contributed artistically and with a spirit that matched that of the others.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1906.

BOSTON QUARTET'S FIRST CONCERT

An Enjoyable Musical Matinee Given in Mendelssohn Hall by Symphony Players.

SOMETHING NEW PROVIDED

Joseph Suks' Quartet, a Novelty to the Local Concert Room, Proves an Interesting Number.

At its first chamber music concert of the season in Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Quartet played in a manner deserving of high praise. Professor Willy Hess and his associates have apparently reached a better mutual understanding even than last year. They play with more unanimity and with far greater freedom than ever before, and their tone is generally well balanced and often of delightfully mellow quality.

An interesting quartet by Joseph Suk, new to the local concert room, emphasized this advance toward perfect chamber music ensemble. In its own right this composition proved well worth a hearing. Its melodies are fresh and graceful, their development is ingenious, and the contrasting qualities of tone of the four instruments are skilfully combined.

With Mr. Heinrich Gebhard at the piano, Cesar Frank's sombre quintet in F minor was given, the pianist contributing praiseworthy playing to the ensemble except when he rather overdid his share of things at times. Schubert's posthumous "Quartet Satz," in C minor for strings, was played between the Suk and Frank numbers.

BOSTON HERALD

Published Every Day in the Year.

VOL. CXX., No. 133.

SATURDAY, NOV. 10, 1906.

...Longy Club will give its first con... season in Potter Hall on ... evening. The programme ... pieces by Weath... Handel, ... Bach, Sch... Godard, ... Symphony

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1906.

YESTERDAY'S CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave its first concert for this season at Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon. It is an organization which bears a name that has most honorable associations, and it has had a predecessor which, without the name, lifted chamber music to a plane never occupied by it before in the United States. Naturally much has been expected of it, and, with equal naturalness, wanting the ensemble effects which can come only from experience, there has been some disappointment in all its performances. So there was yesterday, but it was gratifying to note improvement, especially over the last concert of last season, which was wofully disappointing. The direct and virile purpose stamped upon the work of the little band at the outset by its leader, Professor Hess, was there, but also somewhat more of finish. The chief lack is still euphony, that charm which ought to belong to music which, because of its nature, is prevented from enjoying the adventitious aid of varied instrumental color. A string quartet ought always to give us music like that suggested by Milton in his description of the opening of the gates of heaven: "Harmonious sound, on golden hinges moving." Yesterday's concert brought forth a novelty which did not seem particularly impressive—a quartet in B flat by Josef Suk, of the Bohemian Quartet, and son-in-law of the lamented Dr. Dvorak, who ought to have lived longer to impress upon his intimate disciples his own devotion to the beautiful. The other numbers were the posthumous quartet allegro by Schubert and Cesar Franck's pianoforte quintet in F minor, in which the pianoforte was intelligently, tastefully and affectionately played by Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, of Boston.

...r Cutting Bureau in the World

FIRST BOSTON CONCERT.

Dr. Muck Will Conduct The Symphony Programme.

The first of the series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Lyric during the present season will take place on next Wednesday evening, at 8.15 o'clock. Interest in these concerts has never run so high as it has this year, and its practical manifestation has been found in the largest subscription sale the Orchestra has ever enjoyed in Baltimore. This is due partly, of course, to the fact that at two of the concerts such artists as Paderewski and Melba will be the soloists; but it may mainly be attributed to the presence of Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who comes to America this year on special leave of absence from the German Emperor to conduct Boston's great Orchestra.

As has been the practice this year at all the first appearances of Dr. Muck, there will be no soloist at this first concert, for it has been planned primarily to introduce the new conductor, and it is not deemed advisable to divide the interest. The programme that he has chosen is with one exception that which he used for his first concert in Boston, the exception being Wagner's "A Faust Overture," for which he has substituted Strauss' "Don Juan." The programme is as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 5...Beethoven
Tone-Poem, "Don Juan".Richard Strauss
Siegfried Idyll.....Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg".....Wagner

om_____

dress _____

te_____

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

First Appearance Here of Conductor Karl Muck.

SCHEEL'S MODERN PROGRAM

Probability That the First Opera of the Season Will be of the French School and That M. Samuel Bovy Will Direct.

Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his initial apearance here to-morrow night at the Academy of Music, where the first concert of the season by that orchestra will be given. He comes here with a record of brilliant successes in Boston, and, as there will be no soloist there will be nothing to divert attention from him. His opening program is the same that was used at the opening concert in Boston, and includes Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, No. 5, and three Wagnerian selections, a "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyll," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

...ER. STAATSZEITU...

NOV 2 - 190...

bementirt werden, das mit in den letzten Tagen zu Ohren kam; Frau Fama, die geschwätzige alte Dame, wollte wissen, daß Dr. Karl Muck in der Saison 1907—1908 an das Metropolitan Opernhaus beurlaubt werden soll. Dieses Gerücht allein hätte kaum auf Glaubwürdigkeit Anspruch erheben können, wenn Frau Fama nicht mit Einzelheiten aufgewartet hätte, die ihm den Schein der Möglichkeit verliehen hätten; man erzählte, daß zwischen Direktor Conried und der Berliner Intendanz eine Art Austausch vereinbart wurde, wonach Dr. Muck fünf Monate nach New York Urlaub erhalten und dafür Enrico Caruso an sechzehn Abenden an der Berliner Oper auftreten soll. Dieser Handel schien ein guter und ein begreiflicher, aber Frau Fama hat sich wieder als das unzuverlässige Frauenzimmer erwiesen, als das man sie längst kennt: es ist — wie mir von verschiedener Seiten versichert wird — kein Wörtlein wahr an dem Gerücht. Dr. Muck ist zwar entzückt von Amerika, aber er hat über seine nächstjährigen Pläne noch nichts beschlossen; er ist kontraktlich verpflichtet nach Berlin zurückzukehren. Von Direktor Conried, den er persönlich nicht kennt, hat er nicht nur nicht jetzt, sondern überhaupt noch nie zuvor irgend welches Anerbieten erhalten, und es wäre wohl anzunehmen, daß der Direktor zuerst mit Herrn Muck verhandeln würde, ehe er sich an die Berliner Intendanz wendet. Es wäre mehr als fraglich, ob Muck sich, unter dem herrschenden Star-System, dazu verstehen könnte, einem Ruf an die Oper zu folgen. Und von allem Anderen abgesehen drängt sich dabei noch die Frage auf: Wozu? . . . . . Unsere Oper hat in Alfred Hertz einen Dirigenten, der allen Ansprüchen vollauf genügt und der seit Anton Seidl der erste Opernleiter ist, der sich beim amerikanischen Publikum Geltung verschafft hat. Es wäre gewiß interessant, Muck auch als Dirigent in der Oper kennen zu lernen, aber es wäre der Oper — speziell der deutschen — damit weiter kein Dienst erwiesen; Alfred Hertz hat die deutsche Oper so hoch gebracht, wie man es irgendwie erwarten kann, so hoch, wie sie je vor ihm gewesen — ob es unter den obwaltenden Umständen ein Darüberhinaus überhaupt giebt?! Let well enough alone!

Welchen Gewinn könnte Dr. Muck davon haben, abgesehen von einem nicht in's Gewicht fallenden finanziellen Vortheil. Der Herr Doktor hat am Samstag Nachmittag den sensationellsten Erfolg gefeiert, den jemals ein Dirigent hier errungen. Nach der Brahms'schen Symphonie wurde Muck so oft von der begeisterten Zuhörerschaar hervorgejubelt, daß er schließlich das gesammte Orchester sich erheben und seinen Dank ausdrücken ließ. Diese Ovation nach einer Symphonie, die eigentlich „Caviar für's Volk", das ist sicherlich das Höchste, was ein Dirigent erwarten kann. Dieser schmächtige, etwas doktrinär aussehende Herr Muck mit dem scharfgeschnittenen, geistvollen Gesicht ist eine Persönlichkeit, deren Eindruck sich auch der Zuhörer nicht entziehen kann. Ganz abgesehen davon, daß sich auf diesem beweglichen Antlitz jede Gemüthsbewegung widerspiegelt, daß von diesen durchdringenden Augen ein hypnotisches Fluidum ausgeht, ganz abgesehen auch von der Energie und Ruhe, die diesen Dirigenten auszeichnet, besitzt Herr Muck noch einen ganz eigenen Vorzug. Der Herr Dirigent ist „Doctor juris", er hat an den Brüsten der Ruperto Carola, im schönen Alt-Heidelberg, des Wissens Durst gelöscht und einige schön gezogene Quarten zeigen, daß er auch im „Hirschen" in Neuenheim eifrig „studirte". Und wenn nun den Herrn Doktor das heilige Feuer der Begeisterung erfaßt, dann kommt der flotte, feurige Bursch zum Durchbruch, dann glaubt man den hiebgewandten, bewährten Kämpfer vor sich zu sehen, der mit frohem Muthe die blanke Klinge kreuzte. Jede seiner Bewegungen, sogar das unwillkürliche Biegen und Vorschieben des rechten Beines gemahnt an den Stretter auf dem Fechtboden; jede Bewegung knapp und scharf, jeder Blick fest und durchdringend . . . und von diesem aufflammenden Jugendfeuer und von dieser stürmischen Jugendkraft ergießt es sich wärmend und mitreißend über die Zuhörerschaft, das ist Mucks unwiderstehlicher Magnetismus, das ist sein Zauber, der ihn überall zum Sieger werden läßt, das ist der göttliche Funke des Genies!

H. R. H.

[55]

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World

AMERICAN

BALTIMORE, MD.

NOV 4 - 190...

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Lyric during the present season will take place on next Wednesday evening, November 7, at 8.15 o'clock. Interest in these concerts has never run so high as it has this year, and its practical manifestation has been found in the largest subscription sale the Orchestra has ever enjoyed in Baltimore. This is due partly, of course, to the fact that at two of the concerts such supreme artists as Paderewski and Melba will be the soloists; but it may mainly be attributed to the presence of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who comes to America this year on special leave of absence from the German Emperor to conduct Boston's great Orchestra.

It is only fair to believe that the extraordinary and even unexpected success which Dr. Muck had in Boston will be repeated here in Baltimore. Boston has unquestionably the most conservative musical public in this country, a public which has had its training in the 25 years of concerts which its Orchestra has given. It has become almost a tradition that nothing can arouse a symphony audience in Boston to wilder enthusiasm than that which finds its expression in the polite clapping together of hands. This is one of the several traditions that Dr. Muck broke on his first appearances there on Friday afternoon, October 12, and Saturday evening, October 13. At both of these performances, at the finish of Beethoven's C minor symphony, he was roundly cheered. Again, the following week, his performance of Haydn's Symphony in G major aroused enthusiasm to a pitch which usually comes only from the highly emotional music of modern composers. This again was repeated at the third concert, after the performance of Brahm's C minor Symphony and of Richard Strauss' tone-poem "Don Juan." Altogether, Dr. Muck has exceeded the highest expectations, and it is only fair to say that expectations regarding him were very high from the time his engagement was first announced.

As has been the practice this year at all the first appearances of Dr. Muck, there will be no soloist at this first concert, for it has been planned primarily to introduce the new conductor, and it is not deemed advisable to divide the interest. The program that he has chosen is, with one exception, that which he used for his first concert in Boston, the exception being Wagner's A Faust Overture, for which he has substituted Strauss' "Don Juan." The program is admirable in its composition, and the concert should be one of the most interesting Baltimore has ever enjoyed. The program is as follows:

1. Beethoven—
   Symphony in G minor, No. 5.
2. Richard Strauss—
   Tone-poem "Don Juan."
3. Wagner—
   Siegfried Idyll.
4. Wagner—
   Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

...ER

...SHINGTON, D. C.

ss

The first appearance of Dr. Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was one of great interest. He made his debut in this capacity two weeks ago and demonstrated that the directors made no mistake in selecting him to wield the baton over their organization. He has made his power as a musician and a conductor felt, and has aroused Bostonians to enthusiasm. Dr. Muck is a tall, spare, nervous looking man, of very apparent modesty, considering all he has accomplished. When he appeared on the stage on his "first night," and walked briskly to take his place on the conductor's stand, the orchestra rose in a body to greet him, and the audience was most cordial, but Dr. Muck was there for the work in hand, and while he acknowledged the kindness shown him, merely bowed courteously to the assembled symphony lovers, then called the orchestra to attention and began his work. Much trepidation had filled the hearts and minds of conservative, musical Boston, because of Dr. Muck's fondness for and identification with opera. They feared he was not sufficiently experienced for orchestra. It is of special interest to Washingtonians to know that it was Dr. Muck who conducted the Royal Opera House Orchestra in Berlin on the occasion of the debut of Miss Geraldine Farrar in Wagner's "Lohengrin." A Boston critic says of Dr. Muck and his first appearance: "The first concert set the minds of the fearful ones at rest. However great Dr. Muck may be as an operatic conductor, there remained no doubt of his ability to hold the baton over Boston's orchestra. His splendidly broad and tremendously passionate reading of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, a performance which compelled the conservative Bostonians to rise and cheer him at the end, was ample evidence that he was all that he should be.

"And yet, as one watched him conduct, one wondered how he did it. No conductor, not even Theodore Thomas, has been less demonstrative."

The New York Times

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 10, 1906.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Begins Its Third New York Season with a Concert in Mendelssohn Hall.

The Boston Symphony Quartet began its third season in New York yesterday afternoon. The personnel of the quartet remains as it was last season; with Prof. Willy Hess are Messrs. Otto Roth, Emile Férir, and Heinrich Warnke, all leading players of their respective instruments in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and hence all admirable players. They have devoted hard work to perfecting their playing together in quartet—for a string quartet party is not made by the immediate assemblage of four players, however excellent. And New York music lovers have had the opportunity to observe the progress they have made toward finish and euphony. There was occasion yesterday to observe it, for their playing showed more of those qualities than it has in the past.

The programme consisted of a new string quartet by Josef Suk, the single movement in C minor from a quartet that Schubert projected, but never carried further, and César Franck's pianoforte quintet, in which M. Heinrich Gebhard of Boston played the pianoforte part. Suk's quartet is an agreeable though scarcely an important addition to the list of modern works in this form. It is, as is natural in the work of a composer who is also a quartet player, well made, well put together for the four instruments, and the part writing is fluent and effective. As is likewise natural in a composer who is the son-in-law of Antonin Dvorak, it shows some of the traits of that master's music; some of the melodic turns, some of the harmonic devices. Yet it may be that the influence is more Bohemian than personal, and that Mr. Suk drew the spirit of his mournful first movement and some of his rhythmic fancies that appear in the march movement, the intermezzo, and elsewhere, from the circumambient Bohemian atmosphere. But the work lacks distinction and individuality.

César Franck's quintet had not been heard here for several years. And repeated hearing of it does not enforce the lesson of the supreme greatness that Franck's admirers find in it—they who would put it by the side of Beethoven's greatest chamber music in originality and loftiness of conception. That there are passages of profound beauty in it, of mystical elevation, of fine and strongly original harmonic color, is true. But the work as a whole contains much that is dry and even labored; tedious elaboration and reworking of arid thematic material, sometimes at wearisome length. For the noble and strongly appealing passages in which the quintet abounds the listener has to pay by stretches of dullness. The quintet was played with devotion and enthusiasm by Prof. Hess and his comrades, and to the whole Mr. Gebhard contributed artistically and with a spirit that matched that of the others.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1906.

BOSTON QUARTET'S FIRST CONCERT

An Enjoyable Musical Matinee Given in Mendelssohn Hall by Symphony Players.

SOMETHING NEW PROVIDED

Joseph Suks' Quartet, a Novelty to the Local Concert Room, Proves an Interesting Number.

At its first chamber music concert of the season in Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Quartet played in a manner deserving of high praise. Professor Willy Hess and his associates have apparently reached a better mutual understanding even than last year. They play with more unanimity and with far greater freedom than ever before, and their tone is generally well balanced and often of delightfully mellow quality.

An interesting quartet by Joseph Suk, new to the local concert room, emphasized this advance toward perfect chamber music ensemble. In its own right this composition proved well worth a hearing. Its melodies are fresh and graceful, their development is ingenious, and the contrasting qualities of tone of the four instruments are skilfully combined.

With Mr. Heinrich Gebhard at the piano, Cesar Frank's sombre quintet in F minor was given, the pianist contributing praiseworthy playing to the ensemble except when he rather overdid his share of things at times. Schubert's posthumous "Quartet Satz," in C minor for strings, was played between the Suk and Frank numbers.

BOSTON HERALD

Published Every Day in the Year.

VOL. CXX., No. 133.

SATURDAY, NOV. 10, 1906.

The Longy Club will give its first concert this season in Potter Hall on Wednesday evening. The programme will include pieces by Woollett, Handel, Weber, Grieg, Bach, Schumann, Godard, Beethoven.

Tickets are now on sale at Symphony

New-York Daily Tribune.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1906.

YESTERDAY'S CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave its first concert for this season at Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon. It is an organization which bears a name that has most honorable associations, and it has had a predecessor which, without the name, lifted chamber music to a plane never occupied by it before in the United States. Naturally much has been expected of it, and, with equal naturalness, wanting the ensemble effects which can come only from experience, there has been some disappointment in all its performances. So there was yesterday, but it was gratifying to note improvement, especially over the last concert of last season, which was wofully disappointing. The direct and virile purpose stamped upon the work of the little band at the outset by its leader, Professor Hess, was there, but also somewhat more of finish. The chief lack is still euphony, that charm which ought to belong to music which, because of its nature, is prevented from enjoying the adventitious aid of varied instrumental color. A string quartet ought always to give us music like that suggested by Milton in his description of the opening of the gates of heaven: "Harmonious sound, on golden hinges moving." Yesterday's concert brought forth a novelty which did not seem particularly impressive—a quartet in B flat by Josef Suk, of the Bohemian Quartet, and son-in-law of the lamented Dr. Dvorak, who ought to have lived longer to impress upon his intimate disciples his own devotion to the beautiful. The other numbers were the posthumous quartet allegro by Schubert and Cesar Franck's pianoforte quintet in F minor, in which the pianoforte was intelligently, tastefully and affectionately played by Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, of Boston.

r Cutting Bureau in the World

FIRST BOSTON CONCERT.

Dr. Muck Will Conduct The Symphony Programme.

The first of the series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Lyric during the present season will take place on next Wednesday evening, at 8.15 o'clock. Interest in these concerts has never run so high as it has this year, and its practical manifestation has been found in the largest subscription sale the Orchestra has ever enjoyed in Baltimore. This is due partly, of course, to the fact that at two of the concerts such artists as Paderewski and Melba will be the soloists; but it may mainly be attributed to the presence of Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who comes to America this year on special leave of absence from the German Emperor to conduct Boston's great Orchestra.

As has been the practice this year at all the first appearances of Dr. Muck, there will be no soloist at this first concert, for it has been planned primarily to introduce the new conductor, and it is not deemed advisable to divide the interest. The programme that he has chosen is with one exception that which he used for his first concert in Boston, the exception being Wagner's "A Faust Overture," for which he has substituted Strauss' "Don Juan." The programme is as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 5...Beethoven
Tone-Poem, "Don Juan".Richard Strauss
Siegfried Idyll.....Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg".....Wagner

om

dress

te

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

First Appearance Here of Conductor Karl Muck.

SCHEEL'S MODERN PROGRAM

Probability That the First Opera of the Season Will be of the French School and That M. Samuel Bovy Will Direct.

Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his initial apearance here to-morrow night at the Academy of Music, where the first concert of the season by that orchestra will be given. He comes here with a record of brilliant successes in Boston, and, as there will be no soloist there will be nothing to divert attention from him. His opening program is the same that was used at the opening concert in Boston, and includes Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, No. 5, and three Wagnerian selections, a "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyll," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Bei dieser Gelegenheit soll ein Gerücht dementirt werden, das mir in den letzten Tagen zu Ohren kam; Frau Fama, die geschwätzige alte Dame, wollte wissen, daß Dr. Karl Muck in der Saison 1907—1908 an das Metropolitan Opernhaus beurlaubt werden soll. Dieses Gerücht allein hätte kaum auf Glaubwürdigkeit Anspruch erheben können, wenn Frau Fama nicht mit Einzelheiten aufgewartet hätte, die ihm den Schein der Möglichkeit verliehen hätten; man erzählte, daß zwischen Direktor Conried und der Berliner Intendanz eine Art Austausch vereinbart wurde, wonach Dr. Muck fünf Monate nach New York Urlaub erhalten und dafür Enrico Caruso an sechzehn Abenden an der Berliner Oper auftreten soll. Dieser Handel schien ein guter und ein begreiflicher, aber Frau Fama hat sich wieder als das unzuverlässige Frauenzimmer erwiesen, als das man sie längst kennt: es ist — wie mir von verschiedenen Seiten versichert wird — kein Wörtlein wahr an dem Gerücht. Dr. Muck ist zwar entzückt von Amerika, aber er hat über seine nächstjährigen Pläne noch nichts beschlossen; er ist kontraktlich verpflichtet nach Berlin zurückzukehren. Von Direktor Conried, den er persönlich nicht kennt, hat er nicht nur nicht jetzt, sondern überhaupt noch nie zuvor irgend welches Anerbieten erhalten, und es wäre wohl anzunehmen, daß der Direktor zuerst mit Herrn Muck verhandeln würde, ehe er sich an die Berliner Intendanz wendet. Es wäre mehr als fraglich, ob Muck sich, unter dem herrschenden Star-System, dazu verstehen könnte, einem Ruf an die Oper zu folgen. Und von allem Anderen abgesehen drängt sich dabei noch die Frage auf: Wozu? . . . . . Unsere Oper hat in Alfred Hertz einen Dirigenten, der allen Ansprüchen vollauf genügt und der seit Anton Seidl der erste Opernleiter ist, der sich beim amerikanischen Publikum Geltung verschafft hat. Es wäre gewiß interessant, Muck auch als Dirigent in der Oper kennen zu lernen, aber es wäre der Oper — speziell der deutschen — damit weiter kein Dienst erwiesen; Alfred Hertz hat die deutsche Oper so hoch gebracht, wie man es irgendwie erwarten kann, so hoch, wie sie je vor ihm gewesen — ob es unter den obwaltenden Umständen ein Darüberhinaus überhaupt giebt?! Let well enough alone!

Welchen Gewinn könnte Dr. Muck davon haben, abgesehen von einem nicht in's Gewicht fallenden finanziellen Vortheil. Der Herr Doktor hat am Samstag Nachmittag den sensationellsten Erfolg gefeiert, den jemals ein Dirigent hier errungen. Nach der Brahms'schen Symphonie wurde Muck so oft von der begeisterten Zuhörerschaar hervorgejubelt, daß er schließlich das gesammte Orchester sich erheben und seinen Dank ausdrücken ließ. Diese Ovation nach einer Symphonie, die eigentlich „Caviar für's Volk", das ist sicherlich das Höchste, was ein Dirigent erwarten kann. Dieser schmächtige, etwas doktrinär aussehende Herr Muck mit dem scharfgeschnittenen, geistvollen Gesicht ist eine Persönlichkeit, deren Eindruck sich auch der Zuhörer nicht entziehen kann. Ganz abgesehen davon, daß sich auf diesem beweglichen Antlitz jede Gemüthsbewegung widerspiegelt, daß von diesen durchdringenden Augen ein hypnotisches Fluidum ausgeht, ganz abgesehen auch von der Energie und Ruhe, die diesen Dirigenten auszeichnet, besitzt Herr Muck noch einen ganz eigenen Vorzug. Der Herr Dirigent ist „Doctor juris", er hat an den Brüsten der Ruperto Carola, im schönen Alt-Heidelberg, des Wissens Durst gelöscht und einige schön gezogene Quarten zeigen, daß er auch im „Hirschen" in Neuenheim eifrig „studirte". Und wenn nun den Herrn Doktor das heilige Feuer der Begeisterung erfaßt, dann kommt der flotte, feurige Bursch zum Durchbruch, dann glaubt man den hiebgewandten, bewährten Kämpfer vor sich zu sehen, der mit frohem Muthe die blanke Klinge kreuzte. Jede seiner Bewegungen, sogar das unwillkürliche Biegen und Vorschieben des rechten Beines gemahnt an den Streiter auf dem Fechtboden; jede Bewegung knapp und scharf, jeder Blick fest und durchdringend . . . und von diesem aufflammenden Jugendfeuer und von dieser stürmischen Jugendkraft ergießt es sich wärmend und mitreißend über die Zuhörerschaft, das ist Mucks unwiderstehlicher Magnetismus, das ist sein Zauber, der ihn überall zum Sieger werden läßt, das ist der göttliche Funke des Genies!

H. R. H.

[55]

paper Cutting Bureau in the World

ERICA

ORLD

ss

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Lyric during the present season will take place on next Wednesday evening, November 7, at 8.15 o'clock. Interest in these concerts has never run so high as it has this year, and its practical manifestation has been found in the largest subscription sale the Orchestra has ever enjoyed in Baltimore. This is due partly, of course, to the fact that at two of the concerts such supreme artists as Paderewski and Melba will be the soloists; but it may mainly be attributed to the presence of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who comes to America this year on special leave of absence from the German Emperor to conduct Boston's great Orchestra.

It is only fair to believe that the extraordinary and even unexpected success which Dr. Muck had in Boston will be repeated here in Baltimore. Boston has unquestionably the most conservative musical public in this country, a public which has had its training in the 25 years of concerts which its Orchestra has given. It has become almost a tradition that nothing can arouse a symphony audience in Boston to wilder enthusiasm than that which finds its expression in the polite clapping together of hands. This is one of the several traditions that Dr. Muck broke on his first appearances there on Friday afternoon, October 12, and Saturday evening, October 13. At both of these performances, at the finish of Beethoven's C minor symphony, he was roundly cheered. Again, the following week, his performance of Haydn's Symphony in G major aroused enthusiasm to a pitch which usually comes only from the highly emotional music of modern composers. This again was repeated at the third concert, after the performance of Brahm's C minor Symphony and of Richard Strauss' tone-poem "Don Juan." Altogether, Dr. Muck has exceeded the highest expectations, and it is only fair to say that expectations regarding him were very high from the time his engagement was first announced.

As has been the practice this year at all the first appearances of Dr. Muck, there will be no soloist at this first concert, for it has been planned primarily to introduce the new conductor, and it is not deemed advisable to divide the interest. The program that he has chosen is, with one exception, that which he used for his first concert in Boston, the exception being Wagner's A Faust Overture, for which he has substituted Strauss' "Don Juan." The program is admirable in its composition, and the concert should be one of the most interesting Baltimore has ever enjoyed. The program is as follows:

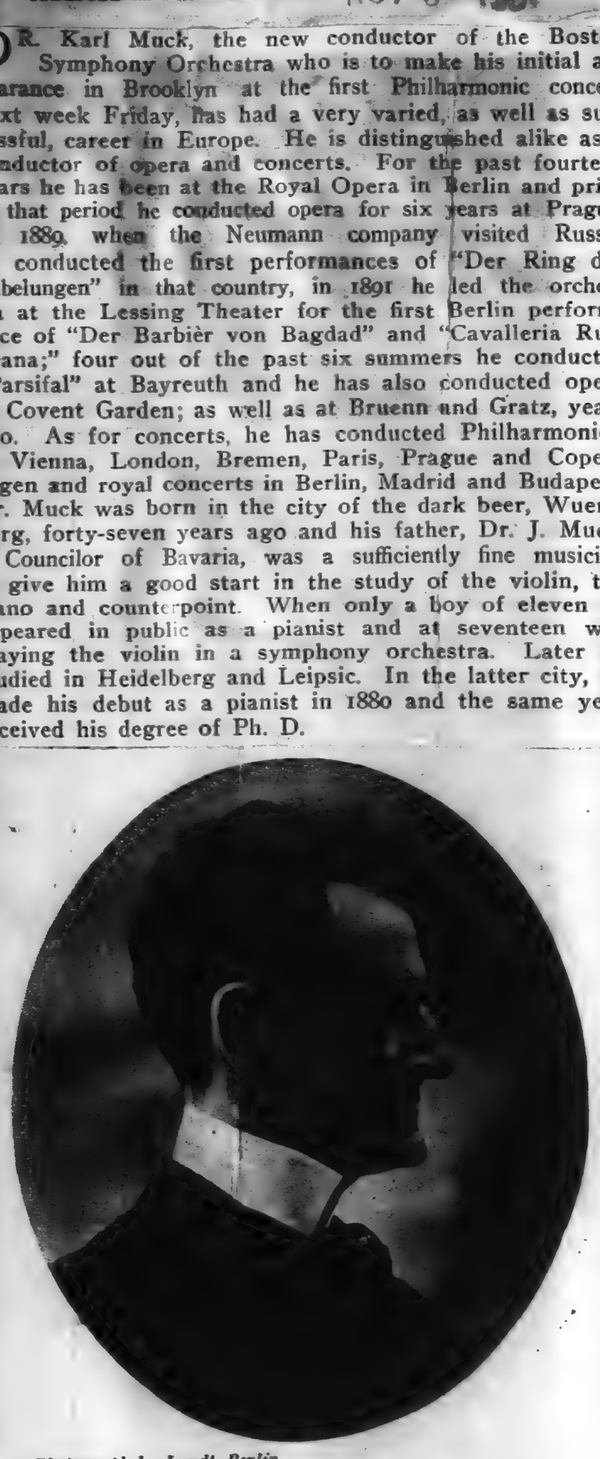
1. Beethoven—
   Symphony in G minor, No. 5.
2. Richard Strauss—
   Tone-poem "Don Juan."
3. Wagner—
   Siegfried Idyll.
4. Wagner—
   Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The first appearance of Dr. Karl Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was one of great interest. He made his debut in this capacity two weeks ago and demonstrated that the directors made no mistake in selecting him to wield the baton over their organization. He has made his power as a musician and a conductor felt, and has aroused Bostonians to enthusiasm. Dr. Muck is a tall, spare, nervous looking man, of very apparent modesty, considering all he has accomplished. When he appeared on the stage on his "first night," and walked briskly to take his place on the conductor's stand, the orchestra rose in a body to greet him, and the audience was most cordial, but Dr. Muck was there for the work in hand, and while he acknowledged the kindness shown him, merely bowed courteously to the assembled symphony lovers, then called the orchestra to attention and began his work. Much trepidation had filled the hearts and minds of conservative, musical Boston, because of Dr. Muck's fondness for and identification with opera. They feared he was not sufficiently experienced for orchestra. It is of special interest to Washingtonians to know that it was Dr. Muck who conducted the Royal Opera House Orchestra in Berlin on the occasion of the debut of Miss Geraldine Farrar in Wagner's "Lohengrin." A Boston critic says of Dr. Muck and his first appearance: "The first concert set the minds of the fearful ones at rest. However great Dr. Muck may be as an operatic conductor, there remained no doubt of his ability to hold the baton over Boston's orchestra. His splendidly broad and tremendously passionate reading of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, a performance which compelled the conservative Bostonians to rise and cheer him at the end, was ample evidence that he was all that he should be.

"And yet, as one watched him conduct, one wondered how he did it. No conductor, not even Theodore Thomas, has been less demonstrative."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address Brooklyn, N. Y. NOV 3 - 1906

DR. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who is to make his initial appearance in Brooklyn at the first Philharmonic concert next week Friday, has had a very varied, as well as successful, career in Europe. He is distinguished alike as a conductor of opera and concerts. For the past fourteen years he has been at the Royal Opera in Berlin and prior to that period he conducted opera for six years at Prague. In 1889, when the Neumann company visited Russia, he conducted the first performances of "Der Ring des Nibelungen" in that country, in 1891 he led the orchestra at the Lessing Theater for the first Berlin performance of "Der Barbièr von Bagdad" and "Cavalleria Rusticana;" four out of the past six summers he conducted "Parsifal" at Bayreuth and he has also conducted opera at Covent Garden; as well as at Bruenn and Gratz, years ago. As for concerts, he has conducted Philharmonic's in Vienna, London, Bremen, Paris, Prague and Copenhagen and royal concerts in Berlin, Madrid and Budapest. Dr. Muck was born in the city of the dark beer, Wuerzburg, forty-seven years ago and his father, Dr. J. Muck, a Councilor of Bavaria, was a sufficiently fine musician to give him a good start in the study of the violin, the piano and counterpoint. When only a boy of eleven he appeared in public as a pianist and at seventeen was playing the violin in a symphony orchestra. Later he studied in Heidelberg and Leipsic. In the latter city, he made his debut as a pianist in 1880 and the same year received his degree of Ph. D.



Photograph by Lundt, Berlin.

DR. KARL MUCK.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date

THE most important musical event of the week will be the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow night in the Academy of Music with the introductory appearance in this city of Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor. Four concerts have been already given by Doctor Muck in Boston, and the enthusiasm of his audiences has been steadily on the increase. The new leader is declared to be an earnest student and a man with an infinite capacity for taking pains with the smallest orchestral detail, no less than a magnetic and inspiring interpreter. A soloist has been dispensed with for tomorrow's concert, as was the case at Doctor Muck's first appearance in Boston, it being held undesirable to divide the attention of the audience. The programme of the Boston premiere will be duplicated. It is divided between Beethoven and Wagner, the mighty Fifth Symphony being followed by the "Faust Overture," the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." As Doctor Muck has won especial fame as a Wagnerian interpreter, his choice of these selections is not without significance.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
ss WASHINGTON, D. C. NOV 4 - 19

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its first visit to Washington for the season of 1906-1907 next Tuesday afternoon, giving its concert in the New National Theater. New interest is added in the appearance of Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor, fresh from his recent success in Boston.

In accordance with the practice prevailing with the orchestra this year, there will be no soloist at this first concert, for it has been planned primarily to introduce Dr. Muck to Washington. The programme is as follows:

Brahms.....Symphony in C minor, No. 1
Haydn.....Symphony in G major (B and H No. 13)
Weber.....Overture to "Der Freischuetz"

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
HERA
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NOV 4-1906

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The winter season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open on next Tuesday afternoon at the New National Theater, which will be the second appearance in Washington of this organization in many years.

Dr. Karl Muck, the new director, has announced the following programme, and in common with the practice which prevails with the orchestra, there will be no soloist at this first concert, for it has been planned primarily to introduce Dr. Muck to Washington:

Haydn, Symphony in G major (B. and H. No. 13).
Weber, overture to "Der Freischuetz."
Brahms' Symphony in C minor, No. 1.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Press
Address
Date

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on to-morrow (Monday) evening, at 8.15. This will be the introductory appearance in Philadelphia of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, having come to America on a special leave of absence granted him last spring by the German Emperor after a long series of negotiations. Quite unusual interest has been manifested in his coming to this city. In fact, not since Mr. Nikisch was conductor of the Orchestra has there been anything like it and the prospects are that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have the most prosperous season in Philadelphia that has been its fortune for several years past.

At this first concert in Philadelphia there will be no solo artist, for it has been planned primarily to introduce Dr. Muck to the Philadelphia patrons of the Boston Symphony and it has been deemed undesirable to divide the attention of the audience. The program for to-morrow (Monday) night will be the same as that used by Dr. Muck for his first concert in Boston. It is as follows:

Beethoven.....Symphony in C Minor, No. 5
Wagner.....Eine Faust Overture
Wagner.....Siegfried Idyll
Wagner.....Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PHILADELPHIA
ss PHILADELPHIA,
3-19

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Dr. Carl Muck Makes Favorable Impression on His Debut.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the directorship of its new leader, Dr. Carl Muck, made its first appearance in its series of Monday evening concerts before a Philadelphia audience last night at the Academy of Music. There was no soloist on the programme. Dr. Muck, the new leader, was the centre of attraction. It was wise for the management of the orchestra to allow this first performance of the season to be dominated entirely by its new conductor.

This programme gave us a chance, after the wide advertising that had been given him, to make a clearly concise judgment of a man who has hitherto been known to us only by reputation.

Dr. Muck last night proved himself very well worthy of the fame that has preceded him. His manner is most modest; his beat is not obtrusive, yet, at the same time, one knows that he is completely in control of his orchestra, and even his unexpressive back shows that he is master of his musicians.

If Dr. Muck had had an ordinary European orchestra to conduct he could not possibly have achieved the results that he did last night.

But with such a perfect organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he was at liberty to show himself at his best.

Dr. Muck's conducting is, in its way, forceful and convincing. It is strong and individual. It is a most welcome relief from the classicism of Mr. Gericke.

But Dr. Muck's interpretation is not entirely satisfactory. He has many points in his favor, but he is too inclined to make very big distinctions between pianissimo and fortissimo. In fact, one might almost say that he is too much inclined to overuse the punctuation points of music. His sentences are flowing but subdued; his climaxes are so strong in contrast as to be almost obtrusive. The ideas which he brings to us are not epoch-making, but they are fresh, young, strong and imbued with the spirit of the new era. Therefore they are most welcome, especially in contrast with what the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been offering us for a number of years past.

The programme, made up of the fifth Beethoven symphony and three familiar numbers by Wagner, offered nothing new, but on this very account was, perhaps, particularly well chosen, in that it gave us liberty to put our whole attention on Dr. Muck and to compare him in well-known works with others we have heard.

Again let it be said that Dr. Muck is most welcome and most worthy of support.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NOV 4 - 19

Will high hats be eliminated at the Boston Symphony concerts this year? One of last season's concert goers writes to the management: "We were exceedingly annoyed by a very tall (sitting) lady in a big hat who insisted upon wearing it. She sat about the second or third in the front row. If she is going to sit there again this year please move us nearer the center and give some one else a turn. Please don't move us to the left, as there were more big hats there. I am one of those unfortunates who can't listen entirely with the soul, but want to see, too. I am sure I am not alone in this. I heard the men behind me swear, and if you could do a little missionary hat work I think you would endear yourself to many people."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

National—The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert season of 1906-1907 will open Tuesday afternoon, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its first visit to Washington and gives its concert in the new National Theater. Interest in Washington ran high a year ago when this famous organization returned to this city, after an absence of many years. This year it seemed to run even higher, and the house has been practically sold out on subscription for all of the five concerts the orchestra will give here. After the splendid concerts which were given under Mr. Gericke's direction a year ago, it was but natural that more of the music lovers of this city should desire to go to the present series, and added to this is the coming of Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor, of whom Washington has been hearing so much of late and who made such an extraordinary and even unexpected success in Boston.

In common with the practice which prevails with the orchestra this year there will be no soloist at this first concert, for it has been planned primarily to introduce Dr. Muck to Washington. The program is as follows:

Symphony in G major (B. and H. No. 13).....Haydn
"Overture to Der Freischuetz"...Weber
Symphony in C minor, No. 1.....Brahms

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World RECORD
n ress
e
PHILADELPHIA

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Karl Mock Makes His Local Debut as Director.

It was rather a daring thing for the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, fresh from the Royal Opera House, at Berlin, to make his Philadelphia debut as a conductor with so familiar a musical selection as that which constituted the program of the concert given last evening at the Academy of Music. All who are familiar with classical music know the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven almost by heart, and most people have their own conceptions of how it should be played; nor are the Faust Overture of Wagner, the Siegfried Idyl and the prelude to Die Meistersinger by the same composer by any means strangers to music patrons. Yet these four numbers were all that appeared on last night's program—soloist, too, there was none. By making such a selection Dr. Muck directly challenged comparison with other conductors, and, it must be admitted, the result justified his intent, albeit it that to it may be attributed the fact that the opening concert of the Boston Symphony in this city had rather a slimmer audience than that which greets it usually.

There can be no doubt that Dr. Muck is a great conductor. The applause which greeted his appearance was prefunctory and the audience was a little apathetic during the first two movements of the symphony. As Beethoven's immortal work progressed, however, the orchestra warmed up and the audience grew more enthusiastic and less critical; and with good reason. Seldom if ever has a finer rendition of the last two movements of this symphony been heard in this city. Under Dr. Muck's baton the orchestra displayed wonderful refinement of phrasing and gradation of musical shading. In fact its playing was about as near being ideal as one can hope for on this mundane sphere. Back of the leading was both intellect and temperament; a great combination in the artistic world; and this directed what is probably the best orchestra in America playing at its best.

The rest of the concert illustrated that Dr. Muck could interpret Wagner as well as he could Beethoven, the Siegfried idyl, particularly displaying his ability to give the true poetic conception to orchestral music.

Later the orchestra is to play more modern music than it did last evening and one looks forward with interest to the way in which it will render the work of Richard Strauss, under Dr. Muck's baton.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ess
Boston Symphony Orchestra
The first Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on tomorrow evening, at 8.15, when Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, will make his first appearance in this city. Quite unusual interest has been manifested in the occasion, it is said Muck will appeal to Philadelphia audiences to be seen, but he is regarded to have captured Boston. At this first concert in Philadelphia there will be no solo artist, for it has been planned primarily to introduce Dr. Muck to the Philadelphia patrons of the Boston Symphony and it has been deemed undesirable to divide the attention of the audience. The program for tomorrow night will be the same as that used by Dr. Muck for his first concert in Boston. It is as follows:
Beethoven..Symphony in C minor, No. 5
Wagner.....Eine Faust Overture
Wagner.....Siegfried Idyll
Wagner, prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
SUN
BALTIMORE, MD

WILL WELCOME DR. MUCK

Baltimore Music Lovers Want To See New Boston Leader.

MacDOWELL'S PATHETIC PLIGHT

America's Greatest Musician And Composer Broken Down—Fritz Scheel And Mme. Gadski.

With the coming of Dr. Karl Muck next Wednesday evening we shall have our first opportunity of hearing the famous orchestra under the inspiring baton of the great Berlin conductor, whose magnetic personality will surely infuse new life into this wonderful band of musicians. The fine program announced — Beethoven, Strauss, Wagner—will probably have far more interest for the general musical public than many of those Mr. Gericke gave us in past seasons. It is as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 5.....Beethoven
Tone-poem, Don Juan.....Richard Strauss
Siegfried Idyll.....Wagner
Prelude to The Mastersingers of Nuremburg

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
BULLETIN
m ress PHILADELPHIA,
e NOV 6

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Dr. Karl Muck Makes His First Appearance as Conductor in This City.

Dr. Karl Muck, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his bow before Philadelphia's music lovers in the Academy of Music last night and received an enthusiastic welcome. The applause which greeted him was much more than a polite tribute to a distinguished musician, who had come crowned with the approval of Germany's best critics; it was the spontaneous acknowledgment of rare talent adorning a potent personality. In all respects the concert was a notable artistic event.

The program was arranged obviously to give Dr. Muck all possible opportunity to display his powers. It contained only compositions that have been made familiar here by frequent performance and the services of a soloist were dispensed with that the attention of the audience might be concentrated on the orchestra. The symphony was Beethoven's mighty Fifth, which was followed by three Wagner numbers: The "Faust Overture," the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." As Dr. Muck has won particular fame as a Wagnerian interpreter his selection was significant.

The symphony, of course, was the show piece of the evening and the new conductor's reading of it was highly original and forceful. He made it perfectly clear that he was bound by no traditions that could interfere with his conception of the real significance of the work.

In the Wagner numbers, Dr. Muck fully justified his reputation. The "Faust" overture was played with splendid vigor and clearness. It was here that the conductor demonstrated most fully the complete and sympathetic control he had over the orchestra.

Dr. Muck is a slender man of medium height. His face is smooth and shaven with large features, boldly outlined and indicative of great vigor. The most striking thing about him is his massive head, which is covered with thick dark brown hair. Though he is forty-five years old he looks much younger, and in his movements gives the impression of buoyant youthfulness. In conducting, his manner is restrained, though there can be no mistaking the energy that is back of the quick gestures with which he imposes his will on the orchestra. Dr. Muck received the applause which greeted him last night with every show of [illegible] and seemed rather embarrassed [illegible] was forced several times to step [illegible] the audience and acknowledge its [illegible] Dr. Muck is now absent from the [illegible] Royal Opera House by special permission of the Emperor, but, unfortunately, [illegible] lasts for only one year.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

DR. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who is to make his initial appearance in Brooklyn at the first Philharmonic concert next week Friday, has had a very varied, as well as successful, career in Europe. He is distinguished alike as a conductor of opera and concerts. For the past fourteen years he has been at the Royal Opera in Berlin and prior to that period he conducted opera for six years at Prague. In 1889, when the Neumann company visited Russia, he conducted the first performances of "Der Ring des Nibelungen" in that country, in 1891 he led the orchestra at the Lessing Theater for the first Berlin performance of "Der Barbier von Bagdad" and "Cavalleria Rusticana;" four out of the past six summers he conducted "Parsifal" at Bayreuth and he has also conducted opera at Covent Garden; as well as at Bruenn and Gratz, years ago. As for concerts, he has conducted Philharmonic's in Vienna, London, Bremen, Paris, Prague and Copenhagen and royal concerts in Berlin, Madrid and Budapest. Dr. Muck was born in the city of the dark beer, Wuerzburg, forty-seven years ago and his father, Dr. J. Muck, a Councilor of Bavaria, was a sufficiently fine musician to give him a good start in the study of the violin, the piano and counter point. When only a boy of eleven he appeared in public as a pianist and at seventeen was playing the violin in a symphony orchestra. Later he studied in Heidelberg and Leipsic. In the latter city, he made his debut as a pianist in 1880 and the same year received his degree of Ph. D.

Photograph by Lundt, Berlin.

DR. KARL MUCK.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

1

ress

e

THE most important musical event of the week will be the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow night in the Academy of Music with the introductory appearance in this city of Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor. Four concerts have been already given by Doctor Muck in Boston, and the enthusiasm of his audiences has been steadily on the increase. The new leader is declared to be an earnest student and a man with an infinite capacity for taking pains with the smallest orchestral detail, no less than a magnetic and inspiring interpreter. A soloist has been dispensed with for tomorrow's concert, as was the case at Doctor Muck's first appearance in Boston, it being held undesirable to divide the attention of the audience. The programme of the Boston premiere will be duplicated. It is divided between Beethoven and Wagner, the mighty Fifth Symphony being followed by the "Faust Overture," the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." As Doctor Muck has won especial fame as a Wagnerian interpreter, his choice of these selections is not without significance.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss WAS

Boston Symphony Orchesctra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its first visit to Washington for the season of 1906-1907 next Tuesday afternoon, giving its concert in the New National Theater. New interest is added in the appearance of Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor, fresh from his recent success in Boston.

In accordance with the practice prevailing with the orchestra this year, there will be no soloist at this first concert, for it has been planned primarily to introduce Dr. Muck to Washington. The programme is as follows:

Brahms.....Symphony in C minor, No. 1
Haydn.....Symphony in G major (B and H No. 13)
Weber.....Overture to "Der Freischuetz

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The winter season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open on next Tuesday afternoon at the New National Theater, which will be the second appearance in Washington of this organization in many years.

Dr. Karl Muck, the new director, has announced the following programme, and in common with the practice which prevails with the orchestra, there will be no soloist at this first concert, for it has been planned primarily to introduce Dr. Muck to Washington:

Haydn, Symphony in G major (B. and H. No. 13).
Weber, overture to "Der Freischuetz."
Brahms' Symphony in C minor, No. 1.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the W

From

ddress

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on to-morrow (Monday) evening, at 8.15. This will be the introductory appearance in Philadelphia of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin who is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, having come to America on a special leave of absence granted him last spring by the German Emperor after a long series of negotiations. Quite unusual interest has been manifested in his coming to this city. In fact, not since Mr. Nikisch was conductor of the Orchestra has there been anything like it and the prospects are that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have the most prosperous season in Philadelphia that has been its fortune for several years past.

At this first concert in Philadelphia there will be no solo artist, for it has been planned primarily to introduce Dr. Muck to the Philadelphia patrons of the Boston Symphony and it has been deemed undesirable to divide the attention of the audience. The program for to-morrow (Monday) night will be the same as that used by Dr. Muck for his first concert in Boston. It is as follows:

Beethoven .....Symphony in C Minor, No. 5
Wagner .....Eine Faust Overture
Wagner .....Siegfried Idyll
Wagner.....Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Dr. Carl Muck Makes Favorable Impression on His Debut.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the directorship of its new leader, Dr. Carl Muck, made its first appearance in its series of Monday evening concerts before a Philadelphia audience last night at the Academy of Music. There was no soloist on the programme. Dr. Muck, the new leader, was the centre of attraction It was wise for the management of the orchestra to allow this first performance of the season to be dominated entirely by its new conductor.

This programme gave us a chance, after the wide advertising that had been given him, to make a clearly concise judgment of a man who has hitherto been known to us only by reputation.

Dr. Muck last night proved himself very well worthy of the fame that has preceded him. His manner is most modest; his beat is not obtrusive, yet, at the same time, one knows that he is completely in control of his orchestra, and even his unexpressive back shows that he is master of his musicians.

If Dr. Muck had had an ordinary European orchestra to conduct he could not possibly have achieved the results that he did last night.

But with such a perfect organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he was at liberty to show himself at his best.

Dr. Muck's conducting is, in its way, forceful and convincing. It is strong and individual. It is a most welcome relief from the classicism of Mr. Gericke.

But Dr. Muck's interpretation is not entirely satisfactory. He has many points in his favor, but he is too inclined to make very big distinctions between pianissimo and fortissimo. In fact, one might almost say that he is too much inclined to overuse the punctuation points of music. His sentences are flowing but subdued; his climaxes are so strong in contrast as to be almost obtrusive. The ideas which he brings to us are not epoch-making, but they are fresh, young, strong and imbued with the spirit of the new era. Therefore they are most welcome, especially in contrast with what the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been offering us for a number of years past.

The programme, made up of the fifth Beethoven symphony and three familiar numbers by Wagner, offered nothing new, but on this very account was, perhaps, particularly well chosen, in that it gave us liberty to put our whole attention on Dr. Muck and to compare him in well-known works with others we have heard.

Again let it be said that Dr. Muck is most welcome and most worthy of support.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

POST

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Will high hats be eliminated at the Boston Symphony concerts this year? One of last season's concert goers writes to the management: "We were exceedingly annoyed by a very tall (sitting) lady in a big hat who insisted upon wearing it. She sat about the second or third in the front row. If she is going to sit there again this year please move us nearer the center and give some one else a turn. Please don't move us to the left, as there were more big hats there. I am one of those unfortunates who can't listen entirely with the soul, but want to see, too. I am sure I am not alone in this. I heard the men behind me swear. and if you could do a little missionary hat work I think you would endear yourself to many people."

paper Cutting Bureau in the World

National—The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert season of 1906-1907 will open Tuesday afternoon, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its first visit to Washington and gives its concert in the new National Theater. Interest in Washington ran high a year ago when this famous organization returned to this city, after an absence of many years. This year it seemed to run even higher, and the house has been practically sold out on subscription for all of the five concerts the orchestra will give here. After the splendid concerts which were given under Mr. Gericke's direction a year ago, it was but natural that more of the music lovers of this city should desire to go to the present series, and added to this is the coming of Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor, of whom Washington has been hearing so much of late and who made such an extraordinary and even unexpected success in Boston.

In common with the practice which prevails with the orchestra this year there will be no soloist at this first concert, for it has been planned primarily to introduce Dr. Muck to Washington. The program is as follows:

Symphony in G major (B. and H. No. 13).....Haydn
"Overture to Der Freischuetz"...Weber
Symphony in C minor, No. 1.....Brahms

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wor

n

ress

e

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Karl Mock Makes His Local Debut as Director.

It was rather a daring thing for the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, fresh from the Royal Opera House, at Berlin, to make his Philadelphia debut as a conductor with so familiar a musical selection as that which constituted the program of the concert given last evening at the Academy of Music. All who are familiar with classical music know the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven almost by heart, and most people have their own conceptions of how it should be played; nor are the Faust Overture of Wagner, the Siegfried Idyl and the prelude to Die Meistersinger by the same composer by any means strangers to music patrons. Yet these four numbers were all that appeared on last night's program—soloist, too, there was none. By making such a selection Dr. Muck directly challenged comparison with other conductors, and, it must be admitted, the result justified his intent, albeit it that to it may be attributed the fact that the opening concert of the Boston Symphony in this city had rather a slimmer audience than that which greets it usually.

There can be no doubt that Dr. Muck is a great conductor. The applause which greeted his appearance was prefunctory and the audience was a little apathetic during the first two movements of the symphony. As Beethoven's immortal work progressed, however, the orchestra warmed up and the audience grew more enthusiastic and less critical; and with good reason. Seldom if ever has a finer rendition of the last two movements of this symphony been heard in this city. Under Dr. Muck's baton the orchestra displayed wonderful refinement of phrasing and gradation of musical shading. In fact its playing was about as near being ideal as one can hope for on this mundane sphere. Back of the leading was both intellect and temperament; a great combination in the artistic world; and this directed what is probably the best orchestra in America playing at its best.

The rest of the concert illustrated that Dr. Muck could interpret Wagner as well as he could Beethoven, the Siegfried idyl, particularly displaying his ability to give the true poetic conception to orchestral music.

Later the orchestra is to play more modern music than it did last evening, and one looks forward with interest to the way in which it will render the work of Richard Strauss, under Dr. Muck's baton.

ess

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on tomorrow evening, at 8.1 when Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, will make his first appearance in this city. Quite unusual interest has been manifested in the occasion: How Dr. Muck will appeal to Philadelphia remains to be seen, but he is reported to have captured Boston. At this first concert in Philadelphia there will be no solo artist, for it has been planned primarily to introduce Dr. Muck to the Philadelphia patrons of the Boston Symphony and it has been deemed undesirable to divide the attention of the audience. The program for tomorrow night will be the same as that used by Dr. Muck for his first concert in Boston. It is as follows:

Beethoven..Symphony in C minor, No. 5
Wagner.....Eine Faust Overture
Wagner.....Siegfried Idyll
Wagner, prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

aper Cutting Bureau in the World

WILL WELCOME DR. MUCK

Baltimore Music Lovers Want To See New Boston Leader.

MacDOWELL'S PATHETIC PLIGHT

America's Greatest Musician And Composer Broken Down—Fritz Scheel And Mme. Gadski.

With the coming of Dr. Karl Muck next Wednesday evening we shall have our first opportunity of hearing the famous orchestra under the inspiring baton of the great Berlin conductor, whose magnetic personality will surely infuse new life into this wonderful band of musicians. The fine program announced — Beethoven, Strauss, Wagner—will probably have far more interest for the general musical public than many of those Mr. Gericke gave us in past seasons. It is as follows:

Sympony in C minor, No. 5.....Beethoven
Tone-poem, Don Juan.....Richard Strauss
Siegfried Idyll.....Wagner
Prelude to The Mastersingers of Nuremburg.....Wagner

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wor

m lress

e

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Dr. Karl Muck Makes His First Appearance as Conductor in This City.

Dr. Karl Muck, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his bow before Philadelphia's music lovers in the Academy of Music last night and received an enthusiastic welcome. The applause which greeted him was much more than a polite tribute to a distinguished musician, who had come crowned with the approval of Germany's best critics; it was the spontaneous acknowledgment of rare talent adorning a potent personality. In all respects the concert was a notable artistic event.

The program was arranged obviously to give Dr. Muck all possible opportunity to display his powers. It contained only compositions that have been made familiar here by frequent performance and the services of a soloist were dispensed with that the attention of the audience might be concentrated on the orchestra. The symphony was Beethoven's mighty Fifth, which was followed by three Wagner numbers: The "Faust Overture," the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." As Dr. Muck has won particular fame as a Wagnerian interpreter his selection was significant.

The symphony, of course, was the show piece of the evening and the new conductor's reading of it was highly original and forceful. He made it perfectly clear that he was bound by no traditions that could interfere with his conception of the real significance of the work.

In the Wagner numbers, Dr. Muck fully justified his reputation. The "Faust" overture was played with splendid vigor and clearness. It was here that the conductor demonstrated most fully the complete and sympathetic control he had over the orchestra.

Dr. Muck is a slender man of medium height. His face is smooth and shaven with large features, boldly outlined and indicative of great vigor. The most striking thing about him is his massive head which is covered with thick dark brown hair. Though he is forty-five years old he looks much younger, and in his movements gives the impression of buoyant youthfulness. In conducting, his manner is restrained, though there can be no mistaking the energy that is back of the quick gestures with which he imposes his will on the orchestra. Dr. Muck received the applause which greeted him last nibht with every show of modesty and seemed rather embarrassed when he was forced several times to appear before the audience and acknowledge its praises. Dr. Muck is now absent from the Berlin Royal Opera House by special permission of the Emperor, but, unfortunately, this lasts for only one year.

Telegraph
Phila. Pa.
Nov. 6, 190

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Dr. Carl Muck Makes Favorable Impression on His Debut.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the directorship of its new leader, Dr. Carl Muck, made its first appearance in its series of Monday evening concerts before a Philadelphia audience last night at the Academy of Music. There was no soloist on the programme. Dr. Muck, the new leader, was the centre of attraction. It was wise for the management of the orchestra to allow this first performance of the season to be dominated entirely by its new conductor.

This programme gave us a chance, after the wide advertising that had been given him, to make a clearly concise judgment of a man who has hitherto been known to us only by reputation.

Dr. Muck last night proved himself very well worthy of the fame that has preceded him. His manner is most modest; his beat is not obtrusive, yet, at the same time, one knows that he is completely in control of his orchestra, and even his unexpressive back shows that he is master of his musicians.

If Dr. Muck had had an ordinary European orchestra to conduct he could not possibly have achieved the results that he did last night.

But with such a perfect organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he was at liberty to show himself at his best.

Dr. Muck's conducting is, in its way, forceful and convincing. It is strong and individual. It is a most welcome relief from the classicism of Mr. Gericke.

But Dr. Muck's interpretation is not entirely satisfactory. He has many points in his favor, but he is too inclined to make very big distinctions between pianissimo and fortissimo. In fact, one might almost say that he is too much inclined to overuse the punctuation points of music. His sentences are flowing but subdued; his climaxes are so strong in contrast as to be almost obtrusive. The ideas which he brings to us are not epoch-making, but they are fresh, young, strong and imbued with the spirit of the new era. Therefore they are most welcome, especially in contrast with what the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been offering us for a number of years past.

The programme, made up of the fifth Beethoven symphony and three familiar numbers by Wagner, offered nothing new, but on this very account was, perhaps, particularly well chosen, in that it gave us liberty to put our whole attention on Dr. Muck and to compare him in well-known works with others we have heard.

Again let it be said that Dr. Muck is most welcome and most worthy of support.

NEWS
BALTIMORE, Md.
NOV 7 - 1906

Dr. Karl Muck

he new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will be heard in Baltimore for the first time at tonight's concert at the Lyric.

Herald
Washington, D.
Nov 7, 190

DR. KARL MUCK'S DEBUT.

The New Boston Symphony Conductor Makes Agreeable Impression.

Before an audience which thronged the National Theater, and which accorded the Boston Symphony Orchestra a cordial greeting, Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of that organization, made his debut in Washington yesterday afternoon. The advent of a new maestro is a matter of no small importance, and it is pleasant to record the fact that Dr. Muck is a worthy successor to the distinguished and capable men under whose batons the orchestra has speedily progressed toward perfection.

He made a most pleasing impression, being dignified without being distrait, unobtrusive yet confident in his conducting, and withal evidencing a catholicity of spirit that augurs well for future concerts. The latter characteristic was especially noticeable, it being difficult to determine whether the joyous and light-hearted Haydn appealed to him more than the serious and sedate Brahms. It is true that the programme did not offer any novelties.

Haydn's Symphony in G minor, Brahms' Symphony No. 1, in C minor, and Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz," are all well-known to concert-goers. Their very familiarity, however, afforded an opportunity to judge of Dr. Muck as an interpreter. His reading, while conservative, is not hackneyed, and he is a past-master in the art of accentuation.

The Haydn Symphony was interpreted con amore, each number being marked by crispness, delicacy, and spirit. The Brahms work was given in masterly fashion. This is especially true of the second movement, which was marked by reverential solemnity, and the last movement, the breadth and nobility of which received adequate treatment. Brahms does not belong to the group of musicians who are universally beloved. His writing is like blank verse, sonorous and rhythmic, but lacking the fascination of well-balanced rhyme. The last movement of the symphony yesterday afternoon, however, appealed with tremendous force by reason of its inherent strength and beauty. "The Freischutz" overture was presented with an abundance of tone-color, but if Dr. Muck had been seeking dramatic effect he would not have overlooked the two-beat which precedes the fortissimo [illegible] which mark the stirring finale. As to the orchestra itself, it may be said that, like wine, it improves with age. Each member is an artist, and its [illegible] work is characterized by wonderful precision and accuracy. It is remarkable [illegible] temperament of the conductor, [illegible] responsive to [illegible] and individual [illegible] Cutting Bureau in the World.

POST

SOCIETY HEARS CLASSICS.

Dr. Karl Muck Makes Washington Debut with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Karl Muck made his Washington debut as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at the National Theater. The programme opened with Haydn's Symphony in G major and closed with Brahms' First Symphony. Between these came Weber's overture to "Der Freischuetz," which is almost as familiar to the Washington public as Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" overture.

The arrangement of these numbers in order of date, beginning with Haydn, called the earliest exponent of the symphony; extending then to Weber, the founder of the romantic school of German opera, and followed by Brahms, the latter-day classicist, was indicative of historical sequence, illustrative of the progress of music in Germany during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

A careful mastery of every detail in the Haydn symphony made the performance of that work perfect. The naivette and delicacy which often pall in this early style of composition found relief in sudden, contrasted measures of mock fierceness. Dr. Muck found the orchestra so certain of the exact shade and rhythm in this work that he rested his baton on his desk for minutes at a time, merely glancing at this or that group of instruments and turning the pages of his score.

In the overture, the effects were studied and well nigh over-drawn. There was an exaggeration of nicety and almost a domination of suppression until the louder and swifter portions were announced. The newness of the interpretation saved the performance from a threatened tedium owing ot a too frequent hearing of the composition. In the Brahms symphony, both players and conductor reached the pinnacle of the afternoon's achievements.

Dr. Muck followed every turn of the devious solitude of musical phrases in this rendition. It was conducted sympathetically and with the true import of its pages. While there was little human expression of the present generation in yesterday's concert, it teemed with intellectuality and classicism in its severest contour.

Mrs. Roosevelt occupied one of the lower boxes, and had with her Mrs. Boardman, Mrs. and Miss Bishop, Miss Randolph, and Miss Hagner. On the opposite side of the theater were the Baroness von Sternburg and party. Mrs. Samuel Thomas, Mrs. C. A. Williams, and A. Lisner, also occupied boxes, and several well-known leaders in society and musical affairs of the city were to be seen in the audience.

[illegible] Cutting Bureau in the World.
GLOBE

NOV 7 - 1906

A GOOD deal of curiosity has been expressed as to Dr. Karl Muck's opinion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he is conducting this year, especially since he has been conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, admittedly the finest in Europe. Dr. Muck does not talk much and never deals in comparisons, but in a conversation with a visitor from New York a short time ago, he said: "Of course I knew I was coming to a splendid orchestra, but I really had no idea what the Boston Symphony really is. Its wind choirs are the most beautiful, and the strings—I have never heard such strings in all my life!"

An interesting pendant to Dr. Muck's opinion of the orchestra's quality is the record of his success with the orchestra contained in a private letter from one who has been a close and keen observer of the orchestra and its work since its inauguration twenty-four years ago: "Dr. Muck," says our correspondent, "seems to have captured the town. The orchestra all seem delighted with him. He has allowed the men so many favors that they all seem to stand up for him loyally. He allows them to commence rehearsing at 9:30 A. M., instead of 10; lets them play an overture, for instance, through in their way instead of stopping at every phrase; compliments them when he likes their ideas after he has heard them play as they like, and wastes no time in useless talking or explaining. He also lets the lid off the brasses sometimes. Truly, I never enjoyed the orchestra as this year. The Brahms First Symphony was perfection, wonderful. His bringing out of the themes in the complicated opening was superb."

[illegible] Cutting Bureau in the World.
POST

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NOV 7 - 1906

Mrs. Roosevelt occupied a box at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in the National Theater. She was accompanied by Mrs. Boardman, Mrs. Bishop, Mrs. Randolph, and Miss Hagner. Mrs. Roosevelt was gowned in her customary black gown, with small black hat, trimmed with a bunch of ostrich feathers, and looked unusually well. She has gained a few pounds avoirdupois this fall, and also a becoming amount of color, and never looked so well as just now. She and her party came in early. In fact, in ample time for the opening number, as is Mrs. Roosevelt's custom, and they remained until the end and added their approval of Dr. Muck's work with the orchestra in applause, to that of the audience.

[57]

[illegible] Paper Cutting Bureau in the World.
TIMES

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NOV 7 - 1906

GREET DR. MUCK IN MATIN CONCERT.

New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Pleases Audience.

GAVE DELIGHTFUL PROGRAM

First Concert of Present Season Was One of Organization's Best.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Washington this season took place yesterday afternoon in the National Theater. An audience in every way worthy of the magnificent organization greeted them. It filled almost every seat in gallery, balcony, and on the floor, and proved that Washinston has taken a foremost place as a supporter of the best in music, when a program of orchestral music without the attraction of a soloist could draw such a splendid house.

Washington audiences have seldom shown such an intense interest in an orchestral concert as this one showed in the first appearance of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera of Berlin, who has been loaned by the Kaiser for a year's sojourn in America, to conduct the Boston Symphony. Washington greeted Dr. Muck kindly, but it was not until the close of the Overture to Freischutz that it put the unmistakable stamp of approval upon his work. He chatted and smiled rather familiarly with the men immediately near him, which many concert growers criticize, while others approve as an evidence of perfect sympathy and good feeling between players and conductor.

However he may be criticised personally, his genius as a conductor is undisputed. He has a happy combination of the qualities of his predecessors, temperament, self-control, polish, and an intimate knowledge of music. His temperament dominates the orchestra.

Dr. Muck very apparently does his work with his men at rehearsals, leaving nothing for the concert but the result of the work. He has no acrobatic accomplishments, at least if he has he does not display them on the concert stage. He is quiet, forceful, and has a strong, tempestuous temperament apparently suppressed and under perfect control. He even lays his baton down quietly and rests both hands upon his score frequently, and his men play with the same precision and put warmth of color into their work just the same, showing their conscientious labor in rehearsal.

The program opened with the quaint and stately Symphony in G major, by Haydn, followed by the Overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz," the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor, giving the proper weight to a pleasingly arranged program. "Der Freischutz" was full of new beauties under the magic of his interpretation.

Dr. Muck's reading of the Brahms Symphony was masterly. He brought out every tiny theme and melody with no predominance of one instrument over another except when one had the melody. In fact, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played with such perfect satisfaction in Washington for some time, as it did yesterday afternoon. It will have a warm welcome on its next visit for Dr. Muck has made a pronounced hit here as he has in New York and in Boston. He is as great a conductor of orchestra as he is of German opera.

[illegible] N. Y. EV'G SUN
NOV 7 - 1906

Curious persons have asked Dr. Karl Muck's opinion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he is to conduct for the first time in New York to-morrow evening. As a conductor of Berlin's Royal Opera, of Bayreuth "Parsifal," and of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, admittedly the finest in Europe, Dr. Muck has learned never to deal in comparisons, but in conversation with a visitor to Boston a short time ago, he said: "Of course, I knew I was coming to a splendid orchestra, but I really had no idea of what the Boston Symphony really is. Its wind choirs are the most beautiful, and as for the strings, I have never heard such strings in all my life." Surely there is "praise from Sir Herbert."

[illegible] Standard Union
[illegible] N. Y.
NOV 8 - 190

William J. Henderson, of the "Sun," lectured at Association Hall yesterday afternoon on the programme at the first concert to be given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mme. Stoffrejen was at the piano.

...Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World...
...ess Philadelphia Pa
...Nov 6, 1906

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Dr. Carl Muck Makes Favorable Impression on His Debut.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the directorship of its new leader, Dr. Carl Muck, made its first appearance in its series of Monday evening concerts before a Philadelphia audience last night at the Academy of Music. There was no soloist on the programme. Dr. Muck, the new leader, was the centre of attraction. It was wise for the management of the orchestra to allow this first performance of the season to be dominated entirely by its new conductor.

This programme gave us a chance, after the wide advertising that had been given him, to make a clearly concise judgment of a man who has hitherto been known to us only by reputation.

Dr. Muck last night proved himself very well worthy of the fame that has preceded him. His manner is most modest; his beat is not obtrusive, yet, at the same time, one knows that he is completely in control of his orchestra, and even his unexpressive back shows that he is master of his musicians.

If Dr. Muck had had an ordinary European orchestra to conduct he could not possibly have achieved the results that he did last night.

But with such a perfect organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he was at liberty to show himself at his best.

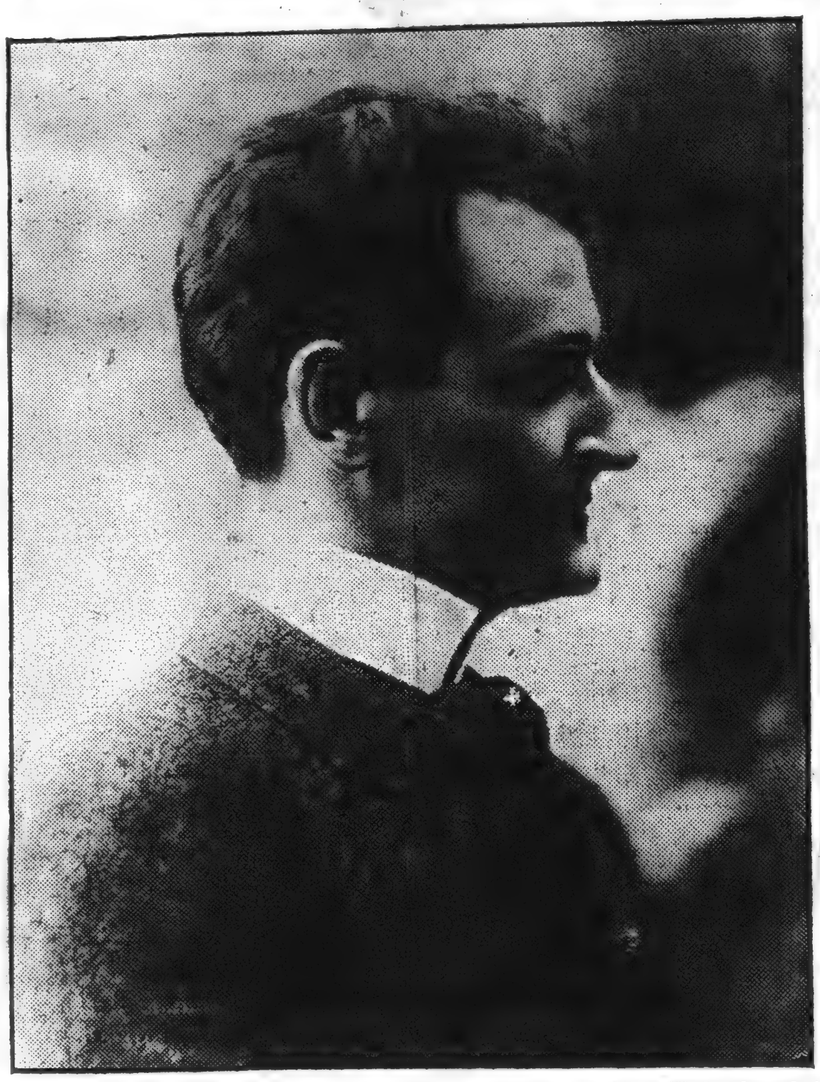
Dr. Muck's conducting is, in its way, forceful and convincing. It is strong and individual. It is a most welcome relief from the classicism of Mr. Gericke.

But Dr. Muck's interpretation is not entirely satisfactory. He has many points in his favor, but he is too inclined to make very big distinctions between pianissimo and fortissimo. In fact, one might almost say that he is too much inclined to overuse the punctuation points of music. His sentences are flowing but subdued; his climaxes are so strong in contrast as to be almost obtrusive. The ideas which he brings to us are not epoch-making, but they are fresh, young, strong and imbued with the spirit of the new era. Therefore they are most welcome, especially in contrast with what the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been offering us for a number of years past.

The programme, made up of the fifth Beethoven symphony and three familiar numbers by Wagner, offered nothing new, but on this very account was, perhaps, particularly well chosen, in that it gave us liberty to put our whole attention on Dr. Muck and to compare him in well-known works with others we have heard.

Again let it be said that Dr. Muck is most welcome and most worthy of support.

Dr. Karl Muck



he new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will be heard in Baltimore for the first time at tonight's concert at the Lyric.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World...
...Herald
...ess Baltimore Md
...Nov 7, 06

DR. KARL MUCK'S DEBUT.

The New Boston Symphony Conductor Makes Agreeable Impression.

Before an audience which thronged the National Theater, and which accorded the Boston Symphony Orchestra a cordial greeting, Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of that organization, made his debut in Washington yesterday afternoon. The advent of a new maestro is a matter of no small importance, and it is pleasant to record the fact that Dr. Muck is a worthy successor to the distinguished and capable men under whose batons the orchestra has speedily progressed toward perfection.

He made a most pleasing impression, being dignified without being distrait, unobtrusive yet confident in his conducting, and withal evidencing a catholicity of spirit that augurs well for future concerts. The latter characteristic was especially noticeable, it being difficult to determine whether the joyous and light-hearted Haydn appealed to him more than the serious and sedate Brahms. It is true that the programme did not offer any novelties.

Haydn's Symphony in G minor, Brahms' Symphony No. 1, in C minor, and Weber's Overture "Der Freischutz," are all well-known to concert-goers. Their very familiarity, however, afforded an opportunity to judge of Dr. Muck as an interpreter. His reading, while conservative, is not hackneyed, and he is a past-master in the art of accentuation.

The Haydn Symphony was interpreted con amore, each number being marked by crispness, delicacy, and spirit. The Brahms work was given in masterly fashion. This is especially true of the second movement, which was marked by reverential solemnity, and the last movement, the breadth and nobility of which received adequate treatment. Brahms does not belong to the group of musicians who are universally beloved. His writing is like blank verse, sonorous and rhythmic, but lacking the fascination of well-balanced rhyme. The last movement of the symphony yesterday afternoon, however, appealed with tremendous force by reason of its inherent strength and beauty. "The Freischutz" overture was presented with an abundance of tone-color, but if Dr. Muck had been seeking dramatic effect he would not have overlooked the two-bar rest which precedes the fortissimo chords which mark the stirring finale.

As to the orchestra itself, it may be said that, like wine, it improves with age. Each member is an artist, and its ensemble work is characterized by wonderful precision and accuracy. It is responsive to the temperament of the conductor, and intelligently appreciative of the nuances which give life and individuality to the score.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World...

SOCIETY HEARS CLASSICS.

Dr. Karl Muck Makes Washington Debut with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Karl Muck made his Washington debut as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at the National Theater. The programme opened with Haydn's Symphony in G major and closed with Brahms' First Symphony. Between these came Weber's overture to "Der Freischuetz," which is almost as familiar to the Washington public as Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" overture.

The arrangement of these numbers in order of date, beginning with Haydn, called the earliest exponent of the symphony; extending then to Weber, the founder of the romantic school of German opera, and followed by Brahms, the latter-day classicist, was indicative of historical sequence, illustrative of the progress of music in Germany during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

A careful mastery of every detail in the Haydn symphony made the performance of that work perfect. The naivette and delicacy which often pall in this early style of composition found relief in sudden, contrasted measures of mock fierceness. Dr. Muck found the orchestra so certain of the exact shade and rhythm in this work that he rested his baton on his desk for minutes at a time, merely glancing at this or that group of instruments and turning the pages of his score.

In the overture, the effects were studied and well nigh over-drawn. There was an exaggeration of nicety and almost a domination of suppression until the louder and swifter portions were announced. The newness of the interpretation saved the performance from a threatened tedium owing ot a too frequent hearing of the composition. In the Brahms symphony, both players and conductor reached the pinnacle of the afternoon's achievements.

Dr. Muck followed every turn of the devious solitude of musical phrases in this rendition. It was conducted sympathetically and with the true import of its pages. While there was little human expression of the present generation in yesterday's concert, it teemed with intellectuality and classicism in its severest contour.

Mrs. Roosevelt occupied one of the lower boxes, and had with her Mrs. Boardman, Mrs. and Miss Bishop, Miss Randolph, and Miss Hagner. On the opposite side of the theater were the Baroness von Sternburg and party. Mrs. Samuel Thomas, Mrs. C. A. Williams, and A. Lisner, also occupied boxes, and several well-known leaders in society and musical affairs of the city were to be seen in the audience.

...BE...

A GOOD deal of curiosity has been expressed as to Dr. Karl Muck's opinion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he is conducting this year, especially since he has been conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, admittedly the finest in Europe. Dr. Muck does not talk much and never deals in comparisons, but in a conversation with a visitor from New York a short time ago, he said: "Of course I knew I was coming to a splendid orchestra, but I really had no idea what the Boston Symphony really is. Its wind choirs are the most beautiful, and the strings—I have never heard such strings in all my life!"

An interesting pendant to Dr. Muck's opinion of the orchestra's quality is the record of his success with the orchestra contained in a private letter from one who has been a close and keen observer of the orchestra and its work since its inauguration twenty-four years ago: "Dr. Muck," says our correspondent, "seems to have captured the town. The orchestra all seem delighted with him. He has allowed the men so many favors that they all seem to stand up for him loyally. He allows them to commence rehearsing at 9.30 A. M., instead of 10; lets them play an overture, for instance, through in their way instead of stopping at every phrase; compliments them when he likes their ideas after he has heard them play as they like, and wastes no time in useless talking or explaining. He also lets the lid off the brasses sometimes. Truly, I never enjoyed the orchestra as this year. The Brahms First Symphony was perfection, wonderful. His bringing out of the themes in the complicated opening was superb."

...r Cutting Bureau in the World...

Mrs. Roosevelt occupied a box at the oncert of the Boston Symphony Orhestra yesterday afternoon in the Nalonal Theater. She was accompanied y Mrs. Boardman, Mrs. Bishop, Mrs. tandolph, and Miss Hagner. Mrs. oosevelt was gowned in her customry black gown, with small black hat, rimmed with a bunch of ostrich feathrs, and looked unusually well. She as gained a few pounds avoirdupois his fall, and also a becoming amount f color, and never looked so well as ast now. She and her party came in arly. In fact, in ample time for the pening number, as is Mrs. Roosevelt's ustom, and they remained until the end nd added their approval of Dr. Muck's ork with the orchestra in apprause, to hat of the audience.

[57]

...aper Cutting Bureau in the World

GREET DR. MUCK IN MATIN CONCERT.

New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Pleases Audience.

GAVE DELIGHTFUL PROGRAM

First Concert of Present Season Was One of Organization's Best.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Washington this season took place yesterday afternoon in the National Theater. An audience in every way worthy of the magnificent organization greeted them. It filled almost every seat in gallery, balcony, and on the floor, and proved that Washington has taken a foremost place as a supporter of the best in music, when a program of orchestral music without the attraction of a soloist could draw such a splendid house.

Washington audiences have seldom shown such an intense interest in an orchestral concert as this one showed in the first appearance of Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera of Berlin, who has been loaned by the Kaiser for a year's sojourn in America, to conduct the Boston Symphony. Washington greeted Dr. Muck kindly, but it was not until the close of the Overture to Freischutz that it put the unmistakable stamp of approval upon his work. He chatted and smiled rather familiarly with the men immediately near him, which many concert growers criticize, while others approve as an evidence of perfect sympathy and good feeling between players and conductor.

However he may be criticised personally, his genius as a conductor is undisputed. He has a happy combination of the qualities of his predecessors, temperament, self-control, polish, and an intimate knowledge of music. His temperament dominates the orchestra.

Dr. Muck very apparently does his work with his men at rehearsals, leaving nothing for the concert but the result of the work. He has no acrobatic accomplishments, at least if he has he does not display them on the concert stage. He is quiet, forceful, and has a strong, tempestuous temperament apparently suppressed and under perfect control. He even lays his baton down quietly and rests both hands upon his score frequently, and his men play with the same precision and put warmth of color into their work just the same, showing their conscientious labor in rehearsal.

The program opened with the quaint and stately Symphony in G major, by Haydn, followed by the Overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz," the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor, giving the proper weight to a pleasingly arranged program. "Der Freischutz" was full of new beauties under the magic of his interpretation.

Dr. Muck's reading of the Brahms Symphony was masterly. He brought out every tiny theme and melody, with no predominance of one instrument over another except when one had the melody. In fact, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played with such perfect satisfaction in Washington for some time, as it did yesterday afternoon. It will have a warm welcome on its next visit for Dr. Muck has made a pronounced hit here as he has in New York and in Boston. He is as great a conductor of orchestra as he is of German opera.

...n...
...ress...
...e...

Curious persons have asked Dr. Karl Muck's opinion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he is to conduct for the first time in New York to-morrow evening. As a conductor of Berlin's Royal Opera, of Bayreuth "Parsifal," and of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, admittedly the finest in Europe, Dr. Muck has learned never to deal in comparisons, but in conversation with a visitor to Boston a short time ago, he said: "Of course, I knew I was coming to a splendid orchestra, but I really had no idea of what the Boston Symphony really is. Its wind choirs are the most beautiful, and as for the strings, I have never heard such strings in all my life." Surely there is "praise from Sir Herbert."

...m...
...ress...
...e...

William J. Henderson, of the "Sun," lectured at Association Hall yesterday afternoon on the programme at the first concert to be given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mme. Stoffrejen was at the piano.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BALTIMORE,

NOV 7 - 1906

SOCIETY IN WASHINGTON

Mrs. Roosevelt At First Boston Symphony Concert.

[Special Dispatch to the Baltimore Sun.]

Washington, Nov. 6.—Mrs. Roosevelt, wife of the President, occupied a box this afternoon at the first concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the National Theatre. She had with her Mrs. Boardman, Mrs. Bishop, Mrs. Randolph and Miss Isabelle Hagner. Mrs. Roosevelt was gowned in black, with small black hat, with black ostrich feathers upon the left upturned side. She is looking particularly well this fall and has a bright color in her face, which has not been noticed there for some years.

Dr. Muck, the new conductor of the symphony, made a pronounced success and was recalled many times by the packed house which greeted him. Among other distinguished persons in the audience were the Baroness von Sternburg, wife of the German Ambassador; the Japanese Ambassador and Viscountess Aoki, Mrs. Hopkins, Rev. Doctor and Mrs. McKim and Lady Durand and Miss Durand.

N. Y. TELEGRAM

NOV 7 - 1906

Dr. Carl Muck, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was a distinguished pianist before he became famous as a conductor. Shortly after he arrived in Boston Professor Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra, asked him to play the piano in one of the modern works which the Boston Symphony Quartet is to give this season. Dr. Muck looked doubtful and asked to see the score. He read it over and then said:—"Yes, I will, if you put it into your last concert. These young fellows that are writing music ask so much of the poor pianist. Only virtuosos will suit them, and—ach, Gott! my fingers are getting stiff. I'll have to take a course of scales before the concert, and you must give me time."

Standard Union Brooklyn

NOV 7 -

MUCK WAS AWED.

Dr. Karl Muck, who is to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, gave "The Musical Age" this interesting description of how his first sail into the Port of New York impressed him:

"I was awed—yes, awed—by the skyline of your city as the steamer slowly moved up the bay," he said. "It is gigantic, overwhelming, bewildering. It completely embodies the mental picture I had formed of it, the reality filling out magnificently the crevices of detail. The colossal structures, studded with innumerable windows, put me in mind of so many human beehives, the workers within bent on great accomplishment. This, then, is the energy that makes your country what it is. The sight is an inspiration—splendid! splendid!

"This may sound naive to you. Recollect, too, this is my first visit to your shores. Wait until I come again, then probably I shall assume that fashionable blase indifference. Now I am interested in everything, everything."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

CITIZEN.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

NOV 8 - 1906

FINE LECTURE-RECITAL BY WM. J. HENDERSON.

The first in the series of five lecture recitals on the Boston Symphony Concerts was given at Association Hall yesterday afternoon under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute, the lecturer being William J. Henderson, music editor of the New York "Sun." Mme. Stoffregen was at the piano. The programme studied was that of the concert at the Baptist Temple tomorrow evening: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68, Brahms; overture to "Oberon," Weber; the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Der Meistersinger," Wagner. The lecturer assumed that his audience knew the facts about the lives of the three authors, so kept closely to the study of their music. It was said of Brahms that when he is not "pretty" in his music he is something greater and better—grand, noble, majestic, serious. Weber was said to have done a whole lot of things before Wagner did them, "and a great many of Wagner's best ideas were Weber's ideas."

Sun

Baltimore, Md.

Nov. 8, 1906

DR. KARL MUCK THRILLS

Large Audience Greets Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CONCERT ANOTHER TRIUMPH

Program Affords Fine Opportunity To Study New Director's Versatility.

It is questionable whether the Boston Symphony Orchestra was ever greeted by a larger audience in Baltimore than that which attended the first of the present series of concerts, which was given last evening at the Lyric. Every seat in the spacious hall—the main floor, balcony and gallery—was filled, and here and there, scattered about the outer aisles, could be seen persons standing.

Whether this generous outpouring of a music-loving public was due to anticipation of the music it was to hear or whether the throng was attracted by curiosity, merely to get a glimpse of Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of that organization, is also questionable. At any rate, it was the two causes—the superb work of the orchestra and the masterful, musicianly qualities displayed by Dr. Muck—that combined to hold the audience almost as if spellbound through one of the most interesting and brilliant concerts ever heard in this city.

As to the reception accorded Dr. Muck, it is sufficient to say he was received with hearty, spontaneous cordiality, without any undue, unnecessary demonstration. Once, when the audience became demonstrative in its applause, and Dr. Muck motioned the members of the orchestra to arise and share the honors with him, there were a half dozen persons scattered about the hall who shouted "Bravo!" but this was the only demonstration, aside from the hearty handclapping which followed each number.

The concert was another triumph for the orchestra and the initial Baltimore triumph for Dr. Muck. Of the fact that the latter has created a most favorable impression here there is no doubt. His work was received, as it well deserved to have been, with the sincere approbation of a critical, but thoroughly musical, audience.

The following program was given:

Symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 67.....Beethoven
- Allegro con brio.
- Andante con moto.
- Allegro; trio.
- Allegro.

Tone Poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), op. 20.....Richard Strauss

"A Siegfried Idyl".....Wagner

Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg".....Wagner

With the exception of one number, the program was the same as that given by the orchestra at its first concert under Dr. Muck in Boston about a month ago. Its numbers offered a rich contrast and ample opportunity to study the breadth and versatility of the new conductor.

The Beethoven symphony might well be termed a continual string of melodic jewels. Throughout the four movements there is not a dull moment—not an instant that one does not feel, as it were, the wealth of magnificent, pure melody being poured forth. The motives of the first three movements were sketched by Beethoven in 1800 and 1801 and the work was finished in 1807. It was first performed in Vienna in 1808.

Of the four movements the second is perhaps the richest in melody. This movement—the andante—might well be termed one great, glittering gem, outshining, if such a thing were possible, the richness of the others of the same work.

In strong contrast, in point of thematic and harmonic treatment, was the Strauss tone-poem. The inspiration for the work was received from the poem of "Don Juan," by Nicolaus Lenau, and is known as the first of Strauss' symphonic or tone poems. It is imposing in conception and construction and conveys its message of intense human passion and feeling in beautiful, majestic strains, which require practically all the resources of the orchestra, including the triangle, cymbals, glockenspiel and harp.

In the two closing numbers—Wagner's Siegfried idyl and the overture of "Die Meistersinger"—Dr. Muck proved how thoroughly familiar he is with the works of the great Bavarian master. This was to have been expected after the conductor had spent several seasons as leader at Bayreuth. This fact only caused the Wagner numbers to be received with probably more than ordinary interest. That such a work as the Siegfried idyl was truly inspired by Wagner's pleasure at the birth of his son, Siegfried, in whose honor he wrote it, can well be believed. In the work the master has associated much of the thematic treatment to be found in the Siegfried music of "Die Walkure." In fact, nearly all them were, with the exception of the folksong "Sleep, My Child, Sleep."

The prelude was given with all its dash and fire, and one regretted that there was not more of it.

Of Dr. Muck it may almost be said that he is the antithesis of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, whom he succeeds. The one thoroughly orthodox in his reading, conservative in his interpretation and at all times inclined to repress rather than bring forth the full force of the music at his command, and the other—Dr. Muck—at all times full of energy and ever and anon manifesting that individuality which is born of energy and animation. Dr. Muck may be classed in music as a broad conservative. It was this breadth, combined with a fearlessness and at the same time a distinct loyalty to all of the musical traditions, that marked his readings throughout the program last evening and has doubtless stamped him a sincere favorite in Baltimore.

Among the audience was Sir William Henry Perkin, the eminent English scientist, who is visiting this city with the [illegible] family.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

EAGLE.

NOV 8 - 1906

W. J. HENDERSON LECTURES.

The First of Five Lecture Recitals on the Boston Symphony Concerts.

The first in the series of five lecture recitals on the Boston Symphony concerts (Philharmonic) was given at Association Hall, yesterday afternoon, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute, the lecturer being William J. Henderson, music editor of the New York Sun. Mme. Stoffregen was at the piano. The programme studied was that of the concert at the Baptist Temple to-morrow evening: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op 68, Brahms; overture to "Oberon," Weber; the "Siegfried Idyl," and the prelude to "Der Meistersinger," Wagner.

The lecturer assumed that his audience knew the facts about the lives of the three authors, so kept closely to the study of their music. It was said of Brahms that when he is not "pretty" in his music he is something greater and better—grand, noble, majestic, serious. Schumann, called the greatest musical critic that ever lived, heard Brahms in 1853, and declared his music to be of a sort the like of which he had never heard before, admiring it greatly. "The first symphony has a closeness of construction that goes with music of the highest architectural form," it is said, such music being later called "tonal architecture."

The four movements were studied in detail, attention being called to the Beethoven-like sound of the allegro of the fourth movement. Weber was said to have done many things before Wagner did them, "and a great many of Wagner's best ideas were Weber's ideas." In speaking more particularly of Weber's music, Mr. Henderson said that it would be fully and carefully described in every detail in the programme of the concert, "for my friend Hale never lets any facts get away from him. If he cannot get them in the text, he puts them in footnotes and notes to footnotes." He spoke of the great value of these programmes and advised attendants at the Philharmonic concerts to have them bound for future reference. The familiar story of the writing of the "Siegfried Idyl" was told, and the story of "Der Meistersinger" related.

ess

1906

Unlike those conductors and children who should be "seen and not heard," Karl Muck—in his time has been a distinguished pianist. When Willy Hess, of the Boston Symphony Quartet, asked him to play in Boston this season, Muck looked doubtful and asked to see the score. He read it over, an ultra modern composition.

"Yes, I will, if you put it into your last concert," he finally agreed. "These young fellows that are writing music ask so much of the poor pianist. Only virtuosos will suit them and, ach Gott! my fingers are getting stiff. I'll have to take a course of scales before the concert and you must give me time."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

GERMAN HERO

NEW YORK CI

NOV 8 - 1906

Empfang für Karl Muck.

Dr. Karl Muck, dem bekannten Musiker, wird heute Abend in Luchow's Restaurant ein Empfang veranstaltet werden, an dem sich hervorragende Persönlichkeiten aus der musikalischen Welt New Yorks betheiligen werden.

Dr. Muck wird heute zum ersten Male hier in New York ein Konzert dirigiren.

N. Y.

ess

NOV 8

"Have you heard Karl Muck?" was the question asked wherever musicians met today. And already there were special devotees who drew up their eyebrows to their Russian pompadours and mysteriously ejaculated: "Heard him? Ah! yes. Boston!"

Various New Yorkers have arranged a reception to Dr. Muck at a famous German meeting place in Fourteenth street to-night after his first appearance uptown at the Boston symphony concert.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BALTIMORE,

NOV 8 - 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives Its First Concert for the Season at the Lyric.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert for this season at the Lyric last evening under its new director, Dr. Karl Muck. To say that it was one of the best concerts ever given in this city would not be enough. It would be nearer the truth to say that no better concert was ever given here.

Dr. Muck is a perfect master of tonal proportion and expression, and he fully realizes the fact that the voice, even of deity, is not always in the whirlwind or the earthquake.

The audience itself quickly caught the lesson which Dr. Muck has at his baton's end, that the greatest power as well as the most difficult work in music is in the fineness of the piano and pianissimo. With all his ninety-odd instruments at his absolute command, the orchestra was not for one moment even noisy. The power was only exhibited long enough at a time to show that it was amply there, and that more held in musical reserve could be given out whenever necessary.

Dr. Muck's "beat" is precision and expression itself. No note is allowed to take care of itself. Its beginning, middle and end are carefully laid out and fully directed. No slovenly playing is possible under his baton. He makes it alive with his thought and determination. He delights in finish, and finish to perfection. Every phrase is clearly cut and distinctly set out. It is impossible for either orchestra or audience to mistake his meaning in anything he offers. His reading of the Beethoven C minor symphony differed from Gericke's, and agreed with that of Hans von Bulow, which was made familiar to Baltimoreans by many renditions under Asger Hamerik. The opening movement is taken a little quicker than is usual, giving it more life and freshness. The andante was never for a moment lagging. The scherzo allegro was a trifle slower than Von Bulow's, and gave ample opportunity for the eight double bassos to execute their difficult figures in perfect unison.

The allegro finale was full of spirit and set the work out in all its great glory and finish. It made the audience enthusiastic and established Dr. Muck in Baltimore's favor at once. From its opening unaccented eighth note to its strong close the rendition of the symphony was perfect.

The modern Strauss tone-poem, "Don Juan," was in fine contrast with the great Beethoven symphony. It is full of passion, and the "lingering sweetness, long drawn out," which may be bliss one moment and coolness the next, the changing feelings finding their expression in every shade of musical dynamics. As a modern contrast with old classic forms nothing better can be found, but it does not put the ear for the older out of joint. The following was the complete program:

Beethoven—
- Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67.
- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Andante con moto.
- III. Allegro; trio.
- IV. Allegro.

Richard Strauss—
- Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20.

Wagner—
- "A Siegfried Idyl."

Wagner—
- Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

ROSS Y ZEITUNG.

NOV 8 - 1906

Das „hohe C" Uncle Sam's.

Dr. Karl Muck, der bekanntlich das Boston Symphony Orchester für diese Saison leiten wird, hat in einem Interview über seinen ersten Eindruck, den er bei seiner Ankunft in New York erhielt, geplaudert, und dabei unumwunden erklärt, daß ihm die Wolkenkratzer mit ihren hunderten von Fenstern ganz besonders als ein Kennzeichen des amerikanischen Strebens auf der Konleiter des Fortschrittes imponirt habe. Allerdings fügte Dr. Muck hinzu, daß dies sein erster etwas naiv klingender Eindruck gewesen sei, wenn er vielleicht im nächsten Jahre wiederkomme, werde sich vielleicht sein Enthusiasmus nach dem Muster des Amerikaners abgekühlt haben.

THE MORNING TELEGRAPH

NEW YORK CIT

NOV 8 - 1

RECEPTION TO DR. MUCK.

New York Musicians to Greet German Conductor at Luechow's.

Prominent New York musicians have arranged a reception to Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The affair will be informal and will be held in the reception room of Luechow's.

To-night will be Dr. Muck's first appearance in New York, and the reception will take place after the Boston Symphony concert.

[58]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n

ress

e

SOCIETY IN WASHINGTON

Mrs. Roosevelt At First Boston Symphony Concert.

[Special Dispatch to the Baltimore Sun.]

Washington, Nov. 6.—Mrs. Roosevelt, wife of the President, occupied a box this afternoon at the first concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the National Theatre. She had with her Mrs. Boardman, Mrs. Bishop, Mrs. Randolph and Miss Isabelle Hagner. Mrs. Roosevelt was gowned in black, with small black hat, with black ostrich feathers upon the left upturned side. She is looking particularly well this fall and has a bright color in her face, which has not been noticed there for some years.

Dr. Muck, the new conductor of the symphony, made a pronounced success and was recalled many times by the packed house which greeted him. Among other distinguished persons in the audience were the Baroness von Sternburg, wife of the German Ambassador; the Japanese Ambassador and Viscountess Aoki, Mrs. Hopkins, Rev. Doctor and Mrs. McKim and Lady Durand and Miss Durand.

Dr. Carl Muck, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was a distinguished pianist before he became famous as a conductor. Shortly after he arrived in Boston Professor Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra, asked him to play the piano in one of the modern works which the Boston Symphony Quartet is to give this season. Dr. Muck looked doubtful and asked to see the score. He read it over and then said:—"Yes, I will, if you put it into your last concert. These young fellows that are writing music ask so much of the poor pianist. Only virtuosos will suit them, and—ach, Gott! my fingers are getting stiff. I'll have to take a course of scales before the concert, and you must give me time."

---

ldress

ıte

MUCK WAS AWED.

Dr. Karl Muck, who is to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, gave "The Musical Age" this interesting description of how his first sail into the Port of New York impressed him:

"I was awed—yes, awed—by the skyline of your city as the steamer slowly moved up the bay," he said. "It is gigantic, overwhelming, bewildering. It completely embodies the mental picture I had formed of it, the reality filling out magnificently the crevices of detail. The colossal structures, studded with innumerable windows, put me in mind of so many human beehives, the workers within bent on great accomplishment. This, then, is the energy that makes your country what it is. The sight is an inspiration—splendid! splendid!

"This may sound naive to you. Recollect, too, this is my first visit to your shores. Wait until I come again, then probably I shall assume that fashionable blase indifference. Now I am interested in everything, everything."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n

ress

e

FINE LECTURE-RECITAL BY WM. J. HENDERSON.

The first in the series of five lecture recitals on the Boston Symphony Concerts was given at Association Hall yesterday afternoon under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute, the lecturer being William J. Henderson, music editor of the New York "Sun." Mme. Stoffregen was at the piano. The programme studied was that of the concert at the Baptist Temple tomorrow evening: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68, Brahms; overture to "Oberon," Weber; the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Der Meistersinger," Wagner. The lecturer assumed that his audience knew the facts about the lives of the three authors, so kept closely to the study of their music. It was said of Brahms that when he is not "pretty" in his music he is something greater and better—grand, noble, majestic, serious. Weber was said to have done a whole lot of things before Wagner did them, "and a great many of Wagner's best ideas were Weber's ideas."

---

m Sun

ress Baltimore, Md

e Nov 8, 1906

DR. KARL MUCK THRILLS

Large Audience Greets Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CONCERT ANOTHER TRIUMPH

Program Affords Fine Opportunity To Study New Director's Versatility.

It is questionable whether the Boston Symphony Orchestra was ever greeted by a larger audience in Baltimore than that which attended the first of the present series of concerts, which was given last evening at the Lyric. Every seat in the spacious hall—the main floor, balcony and gallery—was filled, and here and there, scattered about the outer aisles, could be seen persons standing.

Whether this generous outpouring of a music-loving public was due to anticipation of the music it was to hear or whether the throng was attracted by curiosity, merely to get a glimpse of Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of that organization, is also questionable. At any rate, it was the two causes—the superb work of the orchestra and the masterful, musicianly qualities displayed by Dr. Muck—that combined to hold the audience almost as if spellbound through one of the most interesting and brilliant concerts ever heard in this city.

As to the reception accorded Dr. Muck, it is sufficient to say he was received with hearty, spontaneous cordiality, without any undue, unnecessary demonstration. Once, when the audience became demonstrative in its applause, and Dr. Muck motioned the members of the orchestra to arise and share the honors with him, there were a half dozen persons scattered about the hall who shouted "Bravo!" but this was the only demonstration, aside from the hearty handclapping which followed each number.

The concert was another triumph for the orchestra and the initial Baltimore triumph for Dr. Muck. Of the fact that the latter has created a most favorable impression here there is no doubt. His work was received, as it well deserved to have been, with the sincere approbation of a critical, but thoroughly musical, audience.

The following program was given:

Symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 67.....Beethoven
Allegro con brio.
Andante con moto.
Allegro; trio.
Allegro.

Tone Poem, 'Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), op. 20.....Richard Strauss

"A Siegfried Idyl".....Wagner

Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg".....Wagner

With the exception of one number, the program was the same as that given by the orchestra at its first concert under Dr. Muck in Boston about a month ago. Its numbers offered a rich contrast and ample opportunity to study the breadth and versatility of the new conductor.

The Beethoven symphony might well be termed a continual string of melodic jewels. Throughout the four movements there is not a dull moment—not an instant that one does not feel, as it were, the wealth of magnificent, pure melody being poured forth. The motives of the first three movements were sketched by Beethoven in 1800 and 1801 and the work was finished in 1807. It was first performed in Vienna in 1808.

Of the four movements the second is perhaps the richest in melody. This movement—the andante—might well be termed one great, glittering gem, outshining, if such a thing were possible, the richness of the others of the same work.

In strong contrast, in point of thematic and harmonic treatment, was the Strauss tone-poem. The inspiration for the work was received from the poem of "Don Juan," by Nicolaus Lenau, and is known as the first of Strauss' symphonic or tone poems. It is imposing in conception and construction and conveys its message of intense human passion and feeling in beautiful, majestic strains, which require practically all the resources of the orchestra, including the triangle, cymbals, glockenspiel and harp.

In the two closing numbers—Wagner's Siegfried idyl and the overture of "Die Meistersinger"—Dr. Muck proved how thoroughly familiar he is with the works of the great Bavarian master. This was to have been expected after the conductor had spent several seasons as leader at Baireuth. This fact only caused the Wagner numbers to be received with probably more than ordinary interest. That such a work as the Siegfried idyl was truly inspired by Wagner's pleasure at the birth of his son, Siegfried, in whose honor he wrote it, can well be believed. In the work the master has associated much of the thematic treatment to be found in the Siegfried music of "Die Walkure." In fact, nearly all them were, with the exception of the folksong "Sleep, My Child, Sleep."

The prelude was given with all its dash and fire, and one regretted that there was not more of it.

Of Dr. Muck it may almost be said that he is the antithesis of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, whom he succeeds. The one thoroughly orthodox in his reading, conservative in his interpretation and at all times inclined to repress rather than bring forth the full force of the music at his command, and the other—Dr. Muck—at all times full of energy and ever and anon manifesting that individuality which is born of energy and animation. Dr. Muck may be classed in music as a broad conservative. It was this breadth, combined with a fearlessness and at the same time a distinct loyalty to all of the musical traditions, that marked his readings throughout the program last evening and has doubtless stamped him a sincere favorite in Baltimore.

Among the audience was Sir William Henry Perkin, the eminent English scientist, who is visiting this city with the members of his family.

ıting Bureau in the World

W. J. HENDERSON LECTURES.

The First of Five Lecture Recitals on the Boston Symphony Concerts.

The first in the series of five lecture recitals on the Boston Symphony concerts (Philharmonic) was given at Association Hall, yesterday afternoon, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute, the lecturer being William J. Henderson, music editor of the New York Sun. Mme. Stoffregen was at the piano. The programme studied was that of the concert at the Baptist Temple to-morrow evening: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op 68, Brahms; overture to "Oberon," Weber; the "Siegfried Idyl," and the prelude to "Der Meistersinger," Wagner.

The lecturer assumed that his audience knew the facts about the lives of the three authors, so kept closely to the study of their music. It was said of Brahms that when he is not "pretty" in his music he is something greater and better—grand, noble, majestic, serious. Schumann, called the greatest musical critic that ever lived, heard Brahms in 1853, and declared his music to be of a sort the like of which he had never heard before, admiring it greatly. "The first symphony has a closeness of construction that goes with music of the highest architectural form," it is said, such music being later called "tonal architecture."

The four movements were studied in detail, attention being called to the Beethoven-like sound of the allegro of the fourth movement. Weber was said to have done many things before Wagner did them, "and a great many of Wagner's best ideas were Weber's ideas." In speaking more particularly of Weber's music, Mr. Henderson said that it would be fully and carefully described in every detail in the programme of the concert, "for my friend Hale never lets any facts get away from him. If he cannot get them in the text, he puts them in footnotes and notes to footnotes." He spoke of the great value of these programmes and advised attendants at the Philharmonic concerts to have them bound for future reference. The familiar story of the writing of the "Siegfried Idyl" was told, and the story of "Der Meistersinger" related.

---

ss

Unlike those conductors and children who should be "seen and not heard," Karl Muck in his time has been a distinguished pianist. When Willy Hess, of the Boston Symphony Quartet, asked him to play in Boston this season, Muck looked doubtful and asked to see the score. He read it over, an ultra modern composition.

"Yes, I will, if you put it into your last concert," he finally agreed. "These young fellows that are writing music ask so much of the poor pianist. Only virtuosos will suit them and, ach Gott! my fingers are getting stiff. I'll have to take a course of scales before the concert and you must give me time."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK

ss

NOV 5 1906

Empfang für Karl Muck.

Dr. Karl Muck, dem bekannten Musiker, wird heute Abend in Lüchow's Restaurant ein Empfang veranstaltet werden, an dem sich hervorragende Persönlichkeiten aus der musikalischen Welt New Yorks betheiligen werden.

Dr. Muck wird heute zum ersten Male hier in New York ein Konzert dirigiren.

Newspaper

n

ress

e

"Have you heard Karl Muck?" was the question asked wherever musicians met today. And already there were special devotees who drew up their eyebrows to their Russian pompadours and mysteriously ejaculated: "Heard him? Ah! yes. Boston!"

Various New Yorkers have arranged a reception to Dr. Muck at a famous German meeting place in Fourteenth street to-night after his first appearance uptown at the Boston symphony concert.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives Its First Concert for the Season at the Lyric.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert for this season at the Lyric last evening under its new director, Dr. Karl Muck. To say that it was one of the best concerts ever given in this city would not be enough. It would be nearer the truth to say that no better concert was ever given here.

Dr. Muck is a perfect master of tonal proportion and expression, and he fully realizes the fact that the voice, even of deity, is not always in the whirlwind or the earthquake.

The audience itself quickly caught the lesson which Dr. Muck has at his baton's end, that the greatest power as well as the most difficult work in music is in the fineness of the piano and pianissimo. With all his ninety-odd instruments at his absolute command, the orchestra was not for one moment even noisy. The power was only exhibited long enough at a time to show that it was amply there, and that more held in musical reserve could be given out whenever necessary.

Dr. Muck's "beat" is precision and expression itself. No note is allowed to take care of itself. Its beginning, middle and end are carefully laid out and fully directed. No slovenly playing is possible under his baton. He makes it alive with his thought and determination. He delights in finish, and finish to perfection. Every phrase is clearly cut and distinctly set out. It is impossible for either orchestra or audience to mistake his meaning in anything he offers. His reading of the Beethoven C minor symphony differed from Gericke's, and agreed with that of Hans von Bulow, which was made familiar to Baltimoreans by many renditions under Asger Hamerik. The opening movement is taken a little quicker than is usual, giving it more life and freshness. The andante was never for a moment lagging. The scherzo allegro was a trifle slower than Von Bulow's, and gave ample opportunity for the eight double bassos to execute their difficult figures in perfect unison.

The allegro finale was full of spirit and set the work out in all its great glory and finish. It made the audience enthusiastic and established Dr. Muck in Baltimore's favor at once. From its opening unaccented eighth note to its strong close the rendition of the symphony was perfect.

The modern Strauss tone-poem, "Don Juan," was in fine contrast with the great Beethoven symphony. It is full of passion, and the "lingering sweetness, long drawn out," which may be bliss one moment and coolness the next, the changing feelings finding their expression in every shade of musical dynamics. As a modern contrast with old classic forms nothing better can be found, but it does not put the ear for the older out of joint. The following was the complete program:

Beethoven—
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67.
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Allegro; trio.
IV. Allegro.

Richard Strauss—
Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20.

Wagner—
"A Siegfried Idyl."

Wagner—
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Das' „hohe C" Uncle Sams.

Dr. Karl Muck, der bekanntlich das Boston Symphony Orchester für diese Saison leiten wird, hat in einem Interview über seinen ersten Eindruck, den er bei seiner Ankunft in New York erhielt, geplaudert, und dabei unumwunden erklärt, daß ihm die Wolkenkratzer mit ihren hunderten von Fenstern ganz besonders als ein Kennzeichen des amerikanischen Strebens auf der Tonleiter des Fortschrittes imponirt habe. Allerdings fügte Dr. Muck hinzu, daß dies sein erster etwas naiv klingender Eindruck gewesen sei, wenn er vielleicht im nächsten Jahre wiederkomme, werde sich vielleicht sein Enthusiasmus nach dem Muster des Amerikaners abgekühlt haben.

TELEGRAPH

RECEPTION TO DR. MUCK.

New York Musicians to Greet German Conductor at Luechow's.

Prominent New York musicians have arranged a reception to Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The affair will be informal and will be held in the reception room of Luechow's.

To-night will be Dr. Muck's first appearance in New York, and the reception will take place after the Boston Symphony concert.

[illegible], Md
Nov 8, 1906

MUSIC

[illegible]'s Debut in Baltimore As [illegible] for Of America's, And, In [illegible] Of The World's, Finest Or-
[illegible]stra.

[illegible] otherwise that was includ-
[illegible]icke's tours with the Boston
[illegible]y Orchestra in which the great
[illegible] won such affection and such ap-[illegible] of his masterful ability as he [illegible] Baltimore. Mr. Gericke was not [illegible] least sensational, he was ever
[illegible]ness scant in his display of en-
[illegible], but he was always logical
[illegible] to his convictions, and he never [illegible] to put his conceptions before his [illegible]s with crystalline clearness.
[illegible] secured the respect and love of [illegible]rical people through the con-
[illegible] observance of legitimate
[illegible] he will retain his high position
[illegible]steem, whoever may assume his [illegible]s leader. Mr. Gericke's aims [illegible] and results were so pure and [illegible] we will leave them on record
[illegible]ed by no comparisons.

Muck has come to us, bringing an [illegible] unrivaled reputation as an op-
[illegible] conductor, which he has earned [illegible] Baireuth and Berlin. The last ten [illegible]s have brought him rich opportuni-
[illegible], and he has utilized them all to re-
[illegible] and strengthen his art. He ripens
[illegible] broadens with each year's experi-
[illegible], and, like most supremely great [illegible] remains modest and unaffected
[illegible]ough all of his realized ambition, [illegible]ing to feel that art is greater than [illegible] highest accomplishments. Dr. Muck's [illegible] when before his orchestra per-
[illegible] mirrors his character—he is too
[illegible] to be self-conscious, too well
[illegible] to permit mannerisms to creep [illegible] his movements, too experienced to [illegible] in superfluous or meaningless
[illegible]nstrations, and too genial to admit [illegible] emotional moments. Dr. Muck is [illegible]ian who does not need to em[illegible] the impressions made by his [illegible]us through outward devices. No
[illegible]

other conductor of our times controls
[illegible] so completely while controlling [illegible]s men.

[illegible] Americans sometimes question the [illegible]lness of Emperor William's friend[illegible]s toward our country, but here we [illegible] authentic testimony to its exist-
[illegible]: for had Mr. Higginson's offer come [illegible] any other land, Dr. Muck would not have been granted his leave of ab-
[illegible].

The programme last night at the Lyric was as follows:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67.
1. Allegro con brio.
2. Andante con moto.
3. Allegro; Trio.
4. Allegro.

Richard Strauss—Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20.

Wagner—"A Siegfried Idyl."

Wagner—Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Dr. Muck's reading of the Beethoven Symphony, while showing respect for tradition, was so individual that it presented many features of that great work in a new and interesting light. Dr. Muck could never be irrational, but his conceptions of orchestral works may differ from those expressed by Gericke or Nikisch as much as Rubinstein's renditions of many piano works differed from those of Bulow. If individuality cannot enter into the readings of compositions without upsetting their import, their composers must have built upon a narrow foundation and with faint inspiration. Real music is absolutely unmechanical. It is plastic and adaptable.

"Don Juan" is one of Richard Strauss' later tone-poems. It is full of color-eloquence, and it contains beautiful themes developed as the normal man likes to hear them. As is usual with Strauss, he in "Don Juan" invents new instrumental situations of startling effectiveness. Dr. Muck made this involved work present contrasting pictures with almost startling clarity.

The two Wagner numbers found Dr. Muck on his native heath. They were wonderfully impressive, although some parts of the "Meistersinger" prelude were read faster than we are accustomed to hear them. Altogether, the great Berlin conductor came and conquered in Baltimore, as he had in Boston and Philadelphia.

O. B. B.

TU[illegible]

NOV 8- 1906

[illegible]s Angelegenheit des Artists nach Boston, welche bekanntlich auf den 18. d. Mts. angesetzt ist, muß wahrscheinlich verschoben werden.

Es heißt nämlich, daß das Boston Symphonie-Orchester, welches bei dem Konzert zum Besten des Germanischen Museums mitwirkt, nicht im November in Boston anwesend sein kann, da es anderweitige Engagements hat.

Na, aufgeschoben ist nicht aufgehoben!

Mit einem feierlichen Bankett in dem Bankettsaal der Broadway Theaterhalle ging gestern Abend das 40jährige Jubiläum des Deutschen Liederkranz zu Ende.

Gegen siebzig Personen hatten sich zur festlichen Tafel in dem hübsch dekorirten Saal niedergelassen.

Caterer Jappen servirte ein vorzügliches Menu und allgemeine Fröhlichkeit herrschte.

Präsident Frank Künzinger führte den Vorsitz. Beim Kaffee erhob sich der Vorsitzende und begrüßte die Gäste und stellte als ersten Redner den Ex-Präsidenten Fritz Mayer vor, der den Toast auf die beiden noch lebenden Gründer, Wm. Van der Clute und Peter Glaesgen, ausbrachte.

Herr Van der Clute, der trotz seiner 77 Jahre noch regelmäßig die Singstunden besucht, beantwortete den Toast mit jugendlichem Feuer.

Der zweite Redner war Dr. W. John Schildge, der Präsident der Vereinigten Sänger von Brooklyn, dessen Toast „Das deutsche Lied" zu Grunde lag; gleichzeitig gratulierte er im Namen der Vereinigung zum Jubiläum.

Hierauf verlas der Sekretär Henry Klode die eingelaufenen Gratulationsschreiben von den Vereinigten Sängern, Brooklyn E. D. Turnverein, Friedrich Glück Quartett-Club und vom Schwäbischen Sängerbund.

Ex-Präsident August H. Tiemann sprach auf die Presse und wies in humoristischer Rede auf das freundschaftliche Verhältniß des Liederkranz mit der Presse, resp. mit den Vertretern derselben hin; Herr Julius Sonntag antwortete darauf.

Weitere Ansprachen hielten dann noch Herr Ernst Kampermann, der Dirigent des Vereins, der über die guten Leistungen des Liederkranz sprach, und Herr Max Schönborn, der den Toast auf die Damen ausbrachte.

Frau Fritz Mayer ergriff dann das Wort und gratulirte dem Verein im Namen der Frauen und sprach den Wunsch aus, alle Gäste wieder beim goldenen Jubiläum vereinigt zu sehen; dann überreichte sie dem Präsidenten ein hübsches und nützliches Geschenk für den Verein, welches mit Dank entgegengenommen wurde.

Hiermit war die Rednerliste erschöpft und man schritt zur Gemüthlichkeit über und lange noch weilte man, zum Schluß wurde sogar getanzt in den gastlichen Räumen.

Unter den Theilnehmern am Bankett befanden sich: F. A. Kunzinger und Frau, Jacob Weber, Dr. W. John Schildge, Frau N. Kreppner, Ernst Kämpermann und Frau, Herr und Frau Edward Spott, Herr und Frau Fritz Mayer, Herr und Frau Henry Klode, Herr und Frau E. Gnant, Herr und Frau August H. Tiemann, Herr und Frau John B. Reiß, Herr und Frau Alfred Wintopp, Herr und Frau Wm. Van der Clute, Herr und Frau C. Siegmann, Herr und Frau J. C. Steinmann, Herr und Frau W. Allmann, Herr und Frau C. Schmidt, Herr und Frau Philipp Jung, Hugo Metzger, Frl. Emily Driemel, Herr und Frau Charles Dombert, Frl. Julia Dombert, Herr und Frau Robert Elsaßer, Herr und Frau Henry Schilling, Herm. Dueser, Louis Flach, Herr und Frau John C. Kiemeyer, Herr und Frau Otto Triebig, Herr und Frau Moritz Böttticher, Herr und Frau Jos. Schumacher u. A.

Beim Hessischen Sängerbund wurde gestern Abend nicht viel gesungen, denn man schwelgte noch im Triumph des Konzerts am letzten Sonntag und im Wonnegefühl des [illegible] Ueberschusses; man munkelt von über $350.

Der Independent Quartett-Club beschloß gestern, sein „erstes" Stiftungsfest am Sonntag, den 15. Januar, zu feiern.

Ferner wurde beschlossen, den Blumenball des Independent Damenchors am Samstag und das Konzert des Schwäbischen Sängerbundes am Sonntag, den 18. ds Mts., in Corpore zu besuchen.

Am Eröffnungstage der Fair des Brooklyn E. D. Turnvereins, am 1. Dezember, wird sich der Verein einstellen nur eine Nummer des Konzert-Programm übernehmen.

Hermann Grünewald wurde gestern als neues Mitglied aufgenommen.

Die monatliche Versammlung der Deut-

[illegible] Str., Henry Bolmer, 81 Jefferson Str., Manhattan; A. E. Gern, 1113 Lafayette Ave.; Valentin Stehlin, 152 St. Nicholas Ave., und Dr. Carl Müller, 2623 Atlantic Ave.

Folgende Aerzte wurden auf Vorschlag des ärztlichen Collegiums für ein weiteres Jahr wiedergewählt: rs. Jacob Fuhs, Ernest Schalk, F. H. Droge, William Browning, William Linder, James P. Warbasse, Fred. Weisbrod, Hermann P. Bender, Louis S. Pilcher, Russell S. Bowler, William Moser, Charles Wüst, Leon Louria, William Seimel, William Laing und Carl Fulda jr.

Der Bericht des Verwalters, Herrn Louis Pauly, zeigt: Patienten am 1. Oktober 105, 157 neue Patienten wurden aufgenommen, 181 verließen das Hospital, sodaß am 31. Oktober 81 Patienten im Hospital verblieben. Die kleinste tägliche Anzahl von Patienten war 81, die größte 108. 68 nicht zahlende Patienten erhielten 990 Tage Verpflegung, 144 zahlende Patienten 2093 Tage. Bei 50 Unglücksfällen wurde erste Hilfe geleistet. Operationen fanden 89 statt und die Ambulanz wurde 89mal in Dienst gestellt.

[illegible]-W YORK PRESS

s [illegible]

NOV 8- 1906

Prominent musicians of this city have arranged a reception for Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after his first appearance in New York to-night. The reception will take place in Luchow's after the symphony concert.

[illegible] MORGEN JOURNAL

[illegible] YORK C[illegible]

ess [illegible]

NOV 8 - 1906

Ehrung für Dr. Muck.

Hervorragende New Yorker Musiker haben zu Ehren von Dr. Karl Muck, dem neuen Dirigenten des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters, einen Empfang arrangirt, der heut Abend nach dem Konzert, das gleichzeitig Dr. Muck's erstes Auftreten in New York bedeutet, im Privatsaal bei Luchow's stattfindet.

---

m [illegible]

ress [illegible]

e [illegible]

Karl Muck Captures Hearers.

When a man can give so beautiful an interpretation of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" as Dr. Karl Muck did last night with the help of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall it is worth while bringing him to New York for a single performance of it. Many an enthusiast was turned away from the box office, including even applicants for standing room. Those lucky enough to get in had an unusual musical treat, the culminating point of which was reached in the "Siegfried Idyll."

Dr. Muck's programme opened with Beethoven's C minor symphony No. 5. The rest of the evening was occupied by Wagner's "Eine Faust Overture," the "Siegfried Idyll" and the "Meistersinger" prelude—a fitting close to an evening of unusual delight. This list probably did not satisfy every hearer. Fault might be found with the fact so much of Wagner was offered, but this is to be said in favor of the arrangement: Every number was a masterpiece of its kind, and, combined, they gave an admirable opportunity for the display of the conductor's powers—a desirable result.

Boston's new conductor is gaunt of face, with protruding nose and chin. He conducts much as we had expected he would—quietly, carefully, with much reserve power. He wastes no gestures, he shows no affectations. He is much simpler in his demeanor, for example, than Weingartner. But all these considerations are of comparative insignificance. The results, not the means, are the true test. Let it be said, then, that judging from last night's concert Dr. Muck seems an ideal conductor for the Boston Orchestra. He has himself well in hand; he doesn't let himself be carried away by emotional exuberance; yet there is nothing rigid, cold, metronomically measured in his work.

If the "Faust" overture could have been slightly improved the "Idyll" seemed absolutely perfect. It was the sort of interpretation that must have brought Seidl vividly to the memory of every admirer of that conductor. New Yorkers should welcome Dr. Muck with open arms. May the Boston men have his services for many a year!

[illegible] PRESS

[illegible]HILADELPHIA, PA.

ss [illegible]

NOV 9 - 1906

—Dr. Karl Muck, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was a distinguished pianist before he became a famous conductor. Soon after arriving in Boston Prof. Willy Hess, concert-master of the orchestra, asked Muck to play the piano in one of the modern works which the quartet is to give. After looking at the score he said: "I will, if you put it into your last concert. I'll have to take a course in [illegible] before I can [illegible]

[illegible]m [illegible]

dress [illegible]

NOV 9 - 1906

BOSTON STAR.

NEW CONDUCTOR

Dr. Karl Muck Makes His First Appearance in New York.

NO SOLOISTS ON PROGRAMME.

A Strong and Impressive Reading of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Selections by Wagner.

An important part of the activities of the New York musical season began last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra has gained friends and adherents even over last year, and the hall held nearly as many people as it can accommodate. Last evening's performance was of special moment to all its friends in New York, because it brought about the first appearance here of Dr. Karl Muck, and it made the first disclosure as to what manner of man and musician it is who is to guide the work of the organization the coming season.

Dr. Muck was hospitably greeted and accepted the greeting with dignity and reserve. He is tall and spare, almost ascetic in the lines of his streng face, and looks more the doctor of philosophy he is than the musician. The least of his concerns is, to all appearances, the audience behind him, and there is little or nothing in his conducting that is calculated for effect in this direction. His manner toward the orchestra is straightforward and explicit; his beat is rarely graceful; it is sometimes angular. It certainly has none of the eloquence and suggestiveness that some suppose to reside in the conductor's stick. Whatever effect Dr. Muck's conducting has upon the audience comes through the ear and not through the eye. He is clearly a man of authority and intellectual force, and he has that classical merit in a conductor of knowing what he wants and getting it. He is an analyst and a thinker about his art. He had taken strongly about every measure that he played last evening, and what he had thought was realized in the performance. Whether he is also a man of warm and convincing temperament who can rise on occasion to glowing powers of eloquence as an interpreter was not so clearly established last evening. Yet there was not lacking that which stirred the audience to enthusiasm.

The programme was that which he gave at his first performance in Boston in October, unrelieved or uninterpreted by the offices of a solo performer, comprising Beethoven's fifth symphony, and, by Wagner, "A Faust Overture," the Siegfried Idyl, and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." It was a performance in respect of finish, of elaboration of detail, of the general adjustment of the lesser proportions to the whole, that at every point compelled admiration. It may also be said that it was more finely and definitely finished than it was a few weeks ago in Boston, whence it may be inferred that Dr. Muck is not satisfied with first results, and that he is imbued with something of that "passion for perfection" that is a tradition with the Boston Orchestra.

There can only be praise for his readings of the several numbers of his programme. The performance of the symphony was an admirable one, full of the spirit and robustness of the music, elastic in tempo, minutely shaded in nuance, with all its climaxes and contrasts skillfully prepared. It was not a "Wagnerized" version, even in the treatment of the "motto" or detached theme with which the symphony opens; nor does Dr. Muck seek for inner voices in the orchestration to be exploited at the expense of the symmetry of the whole. He is not afraid to let the more powerful instruments of the orchestra be heard powerfully when occasion requires; yet he has a sense, if not the highest sense, of balance of orchestral tone and beauty of orchestral color. He did nothing startling in the symphony, for there is nothing startling to be done by him who is only for eliciting its beauty and who holds to the text and its plain mandates. But it seemed, at last, with all the skill expended upon it, that it was not a performance that imparted everything the symphony has to say.

Dr. Muck gave a superbly dramatic reading of the "Faust" overture, capturing its spirit of gloomy passion entirely and filling it with an infinity of strongly wrought details, which were never allowed to stop the coursing of the dramatic blood. It may be imagined that his leanings are to the dramatic. He put a deal of patience into the "Siegfried Idyl," whose charms, undeniable and delectable though they are, are mercilessly long. And in the "Meistersinger" prelude he was again more in his element. He takes the tempo faster than most, with a loss of perhaps something of the most characteristic spirit of the work, though there is a splendidly propulsive energy gained by doing as he does. He has no superabundance of lingering verbatos in this piece, and he brings out with the utmost clearness the contrapuntal complications in the middle of it that are sometimes mud rather than a pellucid stream of many-voiced melody. There was much enthusiasm aroused by this performance, and there was apparently a feeling that Mr. Higginson had intrusted his men to safe hands.

[59]

Newer
Baltimore, Md
Nov 8, 1906

MUSIC

Dr. Muck's Debut In Baltimore As Conductor Of America's, And, Indeed, Of The World's, Finest Orchestra.

There is no other city that was included in Mr. Gericke's tours with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in which the great leader won such affection and such appreciation of his masterful ability as he did in Baltimore. Mr. Gericke was not in the least sensational, he was even sometimes scant in his display of enthusiasm, but he was always logical and true to his convictions, and he never failed to put his conceptions before his audiences with crystalline clearness. Having secured the respect and love of our musical people through the conscientious observance of legitimate methods, he will retain his high position in our esteem, whoever may assume his duties as leader. Mr. Gericke's aims, virtues and results were so pure and high that we will leave them on record, disturbed by no comparisons.

Dr. Muck has come to us, bringing an almost unrivaled reputation as an operatic conductor, which he has earned at Baireuth and Berlin. The last ten years have brought him rich opportunities, and he has utilized them all to refine and strengthen his art. He ripens and broadens with each year's experience, and, like most supremely great men, remains modest and unaffected through all of his realized ambition, seeming to feel that art is greater than our highest accomplishments. Dr. Muck's manner when before his orchestra perfectly mirrors his character—he is too earnest to be self-conscious, too well poised to permit mannerisms to creep into his movements, too experienced to indulge in superfluous or meaningless demonstrations, and too genial to admit of unemotional moments. Dr. Muck is a musician who does not need to emphasize the impressions made by his genius through outward devices. No other conductor of our times controls himself so completely while controlling his men.

We Americans sometimes question the genuineness of Emperor William's friendliness toward our country, but here we have authentic testimony to its existence; for had Mr. Higginson's offer come from any other land, Dr. Muck would not have been granted his leave of absence.

The programme last night at the Lyric was as follows:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67.
1. Allegro con brio.
2. Andante con moto.
3. Allegro; Trio.
4. Allegro.

Richard Strauss—Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20.
Wagner—"A Siegfried Idyl."
Wagner—Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Dr. Muck's reading of the Beethoven Symphony, while showing respect for tradition, was so individual that it presented many features of that great work in a new and interesting light. Dr. Muck could never be irrational, but his conceptions of orchestral works may differ from those expressed by Gericke or Nikisch as much as Rubinstein's renditions of many piano works differed from those of Bulow. If individuality cannot enter into the readings of compositions without upsetting their import, their composers must have built upon a narrow foundation and with faint inspiration. Real music is absolutely unmechanical. It is plastic and adaptable.

"Don Juan" is one of Richard Strauss' saner tone-poems. It is full of color-eloquence, and it contains beautiful themes developed as the normal man likes to hear them. As is usual with Strauss, he in "Don Juan" invents new instrumental situations of startling effectiveness. Dr. Muck made this involved work present contrasting pictures with almost startling clarity.

The two Wagner numbers found Dr. Muck on his native heath. They were wonderfully impressive, although some parts of the "Meistersinger" prelude were read faster than we are accustomed to hear them. Altogether, the great Berlin conductor came and conquered in Baltimore, as he had in Boston and Philadelphia.

O. B. B.

s

NOV 8 - 1906

Die Sängerreise des Arions nach Boston, welche bekanntlich auf den 18. d. Mts. angesetzt ist, muß wahrscheinlich verschoben werden.

Es heißt nämlich, daß das Boston Symphonie-Orchester, welches bei dem Konzert zum Besten des Germanischen Museums mitwirkt, nicht im November in Boston anwesend sein kann, da es anderweitige Engagements hat.

Na, aufgeschoben ist nicht aufgehoben!

Mit einem feierlichen Bankett in dem Bankettsaal der Broadway Theaterhalle ging gestern Abend das 40jährige Jubiläum des Deutschen Liederkranz zu Ende.

Gegen siebzig Personen hatten sich zur festlichen Tafel in dem hübsch dekorirten Saal niedergelassen.

Caterer Jappen servirte ein vorzügliches Menu und allgemeine Fröhlichkeit herrschte.

Präsident Frank Künzinger führte den Vorsitz. Beim Kaffee erhob sich der Vorsitzende und begrüßte die Gäste und stellte als ersten Redner den Ex-Präsidenten Fritz Mayer vor, der den Toast auf die beiden noch lebenden Gründer, Wm. Van der Clute und Peter Glaesgen, ausbrachte.

Herr Van der Clute, der trotz seiner 77 Jahre noch regelmäßig die Singstunden besucht, beantwortete den Toast mit jugendlichem Feuer.

Der zweite Redner war Dr. W. John Schildge, der Präsident der Vereinigten Sänger von Brooklyn, dessen Toast „Das deutsche Lied" zu Grunde lag; gleichzeitig gratulierte er im Namen der Vereinigung zum Jubiläum.

Hierauf verlas der Sekretär Henry Klocke die eingelaufenen Gratulationsschreiben von den Vereinigten Sängern, Brooklyn E. D. Turnverein, Friedrich Glück Quartett-Club und vom Schwäbischen Sängerbund.

Ex-Präsident August H. Tiemann sprach auf die Presse und wies in humoristischer Rede auf das freundschaftliche Verhältnis des Liederkranz mit der Presse, resp. mit den Vertretern derselben hin; Herr Julius Sonntag antwortete darauf.

Weitere Ansprachen hielten dann noch Herr Ernst Kampermann, der Dirigent des Vereins, der über die guten Leistungen des Liederkranz sprach, und Herr Max Schönborn, der den Toast auf die Damen ausbrachte.

Frau Fritz Mayer ergriff dann das Wort und gratulirte dem Verein im Namen der Frauen und sprach den Wunsch aus, alle Gäste wieder beim goldenen Jubiläum vereinigt zu sehen; dann überreichte sie dem Präsidenten ein hübsches und nützliches Geschenk für den Verein, welches mit Dank entgegengenommen wurde.

Hiermit war die Rednerliste erschöpft und man schritt zur Gemüthlichkeit über und lange noch weilte man, zum Schluß wurde sogar getanzt in den gastlichen Räumen.

Unter den Theilnehmern am Bankett befanden sich: F. A. Kunzinger und Frau, Jacob Weber, Dr. W. John Schildge, Frau N. Kreppner, Ernst Kampermann und Frau, Herr und Frau Edward Spott, Herr und Frau Fritz Mayer, Herr und Frau Henry Klocke, Herr und Frau E. Gnant, Herr und Frau August H. Tiemann, Herr und Frau John B. Reitz, Herr und Frau Alfred Winkopp, Herr und Frau Wm. Van der Clute, Herr und Frau C. Siegmann, Herr und Frau J. C. Steinmann, Herr und Frau W. Allmann, Herr und Frau C. Schmidt, Herr und Frau Philipp Jung, Hugo Metzger, Frl. Emily Driemel, Herr und Frau Charles Dombert, Frl. Julia Dombert, Herr und Frau Robert Elsaßer, Herr und Frau Henry Schilling, Herm. Dueser, Louis Flach, Herr und Frau John C. Kiemeyer, Herr und Frau Otto Triebig, Herr und Frau Moritz Böttticher, Herr und Frau Jos. Schumacher u. A.

Beim Hessischen Sängerbund wurde gestern Abend nicht viel gesungen, denn man schwelgte noch im Triumph des Konzerts am letzten Sonntag und im Wonnegefühl des . . . . . Ueberschusses; man munkelt von über $350.

Der Independent Quartett-Club beschloß gestern, sein „erstes" Stiftungsfest am Sonntag, den 15. Januar, zu feiern.

Ferner wurde beschlossen, den Blumenball des Independent Damenchors am Samstag und das Konzert des Schwäbischen Sängerbundes am Sonntag, den 18. ds Mts., in Corpore zu besuchen.

Am Eröffnungstage der Fair des Brooklyn E. D. Turnvereins, am 1. Dezember, wird sich der Verein einstellen mit eine Nummer des Konzert-Programms übernehmen.

Hermann Grünewald wurde gestern als neues Mitglied aufgenommen.

Die monatliche Versammlung der Deutschen Hospital-Gesellschaft von Brooklyn fand am 5. November im Hospitalgebäude unter dem Vorsitz des Präsidenten Herrn Fred. E. Heitmann statt.

Als neue Mitglieder wurden in den Verein aufgenommen: G. Stehlin, 560 Jefferson Str., Henry Vollmer, 81 New Str., Manhattan; A. E. Evertz, 1145 Lafayette Ave.; Valentin Stehlin, 162 St. Nicholas Ave., und Dr. Carl Müller, 2623 Atlantic Ave.

Folgende Aerzte wurden auf Vorschlag des ärztlichen Collegiums für ein weiteres Jahr wiedergewählt: rs. Jacob Fuhs, Ernest Schalk, J. H. Droge, William Browning, William Linder, James P. Warbasse, Fred. Weisbrod, Hermann P. Bender, Louis S. Pilcher, Russell S. Bowler, William Moser, Charles Wüst, Leon Louria, William Seimel, William Laing und Carl Fulda jr.

Der Bericht des Verwalters, Herrn Louis Pauly, zeigt: Patienten am 1. Oktober 105, 157 neue Patienten wurden aufgenommen, 181 verließen das Hospital, sodaß am 31. Oktober 81 Patienten im Hospital verblieben. Die kleinste tägliche Anzahl von Patienten war 81, die größte 108. 68 nicht zahlende Patienten erhielten 990 Tage Verpflegung, 144 zahlende Patienten 2093 Tage. Bei 50 Unglücksfällen wurde erste Hilfe geleistet. Operationen fanden 89 statt und die Ambulanz wurde 89mal in Dienst gestellt.

s

Prominent musicians of this city have arranged a reception for Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after his first appearance in New York to-night. The reception will take place in Luchow's after the symphony concert.

ess

Ehrung für Dr. Muck.

Hervorragende New Yorker Musiker haben zu Ehren von Dr. Karl Muck, dem neuen Dirigenten des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters, einen Empfang arrangirt, der heut. Abend nach dem Konzert, das gleichzeitig Dr. Muck's erstes Auftreten in New York bedeutet, im Privatsaal bei Lüchow's stattfindet.

n

ress

e

Karl Muck Captures Hearers.

When a man can give so beautiful an interpretation of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" as Dr. Karl Muck did last night with the help of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall it is worth while bringing him to New York for a single performance of it. Many an enthusiast was turned away from the box office, including even applicants for standing room. Those lucky enough to get in had an unusual musical treat, the culminating point of which was reached in the "Siegfried Idyll."

Dr. Muck's programme opened with Beethoven's C minor symphony No. 5. The rest of the evening was occupied by Wagner's "Eine Faust Overture," the "Siegfried Idyll" and the "Meistersinger" prelude—a fitting close to an evening of unusual delight. This list probably did not satisfy every hearer. Fault might be found with the fact so much of Wagner was offered, but this is to be said in favor of the arrangement: Every number was a masterpiece of its kind, and, combined, they gave an admirable opportunity for the display of the conductor's powers—a desirable result.

Boston's new conductor is gaunt of face, with protruding nose and chin. He conducts much as we had expected he would—quietly, carefully, with much reserve power. He wastes no gestures, he shows no affectations. He is much simpler in his demeanor, for example, than Weingartner. But all these considerations are of comparative insignificance. The results, not the means, are the true test. Let it be said, then, that judging from last night's concert Dr. Muck seems an ideal conductor for the Boston Orchestra. He has himself well in hand; he doesn't let himself be carried away by emotional exuberance; yet there is nothing rigid, cold, metronomically measured in his work.

If the "Faust" overture could have been slightly improved the "Idyll" seemed absolutely perfect. It was the sort of interpretation that must have brought Seidl vividly to the memory of every admirer of that conductor. New Yorkers should welcome Dr. Muck with open arms. May the Boston men have his services for many a year!

ss

—Dr. Karl Muck, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was a distinguished pianist before he became a famous conductor. Soon after arriving in Boston Prof. Willy Hess, concert-master of the orchestra, asked Muck to play the piano in one of the modern works which the quartet is to give. After looking at the score he said: "I will, if you put it into your last concert. I'll have to take a course of scales before the concert and you must give me time."

[59]

om

dress

NOV - 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S NEW CONDUCTOR

Dr. Karl Muck Makes His First Appearance in New York.

NO SOLOISTS ON PROGRAMME

A Strong and Impressive Reading of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Selections by Wagner.

An important part of the activities of the New York musical season began last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra has gained friends and adherents even over last year, and the hall held nearly as many people as it can accommodate. Last evening's performance was of special moment to all its friends in New York, because it brought about the first appearance here of Dr. Karl Muck, and it made the first disclosure as to what manner of man and musician it is who is to guide the work of the organization the coming season.

Dr. Muck was hospitably greeted and accepted the greeting with dignity and reserve. He is tall and spare, almost ascetic in the lines of his strong face, and looks more the doctor of philosophy he is than the musician. The least of his concerns is, to all appearances, the audience behind him, and there is little or nothing in his conducting that is calculated for effect in this direction. His manner toward the orchestra is straightforward and explicit; his beat is rarely graceful; it is sometimes angular. It certainly has none of the eloquence and suggestiveness that some suppose to reside in the conductor's stick. Whatever effect Dr. Muck's conducting has upon the audience comes through the ear and not through the eye. He is clearly a man of authority and intellectual force, and he has that classical merit in a conductor of knowing what he wants and getting it. He is an analyst and a thinker about his art. He had taken strongly about every measure that he played last evening, and what he had thought was realized in the performance. Whether he is also a man of warm and convincing temperament who can rise on occasion to glowing powers of eloquence as an interpreter was not so clearly established last evening. Yet there was not lacking that which stirred the audience to enthusiasm.

The programme was that which he gave at his first performance in Boston in October, unrelieved or uninterpreted by the offices of a solo performer, comprising Beethoven's fifth symphony, and, by Wagner, "A Faust Overture," the Sigfried Idyl, and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." It was a performance in respect of finish, of elaboration of detail, of the general adjustment of the lesser proportions to the whole, that at every point compelled admiration. It may also be said that it was more finely and definitely finished than it was a few weeks ago in Boston, whence it may be inferred that Dr. Muck is not satisfied with first results, and that he is imbued with something of that "passion for perfection" that is a tradition with the Boston Orchestra.

There can only be praise for his readings of the several numbers of his programme. The performance of the symphony was an admirable one, full of the spirit and robustness of the music, elastic in tempo, minutely shaded in nuance, with all its climaxes and contrasts skillfully prepared. It was not a "Wagnerized" version, even in the treatment of the "motto" or detached theme with which the symphony opens; nor does Dr. Muck seek for inner voices in the orchestration to be exploited at the expense of the symmetry of the whole. He is not afraid to let the more powerful instruments of the orchestra be heard powerfully when occasion requires; yet he has a sense, if not the highest sense, of balance of orchestral tone and beauty of orchestral color. He did nothing startling in the symphony, for there is nothing startling to be done by him who is only for eliciting its beauty and who holds to the text and its plain mandates. But it seemed, at last, with all the skill expended upon it, that it was not a performance that imparted everything the symphony has to say.

Dr. Muck gave a superbly dramatic reading of the "Faust" overture, capturing its spirit of gloomy passion entirely and filling it with an infinity of strongly wrought details, which were never allowed to stop the coursing of the dramatic blood. It may be imagined that his leanings are to the dramatic. He put a deal of patience into the "Siegfried Idyl," whose charms, undeniable and delectable though they are, are mercilessly long. And in the "Meistersinger" prelude he was again more in his element. He takes the tempo faster than most, with a loss of perhaps something of the most characteristic spirit of the work, though there is a splendidly propulsive energy gained by doing as he does. He has no superabundance of lingering verbatos in this piece, and he brings out with the utmost clearness the contrapuntal complications in the middle of it that are sometimes mud rather than a pellucid stream of many-voiced melody. There was much enthusiasm aroused by this performance, and there was apparently a feeling that Mr. Higginson had intrusted his men to safe hands.

NEW YORK STAATS-ZEITUNG
NOV 2 - 1904

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Das gestern Abend stattgefundene erste Saison-Concert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters brachte zugleich auch das Debut des Berliner Hofkapellmeisters Dr. Karl Muck in unserer Stadt, ein mit Spannung erwartetes Ereignis. Dürfen wir doch das Bostoner Muster-Orchester ein wenig auch unser eigen nennen!

Mit herzlichem, aufmunterndem Beifall empfangen, erschien Dr. Muck. Eine interessante Persönlichkeit, aber keine blendende Künstler-Erscheinung, schlank, fast mager, mit tadelloser Eleganz gekleidet; scharf geschnittene Züge mit einem Stich ins Mephistophelische, klug und ernst, dabei etwas ironisch dreinblickende Augen, gerade, aufrecht, fast soldatisch stramm.

Der erste Eindruck sollte auch in künstlerischem Sinne bis zu einem gewissen Punkt ein bleibender werden. Dr. Muck ist ein musikalischer Heerführer, der den Orchester-Massen seinen Willen aufzwingt, wo andere suggeriren und hypnotisiren. Er dirigirt mit edler Ruhe, die man fast Kühle nennen könnte. Er giebt nicht viele Zeichen, doch giebt er alle, die nöthig sind. Er zeigt eine imponirende Vertrautheit mit der jeweiligen Partitur, tadellose Akkuratesse, straffe rythmische Disziplin, er ist das Bild der Regel und künstlerischen Gewissenhaftigkeit, ohne deshalb kaltverständig oder pedantisch zu werden.

Eine unzweifelhaft hochveranlagte Musikernatur, erreicht er oft, ohne sich sonderlich in seelische Unkosten zu stürzen, geradezu klassische Wirkungen. Was er vermissen läßt, ist der verklärende Schimmer der Poesie, einschmeichelnde Sinnlichkeit, die Subjektivität des genial Nachschaffenden. Bewunderungswürdig ist das zwischen Dirigenten und Orchester nach so kurzem Zusammenarbeiten herrschende intime Einverständniß, der intime geistige Rapport. Die einzelnen Stimmen des Orchester klangen stimmlich tadellos rein und hoben sich in herrlicher Plastik von einander ab. Und der faszinirende Klangzauber des unvergleichlichen Orchesters. Jeder Dirigent hat mit solchen Kräften schon halb gewonnenes Spiel.

Diese Erwägung soll aber die Verdienste des Dirigenten nicht im Geringsten schmälern. Beethoven's C-moll-Symphonie die fünfte der heiligen Neunzahl, welch von vielen Kennern als der Höhepunkt der Instrumentalmusik überhaupt betrachtet wird, brachte er zu gewaltiger Wirkung. Das herrliche thematische Gewebe des ersten Satzes, das Trotzige, Herrische, Grüblerische, gab er mit meisterhafter Klarheit und Durchsichtigkeit wieder, und der Triumphmarsch des Finales brachte eine gewaltige Steigerung. Das war wirklich Beethoven's Fünfte — „von Nacht zum Licht".

Der zweite Theil des Programms brachte drei Wagner'sche Nummern: die „Faust"-Ouverture, das „Siegfried"-Idyll und das „Meistersinger"-Vorspiel. Die Ouverture kam rythmisch ungemein straff und festumrissen heraus. Den schwächsten Eindruck machte das „Siegfried"-Idyll, das wohl zart und nuancenreich wiedergegeben wurde, aber innere Wärme und individuelle Beseeltheit vermissen ließ. Dagegen fand Dr. Muck für die edle, beredte Polyphonie des „Meistersinger"-Vorspiels prächtige Wirkungen.

Alles in Allem genommen hat der Abend einen vollen, ehrlichen Erfolg gebracht und bedeutende Eindrücke vermittelt, welche sich bei näherer Bekanntschaft noch vertiefen dürften. Der namentlich zum Schluß sehr schallkräftige Beifall erwies, daß man die Bostoner zu der getroffenen Wahl beglückwünschte, wobei freilich die Erwägung, daß es sich blos um ein kurzes Jahr handelt, einschränkend wirken muß.

Dr. Karl Muck würden wir als einen musikalischen Logiker charakterisiren, als einen ernsten, ehrlichen Priester seiner Kunst, der ein Idol hat: den Kultus der Partitur, deren getreuester gewissenhafter Ausdeuter und Darleger er sein will, ohne ihr die charakteristische Eigennote aufzudrücken.

Newspaper
From
Address
Date
NOV 2 - 1904

DR. MUCK KINDLES GREAT ENTHUSIASM.

New Conductor of Boston Symphony Produces Exquisite Effects with Brass and String.

Dr. Karl Muck, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new conductor, appeared for the first time in New York last night at the opening concert of this orchestra's twenty-first season. Carnegie Hall was crowded, and there was more enthusiasm than has attended any Boston Symphony concert in recent years.

Dr. Muck, who comes from the Berlin Royal Opera-House, was a great conductor long before Boston and New York made the discovery. He is slight and tall, with black hair, a pronounced chin and is free from affectations. He is very undemonstrative with his baton, indulging in as few movements as possible, but is graceful and commanding.

There can be no doubt about his temperament, for that was clearly proven in the prelude to Wagner's "The Mastersingers," there is no lack of poetic feeling—that fact was shown in the "Siegfried Idyl;" and he has reverence for the clasics without indulging in dry-as-dust readings—and that was made clear in his interpretation of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

He did nothing sensational, save in the "Mastersingers" prelude when he allowed the orchestra to play while he refrained from beating time for a brief space. That is a common trick abroad, and it is usually regarded as a pretty compliment to the virtuosity of the orchestra players.

How that band from Boston did play last night! Dr. Muck unleashed the brass choir so that it was a joy to the ear. And the strings—probably the most wonderful set of orchestral string instruments in the world—were again exquisite.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the opening number of the programme, was impressively read. Dr. Muck departed from the conventional in several of his tempi, and he emphasized some details with stunning effect. The fact that there was no soloist did not in the least create the feeling of a vacancy in the programme.

DR. KARL MUCK, NEW CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Bringing the Baton Down . . .

Boston Symphony and the Star Conductor.

KARL MUCK, of the Royal Berlin Opera House, by arrangement, as the theatrical parlance has it, with the Emperor William, stepped into the limelight last night as star conductor No. 2 of the newly begun musical season. The occasion was the first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York concerts at Carnegie Hall.

It was essentially a début for Dr. Muck, and the interest was therefore focused upon him. The audience was not distracted by either a soloist or any novelty in the programme. The orchestra presented three of the most practised pieces in its great repertoire, all of which it could play, no doubt, without notes and almost without leader—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the Siegfried "Idyll" and the prelude to the "Meistersinger." By no manner of means new, but still not quite so familiar to concertgoers as the other, was the "Faust" overture, making the third Wagner selection on a programme of four numbers.

The expectant audience found Dr. Muck himself something of a riddle. He is a man of indeterminate age, spare, tall, high browed, with distinctly the appearance of a student. He makes no unnecessary movement in his conducting. Reticence, a minimum of effort and a minimum of external evidence of feeling seem to be his main qualities, but they result in an unexpected ability to get the maximum amount of expression out of the orchestra. And one wondered how he did it! The wild waving of baton usually associated with climaxes was absent, but the climax came, nevertheless, and poignantly. Dr. Muck with a little intense bringing together of his hands seemed to bore the effect he desired out of his men rather than drag it out, as is the more common method.

Polish—the polish that would be expected of a saturated music student—is his most evident capability, and for that reason his work with so technically able an organization as the Boston Symphony must be a delight to him. He has a feeling for the very final accent on and phrasing of an inner voice, and a sense of the lines and relief of the contrapuntal pattern, that must always result in joy for his more highly cultivated musical listener.

He plays for the points of a composition as a musician knows them, in a masterly way. Consequently, while it was the well known Fifth Symphony he gave, it was not the "same" Fifth Symphony by any manner of means. In a thousand delightful ways it was reread and given a new meaning. The new meaning was not something that Dr. Muck was trying to give it, but a new revelation through beauties that had by patient study discovered. It was an affectionate, almost passionate, interpretation by an extremely learned and capable man.

The same spirit was noticeable in the Wagner numbers. He handled these with the same full appreciation of their color that he showed in the Beethoven number. Siegfried's "Idyll" was beautifully tender sentiment. It was passionate yet reverent. The Faust overture was vigorous and imaginative, while the prelude to "The Meistersingers" brought the concert to a ringing climax.

It results from Dr. Muck's reticence that the orchestra is never forced. There was no tear and blare of the brass, no rasp of the strings, no squeak and shriek of the wood wind in even the loudest passages. The listeners were swept firmly along to climaxes, which came full, clear and satisfying, without one harsh sound to mar the pleasure.

The fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has a body of tone that in volume and quality is to be compared to that of no other organization in this country and to few abroad was never more evident than last night—thanks to Dr. Muck. He doubtless will take as much pleasure in evoking it as concert goers will in listening to it. He, the Symphony Orchestra and the subscribers should be thankful for the kindness of Emperor William that permits them to make music together.

BANDMASTERS AMERS AND SOUSA
Photo by Elmer Chickering.

John Philip Sousa and Lieutenant Amers, the Alphonso and Gaston of military bandmasters, have been taking off their hats to each other. Now John Philip Sousa announces that he will attend Lieutenant Amers' final concert at Joe Weber's Sunday night. Consequently the works of Mr. Sousa will figure prominently on the programme. Hats off again.

N. Y. EV'G WORLD
NOV 2 - 1904

Dr. Karl Muck Proves Worthy Successor to William Gericke.

Wins Approval of New York Music Lovers at First Boston Orchestra Concert.

A SLENDER man, of medium height, with a pale Greek face, his high forehead corrugated with horizontal lines and his chin protruding, entered upon the stage of Carnegie Hall last night to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert of the season in New York. He was Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, chosen to succeed the tried and familiar William Gericke as director by the most famous band of musicians in America.

There was only a perfunctory, icy greeting for him from a crowded house of the elect of music lovers. He was made to feel that he must "show us." And he did it! He had beat out a score of bars only when a thaw set in, and by the end of the evening he had won his way.

With such a splendid instrument to command, nobody could fail of moderate success, but Dr. Muck achieved a positive triumph. Before the audience went home he was called out several times to receive its homage. At the last he seized Willy Hess, the concert master, by the hand, made the whole orchestra stand, and gracefully indicated that to them was the credit due.

It was a simple programme that the new conductor presented. There was no soloist. He plunged at once into Beethoven's beautiful Fifth Symphony in C minor, challenging comparison with a host of predecessors. Nothing revolutionary marked his reading of it, only there was reverent comprehension and exquisite exposition. When it was done his reputation was established.

Then followed Wagner's 'Faust" overture, "Siegfried" idyl and the prelude to "Der Meistersinger," played with fine fervor. Here Dr. Muck found a chance for some climaxes that stirred the blood. Not anything of precision was lost, and not a little of compelling effect was gained. The audience held itself tense until the last note, and then vented its feeling in one great burst of applause.

There is little mannerism in Dr. Muck's conducting. Hands and arms usually suffice. Occasionally he bends his knees and shifts his feet, but not often. That he has established an intimate relation with his men was made manifest by the frequent familiar smiles that he bestowed upon several of them. Once he actually winked at Willy Hess. Two or three times in the "Meistersinger" for several bars he kept himself [illegible]

DR. KARL MUCK.

[illegible]

„Bostoner" in Brooklyn. Im Baptist Temple, Ecke der dritten Ave. und Schermerhorn Str., giebt heute Abend das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester das erste der diesjährigen Serie von Konzerten, welche unter den Auspicien des Instituts für Künste und Wissenschaften veranstaltet werden. Der neue geniale Dirigent Dr. Karl Muck hat ein gediegenes Programm zusammengestellt, aus welchem speziell Brahms' Symphonie, No. 1 und Wagner's Vorspiel aus „Die Meistersinger" erwähnt werden sollen.

om
ldress
te

MUSIC.

The Boston Orchestra.

New York gave a handsome greeting to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, at the first concert of its twenty-first New York season in Carnegie Hall last night. The vast room was crowded, pleasurable anticipation was on tiptoe, and the newcomer was made to feel that a warm place was established for him in the hearts of the thousands who have admired the organization over which he is to preside this season for a long and happy time. The list of pieces was the same that Dr. Muck had chosen to introduce himself in Boston a fortnight ago. Familiar music all of it—Beethoven's C minor symphony, Wagner's "Faust" overture, "Siegfried Idyl" and "Meistersinger" prelude. It is with such music that most of the foreign conductors who visit us choose to invite attention to their methods and ideals. If they come to proclaim new readings they can do it in these familiar strains; if they come to testify their adherence to time-hallowed tradition, they can do it also. Dr. Muck, it would seem from last night's exposition has no desire to play the iconoclast or instigate a revolution. He made no effort to make new disclosures or find strange philosophies in familiar texts. His band was brilliant, as of yore. It struck like a thunderbolt when called upon to do so, and its euphony fell delightfully into the ear. There were moments in the symphony when it seemed as if conservatism and convention were receiving a little more than their due, but, strangely enough, this was in the very movement that evoked the warmest enthusiasm from the hearers—the second. In the first there was something which might be set down as a new reading, or, at least, like a reading not hit upon by any of Dr. Muck's predecessors. Beethoven's indication and Wagner's plea for a stern and grim performance of the hold on the last note of the characteristic theme were respected, in a manner, but no sooner had the note been sounded than there was a breathless and precipitate continuation of the theme. Though sustained, the effect was not that of a fermata at all. It seemed to be measured off, played by rule of thumb, and therefore was unimpressive. A pause, no matter how slight, would have presented the figure in its naked, stark puissance, enforced its physiognomy, proclaimed its significance as the central thought of the whole magnificent work. The singular precipitancy, studiously compelled by Dr. Muck, robbed the movement of the lofty and essential quality of repose, which beautified all the rest of the music of the evening. The fact that the second movement seemed to give greater pleasure than the immeasurably finer and greater first indicated that the audience felt the deficiency. The "Faust" overture was played with superb warmth and poetry, and received a full measure of appreciation. There was in the concert the promise of a gracious season.

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Das gestern Abend stattgefundene erste Saison-Concert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters brachte zugleich auch das Debut des Berliner Hofkapellmeisters Dr. Karl Muck in unserer Stadt, ein mit Spannung erwartetes Ereignis. Dürfen wir doch das Bostoner Muster-Orchester ein wenig auch unser eigen nennen!

Mit herzlichem, aufmunterndem Beifall empfangen, erschien Dr. Muck. Eine interessante Persönlichkeit, aber keine blendende Künstler-Erscheinung, schlank, fast mager, mit tadelloser Eleganz gekleidet; scharf geschnittene Züge mit einem Stich ins Mephistophelische, klug und ernst, dabei etwas ironisch dreinblickende Augen, gerade, aufrecht, falsch soldatisch stramm.

Der erste Eindruck sollte auch in künstlerischem Sinne bis zu einem gewissen Punkt ein bleibender werden. Dr. Muck ist ein musikalischer Heerführer, der den Orchester-Massen seinen Willen aufzwingt, wo andere suggeriren und hypnotisiren. Er dirigirt mit edler Ruhe, die man fast Kühle nennen könnte. Er giebt nicht viele Zeichen, doch giebt er alle, die nöthig sind. Er zeigt eine imponirende Vertrautheit mit der jeweiligen Partitur, tadellose Akkuratesse, straffe rythmische Disziplin, er ist das Bild der Regel und künstlerischen Gewissenhaftigkeit, ohne deshalb kaltverständig oder pedantisch zu werden.

Eine unzweifelhaft hochveranlagte Musikernatur, erreicht er oft, ohne sich sonderlich in seelische Unkosten zu stürzen, geradezu klassische Wirkungen. Was er vermissen läßt, ist der verklärende Schimmer der Poesie, einschmeichelnde Sinnlichkeit, die Subjektivität des genial Nachschaffenden. Bewunderungswürdig ist das zwischen Dirigenten und Orchester nach so kurzem Zusammenarbeiten herrschende intime Einverständnis, der intime geistige Rapport. Die einzelnen Stimmen des Orchester klangen stimmlich tadellos rein und hoben sich in herrlicher Plastik von einander ab. Und der fascinirende Klangzauber des unvergleichlichen Orchesters. Jeder Dirigent hat mit solchen Kräften schon halb gewonnenes Spiel.

Diese Erwägung soll aber die Verdienste des Dirigenten nicht im Geringsten schmälern. Beethoven's C-moll-Symphonie die fünfte der heiligen Neunzahl, welche von vielen Kennern als der Höhepunkt der Instrumentalmusik überhaupt betrachtet wird, brachte er zu gewaltiger Wirkung. Das herrliche thematische Gewebe des ersten Satzes, das Trotzige, Herrische, Grüblerische, gab er mit meisterhafter Klarheit und Durchsichtigkeit wieder, und der Triumphmarsch des Finales brachte eine gewaltige Steigerung. Das war wirklich Beethoven's Fünfte — „von Nacht zum Licht".

Der zweite Theil des Programms brachte drei Wagner'sche Nummern: die „Faust"-Ouverture, das „Siegfried"-Idyll und das „Meistersinger"-Vorspiel. Die Ouverture kam rythmisch ungemein straff und festumrissen heraus. Den schwächsten Eindruck machte das „Siegfried"-Idyll, das wohl zart und nuancenreich wiedergegeben wurde, aber innere Wärme und individuelle Beseeltheit vermissen ließ. Dagegen fand Dr. Muck für die edle, beredte Polyphonie des „Meistersinger"-Vorspiels prächtige Wirkungen.

Alles in Allem genommen hat der Abend einen vollen, ehrlichen Erfolg gebracht und bedeutende Eindrücke vermittelt, welche sich bei näherer Bekanntschaft noch vertiefen dürften. Der namentlich zum Schluß sehr schallkräftige Beifall erwies, daß man die Bostoner zu der getroffenen Wahl beglückwünschte, wobei freilich die Erwägung, daß es sich blos um ein kurzes Jahr handelt, einschränkend wirken muß.

Dr. Karl Muck würden wir als einen musikalischen Logiker charakterisiren, als einen ernsten, ehrlichen Priester seiner Kunst, der ein Idol hat: den Kultus der Partitur, deren getreuester gewissenhafter Ausbeuter und Darleger er sein will, ohne ihr die charakteristische Eigennote aufzudrücken.

DR. KARL MUCK, NEW CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Newspaper
NEW YORK WORLD
from address
ate

DR. MUCK KINDLES GREAT ENTHUSIASM.

New Conductor of Boston Symphony Produces Exquisite Effects with Brass and String.

Dr. Karl Muck, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new conductor, appeared for the first time in New York last night at the opening concert of this orchestra's twenty-first season. Carnegie Hall was crowded, and there was more enthusiasm than has attended any Boston Symphony concert in recent years.

Dr. Muck, who comes from the Berlin Royal Opera-House, was a great conductor long before Boston and New York made the discovery. He is slight and tall, with black hair, a pronounced chin and is free from affectations. He is very undemonstrative with his baton, indulging in as few movements as possible, but is graceful and commanding.

There can be no doubt about his temperament, for that was clearly proven in the prelude to Wagner's "The Mastersingers," there is no lack of poetic feeling—that fact was shown in the "Siegfried Idyl;" and he has reverence for the clasics without indulging in dry-as-dust readings—and that was made clear in his interpretation of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

He did nothing sensational, save in the "Mastersingers" prelude when he allowed the orchestra to play while he refrained from beating time for a brief space. That is a common trick abroad, and it is usually regarded as a pretty compliment to the virtuosity of the orchestra players.

How that band from Boston did play last night! Dr. Muck unleashed the brass choir so that it was a joy to the ear. And the strings—probably the most wonderful set of orchestral string instruments in the world—were again exquisite.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the opening number of the programme, was impressively read. Dr. Muck departed from the conventional in several of his tempi, and he emphasized some details with stunning effect. The fact that there was no soloist did not in the least create the feeling of a vacancy in the programme.

LEGRAM — NOVEMBER

Bringing the Baton Down Gently

Boston Symphony and the Star Conductor.

KARL MUCK, of the Royal Berlin Opera House, by arrangement, as the theatrical parlance has it, with the Emperor William, stepped into the limelight last night as star conductor No. 2 of the newly begun musical season. The occasion was the first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York concerts at Carnegie Hall.

It was essentially a début for Dr. Muck, and the interest was therefore focused upon him. The audience was not distracted by either a soloist or any novelty in the programme. The orchestra presented three of the most practised pieces in its great repertoire, all of which it could play, no doubt, without notes and almost without leader—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the Siegfried "Idyll" and the prelude to the "Meistersinger." By no manner of means new, but still not quite so familiar to concertgoers as the other, was the "Faust" overture, making the third Wagner selection on a programme of four numbers.

The expectant audience found Dr. Muck himself something of a riddle. He is a man of indeterminate age, spare, tall, high browed, with distinctly the appearance of a student. He makes no unnecessary movement in his conducting. Reticence, a minimum of effort and a minimum of external evidence of feeling seem to be his main qualities, but they result in an unexpected ability to get the maximum amount of expression out of the orchestra. And one wondered how he did it! The wild waving of baton usually associated with climaxes was absent, but the climax came, nevertheless, and poignantly. Dr. Muck with a little intense bringing together of his hands seemed to bore the effect he desired out of his men rather than drag it out, as is the more common method.

Polish—the polish that would be expected of a saturated music student—is his most evident capability, and for that reason his work with so technically able an organization as the Boston Symphony must be a delight to him. He has a feeling for the very final accent on and phrasing of an inner voice, and a sense of the lines and relief of the contrapuntal pattern, that must always result in joy for his more highly cultivated musical listener.

He plays for the points of a composition as a musician knows them, in a masterly way. Consequently, while it was the well known Fifth Symphony he gave, it was not the "same" Fifth Symphony by any manner of means. In a thousand delightful ways it was reread and given a new meaning. The new meaning was not something that Dr. Muck was trying to give it, but a new revelation through beauties that he had by patient study discovered. It was an affectionate, almost passionate, interpretation by an extremely learned and capable man.

The same spirit was noticeable in the Wagner numbers. He handled these with the same full appreciation of their content that he showed in the Beethoven number. Siegfried's "Idyll" was beautifully full of sentiment. It was passionate yet reverent. The Faust overture was vigorous and imaginative, while the prelude to "The Meistersingers" brought the concert to a ringing climax.

It results from Dr. Muck's reticence that the orchestra is never forced. There was no tear and blare of the brass, no rasp of the strings, no squeak and shriek of the wood wind in even the loudest passages. The listeners were swept firmly along to climaxes, which came full, clear and satisfying, without one harsh sound to mar the pleasure.

The fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has a body of tone that in volume and quality is to be compared to that of no other organization in this country and to few abroad was never more evident than last night—thanks to Dr. Muck. He doubtless will take as much pleasure in evoking it as concert goers will in listening to it. He, the Symphony Orchestra and the subscribers should be thankful for the kindness of Emperor William that permits them to make music together.

BANDMASTERS AMERS AND SOUSA
Photo by Elmer Chickering

John Philip Sousa and Lieutenant Amers, the Alphonso and Gaston of military bandmasters, have been taking off their hats to each other. Now John Philip Sousa announces that he will attend Lieutenant Amers' final concert at Joe Weber's Sunday night. Consequently the works of Mr. Sousa will figure prominently on the programme. Hats off again.

Dr. Karl Muck Proves Worthy Successor to William Gericke.

Wins Approval of New York Music Lovers at First Boston Orchestra Concert.

A SLENDER man, of medium height, with a pale Greek face, his high forehead corrugated with horizontal lines and his chin protruding, entered upon the stage of Carnegie Hall last night to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first concert of the season in New York. He was Dr. Karl Muck, of Berlin, chosen to succeed the tried and familiar William Gericke as director by the most famous band of musicians in America.

There was only a perfunctory, icy greeting for him from a crowded house of the elect of music lovers. He was made to feel that he must "show us." And he did it! He had beat out a score of bars only when a thaw set in, and by the end of the evening he had won his way.

With such a splendid instrument to command, nobody could fall of moderate success, but Dr. Muck achieved a positive triumph. Before the audience went home he was called out several times to receive its homage. At the last he seized Willy Hess, the concert master, by the hand, made the whole orchestra stand, and gracefully indicated that to them was the credit due.

It was a simple programme that the new conductor presented. There was no soloist. He plunged at once into Beethoven's beautiful Fifth Symphony in C minor, challenging comparison with a host of predecessors. Nothing revolutionary marked his reading of it, only there was reverent comprehension and exquisite exposition. When it was done his reputation was established.

Then followed Wagner's 'Faust" overture, "Siegfried" idyl and the prelude to "Der Meistersinger," played with fine fervor. Here Dr. Muck found a chance for some climaxes that stirred the blood. Not anything of precision was lost, and not a little of compelling effect was gained. The audience held itself tense until the last note, and then vented its feeling in one great burst of applause.

There is little mannerism in Dr. Muck's conducting. Hands and arms usually suffice. Occasionally he beads his knees and shifts his feet, but not often. That he has established an intimate relation with his men was made manifest by the frequent familiar smiles that he bestowed upon several of them. Once he actually winked at Willy Hess. Two or three times in the "Meistersinger" for several bars he kept himself motionless.

In choosing a successor to Mr. Gericke Mr. Higginson seems to have made no mistake.

DR. KARL MUCK.

om
ldress
ate

MUSIC.

The Boston Orchestra.

New York gave a handsome greeting to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, at the first concert of its twenty-first New York season in Carnegie Hall last night. The vast room was crowded, pleasurable anticipation was on tiptoe, and the newcomer was made to feel that a warm place was established for him in the hearts of the thousands who have admired the organization over which he is to preside this season for a long and happy time. The list of pieces was the same that Dr. Muck had chosen to introduce himself in Boston a fortnight ago. Familiar music all of it—Beethoven's C minor symphony, Wagner's "Faust" overture, "Siegfried Idyl" and "Meistersinger" prelude. It is with such music that most of the foreign conductors who visit us choose to invite attention to their methods and ideals. If they come to proclaim new readings they can do it in these familiar strains; if they come to testify their adherence to time-hallowed tradition, they can do it also. Dr. Muck, it would seem from last night's exposition has no desire to play the iconoclast or instigate a revolution. He made no effort to make new disclosures or find strange philosophies in familiar texts. His band was brilliant, as of yore. It struck like a thunderbolt when called upon to do so, and its euphony fell delightfully into the ear. There were moments in the symphony when it seemed as if conservatism and convention were receiving a little more than their due, but, strangely enough, this was in the very movement that evoked the warmest enthusiasm from the hearers—the second. In the first there was something which might be set down as a new reading, or, at least, like a reading not hit upon by any of Dr. Muck's predecessors. Beethoven's indication and Wagner's plea for a stern and grim performance of the hold on the last note of the characteristic theme were respected, in a manner, but no sooner had the note been sounded than there was a breathless and precipitate continuation of the theme. Though sustained, the effect was not that of a fermata at all. It seemed to be measured off, played by rule of thumb, and therefore was unimpressive. A pause, no matter how slight, would have presented the figure in its naked, stark puissance, enforced its physiognomy, proclaimed its significance as the central thought of the whole magnificent work. The singular precipitancy, studiously compelled by Dr. Muck, robbed the movement of the lofty and essential quality of repose, which beautified all the rest of the music of the evening. The fact that the second movement seemed to give greater pleasure than the immeasurably finer and greater first indicated that the audience felt the deficiency. The "Faust" overture was played with superb warmth and poetry, and received a full measure of appreciation. There was in the concert the promise of a gracious season.

ss

„Bostoner" in Brooklyn. Im Baptist Temple, Ecke der dritten Ave, und Schermerhorn Str., giebt heute Abend das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester das erste der diesjährigen Serie von Konzerten, welche unter den Auspicien des Instituts für Künste und Wissenschaften veranstaltet werden. Der neue geniale Dirigent Dr. Karl Muck hat ein gediegenes Programm zusammengestellt, aus welchem speziell Brahms' Symphonie, No. 1 und Wagner's Vorspiel aus „Die Meistersinger" erwähnt werden sollen.

[60]

N. Y. EV'G SUN
NOV 9 - 1906

...(Leipsic), a man of ...ideally suited to the temper... Boston, had a welcome to New ...night that puzzled observers in ... it was a princely ovation, though ... Hall waited to the end before ... audible shout to those first cheers ... at Symphony Hall a month ago. ... the Boston Symphony orchestra ... in honor of its new chief for a ... year, but the rising before was a ... as he entered the stage, while the ... tribute was earned at the concert's ... It is amusing to note that a few ... ners, of the feline type that see always ... mouse under the king's chair," were ... to-day about "the preponderance ...," while one man thought the best ...-mind choir in the world had "played ... of tune." Idle fancies, both! There ... no false note, not even a soloist, to take ... tion from the conductor and the music ... interpreted.

On the same day that witnessed ...lomé's" first full-orchestra rehearsal ... the Metropolitan and a first sensational ...ross lecture in Mendelssohn Hall ... greatest houseful of all-season sub... scribers at Carnegie Hall declared for Muck ... a Wagner conductor. His three Wagner ...pieces were extra-operatic, so to say. Even ...he many-voiced melody of the "Meister...singer" overture has no concurrent welding ...of action and scene before the curtain's ...rise. The detached "Faust Overture," ...which Wagner meant for Faust in solitude, ...was again dramatic enough for Gretchen ...and Devil too. No wonder Liszt's three... part "Faust" symphony and the Berlioz ..."Damnation" are better known. Yet Wag... ner sketched "Faust" in his younger days ...in Paris, wrote it as if with an idle left hand ...while his right spelled "Tannhäuser" and ..."Lohengrin."

The high mountain top of Dr. Muck's ...survey was "A Siegfried Idyl," that music ..."on the steps" which Wagner's domestic ...orchestra once played before his home ...exactly as Robert Schumann sang epitha...lamium in a year of piano and chamber ...music composition. Here was the intimate ...occasion. The flawless, brooding harmony ...stole away to semi-consciousness until there ...was an impression of silence in this noisy ...world. In a still, small remainder of sound ...was left no thought of effort, no sense of ...means, no interposition of personality, ...no knowledge even of the "Idyl's" inter...minable length. And it is very long.

What about Muck, then, when he is not ...playing Wagner? He started the evening ...with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

As Mr. Louis C. Elson said at the Boston ...premier, "It was an odd coincidence, and ...a purely accidental one, that the last work ...directed here by Mr. Gericke was the first ...conducted by Dr. Muck. In even the first ...four measures there was exhibited a differ...ence of reading. There was ...so long pause separating the ...first two figures. Beethoven wrote the ...hold over the chord, not over the eighth ...rest, says Dr. Muck, and the interpretation ...is an effective one, yet it is a reading that ...we have not had in Boston for a generation." ...And so "Fate at the door" knocked breath...lessly, impatient of delay. It is not the ...fault of the present generation that it was ...born too late to desire Beethoven alone. ...Once a year, perhaps, the pattern and ...exemplar of all symphonies should be heard.

It has come to this, that the "prima donna ...orchestra" can travel the country over, ...repeating the confession of classic faith to ...people that hear gladly. But there was ...significance in the New York preference for ...music in the modern idiom.

Manager Comee's distribution of Mr. Philip Hale's encyclopædic Boston Symphony programme notes has been further outlawed this year to the far side of Fifty-seventh street. They are on call at the druggist's there. In the hall they were sought in vain.

Dr. Muck's biographical note in the pamphlet is worth quoting to those who missed it:

Born at Würzburg on Oct. 22, 1859, the son of a Bavarian councillor who was also a musician, he played piano in public when ...11 years old, completed his studies at the ...Gymnasium of Heidelberg, had two years ...in philosophy at Leipsic and entered the ...conservatory there under Reinecke and E. ...F. Richter.

Determined to be a conductor, he became ...chorus director at the Zurich Stadt Theatre ...in 1880, conducted a year at Salzburg, led ...ers at Brunn and Graz for two years each, ...and both opera and philharmonic six years ...at Prague.

He led the "Ring" in 1889 at St. Petersburg ...and Moscow, and the first "Cavalleria" in ...Berlin in 1891.

...ress NOV 9 - 1906

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

FIRST APPEARANCE HERE OF DR. CARL MUCK.

New Conductor Makes Favorable Impression—Unobtrusive but Commanding, He Interprets Without Sensationalism—Beethoven and Wagner on Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its twenty-first season in this city at Carnegie Hall last night. The concert introduced to this public the new conductor of the orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck, who came lately from the Vienna Philharmonic. Dr. Muck is especially noted for his conducting at Bayreuth, where he was for several seasons the principal assistant of Frau Cosima Wagner in the festival productions of her famous husband's creations. There was, therefore, some natural curiosity among the knowing to hear the new conductor's interpretations of the Wagner numbers on the programme, for it was in the impassioned music of the ultra modern school that Wilhelm Gericke, late conductor in Boston, often fell short of public expectation.

Dr. Muck, however, was prepared also to meet the inevitable inquiry as to his attitude toward the classics. His programme began with Beethoven's fifth symphony, after which came three Wagner numbers, "Eine Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The new conductor met the demands of the evening with composure. His appearance is that of a polished man of thought, a scholar and a gentleman. His manner of conducting is unobtrusive, but firm and assured. He does nothing to furnish the public eye with pictures. His business is with the orchestra and the music. He is anything but a poseur. This is comforting. His predecessor was also retiring, and a fear that there might be a disagreeable change in this matter was removed last night.

These facts are recorded in dereference to the readiness of many music lovers too formulate their verdicts on conductors by what they see quite as much as by what they hear. Those who rely too largely on sight will get an impression that Dr. Muck is not what is somewhat indefinitely described as a temperamental conductor. But we often have somewhat too much of the temperament which exploits itself in wild wavings of the arms and contortions of the body. Let us be thankful that we have a new conductor who does not divert consideration from the music to himself.

In so far as the impressions of a first concert may be trusted we are likely to find that Dr. Muck will not in the deeper qualities of conducting lead us away from the composition to the sensational interpretation. While there were certain personal idiosyncrasies in the reading of Beethoven's fifth symphony, there was nothing disturbing. Everything was sane and well regulated. Everything showed reverence for the master and a sincere desire to present his noble work chastely and honestly. It was a straightforward, vigorous, yet polished performance that Dr. Muck conducted. There was much care in the elaboration of the adante and plenty of boldness in the attack of the finale. We have all heard more tragedy in the first movement and more mystery in the scherzo, but the unfailing beauty of style and the exquisite balance, transparency and richness of tone of the Boston organization were in full evidence.

For those who hungered for temperamental interpretation there was satisfying food in the reading of the "Faust "overture. It was superbly conceived and its poignant emotions were voiced in telling tones. The orchestra played up to the conductor magnificently. The "Siegfried Idyl" was somewhat deficient in contrast and the climax seemed unusually tame, but the finesse of the performance was admirable. The "Meistersinger" prelude was of course well played, but New York music lovers have often heard it given in more stirring fashion.

On the whole, however, Dr. Muck made an excellent impression. That he is a conductor of the first rank has long been conceded in Germany and it will not be questioned here after his interpretations of last night. His second concert, which is set down for to-morrow afternoon, will be awaited with interest. As for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is the same splendid body as of old and the glories of its tone do not seem likely to be dimmed under the new baton.

The Globe and Commercial Advertiser
November 9, 1906.

DEBUT OF DR. MUCK.

FOR so many years audiences had taken the leadership of Mr. Gericke as a matter of course when the band from Boston came to town that in spite of long previous preparation it was still something of a shock to see the much younger Dr. Muck, slim in figure, scholastic in bearing, and with indomitable will graven on his sharply cut features, walk quietly down to the conductor's desk and with a rigid gesture of command lift his baton in signal to the expectant men.

It was soon evident, too, that another and a contrasting temperament was ruling the virtuoso orchestra. Here was a man that took an almost epicurean delight in the different choirs and their several voices. He won from the strings a tone that dripped honey; to the woodwind he allowed in solo passages the freedom of movement and style that go by inalienable right to the greatest artists in the world of song, and as for the brass, he gloried in its strength and brilliance, as his predecessor did in its mellowness and depth. Never probably had the orchestra yielded color and shading in such variety from a pianissimo fairly saturated in sweetness to a fortissimo overwhelming in its penetrating sonority.

Striking as these changes were, they were not without their drawback. In this same fortissimo one missed the perfectly blended richness of Mr. Gericke's fortissimo; one had more than a glimpse of the "grain," so to say, running through its sheer strength of texture.

In Dr. Muck's conducting one felt first of all an enormous energy that expressed itself as a rule in a short, sharp, angular beat, for Dr. Muck is almost as sparing of pose and gesture as Mr. Gericke or Mr. Weingartner. His other dominant traits are a keen analytical grasp of the elements in the music before him and a vivid sense of effectiveness. One misses in him to some extent the unity of conception, as well as the somewhat ascetic dignity, that gave singular coherence and strength to a performance directed by Mr. Gericke. Nor did Dr. Muck reveal that subtle, insistent vitality that injects into a reading by Mr. Weingartner its seeming inevitableness, causing phrase to rise from phrase, and period to merge into period as if determined by the impulse of life itself.

Again and again Dr. Muck seemed essentially a conductor of opera. He made his points with an evident feeling for dramatic effectiveness, and much the same care and emphasis with which an actor of solid training makes his. At times this very sense of effectiveness tended to defeat itself. In the finale of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, for instance, the music would have been even more eloquent if left to tell its own story. By a too "expressive" reading the conductor perceptibly missed the goal he sought.

Yet the performance of the Fifth Symphony was unquestionably notable. There was least that was salient in the first movement. In the following andante Dr. Muck allowed himself unusual freedom in contrasts of dynamics and tempo, at moments with great effectiveness. The transition from the scherzo to the finale again was a climax of thrilling strength, and the finale itself just fell short of the truly sensational in its sweep and power by the slight over-"expressiveness" of the reading already noted. The sudden changes from fortissimo to pianissimo were just too strongly underlined. The audience had time to reflect, whereas it should have been borne helplessly along on the irresistible tide of the music. The performance as a whole lacked, too, the touch of noble austerity that Mr. Gericke would not have failed to impart.

In Wagner's "Faust Overture," which led the second part of the programme, Dr. Muck was successful with fewer reservations. He gave a finely impassioned reading of this tumultuous work of Wagner's youth, and brought out all the appealing beauty of the middle section. The "Siegfried Idyl" which followed, was played with ravishing beauty of tone, though at times its delicacy ran perilously near to daintiness, but there was not enough humor or lightness in the treatment to make the number as a whole seem other than long and garrulous.

It was reserved for the "Meistersinger" prelude, however, to show Dr. Muck convincingly at his best. He secured a performance (at times he secured it with his hands motionless at his sides) that made no sacrifices in clearness or sensuous beauty, and yet in its vigor and its imposing volume of sound was nothing short of stupendous. At the close an audience that had contented itself with rather moderate applause broke into cheers. The prelude proved conclusively that Dr. Muck, in spite of some limitations, is worthy to stand at the head of an orchestra which is by common consent the foremost orchestra in the world.

THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NEW YORK CITY
NOV

DR. MUCK'S DEBUT IN CARNEGIE HALL

First Appearance in New York of Great German Conductor, With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

ALL EXPECTATIONS FULFILLED

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

Dr. Carl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra made their first appearance of the season in New York last night at Carnegie Hall.

There was no soloist, as the management of the orchestra concluded—and concluded with discretion and good taste—that the public interest of New York would, on the occasion of their initial concerts, naturally center around the brilliant and accomplished conductor whom Mr. Higginson has induced to come from Berlin and to sojourn among us for a year.

Dr. Carl Muck is a young man, tall, slender to willowness, possessed of a somewhat humorous cast of countenance. His movements on the stage while he conducts the orchestra are not disfigured by any histrionic mannerisms, or any claptrap posturing for the purpose of capturing the evanescent attention of those who imagine that a conductor should be something more than a profound musician, poetically temperamented and possessed of disciplinary authority over a large body of highly intelligent and individualized men.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who for the past few years has directed, governed and drilled the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was frequently accused of artistic frigidity and of a music habit of thought too cold, too unresponsive and too mathematical. However that may be his patient mastership of detail and his devoted energy have made the Boston Symphony Orchestra one of the most perfect instruments of musical expression to be heard, either in America or amid the older artistic civilizations of Europe.

Equal to the Occasion.

It did not take Dr. Muck long to realize this, and, finding his instrument in excellent condition, he did not occupy himself with supererogatory work in an attempt to make nebulous and theoretical improvements. But he has to a large extent suffused his musicians with something of that warmth and glow that a conductor who has spent years of his life in an opera house might justly be supposed to possess, and insofar as this consummation has been achieved he may be said, at present, at least, to have tightened the grasp which this organization has always had upon the intellect and affections of the concert-going public.

The programme consisted of Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Beethoven; Eine Faust Overture, Siegfried Idyll and Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner.

It was followed by the deepest interest on the part of the vast audience that had gathered together to welcome Dr. Muck. At the end of the andante of the Symphony, which was interpreted with originality, freedom, imagination and poetry, there was a demonstration of approval unusual in Carnegie Hall.

The Siegfried Idyll.

To my mind the particularly graceful and subtle interpretation of the Siegfried Idyll which Dr. Muck vouchsafed, will for many years linger in the memory of those present as a well-nigh perfect realization of this one of the most delicately woven of Wagner's many perfect poems in tone and the work which will always be regarded as the sweetest and purest gift of his richly endowed fancy.

For majesty of utterance and sustained eloquence and beauty of musical diction Dr. Muck's "Prelude to the Mastersingers of Nuremberg" will remain for many years a standard and a criterion.

The Faust overture by Wagner, upon which I feel the efforts of the orchestra were wasted, is a contribution to musical literature without which existence would be perfectly tolerable.

m

ress

Karl Muck, Ph.D. (Leipsic), a man of light and leading ideally suited to the temper of critical Boston, had a welcome to New York last night that puzzled observers in two cities. It was a princely ovation, though Carnegie Hall waited to the end before adding its audible shout to those first cheers reported at Symphony Hall a month ago. Here also the Boston Symphony orchestra stood up in honor of its new chief for a single year, but the rising before was a greeting as he entered the stage, while the local tribute was earned at the concert's close. It is amusing to note that a few listeners, of the feline type that see always "the mouse under the king's chair," were howling to-day about "the preponderance of brass," while one man thought the best wood-wind choir in the world had "played out of tune." Idle fancies, both! There was no false note, not even a soloist, to take attention from the conductor and the music he interpreted.

On the same day that witnessed "Salomé's" first full-orchestra rehearsal at the Metropolitan and a first sensational Strauss lecture in Mendelssohn Hall the greatest houseful of all-season subscribers at Carnegie Hall declared for Muck as a Wagner conductor. His three Wagner pieces were extra-operatic, so to say. Even the many-voiced melody of the "Meistersinger" overture has no concurrent welding of action and scene before the curtain's rise. The detached "Faust Overture," which Wagner meant for Faust in solitude, was again dramatic enough for Gretchen and Devil too. No wonder Liszt's three-part "Faust" symphony and the Berlioz "Damnation" are better known. Yet Wagner sketched "Faust" in his younger days in Paris, wrote it as if with an idle left hand while his right spelled "Tannhäuser" and "Lohengrin."

The high mountain top of Dr. Muck's survey was "A Siegfried Idyl," that music "on the steps" which Wagner's domestic orchestra once played before his home exactly as Robert Schumann sang epithalamium in a year of piano and chamber music composition. Here was the intimate occasion. The flawless, brooding harmony stole away to semi-consciousness until there was an impression of silence in this noisy world. In a still, small remainder of sound was left no thought of effort, no sense of means, no interposition of personality, no knowledge even of the "Idyl's" interminable length. And it is very long.

What about Muck, then, when he is not playing Wagner? He started the evening with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

As Mr. Louis C. Elson said at the Boston premier, "It was an odd coincidence, and a purely accidental one, that the last work directed here by Mr. Gericke was the first conducted by Dr. Muck. In even the first four measures there was exhibited a difference of reading. There was no long pause separating the first two figures. Beethoven wrote the hold over the chord, not over the eighth rest, says Dr. Muck, and the interpretation is an effective one, yet it is a reading that we have not had in Boston for a generation." And so "Fate at the door" knocked breathlessly, impatient of delay. It is not the fault of the present generation that it was born too late to desire Beethoven alone. Once a year, perhaps, the pattern and exemplar of all symphonies should be heard.

It has come to this, that the "prima donna orchestra" can travel the country over, repeating the confession of classic faith to people that hear gladly. But there was significance in the New York preference for music in the modern idiom.

Manager Comee's distribution of Mr. Philip Hale's encyclopædic Boston Symphony programme notes has been further outlawed this year to the far side of Fifty-seventh street. They are on call at the druggist's there. In the hall they were sought in vain.

Dr. Muck's biographical note in the pamphlet is worth quoting to those who missed it:

Born at Würzburg on Oct. 22, 1859, the son of a Bavarian councillor who was also a musician, he played piano in public when 11 years old, completed his studies at the Gymnasium of Heidelberg, had two years in philosophy at Leipsic and entered the conservatory there under Reinecke and E. F. Richter.

Determined to be a conductor, he became chorus director at the Zurich Stadt Theatre in 1880, conducted a year at Salzburg, led opera at Brunn and Graz for two years each, and both opera and philharmonic six years in Prague.

He led the "Ring" in 1889 at St. Petersburg and Moscow, and the first "Cavalleria" in Berlin in 1891.

---

m

ress

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

FIRST APPEARANCE HERE OF DR. CARL MUCK.

New Conductor Makes Favorable Impression—Unobtrusive but Commanding, He Interprets Without Sensationalism—Beethoven and Wagner on Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its twenty-first season in this city at Carnegie Hall last night. The concert introduced to this public the new conductor of the orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck, who came lately from the Vienna Philharmonic. Dr. Muck is especially noted for his conducting at Bayreuth, where he was for several seasons the principal assistant of Frau Cosima Wagner in the festival productions of her famous husband's creations. There was, therefore, some natural curiosity among the knowing to hear the new conductor's interpretetions of the Wagner numbers on the programme, for it was in the impassioned music of the ultra modern school that Wilhelm Gericke, late conductor in Boston, often fell short of public expectation.

Dr. Muck, however, was prepared also to meet the inevitable inquiry as to his attitude toward the classics. His programme began with Beethoven's fifth symphony, after which came three Wagner numbers, "Eine Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The new conductor met the demands of the evening with composure. His appearance is that of a polished man of thought, a scholar and a gentleman. His manner of conducting is unobtrusive, but firm and assured. He does nothing to furnish the public eye with pictures. His business is with the orchestra and the music. He is anything but a poseur. This is comforting. His predecessor was also retiring, and a fear that there might be a disagreeable change in this matter was removed last night.

These facts are recorded in dererence to the readiness of many music lovers too formulate their verdicts on conductors by what they see quite as much as by what they hear. Those who rely too largely on sight will get an impression that Dr. Muck is not what is somewhat indefinitely described as a temperamental conductor. But we often have somewhat too much of the temperament which exploits itself in wild wavings of the arms and contortions of the body. Let us be thankful that we have a new conductor who does not divert consideration from the music to himself.

In so far as the impressions of a first concert may be trusted we are likely to find that Dr. Muck will not in the deeper qualities of conducting lead us away from the composition to the sensational interpretation. While there were certain personal idiosyncrasies in the reading of Beethoven's fifth symphony, there was nothing disturbing. Everything was sane and well regulated. Everything showed reverence for the master and a sincere desire to present his noble work chastely and honestly. It was a straightforward, vigorous, yet polished performance that Dr. Muck conducted. There was much care in the elaboration of the adante and plenty of boldness in the attack of the finale. We have all heard more tragedy in the first movement and more mystery in the scherzo, but the unfailing beauty of style and the exquisite balance, transparency and richness of tone of the Boston organization were in full evidence.

For those who hungered for temperamental interpretation there was satisfying food in the reading of the "Faust "overture. It was superbly conceived and its poignant emotions were voiced in telling tones. The orchestra played up to the conductor magnificently. The "Siegfried Idyl" was somewhat deficient in contrast and the climax seemed unusually tame, but the finesse of the performance was admirable. The "Meistersinger" prelude was of course well played, but New York music lovers have often heard it given in more stirring fashion.

On the whole, however, Dr. Muck made an excellent impression. That he is a conductor of the first rank has long been conceded in Germany and it will not be questioned here after his interpretations of last night. His second concert, which is set down for to-morrow afternoon, will be awaited with interest. As for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is the same splendid body as of old and the glories of its tone do not seem likely to be dimmed under the new baton.

The Globe and Commercial Advertiser

November 9, 1906.

DEBUT OF DR. MUCK.

FOR so many years audiences had taken the leadership of Mr. Gericke as a matter of course when the band from Boston came to town that in spite of long previous preparation it was still something of a shock to see the much younger Dr. Muck, slim in figure, scholastic in bearing, and with indomitable will graven on his sharply cut features, walk quietly down to the conductor's desk and with a rigid gesture of command lift his baton in signal to the expectant men.

It was soon evident, too, that another and a contrasting temperament was ruling the virtuoso orchestra. Here was a man that took an almost epicurean delight in the different choirs and their several voices. He won from the strings a tone that dripped honey; to the wood-wind he allowed in solo passages the freedom of movement and style that go by inalienable right to the greatest artists in the world of song, and as for the brass, he gloried in its strength and brilliance, as his predecessor did in its mellowness and depth. Never probably had the orchestra yielded color and shading in such variety from a pianissimo fairly saturated in sweetness to a fortissimo overwhelming in its penetrating sonority.

Striking as these changes were, they were not without their drawback. In this same fortissimo one missed the perfectly blended richness of Mr. Gericke's fortissimo; one had more than a glimpse of the "grain," so to say, running through its sheer strength of texture.

In Dr. Muck's conducting one felt first of all an enormous energy that expressed itself as a rule in a short, sharp, angular beat, for Dr. Muck is almost as sparing of pose and gesture as Mr. Gericke or Mr. Weingartner. His other dominant traits are a keen analytical grasp of the elements in the music before him and a vivid sense of effectiveness. One misses in him to some extent the unity of conception, as well as the somewhat ascetic dignity, that gave singular coherence and strength to a performance directed by Mr. Gericke. Nor did Dr. Muck reveal that subtle, insistent vitality that injects into a reading by Mr. Weingartner its seeming inevitableness, causing phrase to rise from phrase, and period to merge into period as if determined by the impulse of life itself.

Again and again Dr. Muck seemed essentially a conductor of opera. He made his points with an evident feeling for dramatic effectiveness, and much the same care and emphasis with which an actor of solid training makes his. At times this very sense of effectiveness tended to defeat itself. In the finale of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, for instance, the music would have been even more eloquent if left to tell its own story. By a too "expressive" reading the conductor perceptibly missed the goal he sought.

Yet the performance of the Fifth Symphony was unquestionably notable. There was least that was salient in the first movement. In the following andante Dr. Muck allowed himself unusual freedom in contrasts of dynamics and tempo, at moments with great effectiveness. The transition from the scherzo to the finale again was a climax of thrilling strength, and the finale itself just fell short of the truly sensational in its sweep and power by the slight over-"expressiveness" of the reading already noted. The sudden changes from fortissimo to pianissimo were just too strongly underlined. The audience had time to reflect, whereas it should have been borne helplessly along on the irresistible tide of the music. The performance as a whole lacked, too, the touch of noble austerity that Mr. Gericke would not have failed to impart.

In Wagner's "Faust Overture," which led the second part of the programme, Dr. Muck was successful with fewer reservations. He gave a finely impassioned reading of this tumultuous work of Wagner's youth, and brought out all the appealing beauty of the middle section. The "Siegfried Idyl" which followed, was played with ravishing beauty of tone, though at times its delicacy ran perilously near to daintiness, but there was not enough humor or lightness in the treatment to make the number as a whole seem other than long and garrulous.

It was reserved for the "Meistersinger" prelude, however, to show Dr. Muck convincingly at his best. He secured a performance (at times he secured it with his hands motionless at his sides) that made no sacrifices in clearness or sensuous beauty, and yet in its vigor and its imposing volume of sound was nothing short of stupendous. At the close an audience that had contented itself with rather moderate applause broke into cheers. The prelude proved conclusively that Dr. Muck, in spite of some limitations, is worthy to stand at the head of an orchestra which is by common consent the foremost orchestra in the world.

THE MORNING TELEGRAPH

NEW YORK CITY

DR. MUCK'S DEBUT IN CARNEGIE HALL

First Appearance in New York of Great German Conductor, With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

ALL EXPECTATIONS FULFILLED

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

Dr. Carl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra made their first appearance of the season in New York last night at Carnegie Hall.

There was no soloist, as the management of the orchestra concluded—and concluded with discretion and good taste—that the public interest of New York would, on the occasion of their initial concerts, naturally center around the brilliant and accomplished conductor whom Mr. Higginson has induced to come from Berlin and to sojourn among us for a year.

Dr. Carl Muck is a young man, tall, slender to willowness, possessed of a somewhat humorous cast of countenance. His movements on the stage while he conducts the orchestra are not disfigured by any histrionic mannerisms, or any claptrap posturing for the purpose of capturing the evanescent attention of those who imagine that a conductor should be something more than a profound musician, poetically temperamented and possessed of disciplinary authority over a large body of highly intelligent and individualized men.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who for the past few years has directed, governed and drilled the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was frequently accused of artistic frigidity and of a music habit of thought too cold, too unresponsive and too mathematical. However that may be his patient mastership of detail and his devoted energy have made the Boston Symphony Orchestra one of the most perfect instruments of musical expression to be heard, either in America or amid the older artistic civilizations of Europe.

Equal to the Occasion.

It did not take Dr. Muck long to realize this, and, finding his instrument in excellent condition, he did not occupy himself with supererogatory work in an attempt to make nebulous and theoretical improvements. But he has to a large extent suffused his musicians with something of that warmth and glow that a conductor who has spent years of his life in an opera house might justly be supposed to possess, and insofar as this consummation has been achieved he may be said, at present, at least, to have tightened the grasp which this organization has always had upon the intellect and affections of the concert-going public.

The programme consisted of Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Beethoven; Eine Faust Overture, Siegfried Idyll and Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner.

It was followed by the deepest interest on the part of the vast audience that had gathered together to welcome Dr. Muck. At the end of the andante of the Symphony, which was interpreted with originality, freedom, imagination and poetry, there was a demonstration of approval unusual in Carnegie Hall.

The Siegfried Idyll.

To my mind the particularly graceful and subtle interpretation of the Siegfried Idyll which Dr. Muck vouchsafed, will for many years linger in the memory of those present as a well-nigh perfect realization of this one of the most delicately woven of Wagner's many perfect poems in tone and the work which will always be regarded as the sweetest and purest gift of his richly endowed fancy.

For majesty of utterance and sustained eloquence and beauty of musical diction Dr. Muck's "Prelude to the Mastersingers of Nuremberg" will remain for many years a standard and a criterion.

The Faust overture by Wagner, upon which I feel the efforts of the orchestra were wasted, is a contribution to musical literature without which existence would be perfectly tolerable.

NEW YORK EV'G POST
ess NOV 9 - 1906

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season at our Carnegie Hall last night, there was no pianist, singer, or violinist to give the variety and popular interest commonly supposed to be essential to a successful orchestral concert. Yet the hall was crowded; indeed, there were not enough tickets to supply the demand. "It is often said," remarked a prominent musician, when the throngs were leaving the house at ten o'clock, "that New Yorkers care only for opera. But look at this crowd! And look at the Philharmonic Society having to arrange overflow meetings at the Hippodrome—and at Walter Damrosch compelled to give four Saint-Saëns concerts instead of two!"

There can be no doubt that the interest in orchestral concerts is steadily growing in this town, quite apart from the soloists. The Boston Orchestra has as usual engaged some prominent singers and players for its ten New York concerts, but last night it was not deemed necessary to have one, because of the interest attaching to the début of the orchestra's new pilot, Dr. Muck, of Berlin Royal Opera and Bayreuth fame. That this fame had preceded him from Europe—and Boston, where he is much liked—was shown by the cordiality of the applause which greeted him when he came on the stage. There was much curiosity to know what sort of a conductor he would prove to be. Would he resemble Gericke, or Paur, or Nikisch, or would he be a law unto himself?

A glance at the programme showed that it would not be possible to estimate his powers and peculiarities at one hearing, because only two composers were represented. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony took up the first half, while the second was devoted to three Wagner numbers—the "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyll," and the Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger." As regards the Beethoven symphony, it is useless to deny that many of us are rather tired of it; not that we have changed our minds as to its being a very great work, but simply because we have heard it too often. We expect a conductor to invest it with new interest by an individual reading—by a revelation of hidden beauties, by novel details of phrasing, by a use of that tempo rubato to which Beethoven himself was addicted, and which Wagner and his followers have still further emphasized. From this point of view Dr. Muck was disappointing. There was little individuality in his reading, while his agogic (we must use the German word till we have one of our own) leaned toward the metronomic manner rather than to the Beethoven-Wagner rubato. And yet, with the aid of the admirable playing of the Boston men, he made the symphony sound fresh and interesting. It was like rejuvenating a somewhat faded bouquet by dipping it into water. How did he do it? Chiefly by an animation which seems to be his chief characteristic, and which he knows how to impart to his men.

Dr. Muck being one of Cosima Wagner's staff, his Wagner readings were looked forward to with special interest. When it was announced that Dr. Muck would take the place of Mr. Gericke the thought that probably first occurred to many was: "At last the Boston folk will have a chance to hear the brass in Wagner's scores!" And no doubt, the new conductor is in this respect more satisfactory than his predecessor. Yet climax building, such as Seidl, Mottl, and Hertz have been wont to thrill us with, does not appear to be his strong point. This was particularly noticeable in the "Meistersinger" Vorspiel, which was also taken too fast for our taste and with insufficient contrasting of motives; the pomp and grandeur were not fully revealed. In the "Faust" overture the serene, meditative portions, with their exquisite modulations, were the most impressively rendered. The kaleidoscopic beauties of the Siegfried Idyll were not shown to their best advantage; there was a lack of the subtle contrasts, the miniature climaxes, as one might say, by means of which Seidl used to make this sinfonietta domestica seem so divinely beautiful that one wished it would go on forever.

To-morrow afternoon there will be further opportunity to admire or criticise Dr. Muck in a programme, beginning with the first Brahms symphony and also including a Richard Strauss piece. That certainly is Bostonese! One might suppose Mr. Gericke had never left!

N. Y. EVG. TELEGRAM
NOV 9 - 1906

KARL MUCK, of the Royal Berlin Opera House, by arrangement, as the theatrical parlance has it, with the Emperor William, stepped into the limelight last night as star conductor No. 2 of the newly begun musical season. The occasion was the first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York concerts at Carnegie Hall.

It was essentially a début for Dr. Muck, and the interest was therefore focused upon him. The audience was not distracted by either a soloist or any novelty in the programme. The orchestra presented three of the most practised pieces in its great repertoire, all of which it could play, no doubt, without notes and almost without leader—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the Siegfried "Idyll" and the prelude to the "Meistersinger." By no manner of means new, but still not quite so familiar to concertgoers as the other, was the "Faust" overture, making the third Wagner selection on a programme of four numbers.

The expectant audience found Dr. Muck himself something of a riddle. He is a man of indeterminate age, spare, tall, high browed, with distinctly the appearance of a student. He makes no unnecessary movement in his conducting. Reticence, a minimum of effort and a minimum of external evidence of feeling seem to be his main qualities, but they result in an unexpected ability to get the maximum amount of expression out of the orchestra. And one wondered how he did it! The wild waving of baton usually associated with climaxes was absent, but the climax came, nevertheless, and poignantly. Dr. Muck with a little intense bringing together of his hands seemed to bore the effect he desired out of his men rather than drag it out, as is the more common method.

Polish—the polish that would be expected of a saturated music student—is his most evident capability, and for that reason his work with so technically able an organization as the Boston Symphony must be a delight to him. He has a feeling for the very final accent on and phrasing of an inner voice, and a sense of the lines and relief of the contrapuntal pattern, that must always result in joy for his more highly cultivated musical listener.

He plays for the points of a composition as a musician knows them, in a masterly way. Consequently, while it was the well known Fifth Symphony he gave, it was not the "same" Fifth Symphony by any manner of means. In a thousand delightful ways it was reread and given a new meaning. The new meaning was not something that Dr. Muck was trying to give it, but a new revelation through beauties that he had by patient study discovered. It was an affectionate, almost passionate, interpretation by an extremely learned and capable man.

The same spirit was noticeable in the Wagner numbers. He handled these with the same full appreciation of their content that he showed in the Beethoven number. Siegfried's "Idyll" was beautifully full of sentiment. It was passionate yet reverent. The Faust overture was vigorous and imaginative, while the prelude to "The Meistersingers" brought the concert to a ringing climax.

It results from Dr. Muck's reticence that the orchestra is never forced. There was no tear and blare of the brass, no rasp of the strings, no squeak and shriek of the wood wind in even the loudest passages. The listeners were swept firmly along to climaxes, which came full, clear and satisfying, without one harsh sound to mar the pleasure.

The fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has a body of tone that in volume and quality is to be compared to that of no other organization in this country and to few abroad was never more evident than last night—thanks to Dr. Muck. He doubtless will take as much pleasure in evoking it as concert goers will in listening to it. He, the Symphony Orchestra and the subscribers should be thankful for the kindness of Emperor William that permits them to make music together.

ess NOV 9 - 1906

DR. KARL MUCK'S NEW YORK DEBUT

Dresden Conductor Leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

MR. GERICKE'S SUCCESSOR

Gets Bigger Tone and More Dashing Manner at the Expense of Some Loss of Refinement.

Under the baton of its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, of Dresden, and before a brilliant audience which filled Carnegie Hall to overflowing, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened last night its twenty-first season in New York.

The return of this admirable organization is always a matter of great interest to local concert goers and it held out special inducements last night, though the opportunity given to make the acquaintance of a noted European conductor, and to witness the inauguration of his régime.

Attention was the better focussed on Dr. Muck, since there was no soloist and because the programme contained music which has been made thoroughly familiar to Boston Symphony Orchestra audiences. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony opened the list, and this was followed by a strongly contrasted group of Wagner numbers, the "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

It would have been hard to select a programme better calculated to disclose the new conductor's personality, aims and methods. In some respects he disappointed expectations by his treatment of it; in others he satisfied them. That the orchestra would be governed by other ideals than those of Mr. Gericke was made plain in the Beethoven Symphony. Dr. Muck aimed at a bigger tone and a more dashing manner than Mr. Gericke ever allowed his men. He got it, but at the price of some lost refinement and elegance of technique.

There are many Boston orchestra patrons who were forever complaining that they never really heard the brass. These will now be in clover, for the brass instruments are unleashed by Dr. Muck. There are others who set store by the wonderful polish of detail which has recently marked the orchestra's playing. These were the disappointed ones last night, for much of it was lacking. One even suspected the wood wind choir of being out of tune.

On the other hand Dr. Muck showed himself a Wagner conductor of great imagination. He made the scores of the "Idyl" and the "Faust" overture pulsate with life and interest even when they departed from tradition.

In person the Dresden musician proved to be a man of slight figure, commanding manner and dignified gesture. He was heartily welcomed and warmly applauded.

NOV 9 - 1906

NEW LEADER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Karl Muck Makes New York Debut—Scholarly Precision His Chief Quality Thus Far Revealed.

Dr. Karl Muck made his New York debut last night as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Carnegie Hall was filled to the legal limit for the occasion. There was a courteous welcome for the newcomer, mild applause after the first movement of Beethoven's C minor symphony, cordial clapping at its finale, and enthusiasm, prolonged and real, over the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which ended the concert.

The new conductor is not a demonstrative musician. His decisive beat is usually of small amplitude. His gestures do not precisely indicate to the audience, as did, for instance, those of the late Anton Seidl, the rise and fall of the emotional intensity of the music. He is the antithesis of Mr. Safonoff, who will soon be knocking off the heads of an army of imaginary adversaries, from the conductor's stand of the Philharmonic Orchestra.

To the players, no doubt, Dr. Muck's movements may be as significant as any [illegible] when he conducts, must rely wholly upon its ears, without help from its eyes. This is not a fault or a merit; it is simply a part of the new leader's personality which auditors will have to reckon with. And for this reason it will take longer for them to get thoroughly acquainted with Dr. Muck than with some others. His tall, thin form and his military stride accentuate the reserved self-confidence of the man as he appears on the stage.

These are outward things, but they are nevertheless part of Dr. Muck's personality, and they have a bearing upon his interpretation of music. So far as last night's list (and it was varied) could reveal it, the man's dominating note is of intellectuality. He disclosed the structure of what he played with illuminating clarity and justness. His weaving of the inner voices of the scores was admirably proportioned; the beauty of every detail was laid bare, without loss of general effect. Characteristic rhythms were sharply insisted upon. Behind his readings one felt the weight of intimate knowledge and keen adjustment of values.

What this first concert did not prove was Dr. Muck's possession of a highly developed feeling for emotional breadth. His tempi seemed often too fast for a full realization of emotional effects. And there was also an apparent reluctance to allow full dynamic contrasts. In the victorious finale of the C minor symphony, one could have wished a more majestic stride, in the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" a more thrilling sweep and climax, in "A Faust Overture" more of bleak intensity, and of raw energy of string tone. The "Siegfried Idyl" was played exquisitely, with loving appreciation. But elsewhere one sighed now and again for a little more abandon.

Saturday afternoon's programme will show new facets of Dr. Muck's temper. With the Boston Orchestra (whose splendid virtuosity it is refreshing to meet again), he will play Brahms's first symphony, Weber's "Oberon" and "Der Freischuetz" overtures and Richard Strauss's "Don Juan." Oddly enough the same Brahms symphony will be played Saturday evening by Walter Damrosch and his orchestra.

[illegible] STAATSZEITU ess NOV 9 - 1906
om
ldress
te

Boston Symphonie-Quartett.

Vor sehr zahlreichem Publikum fand gestern Nachmittag in Mendelssohn Hall die erste Produktion des Bostoner Symphonie-Quartetts statt und brachte einen erlesenen Genuß. Das Quartett präsentirt sich heuer in unverändertem Personalstand: Prof. Willy Heß, erste Violine, Otto Roth, zweite, Emile Ferir, Bratsche, und Heinrich Warnke, Cello.

Das Spiel der Herren klang gestern noch feiner abgetönt als im Vorjahre. Die Fusion ist eine anerkennenswerthe, die Kantilene ist schmelzend, das Staccato scharf und bestimmt. Die Herren haben offenbar sehr fleißig gearbeitet, und die Vereinigung steht gegenwärtig tonlich, technisch und geistig auf hoher Stufe.

Prof. Heß ist als vorzüglicher Primgeiger bekannt; er entfaltete gestern einen besonders blühenden und vollen Ton. Seine Autorität ist ebenso groß als die Diskretion seiner Genossen, die ihm mitunter musikalisch den Hof zu machen belieben. Dies kommt aber mehr oder minder bei allen Quartettvereinigungen vor, welche über einen virtuosen Führer verfügen, und trat gestern durchaus nicht störend hervor.

Die Herren spielten als Novität ein neues Streich-Quartett von Josef Suk, dem talentirten zweiten Geiger des berühmten Böhmischen Streich-Quartetts, eine saubere und geschmackvolle Arbeit, deren Schwäche in einer dürftigen Thematik liegt. Herr Suk hat uns diesmal wirklich nichts Aufregendes zu sagen, er plaudert aber in so liebenswürdiger Weise, daß wir ihm gern lauschen. Namentlich der dritte Satz, Adagio, ma, non troppo, sticht durch pikante Harmonisirung und reizvolle Durchführung hervor und erringt durch die verdienstvolle Aufführung reizvolle Wirkung. Besonders der Bratschist, dem in dem Quartett eine dankbare Aufgabe zugefallen ist, entfaltete neben der führenden Stimme großen Tonzauber, und der Cellist zog in den ihm karg zugemessenen Gelegenheiten einen süßen Ton. Cäsar Franck's Quintett für Piano und Streich-Quartett, wobei Herr Heinrich Gebhart aus Boston den Klavierpart übernommen hatte, ist eine interessante Arbeit.

Der Bostoner Pianist, der hier schon gespielt hat, verfügt über bemerkenswerthe Kraft und gutausgebildete Technik. Die anmuthige Ornamentik der führenden Stimme brachte er sauber und glänzend, wenn auch ohne tiefere Empfindung. Geradezu störend war dagegen seine unverhältnißmäßige Kraftentfaltung im Forte, wodurch er das Quartett zu ungebührlichen Anstrengungen zwang, so daß Kratzen und Rasseln der Saiten hörbar wurde.

Wohl das Beste gaben die Heren in dem herrlichen posthumen Quartettsatz in C-moll von Schubert. Da waren die Spieler in ihrem Elemente, und die Instrumente erklangen in reinstem Wohllaut. Der Beifall, mit dem das Publikum nicht kargte, ertönte nach dieser Nummer am Ueberzeugendsten [illegible]

[62]

ess

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season at our Carnegie Hall last night, there was no pianist, singer, or violinist to give the variety and popular interest commonly supposed to be essential to a successful orchestral concert. Yet the hall was crowded; indeed, there were not enough tickets to supply the demand. "It is often said," remarked a prominent musician, when the throngs were leaving the house at ten o'clock, "that New Yorkers care only for opera. But look at this crowd! And look at the Philharmonic Society having to arrange overflow meetings at the Hippodrome—and at Walter Damrosch compelled to give four Saint-Saëns concerts instead of two!"

There can be no doubt that the interest in orchestral concerts is steadily growing in this town, quite apart from the soloists. The Boston Orchestra has as usual engaged some prominent singers and players for its ten New York concerts, but last night it was not deemed necessary to have one, because of the interest attaching to the début of the orchestra's new pilot, Dr. Muck, of Berlin Royal Opera and Bayreuth fame. That this fame had preceded him from Europe—and Boston, where he is much liked—was shown by the cordiality of the applause which greeted him when he came on the stage. There was much curiosity to know what sort of a conductor he would prove to be. Would he resemble Gericke, or Paur, or Nikisch, or would he be a law unto himself?

A glance at the programme showed that it would not be possible to estimate his powers and peculiarities at one hearing, because only two composers were represented. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony took up the first half, while the second was devoted to three Wagner numbers—the "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyll," and the Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger." As regards the Beethoven symphony, it is useless to deny that many of us are rather tired of it; not that we have changed our minds as to its being a very great work, but simply because we have heard it too often. We expect a conductor to invest it with new interest by an individual reading—by a revelation of hidden beauties, by novel details of phrasing, by a use of that tempo rubato to which Beethoven himself was addicted, and which Wagner and his followers have still further emphasized. From this point of view Dr. Muck was disappointing. There was little individuality in his reading, while his agogic (we must use the German word till we have one of our own) leaned toward the metronomic manner rather than to the Beethoven-Wagner rubato. And yet, with the aid of the admirable playing of the Boston men, he made the symphony sound fresh and interesting. It was like rejuvenating a somewhat faded bouquet by dipping it into water. How did he do it? Chiefly by an animation which seems to be his chief characteristic, and which he knows how to impart to his men.

Dr. Muck being one of Cosima Wagner's staff, his Wagner readings were looked forward to with special interest. When it was announced that Dr. Muck would take the place of Mr. Gericke the thought that probably first occurred to many was: "At last the Boston folk will have a chance to hear the brass in Wagner's scores!" And no doubt, the new conductor is in this respect more satisfactory than his predecessor. Yet climax building, such as Seidl, Mottl, and Hertz have been wont to thrill us with, does not appear to be his strong point. This was particularly noticeable in the "Meistersinger" Vorspiel, which was also taken too fast for our taste and with insufficient contrasting of motives; the pomp and grandeur were not fully revealed. In the "Faust" overture the serene, meditative portions, with their exquisite modulations, were the most impressively rendered. The kaleidoscopic beauties of the Siegfried Idyll were not shown to their best advantage; there was a lack of the subtle contrasts, the miniature climaxes, as one might say, by means of which Seidl used to make this sinfonietta domestica seem so divinely beautiful that one wished it would go on forever.

To-morrow afternoon there will be further opportunity to admire or criticise Dr. Muck in a programme, beginning with the first Brahms symphony and also including a Richard Strauss piece. That certainly is Bostonese! One might suppose Mr. Gericke had never left!

NOV 9 - 1906

KARL MUCK, of the Royal Berlin Opera House, by arrangement, as the theatrical parlance has it, with the Emperor William, stepped into the limelight last night as star conductor No. 2 of the newly begun musical season. The occasion was the first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York concerts at Carnegie Hall.

It was essentially a début for Dr. Muck, and the interest was therefore focused upon him. The audience was not distracted by either a soloist or any novelty in the programme. The orchestra presented three of the most practised pieces in its great repertoire, all of which it could play, no doubt, without notes and almost without leader—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the Siegfried "Idyll" and the prelude to the "Meistersinger." By no manner of means new, but still not quite so familiar to concertgoers as the other, was the "Faust" overture, making the third Wagner selection on a programme of four numbers.

The expectant audience found Dr. Muck himself something of a riddle. He is a man of indeterminate age, spare, tall, high browed, with distinctly the appearance of a student. He makes no unnecessary movement in his conducting. Reticence, a minimum of effort and a minimum of external evidence of feeling seem to be his main qualities, but they result in an unexpected ability to get the maximum amount of expression out of the orchestra. And one wondered how he did it! The wild waving of baton usually associated with climaxes was absent, but the climax came, nevertheless, and poignantly. Dr. Muck with a little intense bringing together of his hands seemed to bore the effect he desired out of his men rather than drag it out, as is the more common method.

Polish—the polish that would be expected of a saturated music student—is his most evident capability, and for that reason his work with so technically able an organization as the Boston Symphony must be a delight to him. He has a feeling for the very final accent on and phrasing of an inner voice, and a sense of the lines and relief of the contrapuntal pattern, that must always result in joy for his more highly cultivated musical listener.

He plays for the points of a composition as a musician knows them, in a masterly way. Consequently, while it was the well known Fifth Symphony he gave, it was not the "same" Fifth Symphony by any manner of means. In a thousand delightful ways it was reread and given a new meaning. The new meaning was not something that Dr. Muck was trying to give it, but a new revelation through beauties that it had by patient study discovered. It was an affectionate, almost passionate, interpretation by an extremely trained and capable man.

The same spirit was noticeable in the Wagner numbers. He handles these with the same full appreciation of their content that he showed in the Beethoven score. Siegfried's "Idyll" was beautiful full of sentiment, it was passionate yet reticent. The Faust overture was vigorous and imaginative, while the prelude to "The Meistersingers" brought the concert to a ringing climax.

It results from Dr. Muck's reticence that the orchestra is never forced. There was no tear and blare of the brass, no rasp of the strings, no squeak and shriek of the wood wind in even the loudest passages. The listeners were swept firmly along to climaxes, which came full, clear and satisfying, without one harsh sound to mar the pleasure.

The fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has a body of tone that in volume and quality is to be compared to that of no other organization in this country and to few abroad was never more evident than last night—thanks to Dr. Muck. He doubtless will take as much pleasure in evoking it as concert goers will in listening to it. He, the Symphony Orchestra and the subscribers should be thankful for the kindness of Emperor William that permits them to make music together.

ess

DR. KARL MUCK'S NEW YORK DEBUT

Dresden Conductor Leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

MR. GERICKE'S SUCCESSOR

Gets Bigger Tone and More Dashing Manner at the Expense of Some Loss of Refinement.

Under the baton of its new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, of Dresden, and before a brilliant audience which filled Carnegie Hall to overflowing, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened last night its twenty-first season in New York.

The return of this admirable organization is always a matter of great interest to local concert goers and it held out special inducements last night, though the opportunity given to make the acquaintance of a noted European conductor, and to witness the inauguration of his régime.

Attention was the better focussed on Dr. Muck, since there was no soloist and because the programme contained music which has been made thoroughly familiar to Boston Symphony Orchestra audiences. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony opened the list, and this was followed by a strongly contrasted group of Wagner numbers, the "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

It would have been hard to select a programme better calculated to disclose the new conductor's personality, aims and methods. In some respects he disappointed expectations by his treatment of it; in others he satisfied them. That the orchestra would be governed by other ideals than those of Mr. Gericke was made plain in the Beethoven Symphony. Dr. Muck aimed at a bigger tone and a more dashing manner than Mr. Gericke ever allowed his men. He got it, but at the price of some lost refinement and elegance of technique.

There are many Boston orchestra patrons who were forever complaining that they never really heard the brass. These will now be in clover, for the brass instruments are unleashed by Dr. Muck. There are others who set store by the wonderful polish of detail which has recently marked the orchestra's playing. These were the disappointed ones last night, for much of it was lacking. One even suspected the wood wind choir of being out of tune.

On the other hand Dr. Muck showed himself a Wagner conductor of great imagination. He made the scores of the "Idyl" and the "Faust" overture pulsate with life and interest even when they departed from tradition.

In person the Dresden musician proved to be a man of slight figure, commanding manner and dignified gesture. He was heartily welcomed and warmly applauded.

[62]

NEW YORK MAIL
NOV 9 - 1906

NEW LEADER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Karl Muck Makes New York Debut—Scholarly Precision His Chief Quality Thus Far Revealed.

Dr. Karl Muck made his New York debut last night as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Carnegie Hall was filled to the legal limit for the occasion. There was a courteous welcome for the newcomer, mild applause after the first movement of Beethoven's C minor symphony, cordial clapping at its finale, and enthusiasm, prolonged and real, over the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which ended the concert.

The new conductor is not a demonstrative musician. His decisive beat is usually of small amplitude. His gestures do not precisely indicate to the audience, as did, for instance, those of the late Anton Seidl, the rise and fall of the emotional intensity of the music. He is the antithesis of Mr. Safonoff, who will soon be knocking off the heads of an army of imaginary adversaries, from the conductor's stand of the Philharmonic Orchestra.

To the players, no doubt, Dr. Muck's movements may be as significant as any, but the audience, when he conducts, must rely wholly upon its ears, without help from its eyes. This is not a fault or a merit; it is simply a part of the new leader's personality which auditors will have to reckon with. And for this reason it will take longer for them to get thoroughly acquainted with Dr. Muck than with some others. His tall, thin form and his military stride accentuate the reserved self-confidence of the man as he appears on the stage.

These are outward things, but they are nevertheless part of Dr. Muck's personality, and they have a bearing upon his interpretation of music. So far as last night's list (and it was varied) could reveal it, the man's dominating note is of intellectuality. He disclosed the structure of what he played with illuminating clarity and justness. His weaving of the inner voices of the scores was admirably proportioned; the beauty of every detail was laid bare, without loss of general effect. Characteristic rhythms were sharply insisted upon. Behind his readings one felt the weight of intimate knowledge and keen adjustment of values.

What this first concert did not prove was Dr. Muck's possession of a highly developed feeling for emotional breadth. His tempi seemed often too fast for a full realization of emotional effects. And there was also an apparent reluctance to allow full dynamic contrasts. In the victorious finale of the C minor symphony, one could have wished a more majestic stride, in the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" a more thrilling sweep and climax, in "A Faust Overture" more of bleak intensity, and of raw energy of string tone. The "Siegfried Idyl" was played exquisitely, with loving appreciation. But elsewhere one sighed now and again for a little more abandon.

Saturday afternoon's programme will show new facets of Dr. Muck's temper. With the Boston Orchestra (whose splendid virtuosity it is refreshing to meet again), he will play Brahms's first symphony. Weber's "Oberon" and "Der Freischuetz" overtures and Richard Strauss's "Don Juan." Oddly enough, the same Brahms symphony will be played Saturday evening by Walter Damrosch and his orchestra.

ess

om

dress

te

Das Bürger-Kommittee in Boston hat nämlich dem Verein mitgetheilt, daß an [illegible] zusammenen Tage, am

Boston Symphonie-Quartett.

Vor sehr zahlreichem Publikum fand gestern Nachmittag in Mendelssohn Hall die erste Produktion des Bostoner Symphonie-Quartetts statt und brachte einen erlesenen Genuß. Das Quartett präsentirt sich heuer in unverändertem Personalstand, Prof. Willy Heß, erste Violine, Otto Roth, zweite, Emile Ferir, Bratsche, und Heinrich Warnke, Cello.

Das Spiel der Herren klang gestern noch feiner abgetönt als im Vorjahre. Die Fusion ist eine anerkennenswerthe, die Kantilene ist schmelzend, das Staktato scharf und bestimmt. Die Herren haben offenbar sehr fleißig gearbeitet, und die Vereinigung steht gegenwärtig tonlich, technisch und geistig auf hoher Stufe.

Prof. Heß ist als vorzüglicher Primgeiger bekannt; er entfaltete gestern einen besonders blühenden und vollen Ton. Seine Autorität ist ebenso groß als die Diskretion seiner Genossen, die ihm mitunter musikalisch den Hof zu machen belieben. Dies kommt aber mehr oder minder bei allen Quartettvereinigungen vor, welche über einen virtuosen Führer verfügen, und trat gestern durchaus nicht störend hervor.

Die Herren spielten als Novität ein neues Streich-Quartett von Josef Suk, dem talentirten zweiten Geiger des berühmten Böhmischen Streich-Quartetts, eine saubere und geschmackvolle Arbeit, deren Schwäche in einer dürftigen Thematik liegt. Herr Suk hat uns diesmal wirklich nichts Aufregendes zu sagen, er plaudert aber in so liebenswürdiger Weise, daß wir ihm gern lauschen. Namentlich der dritte Satz, Adagio, ma, non troppo, sticht durch pikante Harmonisirung und reizvolle Durchführung hervor und erringt durch die verdienstvolle Aufführung reizvolle Wirkung. Besonders der Bratschist, dem in dem Quartett eine dankbare Aufgabe zugefallen ist, entfaltete neben der führenden Stimme großen Tonzauber, und der Cellist zog in den ihm karg zugemessenen Gelegenheiten einen süßen Ton. Cäsar Franck's Quintett für Piano und Streich-Quartett, wobei Herr Heinrich Gebhart aus Boston den Klavierpart übernommen hatte, ist eine interessante Arbeit.

Der Bostoner Pianist, der hier schon gespielt hat, verfügt über bemerkenswerthe Kraft und gutausgebildete Technik. Die anmuthige Ornamentik der führenden Stimme brachte er sauber und glänzend, wenn auch ohne tiefere Empfindung. Geradezu störend war dagegen seine unverhältnismäßige Kraftentfaltung im Forte, wodurch er das Quartett zu ungebührlichen Anstrengungen zwang, so daß Kratzen und Rasseln der Saiten hörbar wurde.

Wohl das Beste gaben die Heren in dem herrlichen posthumen Quartettsatz in C-moll von Schubert. Da waren die Spieler in ihrem Elemente, und die Instrumente erklangen in reinstem Wohllaut. Der Beifall, mit dem das Publikum nicht kargte, ertönte nach dieser Nummer am Ueberzeugtesten und Einmüthigsten.

...ATSZEITUNG
NOV 9 - 1906

Konzertgänge

Copyright 1906 by the New Yorker Staats-Zeitung

...ersten Artikel der Konstitution ...Vereinigten Staaten ist festgesetzt, daß ...des Bundespräsidenten lediglich ...cutive sein soll; der Präsident ist ...nur der höchste ausübende Beamte, ...erste Diener des Staates, er ist nicht ...autokratische Lenker, der unumschränkte ...Herr, dessen Willen die Andern unterthan ...sein müssen. So lange es Komponisten ...und Dirigenten gegeben, ist die Frage die ...brennende gewesen, ob der Dirigent eine ...ähnliche Stellung einnimmt wie der Bundespräsident, ob auch er nur der höchste Exekutivbeamte ist, oder ob er supreme regieren darf über den Komponisten und ihren Werken. Es ist die Frage gewesen, ob der Dirigent sich damit begnügen muß, das Mundstück des Komponisten zu sein, oder ob er dessen Werke frei verdolmetschen kann, wie er sie aufgefaßt sehen möchte.

Herr Hofkapellmeister Dr. juris Karl Muck, der gestern Abend in der ihm eigenen, höchst bescheidenen Art dem New Yorker Publikum seinen Antrittsbesuch machte, zählt zu den großen Selbstverleugnern, die ihr Talent dem des Komponisten unterordnen; ihm ist die Sache, das Werk Selbstzweck und seine Person vollkommen Nebensache.

Seine Person . . . Muck ist ein Mann von siebenundvierzig Jahren und seit fünfzehn Jahren Hofkapellmeister am Königlichen Opernhause in Berlin. Man will es zwar nicht für möglich halten, aber es ist darum nicht weniger wahr, Karl Muck, dessen Genialität längst jenseits von Anerkennung und Zweifel steht, ist in Darmstadt geboren, in Darmstadt, dem langweiligsten aller langweiligen deutschen Residenzstädtchen. Jedem, der ihn zum ersten Male sieht, muß seine große Aehnlichkeit mit Richard Wagner auffallen, welche wohl dadurch erhöht wird, daß Dr. Muck weder Backenbart noch Schnurrbart trägt. Er ist groß und schlank und trägt das unverkennbare Gepräge der Künstlerschaft in seinen feingemeißelten Zügen. Dr. Muck spricht überaus lebhaft, aber mit großer Bescheidenheit über seine Laufbahn, die sich unter den denkbar günstigsten Sternen entwickelt hat. Sein Vater, ein namhafter Jurist, war ein leidenschaftlicher Musiker, dem es die Engherzigkeit seiner Familie (Darmstadt!!!) nicht gegönnt hatte, sich so auszulebeen, wie es seine Wünsche und seine Veranlagung begehrten. Sobald er dies konnte, lebte er einzig und allein mehr der Kunst und dem erwachenden Talent seines Sohnes. Nach der Maturitätsprüfung bezog dieser die Universität Heidelberg, wo er so lange blieb, bis er das Doktorat der Rechte erreicht hatte. Eine Anzahl von Schrammen beweist, daß er auch fleißig den Fechtboden besucht hatte. Nachdem er seine Studien so zum Abschluß gebracht, ließ er sich in's Leipziger Konservatorium aufnehmen, wo man ihm aber bei der Aufnahmsprüfung Schwierigkeiten machte, weil er bereits — zu viel konnte und wußte. Sein Sinn war damals auf das Virtuosenthum im Klavierspiel gerichtet, zu dem ihm Bülow und Rubinstein einstimmig riethen. Aber der Vater entschied: wenn er sich der Musik nicht als Dirigent widmen wolle, so solle er lieber bei der Juristerei bleiben. Und so griff Muck zum Taktstock, nachdem er in Leipzig nur fünf Vierteljahre gebraucht hatte, um das ganze Konservatorium zu absolviren. Dr. Karl Muck hat schon in allen Großstädten Europas Triumphe errungen; er hat in Berlin, Wien, London, Petersburg und Moskau dirigirt, von Zürich, Salzburg, Brünn, Graz und Prag, wo er seine Lehr- und Wanderjahre verbrachte, ganz abgesehen. Muck hat die kühlen Bostonians zu ungewohnter und ungewöhnlicher Begeisterung entflammt, er hat ihnen das, durch den fortgesetzten „Pork and Beans" Genuß gar zu dickflüssige Blut rascher pulsiren machen, und nun sollte er vor dem gestrengen New Yorker Tribunal die Feuerprobe bestehen.

Wie hat den New Yorkern — auf deren Musikverständnis man außerhalb Gothams Mauern mit Nasenrümpfen und Achselzucken herabblickt — der junge Berliner Meister des Taktstockes gefallen? Wenn man selbst keine Ansicht hat, dann befragt man die Wissenden um ihre Meinung; die „Wissenden" sind in diesem Falle die Herren, die auf dem geheiligten Dreifuß der hohen Kritik sitzen . . . eh bien fragen wir!

Damit Sie mir nachher nicht gar zu sehr enttäuscht sein mögen, werde ich Ihnen eins im Voraus sagen: ich kann ganz nach Ihrem Belieben aus den „gesammelten" Kritiken einen ungetrübten Erfolg oder eine grausame Niederlage konstruiren. Also, was steht dem Herrn zu Diensten? Ein ungetrübter Erfolg? Gut; ganz wie Sie befehlen. Nehmen wir zuerst die „Times" zur Hand und hören wir, was Richard Aldrich zu sagen hat: „Die Wiedergabe der C-moll Symphonie von Beethoven war bewundernswerth; seine Auffassung zeigte Kraft und das Verständnis für den Geist der Musik, Elastizität der Tempi, zart abgetönte Nüancirung mit allen sorgsam herausgearbeiteten Klimaxen und Gegensätzen . . . . Muck hat aus der Symphonie alles zu Tage geschürft, was man daraus hervorholen kann."

Hiernach hat Muck mit seiner ersten Programmnummer eine vollendete Leistung geschaffen und einen vollen Erfolg erzielt. Hören wir weiter und zwar diesmal, was der „Telegraph" zu sagen hat; Algernon St. John-Brenon schreibt über die zweite Programmnummer:

„Meiner Ansicht nach war es die subtile und bezaubernd graziöse Wiedergabe des Siegfried Idylls unter Dr. Mucks Leitung, die nach vielen Jahren noch in der Erinnerung der Hörer vorhalten wird; das war die unübertrefflich vollendete Ausführung eines der entzückendsten Werke, die wir Wagners reicher Phantasie verdanken."

Demgemäß war auch die zweite Nummer ein einwandfreier Genuß und wir können nun hören, was die „Sun" über Nummer drei zu berichten weiß. Altmeister Henderson drückt seine Begeisterung über die Interpretation der „Faust-Ouverture" wie folgt aus:

„Wer sich nach einer temperamentvollen Wiedergabe sehnte, konte sie in der Aufführung der „Faust-Ouverture" von Wagner finden. Sie war in glänzender Weise aufgebaut und ihre starken Leidenschaften kamen in entsprechender Weise zur Darstellung. Das Orchester folgte seinem Dirigenten in großartiger Weise."

Nach diesem dritten Sieg bliebe nur das Urtheil über die Schlußnummer übrig und zu diesem Zweck ertheile ich der „World" das Wort, die in Arthur H. Ziegler einen der jüngsten, aber auch einen der [illegible] Kritiker besitzt:

„Muck war nirgends „sensationell", außer in dem Vorspiel zu den „Meistersingern", als er das Orchester spielen ließ ohne den Takt zu markiren. Es ist das ein alter Trick in Europa und man sieht darin eine Anerkennung von Seiten des Dirigenten für sein Orchester. Muck bewies sein Temperament in unwiderleglicher Weise gerade bei diesem Vorspiel."

Und so ergiebt sich aus der kombinirten Kritik der Times-Telegraph-Sun-World, daß Mucks erstes Konzert in New York ein gewaltiger, wenn auch gerade kein überwältigender Erfolg war. Sie nörgeln und mäkeln auch an dem neuen, jungen Meister, aber der Eine nörgelt, wo der Andere lobt, der Dritte mäkelt, wo der Vierte lobpreist, warum soll man den abfälligen Urtheilen mehr glauben als dem mindestens ebenso ehrlichen Lob?!

Nach dem Konzert gab es gestern Abend in dem Lüchow'schen Künstlerzimmer einen Empfang, den eine Anzahl Kollegen dem Herrn Hofkapellmeister veranstaltete. Es war eine ganz informelle Affäre, deren Leitung Nahan Franko übernommen hat, der einst als Konzertmeister unter Muck in London gespielt hat und seit jener Zeit für ihn eine tiefe Verehrung hegt. Von den Großen aus dem Reiche der Frau Musika nahmen an dem Feste theil Meister Alfred Hertz, Dr. Otto Neitzel, der deutsche Kunstkritiker und Dozent, der kleine temperamentvolle Arthuro Vigna, Prof. Stojowsky vom Institut für Musik, der populäre Symphoniedirigent X. J. Ahrens, der unvergänglich schöne Alexander Lambert, der ditto Max Bendix, Walter Damrosch's Concertmeister, Sam Franko, der verdienstvolle Leiter der historischen Konzerte und selbstredend Nahan Franko und Alfred Ellis, der Manager der Bostoner. Als Stern neben dem Stern des Abends leuchtete Victor Herbert, der nicht umhin konnte eine seiner berühmten, fidelen und treffenden Reden zu halten. Die ganze Affäre war so gemüthlicher Natur, daß Dr. Muck sich hier noch heimischer fühlt als dies bereits der Fall war, und ich kann Ihnen verrathen, daß es dem Herrn Doktor und Hofkapellmeister hier ganz ausgezeichnet gefällt; er ist einfach entzückt von Amerika. Und die Fachleute, die ihn drüben und hier gehört und bewundert haben, die ihn genau zu schätzen wissen und deren Urtheil, gerade weil es negativ parteiisch ist, erhöhten Werth besitzt, diese Fachleute sind der Meinung, daß Muck des allerhöchsten Lobes werth sei. Nahan Franko sagte ohne eine Spur von Arg, daß es ein Vergnügen, ein Genuß und eine Ehre sei unter solch einem Manne zu spielen.

Muck war wohl etwas abgespannt, denn wenn er frisch und munter, dann ist er ein sehr fesselnder Plauderer und erzählt mit Vorliebe von seinen Petersburger Erfahrungen; er hat dort im Jahre 1889 für Angelo Neumann den „Nibelungenring" mit den Musikern der Kaiserlichen Oper einstudiert und die Aufführungen zuerst in Petersburg und dann in Moskau dirigirt. Die Arbeit erforderte einen viermonatlichen Aufenthalt in Rußland. Muck lobte sehr den Zug ins Große, der in allen den Hofdienst berührenden Dingen in Rußland bemerkbar ist. Nach der ersten Probe stellte er das Verlangen nach einigen Baßtuben und Kontrafagotten, welche ihm bereitwilligst zugesagt wurden. Am nächsten Probetag marschirten im Hofe der Oper sechzig Mann russisches Militär auf, alle mit riesigen Instrumenten bewaffnet. Man hatte sie aus allen Militärkapellen zusammengesucht; er sollte nun die besten auswählen. — In besonders heiterer Erinnerung steht bei Muck die Reise von Petersburg nach Moskau, welche alle Musiker, in einen Extrazug zusammengepfercht, zurücklegen mußten. Unter den Mitgliedern des Orchesters befand sich auch ein kleiner buckliger Pauker, den Muck bei den Proben einigemal, weil derselbe seine Kräfte schonen wollte, besonders scharf aufs Korn genommen hatte. Er war die Zielscheibe des Spotts im Orchester, und wegen Mangels an Raum wurde er von den Kollegen in's Gepäcknetz gelegt, wo er die Nacht hindurch schlief. Als Muck den Zug durchschritt, hörte er ihn im Schlaf brummen: „Angelo und Muck, Muck und Angelo; o, brächten beide sich um!"

H. R. H.

The First Established and ... Newspaper Cutting Bureau
...ERTRUA...
...om ... 3.4 TIMORE, M...
Address ...
NOV 1 0 ...

Dr. Karl Muck, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was a distinguished pianist before he became a famous conductor. Soon after arriving in Boston Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra, asked Muck to play the piano in one of the modern works which the quartet is to give. After looking at the score he said: "I will, if you put it into your last concert. I'll have to take a course of scales before the concert and you must give me time."

BOSTON TRAVELER.
NOVEMBER 10, 1906.

The fifth Symphony programme ... be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will bring a symphony which is not familiar to patrons of the Symphony concerts, ... been played here but once, in ... 1889. It is Sinding's in D ... No. 1. The solo artist will be ... Antoinette Szumowska, a favorite pianist in Boston. The programme ... be:

.....Overture, "Oberon"
Concerto for Pianoforte in E ... No. 1.
.....Symphony in D minor

The Symphony Orchestra returns from its present trip to other cities on Tuesday morning, and the fifth pair of Symphony concerts takes place as usual next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Another of Weber's overtures, that to "Oberon," begins it, and Chopin's concerto in E minor follows with Mme. Szumowska for the pianist. Then, for the first time since Dr. Muck took the orchestra, he has put an unfamiliar composition on his programme—the symphony in D minor by Sinding, the Danish composer. It has been played here only once, and almost eight years ago.

...Hall, Mr. Longy's club of virtuosi upon wind instruments gives the first of its concerts for the current season. With one or two changes, the club still comprises ten members of the wind choir of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. de Voto, the capable pianist. As usual, too, the music from which Mr. Longy has made his programme will come fresh to his hearers, whether it be new or old. For this particular concert he has gone to the classic composers or to moderns of wide range rather than to those that have especially cultivated wind instruments. The list runs:

H. Woollett: Quintet in E major, on French popular themes for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon.
Handel: Air Varié (Suite 5); Weber: Menuet; Grieg: Four Small Pieces; for flute, oboe, two clarinets and two bassoons.
Bach: Allegro from Sonata No. 2 in E-flat major; Schumann: Romance; Godard: Highlander's March; for oboe and piano.
Beethoven: Octet (Op. 103), in E-flat major for two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.

Monday evening, Nov. 26, in Symphony Hall, special concert by the Symphony Orchestra in honor of Camille Saint-Saëns, the eminent French composer, at which he will appear as conductor and organist. His overture to his opera, "The Barbarians," his familiar tone-poems, "La Rouet d'Omphale" and "La Danse Macabre;" his ablest symphony that in C-minor, and a group of organ pieces of his own composing make the programme. In all the orchestral numbers the composer will conduct.

...TIM...
...ess ... Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 10 190...

Dr. Karl Muck, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was a very distinguished pianist before he became famous as a conductor, and shortly after he arrived in Boston, Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra and leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, asked him to play the piano in one of the modern works which the quartet is to give in Boston this season. Dr. Muck looked doubtful, and asked to see the score. He read it over and then said: "Yes, I will, if you put it into your last concert. These young fellows that are writing music ask so much of the poor pianist. Only virtuosos will suit them, and, ach Gott! my fingers are getting stiff. I'll have to take a course of scales before the concert, and you must give me time."

...rom N. Y. TRIBUNE.
...ddress ...
...ate ... NOV 10 190...

MUSIC.

YESTERDAY'S CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave its first concert for this season at Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon. It is an organization which bears a name that has most honorable associations, and it has had a predecessor which, without the name, lifted chamber music to a plane never occupied by it before in the United States. Naturally much has been expected of it, and, with equal naturalness, wanting the ensemble effects which can come only from experience, there has been some disappointment in all its performances. So there was yesterday, but it was gratifying to note improvement, especially over the last concert of last season, which was wofully disappointing. The direct and virile purpose stamped upon the work of the little band at the outset by its leader, Professor Hess, was there, but also somewhat more of finish. The chief lack is still euphony, that charm which ought to belong to music which, because of its nature, is prevented from enjoying the adventitious aid of varied instrumental color. A string quartet ought always to give us music like that suggested by Milton in his description of the opening of the gates of heaven: "Harmonious sound, on golden hinges moving." Yesterday's concert brought forth a novelty which did not seem particularly impressive—a quartet in B flat by Josef Suk, of the Bohemian Quartet, and son-in-law of the lamented Dr. Dvorak, who ought to have lived longer to impress upon his intimate disciples his own devotion to the beautiful. The other numbers were the posthumous quartet allegro by Schubert and Cesar Franck's pianoforte quintet in F minor, in which the pianoforte was intelligently, tastefully and affectionately played by Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, of Boston.

[63]

Der Spaziergänger

Copyright 1906 by the New Yorker Staats-Zeitung

Im zweiten Artikel der Konstitution der Vereinigten Staaten ist festgesetzt, daß die Macht des Bundespräsidenten lediglich eine exekutive sein soll; der Präsident ist somit nur der höchste ausübende Beamte, der erste Diener des Staates, er ist nicht der autokratische Lenker, der unumschränkte Herr, dessen Willen die Andern unterthan sein müssen. So lange es Komponisten und Dirigenten gegeben, ist die Frage die brennende gewesen, ob der Dirigent eine ähnliche Stellung einnimmt wie der Bundespräsident, ob auch er nur der höchste Exekutivbeamte ist, oder ob er supreme regieren darf über den Komponisten und ihren Werken. Es ist die Frage gewesen, ob der Dirigent sich damit begnügen muß das Mundstück des Komponisten zu sein, oder ob er dessen Werke frei verdolmetschen kann, wie er sie aufgefaßt sehen möchte.

Herr Hofkapellmeister Dr. juris Karl Muck, der gestern Abend in der ihm eigenen, höchst bescheidenen Art dem New Yorker Publikum seinen Antrittsbesuch machte, zählt zu den großen Selbstverleugnern, die ihr Talent dem des Komponisten unterordnen; ihm ist die Sache, das Werk Selbstzweck und seine Person vollkommen Nebensache.

Seine Person . . . Muck ist ein Mann von siebenundvierzig Jahren und seit fünfzehn Jahren Hofkapellmeister am königlichen Opernhause in Berlin. Man soll es zwar nicht für möglich halten, aber es ist darum nicht weniger wahr, Karl Muck, dessen Genialität längst jenseits von Anerkennung und Zweifel steht, ist in Darmstadt geboren, in Darmstadt, dem langweiligsten aller langweiligen deutschen Residenzstädtchen. Jedem, der ihn zum ersten Male sieht, muß seine große Aehnlichkeit mit Richard Wagner auffallen, welche wohl dadurch erhöht wird, daß Dr. Muck weder Backenbart noch Schnurrbart trägt. Er ist groß und schlank und trägt das unverkennbare Gepräge der Künstlerschaft in seinen feingemeißelten Zügen. Dr. Muck spricht überaus lebhaft, aber mit großer Bescheidenheit über seine Laufbahn, die sich unter den denkbar günstigsten Sternen entwickelt hat. Sein Vater, ein namhafter Jurist, war ein leidenschaftlicher Musiker, dem es die Engherzigkeit seiner Familie (Darmstadt!!!) nicht gegönnt hatte, sich so auszulebeen, wie es seine Wünsche und seine Veranlagung begehrten. Sobald er dies konnte, lebte er einzig und allein mehr der Kunst und dem erwachenden Talent seines Sohnes. Nach der Maturitätsprüfung bezog dieser die Universität Heidelberg, wo er so lange blieb, bis er das Doktorat der Rechte erreicht hatte. Eine Anzahl von Schrammen beweist, daß er auch fleißig den Fechtboden besucht hatte. Nachdem er seine Studien so zum Abschluß gebracht, ließ er sich in's Leipziger Konservatorium aufnehmen, wo man ihm aber bei der Aufnahmsprüfung Schwierigkeiten machte, weil er bereits — zu viel konnte und wußte. Sein Sinn war damals auf das Virtuosenthum im Klavierspiel gerichtet, zu dem ihm Bülow und Rubinstein einbringlich riethen. Aber der Vater entschied: wenn er sich der Musik nicht als Dirigent widmen wolle, so solle er lieber bei der Juristerei bleiben. Und so griff Muck zum Taktstock, nachdem er in Leipzig nur fünf Vierteljahre gebraucht hatte, um das ganze Konservatorium zu absolviren.

Dr. Karl Muck hat schon in allen Großstädten Europas Triumphe errungen; er hat in Berlin, Wien, London, Petersburg und Moskau dirigirt, von Zürich, Salzburg, Brünn, Graz und Prag, wo er seine Lehr- und Wanderjahre verbrachte, ganz abgesehen. Muck hat die kühlen Bostonians zu ungewohnter und ungewöhnlicher Begeisterung entflammt, er hat ihnen das, durch den fortgesetzten „Pork and Beans" Genuß gar zu dickflüssige Blut rascher pulsiren machen, und nun sollte er vor dem gestrengen New Yorker Tribunal die Feuerprobe bestehen.

Wie hat den New Yorkern — auf deren Musikverständnis man außerhalb Gothams Mauern mit Nasenrümpfen und Achselzucken herabblickt — der junge Berliner Meister des Taktstockes gefallen? Wenn man selbst keine Ansicht hat, dann befragt man die Wissenden um ihre Meinung; die „Wissenden" sind in diesem Falle die Herren, die auf dem geheiligten Dreifuß der hohen Kritik sitzen .... eh bien fragen wir!

Damit Sie mir nachher nicht gar zu sehr enttäuscht sein mögen, werde ich Ihnen eins im Voraus sagen: ich kann ganz nach Ihrem Belieben aus den „gesammelten" Kritiken einen ungetrübten Erfolg oder eine grausame Niederlage konstruiren. Also, was steht dem Herrn zu Diensten? Ein ungetrübter Erfolg? Gut; ganz wie Sie befehlen. Nehmen wir zuerst die „Times" zur Hand und hören wir, was Richard Aldrich zu sagen hat: „Die Wiedergabe der C-moll Symphonie von Beethoven war bewundernswerth; seine Auffassung zeigte Kraft und das Verständnis für den Geist der Musik, Elastizität der Tempi, zart abgetönte Nüancirung mit allen sorgsam herausgearbeiteten Klimaxen und Gegensätzen .... Muck hat aus der Symphonie alles zu Tage geschürft, was man daraus hervorholen kann."

Hiernach hat Muck mit seiner ersten Programmnummer eine vollendete Leistung geschaffen und einen vollen Erfolg erzielt. Hören wir weiter und zwar diesmal, was der „Telegraph" zu sagen hat; Algernon St. John-Brenon schreibt über die zweite Programmnummer:

„Meiner Ansicht nach war es die subtile und bezaubernd graziöse Wiedergabe des Siegfried Idylls unter Dr. Mucks Leitung, die nach vielen Jahren noch in der Erinnerung der Hörer vorhalten wird; das war die unübertrefflich vollendete Ausführung eines der entzückendsten Werke, die wir Wagners reicher Phantasie verdanken."

Demgemäß war auch die zweite Nummer ein einwandfreier Genuß und wir können nun hören, was die „Sun" über Nummer drei zu berichten weiß. Altmeister Henderson drückt seine Begeisterung über die Interpretation der „Faust-Ouverture" wie folgt aus:

„Wer sich nach einer temperamentvollen Wiedergabe sehnte, konte sie in der Aufführung der „Faust-Ouverture" von Wagner finden. Sie war in glänzender Weise aufgebaut und ihre starken Leidenschaften kamen in entsprechender Weise zur Darstellung. Das Orchester folgte seinem Dirigenten in großartiger Weise."

Nach diesem dritten Sieg bliebe nur das Urtheil über die Schlußnummer übrig und zu diesem Zweck ertheile ich der „World" das Wort, die in Arthur H. Ziegler einen der jüngsten, aber auch einen der fähigsten Kritiker besitzt:

„Muck war nirgends „sensationell", außer in dem Vorspiel zu den „Meistersingern", als er das Orchester spielen ließ ohne den Takt zu markiren. Es ist das ein alter Trick in Europa und man sieht darin eine Anerkennung von Seiten des Dirigenten für sein Orchester. Muck bewies sein Temperament in unwiderleglicher Weise gerade bei diesem Vorspiel."

Und so ergiebt sich aus der kombinirten Kritik der Times-Telegraph-Sun-World, daß Mucks erstes Konzert in New York ein gewaltiger, wenn auch gerade kein überwältigender Erfolg war. Sie nörgeln und mäkeln auch an dem neuen, jungen Meister, aber der Eine nörgelt, wo der Andere lobt, der Dritte mäkelt, wo der Vierte lobpreist, warum soll man den abfälligen Urtheilen mehr glauben als dem mindestens ebenso ehrlichen Lob?!

Nach dem Konzert gab es gestern Abend in dem Lüchow'schen Künstlerzimmer einen Empfang, den eine Anzahl Kollegen dem Herrn Hofkapellmeister veranstaltete. Es war eine ganz informelle Affäre, deren Leitung Nahan Franko übernommen hat, der einst als Konzertmeister unter Muck in London gespielt hat und seit jener Zeit für ihn eine tiefe Verehrung hegt. Von den Großen aus dem Reiche der Frau Musika nahmen an dem Feste theil Meister Alfred Hertz, Dr. Otto Neitzel, der deutsche Kunstkritiker und Dozent, der kleine temperamentvolle Arthuro Vigna, Prof. Stojowsky vom Institut für Musik, der populäre Symphoniedirigent X. F. Ahrens, der unvergänglich schöne Alexander Lambert, der ditto Max Bendix, Walter Damrosch's Concertmeister, Sam Franko, der verdienstvolle Leiter der historischen Konzerte und selbstredend Nahan Franko und Alfred Ellis, der Manager der Bostoner. Als Stern neben dem Stern des Abends leuchtete Victor Herbert, der nicht umhin konnte eine seiner berühmten, fidelen und treffenden Reden zu halten. Die ganze Affäre war so gemüthlicher Natur, daß Dr. Muck sich hier noch heimischer fühlt als dies bereits der Fall war, und ich kann Ihnen verrathen, daß es dem Herrn Doktor und Hofkapellmeister hier ganz ausgezeichnet gefällt; er ist einfach entzückt von Amerika. Und die Fachleute, die ihn drüben und hier gehört und bewundert haben, die ihn genau zu schätzen wissen und deren Urtheil, gerade weil es negativ parteiisch ist, erhöhten Werth besitzt, diese Fachleute sind der Meinung, daß Muck des allerhöchsten Lobes werth sei. Dr. Nahan Franko sagte ohne eine Spur von Arg, daß es ein Vergnügen, ein Genuß und eine Ehre sei unter solch einem Manne zu spielen.

Muck war wohl etwas abgespannt, denn wenn er frisch und munter, dann ist er ein sehr fesselnder Plauderer und erzählt mit Vorliebe von seinen Petersburger Erfahrungen; er hat dort im Jahre 1889 für Angelo Neumann den „Nibelungenring" mit den Musikern der Kaiserlichen Oper einstudiert und die Aufführungen zuerst in Petersburg und dann in Moskau dirigirt. Die Arbeit erforderte einen viermonatlichen Aufenthalt in Rußland. Muck lobte sehr den Zug ins Große, der in allen den Hofdienst berührenden Dingen in Rußland bemerkbar ist. Nach der ersten Probe stellte er das Verlangen nach einigen Baßtuben und Kontrafagotten, welche ihm bereitwilligst zugesagt wurden. Am nächsten Probetag marschirten im Hofe der Oper sechzig Mann russisches Militär auf, alle mit riesigen Instrumenten bewaffnet. Man hatte sie aus allen Militärkapellen zusammengesucht; er sollte nun die besten auswählen. — In besonders heiterer Erinnerung steht bei Muck die Reise von Petersburg nach Moskau, welche alle Musiker, in einen Extrazug zusammengepfercht, zurücklegen mußten. Unter den Mitgliedern des Orchesters befand sich auch ein kleiner buckliger Paukist, den Muck bei den Proben einigemal, weil derselbe seine Kräfte schonen wollte, besonders scharf aufs Korn genommen hatte. Er war die Zielscheibe des Spotts im Orchester, und wegen Mangels an Raum wurde er von den Kollegen in's Gepäcknetz gelegt, wo er die Nacht hindurch schlief. Als Muck den Zug durchschritt, hörte er ihn im Schlaf brummen: „Angelo und Muck, Muck und Angelo; o, brächten beide sich um!"

H. R. H.

BOSTON TRAVELER, NOVEMBER 10, 1906.

The fifth Symphony pro[illegible] will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will bring a symphony which is not familiar to the patrons of the Symphony concerts, having been played here but once, in January, 1899. It is Sinding's in D minor, No. 1. The solo artist will be Mme. Antoinette Szumowska, a favorite pianist in Boston. The programme will be:

Weber.....Overture, "Oberon"
Chopin..Concerto for Pianoforte in E minor, No. 1.
Sinding.....Symphony in D minor

The First Established and Most Reliable Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.

From

Address

Date

Dr. Karl Muck, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was a distinguished pianist before he became a famous conductor. Soon after arriving in Boston Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra, asked Muck to play the piano in one of the modern works which the quartet is to give. After looking at the score he said: "I will, if you put it into your last concert. I'll have to take a course of scales before the concert and you must give me time."

SATURDAY TRANSCRIPT NOVEMBER 10, 1906

Concerts Next Week

The Symphony Orchestra returns from its present trip to other cities on Tuesday morning, and the fifth pair of Symphony concerts takes place as usual next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Another of Weber's overtures, that to "Oberon," begins it, and Chopin's concerto in E minor follows with Mme. Szumowska for the pianist. Then, for the first time since Dr. Muck took the orchestra, he has put an unfamiliar composition on his programme—the symphony in D minor by Sinding, the Danish composer. It has been played here only once, and almost eight years ago.

[illegible], at 8.15 in Potter Hall, Mr. Longy's club of virtuosi upon wind instruments gives the first of its concerts for the current season. With one or two changes, the club still comprises ten members of the wind choir of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. de Voto, the capable pianist. As usual, too, the music from which Mr. Longy has made his programme will come fresh to his hearers, whether it be new or old. For this particular concert he has gone to the classic composers or to moderns of wide range rather than to those that have especially cultivated wind instruments. The list runs:

H. Woollett: Quintet in E major, on French popular themes for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon.
Handel: Air Varié (Suite 5); Weber: Menuet; Grieg: Four Small Pieces; for flute, oboe, two clarinets and two bassoons.
Bach: Allegro from Sonata No. 2 in E-flat major; Schumann: Romance; Godard: Highlander's March; for oboe and piano.
Beethoven: Octet (Op. 103), in E-flat major for two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.

Monday evening, Nov. 26, in Symphony Hall, special concert by the Symphony Orchestra in honor of Camille Saint-Saëns, the eminent French composer, at which he will appear as conductor and organist. His overture to his opera, "The Barbarians," his familiar tone-poems, "La Rouet d'Omphale" and "La Danse Macabre;" his ablest symphony that in C-minor, and a group of organ pieces of his own composing make the programme. In all the orchestral numbers the composer will conduct.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

TIMES

[illegible] N. Y.

NOV 10 1906

Dr. Karl Muck, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was a very distinguished pianist before he became famous as a conductor, and shortly after he arrived in Boston, Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra and leader of the Boston Symphony Quartet, asked him to play the piano in one of the modern works which the quartet is to give in Boston this season. Dr. Muck looked doubtful, and asked to see the score. He read it over and then said: "Yes, I will, if you put it into your last concert. These young fellows that are writing music ask so much of the poor pianist. Only virtuosos will suit them, and, ach Gott! my fingers are getting stiff. I'll have to take a course of scales before the concert, and you must give me time."

From N. Y. TRIB.

Address

Date

MUSIC.

YESTERDAY'S CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave its first concert for this season at Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon. It is an organization which bears a name that has most honorable associations, and it has had a predecessor which, without the name, lifted chamber music to a plane never occupied by it before in the United States. Naturally much has been expected of it, and, with equal naturalness, wanting the ensemble effects which can come only from experience, there has been some disappointment in all its performances. So there was yesterday, but it was gratifying to note improvement, especially over the last concert of last season, which was wofully disappointing. The direct and virile purpose stamped upon the work of the little band at the outset by its leader, Professor Hess, was there, but also somewhat more of finish. The chief lack is still euphony, that charm which ought to belong to music which, because of its nature, is prevented from enjoying the adventitious aid of varied instrumental color. A string quartet ought always to give us music like that suggested by Milton in his description of the opening of the gates of heaven: "Harmonious sound, on golden hinges moving." Yesterday's concert brought forth a novelty which did not seem particularly impressive—a quartet in B flat by Josef Suk, of the Bohemian Quartet, and son-in-law of the lamented Dr. Dvorak, who ought to have lived longer to impress upon his intimate disciples his own devotion to the beautiful. The other numbers were the posthumous quartet allegro by Schubert and Cesar Franck's pianoforte quintet in F minor, in which the pianoforte was intelligently, tastefully and affectionately played by Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, of Boston.

[63]

m Harlem Local HARLEM LOC
ress NEW YORK CIT
NOV 1 0 19
e

The most important musical events of the coming week will be the first appearance here of Camille Saint-Saens, the great French composer and pianist, and Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, late from the Royal Opera in Berlin. M. Saint-Saens will play three of his own compositions for piano and orchestra, the "Africa" Fantasie, an Allegro Appassionato, and a caprice, "Wedding Cake," at the first pair of concerts of the New York Symphony. The orchestral numbers will be: George Schumann's overture "The Springtime of Love," Saint-Saen's "Omphale," and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

* * *

m HARLEM Local dress NEW YORK CIT
te

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra has achieved an emphatic success in Boston, and at his concert in this city Thursday night. His program for to-day's concert is: Brahms' Symphony No. 1, the overtures to "Oberon" and "Der Freischutz" by Weber, and Strauss' great symphonic poem "Don Juan."

m NEW YORK SUN
dress
te NOV 1 0 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Its First Concert Introduces a New Work by Suk.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave the first concert of its present season in Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon. The programme consisted of Josef Suk's B flat major quartet, opus 11; Schubert's quartet movement in C minor, and César Franck's piano quintet in F minor. The assisting pianist was Heinrich Gebhard of Boston. The concert, regarded in its entirety, was not an entertainment to be remembered with unmixed delight, though it was filled with manifestations of artistic intention and careful preparation.

Josef Suk is the leader of the famous Bohemian Quartet, which wisely enjoys its European reputation and does not come to America. He has one excellent quality, namely, that he does not try to write like Brahms. This is one of the things that altogether too many composers attempt in these days. Suk prefers to try to compose after the manner of his admired master, Antonin Dvorak, and this also is not easy to do.

The quartet heard yesterday is rich in suggestions of Bohemian nationality but poor in almost everything else that goes to make chamber music of lasting value. Its best movement is the second, an intermezzo, that later substitute for the classic scherzo. This is written judiciously for the four instruments and is cheerful and ingratiating in style. The other three movements are laboriously constructed and in spite of some tuneful thematic matter are, in plain language, dull.

The playing of Prof. Willy Hess and his three associates has not altered in any material trait. It is still vigorous, warmly colored and ambitious, but it still shows the same tendency to wander from the pitch. Prof. Hess is the leader of the quartet in this as well as in other respects.

EW YORK WORLD
s
NOV 10

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET HEARD AGAIN.

Players Show Marked Improvement Over Last Season—Programme Contains Novelty.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave the first of this season's string concerts yesterday afternoon at Mendelssohn Hall. The quartet is composed of Prof. Willy Hess, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Emile Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, 'cello.

This ensemble is the same as it was last year, but the work of the quartet yesterday showed a marked improvement in the playing. There was not so much impetuousness or corresponding roughness, and at times the playing was delightful.

The programme contained a novelty—a quartet by Joseph Suk—which was played here for the first time. It proved to be an interesting work with charmingly second and third movements. It is full of emotional moments, and its final movement is full of dash and swing.

The next number was a posthumous quartet movement by Schubert, which showed the work of the quartet to the best advantage. The programme concluded with Cesar Frank's quintet, the piano part of which was played by Heinrich Gebhard.

m NEW YORK TIM
ress NOV 10 190
e

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

It Begins Its Third New York Season with a Concert in Mendelssohn Hall.

The Boston Symphony Quartet began its third season in New York yesterday afternoon. The personnel of the quartet remains as it was last season; with Prof. Willy Hess are Messrs. Otto Roth, Emile Férir, and Heinrich Warnke, all leading players of their respective instruments in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and hence all admirable players. They have devoted hard work to perfecting their playing together in quartet—for a string quartet party is not made by the immediate assemblage of four players, however excellent. And New York music lovers have had the opportunity to observe the progress they have made toward finish and euphony. There was occasion yesterday to observe it, for their playing showed more of those qualities than it has in the past.

The programme consisted of a new string quartet by Josef Suk, the single movement in C minor from a quartet that Schubert projected, but never carried further, and César Franck's pianoforte quintet, in which M. Heinrich Gebhard of Boston played the pianoforte part. Suk's quartet is an agreeable though scarcely an important addition to the list of modern works in this form. It is, as is natural in the work of a composer who is also a quartet player, well made, well put together for the four instruments, and the part writing is fluent and effective. As is likewise natural in a composer who is the son-in-law of Antonin Dvorak, it shows some of the traits of that master's music; some of the melodic turns, some of the harmonic devices. Yet it may be that the influence is more Bohemian than personal, and that Mr. Suk drew the spirit of his mournful first movement and some of his rhythmic fancies that appear in the march movement, the intermezzo, and elsewhere, from the circumambient Bohemian atmosphere. But the work lacks distinction and individuality.

César Franck's quintet had not been heard here for several years. And repeated hearing of it does not enforce the lesson of the supreme greatness that Franck's admirers find in it—they who would put it by the side of Beethoven's greatest chamber music in originality and loftiness of conception. That there are passages of profound beauty in it, of mystical elevation, of fine and strongly original harmonic color, is true. But the work as a whole contains much that is dry and even labored; tedious elaboration and reworking of arid thematic material, sometimes at wearisome length. For the noble and strongly appealing passages in which the quintet abounds the listener has to pay by stretches of dullness. The quintet was played with devotion and enthusiasm by Prof. Hess and his comrades, and to the whole Mr. Gebhard contributed artistically and with a spirit that matched that of the others.

NEW YORK HERALD
ess
NOV 1 0 190

BOSTON QUARTET'S FIRST CONCERT

An Enjoyable Musical Matinee Given in Mendelssohn Hall by Symphony Players.

SOMETHING NEW PROVIDED

Joseph Suks' Quartet, a Novelty to the Local Concert Room, Proves an Interesting Number.

At its first chamber music concert of the season in Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Quartet played in a manner deserving of high praise. Professor Willy Hess and his associates have apparently reached a better mutual understanding even than last year. They play with more unanimity and with far greater freedom than ever before, and their tone is generally well balanced and often of delightfully mellow quality.

An interesting quartet by Joseph Suk, new to the local concert room, emphasized this advance toward perfect chamber music ensemble. In its own right this composition proved well worth a hearing. Its melodies are fresh and graceful, their development is ingenious, and the contrasting qualities of tone of the four instruments are skilfully combined.

With Mr. Heinrich Gebhard at the piano, Cesar Frank's sombre quintet in F minor was given, the pianist contributing praiseworthy playing to the ensemble except when he rather overdid his share of things at times. Schubert's posthumous "Quartet Satz," in C minor for strings, was played between the Suk and Frank numbers.

m CITIZEN
dress Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 10 19

A good deal of curiosity has been expressed as to Dr. Karl Muck's opinion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra all the more since he has been conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, admittedly the finest in Europe. Dr. Muck does not talk much and never deals in comparisons, but in a conversation with a visitor from New York a short time ago, he said: "Of course I knew I was coming to a splendid orchestra, but I really had no idea what the Boston Symphony really is. Its wind choirs are the most beautiful, and the strings—I have never heard such strings in all my life."

m Standard Union
dress Brooklyn, N. Y.
te NOV 10 1906

Brooklyn's brilliant reception to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, new to us, last evening, like other events in consecrated places, points the moral and adorns the tale for secular and worldly matters. To be more specific, the incident emphasizes the necessity for an Academy of Music, and for an immediate response to the appeal, to-day, to close up the matter, that the work may proceed. That Brooklyn has a constituency which will generously sustain entertainments of a really high order in music was demonstrated last night, and if there were material from which similar opportunity might be given for drama, the lesson would be inevitably repeated. Moreover, the business side of the proposition offered by the Academy is thoroughly sound. It stands neither to reason nor experience that men whose fortunes are based on real estate values in the borough of their own homes are for the first time in their lives to make a mistake, and to lose either their own money or that of their associates in speculation. In other words, the demonstration on either side, artistic and financial, is complete, and instead of waiting for others, it behooves every intelligently selfish citizen to act for himself and promptly.

m NEW YORK EV'G POST
dress
te NOV 10 1906

Two Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Quartet, consisting of Messrs. Hess, Roth, Férir, and Warnke, gave a concert yesterday afternoon at Mendelssohn Hall. The work of this organization has heretofore been somewhat rough, dry, and too frequently untuneful. There was considerable improvement in these respects yesterday, but it was not ideal playing yet. Rome was not built in a day. The novelty of the occasion was a quartet by Suk, the thematic material of which proved to be too commonplace to make it worthy of detailed consideration.

At Carnegie Hall, in the evening, Miss Edna Richolson gave a concert with the aid of Mr. Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra. The programme included two concertos—Chopin's in F minor and Liszt's in E flat. Miss Richolson differs from most of the young ladies who attempt to play the piano and who think they must excel masculine players in power and virility. She falls into the opposite extreme. Her playing, while smooth and polished and pretty, was too dainty and soft for so large a hall, and therefore missed its effect.

ess EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 10 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

First Concert in Its Brooklyn Season at Baptist Temple.

Last night the best orchestra in the world was in Brooklyn, and it is consoling to know that Brooklyn appreciated the boon. The Baptist Temple, our substitute for an Academy of Music, was full of people and enthusiasm, and Dr. Karl Muck, the new director of the Boston Symphonists, received a welcome that would have astonished him had he known of our local reputation for coldness, for the whole audience arose on his entrance, and it testified liberally to its appreciation of his work. He is worthy of the post, hence it is hoped that a long sojourn in this country has been arranged for him, and when Brooklyn has its orchestra of ninety, let us hope it will be led by as good a man.

Dr. Muck is scholarly, but not pedantic; imperative but not careless; he is dignified, quiet, but he has a firm grasp on his theme and its interpreters; none the less firm when it is not exhibited, for in the "Meistersinger" overture he made little use of the baton, letting the orchestra go its gait, as Seidl would do at times, and disclosing the more clearly its wonderful drill. Warmer blood runs through Dr. Muck's veins than through Mr. Gericke's. A few times last night we missed the exquisite polish and academic smoothness of Mr. Gericke's readings, as we missed unity of bowing in the strings, but it was more than amends that the musicians had free range, that the wind choirs were full voiced, the flutes brilliant, the oboes appealing, the brass majestic, the drums stirring, and the color, especially in such gorgeous tone fabrics as the "Meistersinger," resplendent.

The Doctor is of distinguished presence, clear cut, resolute, thoughtful of face, simple in bearing and gesture, and he commends himself to an American audience by an avoidance of the spectacular; indeed, it takes hardihood, in these days, to make an exhibition of one's self before people who are instructed. He chose for Brooklyn a familiar yet delightful programme: Brahms' first symphony, the "Oberon" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the "Meistersinger" overture, or prelude if one insists, or vorspiel if one insists yet more. The symphony is more or less familiar to this public, for it has been played here at intervals for the past 25 or 30 years, and how the curls on the big wigs shook at first hearing. This was different, therefore it would never do. But it has kept on being done, and now it is listened to with such resignation or delight as training and temperament may direct. It lacks form, if we accept Haydn and Mozart as models; it lacks the laborious and scholastic counterpoint; it purposely lacks clearness of melodic expression, for Brahms guards against the expected in the development of his melodies, and therein makes himself a constant surprise and refreshment; its free fantasia is very free, and its endings are without that manufactured and pumpy repetition of the tonic and dominant which is characteristic of so much in music, and that has its type in Rossini endings, and things of that sort. But withal, the Brahms symphony is big in feeling and meaning; it is nearly Beethovenesque at times in its expression, and as played last night in a large, sweeping fashion, with massive effects of strings, it must have won even those who affect to hear in Brahms only a note of that bitter modernity that finds other utterance in homiletic, industrial and political pessimism. The brass was especially full in the choral motive, and the work had a stronger groundwork than Mr. Gericke would have given to it in that there was a full emphasis on the bass—as full as the diminished numbers of the orchestra could give, because the church platform is too small for all the players, and a dozen or twenty of the musicians never come to Brooklyn.

Delightful as was the symphony, the perfect distinctness of Weber in the "Oberon" overture, the concessions to almost sensuous beauty, the luscious instrumentation and the graceful melody were not unwelcome. There is room in the tone garden for lilies as well as for roses and chrysanthemums. And a wonderful thing is this same "Oberon" vorspiel, when one considers that it was written by a man who sat in the shadow of death. The abounding life and even gayety of its later measures, and the tranquil spirit breathed from its fairy horns, bespeak health of body and soul.

The "Siegfried Idyl" revealed the training of Dr. Muck in the Wagnerian schools, yet it was all grace and tenderness; the birds trilled in it, and we heard again the murmur of the waldweben, we dreamed of the singing fire on the mountain top, and the sun arose in fairyland. The "Master Singers" as Dr. Muck views them are a burly, hearty company and their pompous, good natured march and sounding choral were fitting end to the programme—a programme, by the by, that was a bit too short. At least it seems impossible that any one who really loves music, as the whole company made an excellent pretense of doing last night, would have objected to another number. The second concert of the series will occur on December 7.

[64]

m Harlem Local ...I LOC

ress ...NEW YORK CIT...

e

The most important musical events of the coming week will be the first appearance here of Camille Saint-Saens, the great French composer and pianist, and Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, late from the Royal Opera in Berlin. M. Saint-Saens will play three of his own compositions for piano and orchestra, the "Africa" Fantasie, an Allegro Appassionato, and a caprice, "Wedding Cake," at the first pair of concerts of the New York Symphony. The orchestral numbers will be: George Schumann's overture "The Springtime of Love," Saint-Saen's "Omphale," and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

* * *

m

ress ...RA CIT...

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra has achieved an emphatic success in Boston, and at his concert in this city Thursday night. His program for to-day's concert is: Brahms' Symphony No. 1, the overtures to "Oberon" and "Der Freischutz" by Weber, and Strauss' great symphonic poem "Don Juan."

m

ress

te

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Its First Concert Introduces a New Work by Suk.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave the first concert of its present season in Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon. The programme consisted of Josef Suk's B flat major quartet, opus 11; Schubert's quartet movement in C minor, and César Franck's piano quintet in F minor The assisting pianist was Heinrich Gebhard of Boston. The concert, regarded in its entirety, was not an entertainment to be remembered with unmixed delight, though it was filled with manifestations of artistic intention and careful preparation.

Josef Suk is the leader of the famous Bohemian Quartet, which wisely enjoys its European reputation and does not come to America. He has one excellent quality, namely, that he does not try to write like Brahms. This is one of the things that altogether too many composers attempt in these days. Suk prefers to try to compose after the manner of his admired master, Antonin Dvorak, and this also is not easy to do.

The quartet heard yesterday is rich in suggestions of Bohemian nationality but poor in almost everything else that goes to make chamber music of lasting value. Its best movement is the second, an intermezzo, that later substitute for the classic scherzo. This is written judiciously for the four instruments and is cheerful and ingratiating in style. The other three movements are laboriously constructed and in spite of some tuneful thematic matter are, in plain language, dull.

The playing of Prof. Willy Hess and his three associates has not altered in any material trait. It is still vigorous, warmly colored and ambitious, but it still shows the same tendency to wander from the pitch. Prof. Hess is the leader of the quartet in this as well as in other respects.

...EW YORK VITAL...

...s

...NOV 10...

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET HEARD AGAIN.

Players Show Marked Improvement Over Last Season—Programme Contains Novelty.

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave the first of this season's string concerts yesterday afternoon at Mendelssohn Hall. The quartet is composed of Prof. Willy Hess, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Emile Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, 'cello.

This ensemble is the same as it was last year, but the work of the quartet yesterday showed a marked improvement in the playing. There was not so much impetuousness or corresponding roughness, and at times the playing was delightful.

The programme contained a novelty—a quartet by Joseph Suk—which was played here for the first time. It proved to be an interesting work with charming second and third movements. It is full of emotional moments, and its final movement is full of dash and swing.

The next number was a posthumous quartet movement by Schubert, which showed the work of the quartet to the best advantage. The programme concluded with Cesar Frank's quintet, the piano part of which was played by Heinrich Gebhard.

m

ress

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

It Begins Its Third New York Season with a Concert in Mendelssohn Hall.

The Boston Symphony Quartet began its third season in New York yesterday afternoon. The personnel of the quartet remains as it was last season; with Prof. Willy Hess are Messrs. Otto Roth, Emile Férir, and Heinrich Warnke, all leading players of their respective instruments in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and hence all admirable players. They have devoted hard work to perfecting their playing together in quartet—for a string quartet party is not made by the immediate assemblage of four players, however excellent. And New York music lovers have had the opportunity to observe the progress they have made toward finish and euphony. There was occasion yesterday to observe it, for their playing showed more of those qualities than it has in the past.

The programme consisted of a new string quartet by Josef Suk, the single movement in C minor from a quartet that Schubert projected, but never carried further, and Césa Franck's pianoforte quintet, in which M. Heinrich Gebhard of Boston played the pianoforte part. Suk's quartet is an agreeable though scarcely an important addition to the list of modern works in this form. It is, as is natural in the work of a composer who is also a quartet player, well made, well put together for the four instruments, and the part writing is fluent and effective. As is likewise natural in a composer who is the son-in-law of Antonin Dvorak, it shows some of the traits of that master's music; some of the melodic turns, some of the harmonic devices. Yet it may be that the influence is more Bohemian than personal, and that Mr. Suk drew the spirit of his mournful first movement and some of his rhythmic fancies that appear in the march movement, the intermezzo, and elsewhere, from the circumambient Bohemian atmosphere. But the work lacks distinction and individuality.

César Franck's quintet had not been heard here for several years. And repeated hearing of it does not enforce the lesson of the supreme greatness that Franck's admirers find in it—they who would put it by the side of Beethoven's greatest chamber music in originality and loftiness of conception. That there are passages of profound beauty in it, of mystical elevation, of fine and strongly original harmonic color, is true But the work as a whole contains much that is dry and even labored; tedious elaboration and reworking of arid thematic material, sometimes at wearisome length. For the noble and strongly appealing passages in which the quintet abounds the listener has to pay by stretches of dullness. The quintet was played with devotion and enthusiasm by Prof. Hess and his comrades, and to the whole Mr. Gebhard contributed artistically and with a spirit that matched that of the others.

...ess

BOSTON QUARTET'S FIRST CONCERT

An Enjoyable Musical Matinee Given in Mendelssohn Hall by Symphony Players.

SOMETHING NEW PROVIDED

Joseph Suks' Quartet, a Novelty to the Local Concert Room, Proves an Interesting Number.

At its first chamber music concert of the season in Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Quartet played in a manner deserving of high praise. Professor Willy Hess and his associates have apparently reached a better mutual understanding even than last year. They play with more unanimity and with far greater freedom than ever before, and their tone is generally well balanced and often of delightfully mellow quality.

An interesting quartet by Joseph Suk, new to the local concert room, emphasized this advance toward perfect chamber music ensemble. In its own right this composition proved well worth a hearing. Its melodies are fresh and graceful, their development is ingenious, and the contrasting qualities of tone of the four instruments are skilfully combined.

With Mr. Heinrich Gebhard at the piano, Cesar Frank's sombre quintet in F minor was given, the pianist contributing praiseworthy playing to the ensemble except when he rather overdid his share of things at times. Schubert's posthumous "Quartet Satz," in C minor for strings, was played between the Suk and Frank numbers.

m ...CITIZEN

ress ...ooklyn, N. Y.

...N 10 19

A good deal of curiosity has been expressed as to Dr. Karl Muck's opinion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra all the more since he has been conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, admittedly the finest in Europe. Dr. Muck does not talk much and never deals in comparisons, but in a conversation with a visitor from New York a short time ago, he said: "Of course I knew I was coming to a splendid orchestra, but I really had no idea what the Boston Symphony really is. Its wind choirs are the most beautiful, and the strings—I have never heard such strings in all my life."

...m Standard Union

dress ...Brooklyn, N. Y.

te

NOV 10 1906

Brooklyn's brilliant reception to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, new to us, last evening, like other events in consecrated places, points the moral and adorns the tale for secular and worldly matters. To be more specific, the incident emphasizes the necessity for an Academy of Music, and for an immediate response to the appeal, to-day, to close up the matter, that the work may proceed. That Brooklyn has a constituency which will generously sustain entertainments of a really high order in music was demonstrated last night, and if there were material from which similar opportunity might be given for drama, the lesson would be inevitably repeated Moreover, the business side of the proposition offered by the Academy is thoroughly sound. It stands neither to reason nor experience that men whose fortunes are based on real estate values in the borough of their own homes are for the first time in their lives to make a mistake, and to lose either their own money or that of their associates in speculation. In other words, the demonstration on either side, artistic and financial, is complete, and instead of waiting for others, it behooves every intelligently selfish citizen to act for himself and promptly.

m NEW YORK EV'G POST

ress

te NOV 10 1906

Two Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Quartet, consisting of Messrs. Hess, Roth, Férir, and Warnke, gave a concert yesterday afternoon at Mendelssohn Hall. The work of this organization has heretofore been somewhat rough, dry, and too frequently untuneful. There was considerable improvement in these respects yesterday, but it was not ideal playing yet. Rome was not built in a day. The novelty of the occasion was a quartet by Suk, the thematic material of which proved to be too commonplace to make it worthy of detailed consideration.

At Carnegie Hall, in the evening, Miss Edna Richolson gave a concert with the aid of Mr. Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra. The programme included two concertos—Chopin's in F minor and Liszt's in E flat. Miss Richolson differs from most of the young ladies who attempt to play the piano and who think they must excel masculine players in power and virility. She falls into the opposite extreme. Her playing, while smooth and polished and pretty, was too dainty and soft for so large a hall, and therefore missed its effect.

ess ...EAGLE

...Brooklyn, N. Y.

...NOV 10 1906

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

First Concert in Its Brooklyn Season at Baptist Temple.

Last night the best orchestra in the world was in Brooklyn, and it is consoling to know that Brooklyn appreciated the boon. The Baptist Temple, our substitute for an Academy of Music, was full of people and enthusiasm, and Dr. Karl Muck, the new director of the Boston Symphonists, received a welcome that would have astonished him had he known of our local reputation for coldness, for the whole audience arose on his entrance, and it testified liberally to its appreciation of his work. He is worthy of the post, hence it is hoped that a long sojourn in this country has been arranged for him, and when Brooklyn has its orchestra of ninety, let us hope it will be led by as good a man.

Dr. Muck is scholarly, but not pedantic; imperative but not careless; he is dignified, quiet, but he has a firm grasp on his theme and its interpreters; none the less firm when it is not exhibited, for in the "Meistersinger" overture he made little use of the baton, letting the orchestra go its gait, as Seidl would do at times, and disclosing the more clearly its wonderful drill. Warmer blood runs through Dr. Muck's veins than through Mr. Gericke's. A few times last night we missed the exquisite polish and academic smoothness of Mr. Gericke's readings, as we missed unity of bowing in the strings, but it was more than amends that the musicians had free range, that the wind choirs were full voiced, the flutes brilliant, the oboes appealing, the brass majestic, the drums stirring, and the color, especially in such gorgeous tone fabrics as the "Meistersinger," resplendent.

The Doctor is of distinguished presence, clear cut, resolute, thoughtful of face simple in bearing and gesture, and he commends himself to an American audience by an avoidance of the spectacular; indeed, it takes hardihood, in these days, to make an exhibition of one's self before people who are instructed. He chose for Brooklyn a familiar yet delightful programme: Brahms' first symphony, the "Oberon" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the "Meistersinger" overture, or prelude if one insists, or vorspiel if one insists yet more. The symphony is more or less familiar to this public, for it has been played here at intervals for the past 25 or 30 years, and how the curls on the big wigs shook at first hearing. This was different, therefore it would never do. But it has kept on being done, and now it is listened to with such resignation or delight as training and temperament may direct. It lacks form, if we accept Haydn and Mozart as models; it lacks the laborious and scholastic counterpoint; it purposely lacks clearness of melodic expression, for Brahms guards against the expected in the development of his melodies, and therein makes himself a constant surprise and refreshment; its free fantasia is very free, and its endings are without that manufactured and pumpy repetition of the tonic and dominant which is characteristic of so much in music, and that has its type in Rossini endings, and things of that sort. But withal, the Brahms symphony is big in feeling and meaning; it is nearly Beethovenesque at times in its expression, and as played last night in a large, sweeping fashion, with massive effects of strings, it must have won even those who affect to hear in Brahms only a note of that bitter modernity that finds other utterance in homiletic, industrial and political pessimism. The brass was especially full in the choral motive, and the work had a stronger groundwork than Mr. Gericke would have given to it in that there was a full emphasis on the bass—as full as the diminished numbers of the orchestra could give, because the church platform is too small for all the players, and a dozen or twenty of the musicians never come to Brooklyn.

Delightful as was the symphony, the perfect distinctness of Weber in the "Oberon" overture, the concessions to almost sensuous beauty, the luscious instrumentation and the graceful melody were not unwelcome. There is room in the tone garden for lilies as well as for roses and chrysanthemums. And a wonderful thing is this same "Oberon" vorspiel, when one considers that it was written by a man who sat in the shadow of death. The abounding life and even gayety of its later measures, and the tranquil spirit breathed from its fairy horns, bespeak health of body and soul.

The "Siegfried Idyl" revealed the training of Dr. Muck in the Wagnerian schools, yet it was all grace and tenderness; the birds trilled in it, and we heard again the murmur of the waldweben, we dreamed of the singing fire on the mountain top, and the sun arose in fairyland. The "Master Singers" as Dr. Muck views them are a burly, hearty company and their pompous, good natured march and sounding choral were fitting end to the programme—a programme, by the by, that was a bit too short. At least it seems impossible that any one who really loves music, as the whole company made an excellent pretense of doing last night, would have objected to another number. The second concert of the series will occur on December 7.

[64]

Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 10 1906

The first in the series of Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at the Baptist Temple last evening, and without a soloist, the star of the occasion being Dr. Muck, the new conductor, a koenigliche und kaiserliche hofkapelmeister lent to Boston and America as a token of good will on the part of Wilhelm II. The music, the personnel of the orchestra, were probably familiar to every one in the vast audience. Only the conductor was strange. And it was the conductor who was discussed between times and after and before the concert, allegro animato, not without dissonance, but resolving upon a majestic hymn of praise (finale, tempo di marcia vivace), as the house emptied. It has been truly said that in the hands of a tyro the best of Strads will sound like a cheap fiddle. On the other hand Paganini was able to get music out of a wooden shoe strung like a violin. What is true of the single instrument is true of the mass, and it will certainly be granted that the Boston players represent the best Cremonese type, from all of which it was plain that there was justification for the interest which centred in Muck. He is quite different from his predecessor. It may be observed in a tentative way that he represents a happy medium between such men as Nikisch and Weingartner as opposed to Gericke and Paur. Perhaps, when he has become habituated to his new place, the resemblance to the first two will be more striking, for while he gave the Brahms Symphony in a purely conventional way, he displayed greater freedom during the remainder of the evening. The Boston players have become accustomed to a style of conducting in which a gentle but deprecating left hand, calling for repression of tone, has always seemed to say, "Sh! gentlemen, be careful or you'll wake the——"; but while Dr. Muck knows as well as the next man how to obtain delicate effects he likewise seeks contrasts. In the middle of the "Oberon" overture a pianissimo passage in the strings is succeeded by the crash of a massive orchestral chord, and that chord came with a force which must have caused a shock in Symphony Hall. In the prelude to "Meistersinger" there was the splendid quality of big tone from the brasses which has never been heard at these concerts in recent years, and Dr. Muck paid his men the compliment of allowing them to play the greater part without direction other than the occasional signal of entrance to a group of instruments, reserving the use of the baton for changes or complications in the tempo only. In this number, as in the "Siegfried Idyl," which came before, the new conductor proved that he had not wasted his time in Bayreuth. Only Seidl, and, in a lesser degree, Mottl, have shown such insight into and sympathy for the music of Wagner. In appearance the new conductor is as far as possible from the conventional type of German musician. He is tall, slender, smoothly shaven, with rather closely cropped black hair. Decidedly of nervous temperament, he has himself as well as his men under excellent control, and while every cue is given accurately, he prefers to obtain results with the least possible display of Delsarte exercise. Of what Dr. Muck may accomplish for the Boston Symphony orchestra the future must determine, but while he remains in his present place metronome conducting will be relegated to the background. That much, at least, is assured.

ICHABOD.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
DEUTSCHE
NEW YORK CITY
NOV 11 1906

Die dritte große Sensation der Saison waren die beiden Concerte der Bostoner unter ihrem neuen Dirigenten Dr. Carl Muck am Donnerstag Abend und Samstag Nachmittag.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 10 1906

MUSICAL.

Dr. Muck, New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Makes Good Impression at First Concert.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple, introduced the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and the occasion gave much satisfaction to an audience that filled the big auditorium. When the new conductor appeared on the platform there was a greeting of applause, and the audience stood until Mr. Muck was in his place on the conductor's stand, ready to open the concert. As there was no soloist for this concert that measure of public attention which is absorbed in the contemplation of the purely personal element of a concert, went out to the new conductor, and his personality, methods and style as a conductor, claimed a large share of attention. And these qualities contributing to his status as a conductor, proved worthy of all the attention given them, and gave back to the listener and observer a gratifying fullness in value.

There was no element of novelty about last night's programme, but there was sufficient diversity to fairly indicate Mr. Muck's characteristics as a leader. Brahms' Symphony No. 1, in C minor, which opened the concert, is less familiar than the three shorter pieces comprised in the programme, Weber's overture to "Oberon;" Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl," and the same composer's prelude or overture to "Die Meistersinger." But there is not in the Brahms Symphony the quality of music that would tempt one to long for a familiar intimacy with it. It betrays no warmth of emotional loveliness, and is little more than an exudence of cold classicism. Some exception to this may be made in favor of the last movement, which works out into a really fine exposition of tonal richness and contrasts. In this movement Mr. Muck gave his first impressive intimation of profound insight, and the executive insistence to realize with the orchestra his individual conceptions.

The three other pieces made no exact demands upon the conductor, although they gave opportunity to show forth certain aspects of his well-poised and authoritative art as an orchestral leader. Dr. Muck is a tall man of slender physique, and what may be called a self-controlled embodiment of the nervous temperament. There is a calmness in his method which suggests the repose of a broad outlook, and his conducting, while never personally obtrusive or charged with peculiarity of mannerism, is subtly probing in its insistence upon desired effects, and is not lacking in vehement emphasis when this seems really necessary. The concert made it plain that Dr. Muck is a conductor of really masterly attainments, and high ideals in living sympathy with the broadest outlook. This latter trait was indicated especially in the "Die Meistersinger" overture, in which he gave the orchestra a very free hand, not conducting at all in the familiar forte passages, leaving the players to give forth a very full volume of tone and harmonic richness. There can be no question that Dr. Muck made a very favorable impression which may be expected to stimulate special interest in the future undertakings of the orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
THE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NEW YORK CITY
NOV 11 1906

DR. MUCK AGAIN AT CARNEGIE HALL

German Conductor Leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Its Second New York Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

The programme opened with a brilliant rendering of Brahms' First Symphony, a composition of great depth and power.

Brahms, it is true, has a tendency to be academic and severe, yet his compositions are illuminated by flashes and outbursts of deep poetic feeling.

Dr. Muck's handling of this fine work was brilliant and forceful, and due tribute must be paid to the strings for the rounded strength and clear resonance that distinguished them, particularly in the first movement.

The Weber selections were played with finish and taste, but we have learned to expect music of a kind different to this at the concerts of the Boston Symphony concerts. One of them would not have been unwelcome, but two amounted to an overindulgence in music that is somewhat old-fashioned. Strauss' "Don Juan" was cleverly played, but it lacks in real emotion. There was no soloist. Dr. Muck was most warmly greeted.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 10 1906

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Karl Muck and Boston Orchestra Receive Warm Welcome at the Baptist Temple.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Karl Muck as its conductor, succeeding Dr. Gericke, inaugurated the Brooklyn series of Symphony concerts last evening at the Baptist Temple. A representative and fashionable audience filled the church to the limit of its capacity, and took as a matter of course the inconveniences that were at first only tolerated as makeshifts when Brooklyn was left without an Academy of Music.

Most of the regular subscribers were in the same seats as last winter.

When Herr Muck appeared, the audience rose to greet him. Beyond this there was no signal demonstration, except the applause which the Boston orchestra is wont to receive, a little more enthusiastic than usual, perhaps because the selections were familiar Wagner excerpts.

As for the new conductor, he is tall and dignified, younger in appearance than his forty-seven years would indicate, and without mannerisms. He is not the stolid leader that Gericke was, and betrayed fire and animation when the measure would express them.

The programme arranged for this concert had only one unfamiliar number—the Symphony, which was Brahms' No. 1, in C minor, op. 68. It is just twenty years this month since this remarkable work of Brahms had its first production in Munich, with the composer conducting. Great musicians have ranked it with Beethoven's most celebrated symphonies, and indeed, less able critics see some resemblances to that composer's works. To the average listener its first, second and third movements are not very interesting unless in point of composition, but the last movement is imposing, with its climaxes and tone pictures, and beautiful as to theme. It was rendered with the consummate skill and finish for which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is renowned.

Indeed, the rendering of the entire programme last evening declared anew the perfection of the orchestra, which Herr Muck has come to conduct, but which seems hardly to need any conductor; for it can "play itself."

Much of the time in the rendering of the "Siegfried Idyl," by Wagner, the conductor did not raise his baton.

The "Oberon" overture, by Weber, followed the Symphony, and the programme was concluded with the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

SUNDAY HERALD
NOVEMBER 11, 1906.

MUCK AS LEADER, SANE AND THRILLING

Boston Symphony Orchestra Repeats Its Success in New York.

[Special Dispatch to the Sunday Herald.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 10, 1906. Dr. Karl Muck was again subjected to the test of a critical New York audience in Carnegie Hall this afternoon, when he conducted the first matinee this season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. His success was emphatic.

On today's programme Brahms' first symphony was played under the new leadership in a manner at once sane and thrilling. So far as this country is concerned he may be said with this performance to have brought Brahms into his own. The introduction to the last movement, especially, was superb, and the entire movement was one of those rare examples of true musical exposition—the intellectual and the emotional splendidly balanced.

While the same is true of the Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" tone poem, the Weber overtures to "Oberon" and "Der Freischutz," though well played, were less happily chosen. Brilliant in their day and marking the passing of the classical era into the romantic, they seem in this year of grace rather trivial for an orchestra of the calibre of these Boston players.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The programme of the first concert of the Longy Club (wind instruments) in Potter Hall on Wednesday night will be as follows: Quintet in E major on French folk tunes, Woolett; Handel's varied air, Weber's minuetto, and four small pieces by Grieg; three pieces by Bach, Schumann and Godard for oboe and piano (Messrs. Longy and De Voto); octet by Beethoven.

The programme of the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall on Saturday evening will be as follows: Weber's overture to "Oberon," Chopin's piano concerto in E minor (Mme. Szumowska), Sinding's symphony No. 1 in D minor.

NEW YORK TIMES.
NOV 11 1906

DR. MUCK AGAIN LEADS THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Great Enthusiasm Over the Playing of Brahms's First Symphony.

ORCHESTRA MADE TO BOW

Large Audience Listens to Strauss's "Don Juan" and Weber's "Oberon" and "Freischutz" Overtures.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on its present visit to New York, given yesterday afternoon, was heard by quite as large an audience as Carnegie Hall would hold. The occasion was one of uncommon enthusiasm, and Dr. Muck was greeted again with many demonstrations of pleasure, which had their climax after the performance of Brahms's first symphony. He was then several times called out upon the platform and finally made the whole orchestra rise and bow. His programme was in one way curious; it was curious that he should play on the same afternoon two overtures by Weber so similar in their plan and substance as those to "Oberon" and to "Der Freischütz"—both full of the "Weber fleurish," both provided with the carefully prepared pause, followed by a crashing chord and a brilliant rushing passage. But as for the performance, it deepened and strengthened the confidence in Dr. Muck as a conductor of strong musical gifts and high technical acquirement.

It was an altogether noble and beautiful performance of Brahms's symphony and thoroughly deserving of the prolonged outburst of enthusiasm it caused. It was one that brought out every detail, every touch of color, every contrasting phrase and point of imitation in the work; one that composed all its parts in their proper relation, and that built up the symmetrical and nobly proportioned whole. It was quickened with imagination and touched everywhere with life and enthusiasm.

So magnificent and altogether imposing a climax as he secured in the last movement is most rarely to be heard in a symphonic performance. Dr. Muck took all the tempos elastically, and filled every phrase with pregnant significance. He found the true spirit for each movement—gloomy passion and resolution, large-molded heroism, elegiac beauty and sweetness. So should this symphony be played, and so played it is a confutation of those who have thought it "labored, crabbed, cryptic, dull, unintelligible." And is not the time-honored myth of the badness, muddiness, and dullness of Brahms's instrumentation demolished by a performance such as this? Felix Weingartner, in a recent essay, declared that it should be the task of conductors to set forth the real beauty of Brahms's orchestral fabric by a deep and loving study which shall present it as he really intended it, as he imagined it. It has not the easy brilliancy of the modern instrumental composer, which every conservatory teaches; but it is a deeper beauty and a richer, sometimes recondite, easily obscured to insufficient understanding. Dr. Muck has sought it with love and intelligence; and the performance of yesterday afternoon raised this instrumental beauty to its highest power.

The other number of the programme—again one without a soloist—was Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," one of his earlier works in this form, coming before he had committed himself to photographic realism in music, and when he still thought more of musical beauty and musical effects than of pictorial. It is a prodigiously talented piece, and indorses the germs of all he has since developed in thematic ingenuities and instrumental bravura. But its themes are distinguished, its instrumental color is gorgeous, and the whole has a certain superb and swaggering mastery that imposes itself upon the listener. It was played with dazzling brilliancy and irresistible energy; and here again the careful exposition of the thematic structure, even in all the welter of sound, contributed greatly to the impression made.

Dr. Muck's reading of the two Weber overtures was equally brilliant. He has clearly helped himself to some of Wagner's suggestions for the performance of the "Freischütz" overture, but without driving them to an extreme.

[65]

Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 10 1906

The first in the series of Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at the Baptist Temple last evening, and without a soloist, the star of the occasion being Dr. Muck, the new conductor, a koenigliche und kaiserliche hofkapelmeister lent to Boston and America as a token of good will on the part of Wilhelm II. The music, the personnel of the orchestra, were probably familiar to every one in the vast audience. Only the conductor was strange. And it was the conductor who was discussed between times and after and before the concert, allegro animato, not without dissonance, but resolving upon a majestic hymn of praise (finale, tempo di marcia vivace), as the house emptied. It has been truly said that in the hands of a tyro the best of Strads will sound like a cheap fiddle. On the other hand Paganini was able to get music out of a wooden shoe strung like a violin. What is true of the single instrument is true of the mass, and it will certainly be granted that the Boston players represent the best Cremonese type, from all of which it was plain that there was justification for the interest which centred in Muck. He is quite different from his predecessor. It may be observed in a tentative way that he represents a happy medium between such men as Nikisch and Weingartner as opposed to Gericke and Paur. Perhaps, when he has become habituated to his new place, the resemblance to the first two will be more striking, for while he gave the Brahms Symphony in a purely conventional way, he displayed greater freedom during the remainder of the evening. The Boston players have become accustomed to a style of conducting in which a gentle but deprecating left hand, calling for repression of tone, has always seemed to say, "Sh! gentlemen, be careful or you'll wake the—"; but while Dr. Muck knows as well as the next man how to obtain delicate effects he likewise seeks contrasts. In the middle of the "Oberon" overture a pianissimo passage in the strings is succeeded by the crash of a massive orchestral chord, and that chord came with a force which must have caused a shock in Symphony Hall. In the prelude to "Meistersinger" there was the splendid quality of big tone from the brasses which has never been heard at these concerts in recent years, and Dr. Muck paid his men the compliment of allowing them to play the greater part without direction other than the occasional signal of entrance to a group of instruments, reserving the use of the baton for changes or complications in the tempo only. In this number, as in the "Siegfried Idyl," which came before, the new conductor proved that he had not wasted his time in Bayreuth. Only Seidl, and, in a lesser degree, Mottl, have shown such insight into and sympathy for the music of Wagner. In appearance the new conductor is as far as possible from the conventional type of German musician. He is tall, slender, smoothly shaven, with rather closely cropped black hair. Decidedly of nervous temperament, he has himself as well as his men under excellent control, and while every cue is given accurately, he prefers to obtain results with the least possible display of Delsarte exercise. Of what Dr. Muck may accomplish for the Boston Symphony orchestra the future must determine, but while he remains in his present place metronome conducting will be relegated to the background. That much, at least, is assured.

ICHABOD.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau ... the World
NEW YORK CITY
1906

Die dritte große Sensation der Saison waren die beiden Concerte der Bostoner unter ihrem neuen Dirigenten Dr. Carl Muck am Donnerstag Abend und Samstag Nachmittag.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES
NOV 10 1906

MUSICAL.

Dr. Muck, New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Makes Good Impression at First Concert.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple, introduced the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, and the occasion gave much satisfaction to an audience that filled the big auditorium. When the new conductor appeared on the platform there was a greeting of applause, and the audience stood until Mr. Muck was in his place on the conductor's stand, ready to open the concert. As there was no soloist for this concert that measure of public attention which is absorbed in the contemplation of the purely personal element of a concert, went out to the new conductor, and his personality, methods and style as a conductor, claimed a large share of attention. And these qualities contributing to his status as a conductor, proved worthy of all the attention given them, and gave back to the listener and observer a gratifying fullness in value.

There was no element of novelty about last night's programme, but there was sufficient diversity to fairly indicate Mr. Muck's characteristics as a leader. Brahms' Symphony No. 1, in C minor, which opened the concert, is less familiar than the three shorter pieces comprised in the programme, Weber's overture to "Oberon;" Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl," and the same composer's prelude or overture to "Die Meistersinger." But there is not in the Brahms Symphony the quality of music that would tempt one to long for a familiar intimacy with it. It betrays no warmth of emotional loveliness, and is little more than an exudence of cold classicism. Some exception to this may be made in favor of the last movement, which works out into a really fine exposition of tonal richness and contrasts. In this movement Mr. Muck gave his first impressive intimation of profound insight, and the executive insistence to realize with the orchestra his individual conceptions.

The three other pieces made no exact demands upon the conductor, although they gave opportunity to show forth certain aspects of his well-poised and authoritative art as an orchestral leader. Dr. Muck is a tall man of slender physique, and what may be called a self-controlled embodiment of the nervous temperament. There is a calmness in his method which suggests the repose of a broad outlook, and his conducting, while never personally obtrusive or charged with peculiarity of mannerism, is subtly probing in its insistence upon desired effects, and is not lacking in vehement emphasis when this seems really necessary. The concert made it plain that Dr. Muck is a conductor of really masterly attainments, and high ideals in living sympathy with the broadest outlook. This latter trait was indicated especially in the "Die Meistersinger" overture, in which he gave the orchestra a very free hand, not conducting at all in the familiar forte passages, leaving the players to give forth a very full volume of tone and harmonic richness. There can be no question that Dr. Muck made a very favorable impression which may be expected to stimulate special interest in the future undertakings of the orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK CITY
NOV 11 1906

DR. MUCK AGAIN AT CARNEGIE HALL

German Conductor Leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Its Second New York Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

The programme opened with a brilliant rendering of Brahms' First Symphony, a composition of great depth and power.

Brahms, it is true, has a tendency to be academic and severe, yet his compositions are illuminated by flashes and outbursts of deep poetic feeling.

Dr. Muck's handling of this fine work was brilliant and forceful, and due tribute must be paid to the strings for the rounded strength and clear resonance that distinguished them, particularly in the first movement.

The Weber selections were played with finish and taste, but we have learned to expect music of a kind different to this at the concerts of the Boston Symphony concerts. One of them would not have been unwelcome, but two amounted to an overindulgence in music that is somewhat old-fashioned.

Strauss' "Don Juan" was cleverly played, but it lacks in real emotion. There was no soloist. Dr. Muck was most warmly greeted.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
CITIZEN.
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 10 1906

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Karl Muck and Boston Orchestra Receive Warm Welcome at the Baptist Temple.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Karl Muck as its conductor, succeeding Dr. Gericke, inaugurated the Brooklyn series of Symphony concerts last evening at the Baptist Temple. A representative and fashionable audience filled the church to the limit of its capacity, and took as a matter of course the inconveniences that were at first only tolerated as makeshifts when Brooklyn was left without an Academy of Music.

Most of the regular subscribers were in the same seats as last winter.

When Herr Muck appeared, the audience rose to greet him. Beyond this there was no signal demonstration, except the applause which the Boston orchestra is wont to receive, a little more enthusiastic than usual, perhaps because the selections were familiar Wagner excerpts.

As for the new conductor, he is tall and dignified, younger in appearance than his forty-seven years would indicate, and without mannerisms. He is not the stolid leader that Gericke was, and betrayed fire and animation when the measure would express them.

The programme arranged for this concert had only one unfamiliar number—the Symphony, which was Brahms' No. 1, in C minor, op. 68. It is just twenty years this month since this remarkable work of Brahms had its first production in Munich, with the composer conducting. Great musicians have ranked it with Beethoven's most celebrated symphonies, and indeed, less able critics see some resemblances to that composer's works. To the average listener its first, second and third movements are not very interesting unless in point of composition, but the last movement is imposing, with its climaxes and tone pictures, and beautiful as to theme. It was rendered with the consummate skill and finish for which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is renowned.

Indeed, the rendering of the entire programme last evening declared anew the perfection of the orchestra, which Herr Muck has come to conduct, but which seems hardly to need any conductor; for it can "play itself."

Much of the time in the rendering of the "Siegfried Idyl," by Wagner, the conductor did not raise his baton.

The "Oberon" overture, by Weber, followed the Symphony, and the programme was concluded with the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

SUNDAY HERALD NOVEMBER 11, 1906.

MUCK AS LEADER, SANE AND THRILLING

Boston Symphony Orchestra Repeats Its Success in New York.

[Special Dispatch to the Sunday Herald.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 10, 1906. Dr. Karl Muck was again subjected to the test of a critical New York audience in Carnegie Hall this afternoon, when he conducted the first matinee this season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. His success was emphatic.

On today's programme Brahms' first symphony was played under the new leadership in a manner at once sane and thrilling. So far as this country is concerned he may be said with this performance to have brought Brahms into his own. The introduction to the last movement, especially, was superb, and the entire movement was one of those rare examples of true musical exposition —the intellectual and the emotional splendidly balanced.

While the same is true of the Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" tone poem, the Weber overtures to "Oberon" and "Der Freischutz," though well played, were less happily chosen. Brilliant in their day and marking the passing of the classical era into the romantic, they seem in this year of grace rather trivial for an orchestra of the calibre of these Boston players.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The programme of the first concert of the Longy Club (wind instruments) in Potter Hall on Wednesday night will be as follows: Quintet in E major on French folk tunes, Woolett; Handel's varied air, Weber's minuetto, and four small pieces by Grieg; three pieces by Bach, Schumann and Godard for oboe and piano (Messrs. Longy and De Voto); octet by Beethoven.

The programme of the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall on Saturday evening will be as follows: Weber's overture to "Oberon," Chopin's piano concerto in E minor (Mme. Szumowska), Sinding's symphony No. 1 in D minor.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau
NEW YORK TIMES.
NOV 11 1906

DR. MUCK AGAIN LEADS THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Great Enthusiasm Over the Playing of Brahms's First Symphony.

ORCHESTRA MADE TO BOW

Large Audience Listens to Strauss's "Don Juan" and Weber's "Oberon" and "Freischultz" Overtures.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on its present visit to New York, given yesterday afternoon, was heard by quite as large an audience as Carnegie Hall would hold. The occasion was one of uncommon enthusiasm, and Dr. Muck was greeted again with many demonstrations of pleasure, which had their climax after the performance of Brahms's first symphony. He was then several times called out upon the platform and finally made the whole orchestra rise and bow. His programme was in one way curious; it was curious that he should play on the same afternoon two overtures by Weber so similar in their plan and substance as those to "Oberon" and to "Der Freischütz"—both full of the "Weber flourish," both provided with the carefully prepared pause, followed by a crashing chord and a brilliant rushing passage. But as for the performance, it deepened and strengthened the confidence in Dr. Muck as a conductor of strong musical gifts and high technical acquirement.

It was an altogether noble and beautiful performance of Brahms's symphony and thoroughly deserving of the prolonged outburst of enthusiasm it caused. It was one that brought out every detail, every touch of color, every contrasting phrase and point of imitation in the work; one that composed all its parts in their proper relation, and that built up the symmetrical and nobly proportioned whole. It was quickened with imagination and touched everywhere with life and enthusiasm.

So magnificent and altogether imposing a climax as he secured in the last movement is most rarely to be heard in a symphonic performance. Dr. Muck took all the tempos elastically, and filled every phrase with pregnant significance. He found the true spirit for each movement—gloomy passion and resolution, large-molded heroism, elegiac beauty and sweetness. So should this symphony be played, and so played it is a confutation of those who have thought it "labored, crabbed, cryptic, dull, unintelligible." And is not the time-honored myth of the badness, muddiness, and dullness of Brahms's instrumentation demolished by a performance such as this? Felix Weingartner, in a recent essay, declared that it should be the task of conductors to set forth the real beauty of Brahms's orchestral fabric by a deep and loving study which shall present it as he really intended it, as he imagined it. It has not the easy brilliancy of the modern instrumental composer, which every conservatory teaches; but it is a deeper beauty and a richer, sometimes recondite, easily obscured to insufficient understanding. Dr. Muck has sought it with love and intelligence; and the performance of yesterday afternoon raised this instrumental beauty to its highest power.

The other number of the programme—again one without a soloist—was Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," one of his earlier works in this form, coming before he had committed himself to photographic realism in music, and when he still thought more of musical beauty and musical effects than of pictorial. It is a prodigiously talented piece, and indorses the germs of all he has since developed in thematic ingenuities and instrumental bravura. But its themes are distinguished, its instrumental color is gorgeous, and the whole has a certain superb and swaggering mastery that imposes itself upon the listener. It was played with dazzling brilliancy and irresistible energy; and here again the careful exposition of the thematic structure, even in all the welter of sound, contributed greatly to the impression made.

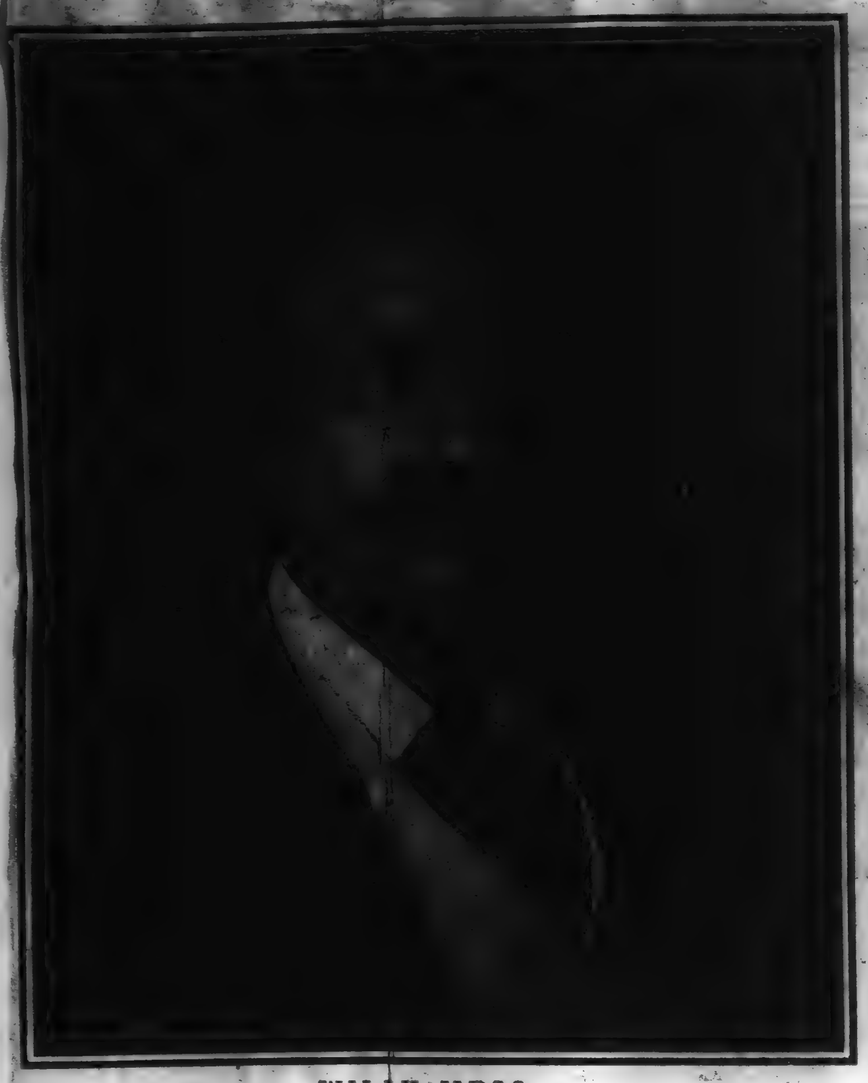
Dr. Muck's reading of the two Weber overtures was equally brilliant. He has clearly helped himself to some of Wagner's suggestions for the performance of the "Freischütz" overture, but without driving them to an extreme.

[65]

The New York Times, November 11-06 Sunday,

AMONG THE MUSICIAN

Well-known artists who will be heard in New York this season.



WILLY HESS
Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
(Photo by Garo.)

MME. OLGA SAMAROFF.
Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
(Photo by McIntosh.)

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
REVUE
NEW YORK CH
NOV 1 1 1906

Das Boston Symphonie Quartett bestehend aus den Herren Heß, Roth, Perr und Warnke gab Freitag unter Mitwirkung des Pianisten Herrn Heinrich Gebhard seinen dritten Kammermusik-Nachmittag in Mendelssohn Hall ab. Die Novität, ein Streichquartett von Josef Suk, gemahnte mit seiner gesunden Natürlichkeit an Schubert. Ein fröhlicher Zug weht durch das ganze Werk, mit Ausnahme des schwermüthigen dritten Satzes. Dabei ist es vorzüglich gearbeitet und stellenweise von origineller Klangwirkung. Das gerade Gegentheil ist das Quintett von Franck, welches Herrn Gebhard Gelegenheit gab, sich als feinfühliger Kammermusikspieler zu zeigen. Trotz poetischer Einzelheiten und manchem guten Anlauf wirkt das Werk doch auf die Dauer durch seine ewige gleichmäßige Homophonie, sowie durch das beständige Vernehmen natürlicher Harmonieen ermüdend. Zwischen beiden Werken stand ein Schubert'sches Fragment, ein wunderboller Quartettsatz in C-moll, dessen schwermüthige Stimmung an die Winterreise des Meisters erinnert. Es verdient, öfters gehört zu werden.

Die Ausführung der drei Werke war eine sehr angemessene.

m NEW YORK SUN
ress NOV 11 1906

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

BRAHMS'S C MINOR HEARD AT BOTH OF THEM.

Dr. Muck and the Bostonians Play It in the Afternoon, While Mr. Damrosch and the New Yorkers Give It at Night—Other Music and Mme. Schumann-Heink

By one of those unfortunate coincidences which are altogether too common in the programmes of orchestral concerts the first symphony of Johannes Brahms was performed in Carnegie Hall twice yesterday. In the afternoon it was the cornerstone of the matinée concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Carl Muck, and in the evening Walter Damrosch led the New York Symphony Orchestra through its splendid measures. This juxtaposition of readings allures to comparisons, but the temptation shall here be resisted.

The first matinée of the gentlemen from Boston, despite the fact that there was no instrumental or vocal virtuoso to incite to hero worship, was attended by a notable audience, which judiciously vented its enthusiasm on the new conductor. Dr. Muck made a stronger impression than he did on Thursday night. He seemed to feel surer of himself and his hearers. He had learned the temper of New York music lovers and he reached out after emotions, which had to meet him more than half way at the evening concert.

What will be the probable change in the style of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under him was indicated in the Brahms symphony. There was nothing startling in Dr. Muck's reading. Tempi and nuances were those established by the clear indications of the score. But where under Mr. Gericke all was subdued and exquisitely polished under Dr. Muck some of the Ciceronian nicety was swept away. The new conductor even permitted his men in one or two places to slip from that military precision of attack and that machine like unanimity which were inseparable from every performance under the inexorable bâton of his predecessor.

These were but momentary failings, however, and for the most part the orchestra maintained its traditions of finish. But in muscularity, incisiveness, brilliancy and power it far outshone anything it has done in recent seasons. The performance of the magnificent last movement of the symphony was one of the most eloquent ever given in this city. It was inspiring to hear. The audience felt the inspiration of the performance and rewarded the conductor with six recalls. These recalls really meant something, for conductors, unlike pianists, do not play encore numbers.

The other compositions on the programme were Weber's "Oberon" overture, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" and Weber's "Der Freischütz" overture. It was a formidable test for the music of Weber, but none the less triumphantly. The florid, old overtures stood their ground handsomely in the presence of the polyphizing of the arch realist of Munich. It seems that Weber was really a composer of talent. The Strauss music was superbly played yesterday. Dr. Muck conducted it con amore, for he and Strauss are associates in artistic labor.

If the first two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were fairly prophetic of what is to come, we shall probably have less perfection of tonal smoothness, more elegance and repose in performance and less conservatism in idea. In their stead we may expect more boldness, more color, more of the golden thunders of the trombone, more of the cymbal's martial clang. In short, the hand that was shod in kid has given way to bared fingers, with polished skin indeed, but with sinews of steel underneath.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK HERALD
ss
NOV 11 1906

DR. MUCK GIVEN GREAT APPLAUSE

He Is Called Out so Often That He Makes Boston Orchestra Rise and Share Tribute.

LED BRAHMS AND STRAUSS

Audience Most Enthusiastic After Former's Symphony and the Tone Poem on Latter's "Don Juan."

Dr. Karl Muck was again subjected to the test of a critical New York audience in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon when he conducted the first matinee this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His success was emphatic.

What a difference between this man's appearance and what he accomplishes! Slight, rather angular, in fact suggesting the schoolmaster rather than the leader of men as he comes on, the moment he takes up the baton angularity and awkwardness vanish. He poises the thin white wand with wonderful grace, uses his left hand with a quiet eloquence of gesture that seems to speak to his players—and he has his orchestra on the tip of his baton.

On yesterday's programme Brahms' first symphony was played under the new leadership in a manner at once sane and thrilling. So far as this country is concerned he may be said with this performance to have brought Brahms into his own. The introduction to the last movement, especially, was superb, and the entire movement was one of those rare examples of true musical exposition—the intellectual and the emotional splendidly balanced.

While the same is true of the Richard Strauss "Don Juan" tone poem, the Weber overtures to "Oberon" and "Der Freischütz," though well played, were less happily chosen. Brilliant in their day and marking the passing of the classical era into the romantic, they seem in this year of grace rather trivial for an orchestra of the calibre of these Boston players.

The audience evidently felt this. Its applause was most enthusiastic after the symphony and the tone poem. In fact the conductor was called out so often after the symphony that he made the orchestra rise and acknowledge the applause with him.

m SUN
ress BALTIMORE, MD.
NOV
e

DR. MUCK GREAT LEADER

New Directory Of The Boston Orchestra Well Received.

MR. SIPSER TO GIVE CONCERT

Kneisel Quartet At Peabody Friday—Bach Choir To Continue—Cæsar Thomson Coming.

The concert Wednesday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of its new leader, Dr. Karl Muck, who has been granted leave of absence by the German Emperor to direct that organization, was doubtless one of the most brilliant musical events that ever took place in Baltimore. Seldom, indeed, has the city been the scene of a symphony concert witnessed by such a throng where the interest was so unflagging throughout the program and where the applause was so hearty and sincere. Dr. Muck made himself a favorite with the audience with the first few swings of his baton — sufficient to convince his auditors that he is a thorough musician—while his subsequent work only endeared him in the affections of those who love music for music's worth and who find in it the true depth of that which is refined, edifying and beautiful.

MR. PHILIP SIPSER

His reading of the Wagner numbers was thorough in every detail. Few conductors, perhaps, have made a greater study of that master's works than has Dr. Muck. He is enabled to direct with full confidence that what he is doing, to the best of his convictions, is being done right. It is no exaggeration to say that hundreds in the audience left at the conclusion of the concert, anxiously anticipating the reappearance here next month of the same great organization and its brilliant conductor.

NEW YORK WORLD
ess NOV 11 1906

MADE HIS ORCHESTRA BOW TO AUDIENCE

Dr. Muck Insisted on Players Sharing Honors at Boston Symphony Concert.

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the soloist at yesterday's matinee concert of the orchestra at Carnegie Hall. It was a brave move on the part of the management to omit a soloist at their concerts, for even the matinee concert audiences are thoroughly spoiled by the star system, but Karl Muck proved to be a star of the very first magnitude, and he attracted an enormous crowd to see him and to hear the incomparable Boston Orchestra.

This was the second time that this conductor has appeared in New York, and he emphasized the opinion that he is not a sentimentalist, but is an artist of the very highest order. He does not pose for his audience nor for his orchestra. Every move has its artistic meaning and its musical purpose. He is not extravagant of gesture but he achieves enormous results from his men and correspondingly great appreciation from his audiences.

Muck's reading of the Brahms first symphony was nothing short of an inspired interpretation. This long and erudite composition has had numberless dry readings which seem to have found excuse under the plea that this work is heavy and necessarily dull. Muck proved yesterday that it is an exceptionally interesting work when played interestingly, and that rich red blood courses through its veins.

The next notable achievement of the afternoon was the performance of Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," which was given a stunningly effective reading and a remarkably lucid one. Weber's "Oberon" overture was well played and the same composer's "Freischuetz" overture was taken with unusual breadth and with jubilant swing.

The entire affair was a musical delight of rare interest, and the audience called the conductor out numerous times. Dr. Muck thanked his players and bade them rise and accept the public's applause standing. The work of the orchestra was exceptionally good save some slips in the horns and trumpets. The strings glowed with warmth of tone, and the playing of the wood wind choir was well nigh impeccable.

The New York Times, November 11-06 Sunday,

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK CLIPPING BUREAU

NOV 11 1906

AMONG THE MUSICIAN

Well-known artists who will be heard in New York this season.

WILLY HESS
Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
(Photo by Garo.)

MME. OLGA SAMAROFF,
Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
(Photo by McIntosh.)

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK HERALD

NOV 11 1906

DR. MUCK GIVEN GREAT APPLAUSE

He Is Called Out so Often That He Makes Boston Orchestra Rise and Share Tribute.

LED BRAHMS AND STRAUSS

Audience Most Enthusiastic After Former's Symphony and the Tone Poem on Latter's "Don Juan."

Dr. Karl Muck was again subjected to the test of a critical New York audience in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon when he conducted the first matinee this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His success was emphatic.

What a difference between this man's appearance and what he accomplishes! Slight, rather angular, in fact suggesting the schoolmaster rather than the leader of men as he comes on, the moment he takes up the baton angularity and awkwardness vanish. He poises the thin white wand with wonderful grace, uses his left hand with a quiet eloquence of gesture that seems to speak to his players—and he has his orchestra on the tip of his baton.

On yesterday's programme Brahms' first symphony was played under the new leadership in a manner at once sane and thrilling. So far as this country is concerned he may be said with this performance to have brought Brahms into his own. The introduction to the last movement, especialy, was superb, and the entire movement was one of those rare examples of true musical exposition—the intellectual and the emotional splendidly balanced.

While the same is true of the Richard Strauss "Don Juan" tone poem, the Weber overtures to "Oberon" and "Der Freischütz," though well played, were less happily chosen. Brilliant in their day and marking the passing of the classical era into the romantic, they seem in this year of grace rather trivial for an orchestra of the calibre of these Boston players.

The audience evidently felt this. Its applause was most enthusiastic after the symphony and the tone poem. In fact the conductor was called out so often after the symphony that he made the orchestra rise and acknowledge the applause with him.

m

ress

e

DR. MUCK GREAT LEADER

New Directory Of The Boston Orchestra Well Received.

MR. SIPSER TO GIVE CONCERT

Kneisel Quartet At Peabody Friday—Bach Choir To Continue—Cæsar Thomson Coming.

The concert Wednesday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of its new leader, Dr. Karl Muck, who has been granted leave of absence by the German Emperor to direct that organization, was doubtless one of the most brilliant musical events that ever took place in Baltimore. Seldom, indeed, has the city been the scene of a symphony concert witnessed by such a throng where the interest was so unflagging throughout the program and where the applause was so hearty and sincere. Dr. Muck made himself a favorite with the audience with the first few swings of his baton — sufficient to convince his auditors that he is a thorough musician—while his subsequent work only endeared him in the affections of those who love music for music's worth and who find in it the true depth of that which is refined, edifying and beautiful.

MR. PHILIP SIPSER

His reading of the Wagner numbers was thorough in every detail. Few conductors, perhaps, have made a greater study of that master's works than has Dr. Muck. He is enabled to direct with full confidence that what he is doing, to the best of his convictions, is being done right. It is no exaggeration to say that hundreds in the audience left at the conclusion of the concert, anxiously anticipating the reappearance here next month of the same great organization and its brilliant conductor.

ess

NOV 11 1906

MADE HIS ORCHESTRA BOW TO AUDIENCE

Dr. Muck Insisted on Players Sharing Honors at Boston Symphony Concert.

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the soloist at yesterday's matinee concert of the orchestra at Carnegie Hall. It was a brave move on the part of the management to omit a soloist at their concerts, for even the matinee concert audiences are thoroughly spoiled by the star system, but Karl Muck proved to be a star of the very first magnitude, and he attracted an enormous crowd to see him and to hear the incomparable Boston Orchestra.

This was the second time that this conductor has appeared in New York, and he emphasized the opinion that he is not a sentimentalist, but is an artist of the very highest order. He does not pose for his audience nor for his orchestra. Every move has its artistic meaning and its musical purpose. He is not extraavagant of gestured but he achieves enormous results from his men and correspondingly great appreciation from his audiences.

Muck's reading of the Brahms first symphony was nothing short of an inspired interpretation. This long and erudite composition has had numberless dry readings which seem to have found excuse under the plea that this work is heavy and necessarily dull. Muck proved yesterday that it is an exceptionally interesting work when played interestingly, and that rich red blood courses throough its veins.

The next notable achievement of the afternoon was the performance of Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," which was given a stunningly effective reading and a remarkably lucid one. Weber's "Oberon" overture was well played and the same composer's "Freischuetz" overture was taken with unusual breadth and with jubilant swing.

The entire affair was a musical delight of rare interest, and the audience called the conductor out numerous times. Dr. Muck thanked his players and bade them rise and accept the public's applause standing. The work of the orchestra was exceptionally good save some slips in the horns and trumpets. The strings glowed with warmth of tone, and the playing of the wood wind choir was well nigh impeccable.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK CLIPPING BUREAU

NOV 11 1906

Das Boston Symphonie Quartett bestehend aus den Herren Heß, Roth, Perir und Warnke hielt Freitag unter Mitwirkung des Pianisten Herrn Heinrich Gebhard seinen ersten Kammermusik = Nachmittag in Mendelssohn Hall ab. Die Novität, ein Streichquartett von Josef Suk, gemahnt mit seiner gesunden Natürlichkeit an Schubert. Ein fröhlicher Zug weht durch das ganze Werk, mit Ausnahme des schwermüthigen dritten Satzes. Dabei ist es vorzüglich gearbeitet und stellenweise von origineller Klangwirkung. Das gerade Gegentheil ist das Quintett von Franck, welches Herrn Gebhard Gelegenheit gab, sich als feinfühliger Kammermusikspieler zu zeigen. Trotz poetischer Einzelheiten und manchem guten Anlauf wirkt das Werk doch auf die Dauer durch seine ewige gleichmäßige Homophonie, sowie durch das beständige Vernehmen natürlicher Harmonieen ermüdend. Zwischen beiden Werken stand ein Schubert'sches Fragment, ein wundervoller Quartettsatz in C=moll, dessen schwermüthige Stimmung an die Winterreise des Meisters erinnert. Es verdient, öfters gehört zu werden.

Die Ausführung der drei Werke war eine sehr angemessene.

* * *

m

ress

NEW YORK CL

NOV 11 1906

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

BRAHMS'S C MINOR HEARD AT BOTH OF THEM.

Dr. Muck and the Bostonians Play It in the Afternoon, While Mr. Damrosch and the New Yorkers Give It at Night—Other Music and Mme. Schumann-Heink

By one of those unfortunate coincidences which are altogether too common in the programmes of orchestral concerts the first symphony of Johannes Brahms was performed in Carnegie Hall twice yesterday. In the afternoon it was the cornerstone of the matinée concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Carl Muck, and in the evening Walter Damrosch led the New York Symphony Orchestra through its splendid measures. This juxtaposition of readings allures to comparisons, but the temptation shall here be resisted.

The first matinée of the gentlemen from Boston, despite the fact that there was no instrumental or vocal virtuoso to incite to hero worship, was attended by a notable audience, which judiciously vented its enthusiasm on the new conductor. Dr. Muck made a stronger impression than he did on Thursday night. He seemed to feel surer of himself and his hearers. He had learned the temper of New York music lovers and he reached out after emotions, which had to meet him more than half way at the evening concert.

What will be the probable change in the style of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under him was indicated in the Brahms symphony. There was nothing startling in Dr. Muck's reading. Tempi and nuances were those established by the clear indications of the score. But where under Mr. Gericke all was subdued and exquisitely polished under Dr. Muck some of the Ciceronian nicety was swept away. The new conductor even permitted his men in one or two places to slip from that military precision of attack and that machine like unanimity which were inseparable from every performance under the inexorable baton of his predecessor.

These were but momentary failings, however, and for the most part the orchestra maintained its traditions of finish. But in muscularity, incisiveness, brilliancy and power it far outshone anything it has done in recent seasons. The performance of the magnificent last movement of the symphony was one of the most eloquent ever given in this city. It was inspiring to hear. The audience felt the inspiration of the performance and rewarded the conductor with six recalls. These recalls really meant something, for conductors, unlike pianists, do not play encore numbers.

The other compositions on the programme were Weber's "Oberon" overture, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" and Weber's "Der Freischütz" overture. It was a formidable test for the music of Weber, but none the less triumphant. The florid, old overtures stood their own handsomely in the presence of the philosophizing of the arch realist of Munich. It seems that Weber was really a composer of talent. The Strauss music was superbly played yesterday. Dr. Muck conducted it con amore, for he and Strauss are associates in artistic labor.

If the first two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were fairly prophetic of what is to come, we shall probably have less perfection of tonal smoothness, less elegance and repose in performance and less conservatism in idea. In their places we may expect more boldness, more spirit, more of the golden thunders of the trumpet, more of the cymbal's martial clang. In short, the hand that was shod in kid has given way to bared fingers, with polished skin indeed, but with sinews of steel underneath.

[66]

ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

AMONG THE MUSICIAN

Well-known artists who will be heard in New York this season.

WILLY HESS
Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
(Photo by Garo.)

MME. OLGA SAMAROFF,
Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
(Photo by McIntosh.)

ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss

DR. MUCK GIVEN GREAT APPLAUSE

He [illegible] Orchestra [illegible]
Music [illegible] Orchestra Hall
[illegible] Night.

LED [illegible] AND STRAUSS

Audience [illegible] After Leader's Scores [illegible] Tone Poems
[illegible]

n

ress

e

DR. MUCK GREAT LEADER

New Directory Of The Boston Orchestra Well Received.

MR. SIPSER TO GIVE CONCERT

Kneisel Quartet At Peabody Friday—Bach Choir To Continue—Cæsar Thomson Coming.

The concert Wednesday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of its new leader, Dr. Karl Muck, who has been granted leave of absence by the German Emperor to direct that organization, was doubtless one of the most brilliant musical events that ever took place in Baltimore. Seldom, indeed, has the city been the scene of a symphony concert witnessed by such a throng where the interest was so unflagging throughout the program and where the applause was so hearty and sincere. Dr. Muck made himself a favorite with the audience with the first few swings of his baton — sufficient to convince his auditors that he is a thorough musician — while his subsequent work only endeared him in the affections of those who love music for music's worth and who find in it the true depth of that which is refined, edifying and beautiful.

MR. PHILIP SIPSER

His reading of the Wagner numbers was thorough in every detail. Few conductors, perhaps, have made a greater study of that master's works than has Dr. Muck. He is enabled to direct with full confidence that what he is doing, to the best of his convictions, is being done right. It is no exaggeration to say that hundreds in the audience left at the conclusion of the concert, anxiously anticipating the reappearance here next month of the same great organization and its brilliant conductor.

Interested In Mr. Sipser

[66]

ess

MADE HIS ORCHESTRA BOW TO AUDIENCE

Dr. Muck Insisted on Players Sharing Honors at Boston Symphony Concert.

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the soloist at yesterday's matinée concert of the orchestra at Carnegie Hall. It was a brave person who ventured to [illegible] at what a cheer at their [illegible] and [illegible] covered by [illegible] a state of [illegible] manner, [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] appeared in New York [illegible] the opinion that [illegible] [illegible] Mr. Muck [illegible] nor for [illegible] [illegible] purpose. He [illegible] results from [illegible] Mr. Muck's reading of the Brahms Symphony and the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

N. Y. TRIBUNE
rom
ddress
NOV 11 1906

MUSIC.

TWO ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its first visit for the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, and the New York Symphony Orchestra gave its second evening concert at the same place in the evening. Two concerts of orchestral music of the highest order in a single day, symbolized by the performance at each of Brahms's last symphony! The circumstance might amply serve as a text for critical discourse to a considerable extent; yet there was another added to it which is not uninteresting in view of the prospect of the bewildering richness presented by the season before the serious music lovers of New York. At the afternoon concert there was no solo performer, unless the conductor might be looked upon as such. Considering the extraordinary interest manifested by the public in the concerts of Thursday evening and yesterday, this seems clearly to be the case. In the evening there was an extremely popular singer to lend glamour to the occasion. Dr. Muck sufficed for the afternoon, and his achievement in the symphony was such as to obliterate all thought of a solo performer. He and his orchestra were one, and this one was an interpreter of the thoughts of the creator, Brahms. There was an audience of superb appearance in the afternoon, which filled the vast music room; there was an audience less than three-quarters the size in the evening, which gave out only conventional approval to offset the excited enthusiasm which filled the afternoon listeners. Yet it was Mme. Schumann-Heink who invoked the plaudits of the evening listeners. There was no departure from old custom in her participation in the concert, nor was there in her choice of pieces. Like the familiar figure at all the symphony concerts she sang an air which she has sung before, and which indeed she has made her battle horse. Not since the lamentable death of Mme. Fursch-Madi have we had a concert singer of the large and dramatic manner whose repertory has extended beyond the tiny list which she and her colleagues have made tiresomely hackneyed. Being a contralto, Mme. Schumann-Heink spares us the familiar arias from "Tannhäuser," "Freischütz," "Oberon" and "Fidelio"; but in lieu she offers us only the second of Vitellia's scenes from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito"—that beginning "Ecco il punto." After this last night she sang Schubert's "Erlkönig" and "Der Tod und das Mädchen," with orchestral accompaniment, arranged respectively by Berlioz and Mottl; but, no matter how these masterpieces be tricked out, they belong to the recital room not in the symphony hall, and, although Mr. Walter Damrosch and his fine orchestra deserved much better of the public than they received yesterday, there was yet satisfaction for the lovers of symmetry, consistency and dignity in musical entertainments in the contemplation of the fact that the staider and more austere of yesterday's schemes met with the greater popular approval.

It was a day of generous offerings, yet the dominant note of enjoyment was that elicited by the Brahms symphony in the afternoon. Dr. Muck had made a fine impression on Thursday evening, but it was one that left open occasions for discussion in the minds of the judicious. His Beethoven symphony was a highly gratifying performance—lucid, organically well knit, eloquent, and, on the whole, reverential and proper—in respect of style; his Brahms symphony was—if one wishes to use a hackneyed phrase—a revelation. Not of the splendid prowess of the Boston musicians; that we knew. Neither of the superb and aspiring beauty of the composition itself, for that has held the recognition of the world for decades in spite of the nibbling of the critical mice who think it too austere and learned to be sensuously alluring and emotionally compelling. It was a revelation of what a master mind could do to give new interest to utterances that had become too familiar to hold always the sublimated attention of which they are worthy. Here was dignity; here heaven-kissing loveliness; here the sweep of a prophetic vision; here an emotionalized intellectuality which held faculties and senses in thrall; here a continuity, consistency and eloquence of proclamation which not only held one to the thread of the discourse, but made one eager to follow it, as Theseus was to follow the saving strand of Ariadne. Such a climax as that which Dr. Muck worked up in the last moment, with deliberation that spoke of affectionate regard for each progressive detail, was never before heard by our public, familiar with many fine performances. It was both ear-filling and soul-satisfying, and made one regret that the concert could not end then and there. Truly, what followed was an anticlimax, particularly so because of the phenomenal performance, though it would have been under ordinary circumstances. A singular programme: after the Brahms symphony, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" sandwiched between two Weber overtures—"Oberon" and "Freischütz." Ordinarily it is possible to imagine the reasons of a conductor in compiling a programme; this time no explanation could be thought of which was worthy of the man and the occasion. Nor did it help that the overtures were brilliantly played (though that to "Der Freischütz" was obsessed by the sluggish demon that has chosen it for his own since the so-called Wagnerian ideas achieved authority) and the Strauss work had its compelling charm enhanced by a marvellously lucid exposition of its contents. Logical sequence and development were [illegible] when this scheme was put together.

NEW YORK STAATS-ZEITUNG
NOV 11 19

Zwei Symphonie-Konzerte.

Das war gestern ein kritischer Tag erster Ordnung für den Musik-Kritiker, der doch auch ein Mensch ist, sozusagen. Ein Symphonie-Konzert birgt viel des Schönen und Guten, zwei Symphonie-Konzerte an einem Tage bedeuten aber des Guten entschieden schon zu viel, und das war gestern der Fall. Nachmittags Carnegie Hall, Abends Carnegie Hall, zuerst Dr. Muck mit den Bostonern, dann Walter Damrosch mit dem New Yorker Symphonie-Konzert, und auf beiden Programmen bildete die Pièce de Résistance die erste Symphonie von Brahms, also schwere Kost. Brahms hüben und Brahms drüben. Es giebt Thierschutzvereine, weshalb keinen Kritiker-Schutzverein.

Dr. Muck hat durch seine gestrige Wiedergabe der Brahms'schen C-Moll-Symphonie den vortrefflichen Eindruck, den er anläßlich seines Debuts hervorgerufen hatte, gewaltig erhöht. Es wäre deshalb voreilig, zu behaupten, daß er Brahms besser dirigirt, als Beethoven, aber sicher ist es, daß das Beethoven'sche Tongemälde "per aspera ad astra" (die fünfte Symphonie) ihm weniger gut „liegt", als das Brahms'sche Seitenstück zu dieser Idee. Er dirigirte das gewaltige Werk des großen Epigonen mit einer Fülle von Empfindung und meisterhafter Gestaltungskraft. Dr. Muck hat gestern gezeigt, daß er aus seiner selbstauferlegten Reserve auch heraustreten kann; er wurde ordentlich warm und brachte herrliche Wirkungen zu Wege. Es war eine großzügige Darstellung und feine künstlerische Abtönung im Einzelnen. Wie klar und durchsichtig er aus den vier im ersten Satz nach einander wie widerwillig auftretenden Motiven das Hauptthema bildete. Innig, mit bezauberndem Klangreiz kam das andante sostenuto des zweiten Satzes heraus, es war wirklich eine musica sacra. Mit bezwingender Anmuth und reizvoller Mannigfaltigkeit brachte er den dritten Satz, um im Finale nach dem deprimirenden Pessimismus in eine bithyrambische Jubelhymne auszuklingen. Das war alles sicher und mit den einfachsten Mitteln durchgeführt.

Das Bostoner Orchester hat sich gestern wieder einmal selbst übertroffen. Es sang die lyrischen Lichtpunkte mit dem ihm eigenen Tonzauber und edlen Verve. Die Instrumentalgruppen vereinigten sich zu einem einheitlichen Ganzen, dem der Charakter absoluter Vornehmheit stets gewahrt blieb. Das Zwiegespräch zwischen Horn und Klarinette im ersten Satz, die süße Melodie im zweiten, Horn mit Violine und Horn allein (wobei die Solovioline von Herrn Willy Heß meisterlich gespielt wurde), die Hornmelodie im Andante des Finales — um nur einige Details herauszugreifen — klangen wie Offenbarung.

Auch der Strauß'schen Tondichtung „Don Juan" lieh der Dirigent seine ganze reife Kunst; er meisterte die polyphone Kontrapunktik und fand auch mannigfaltige Nuancen für die gluthvolle Leidenschaft. Allerdings haben wir dieses geniale Werk schon wiederholt mit viel schärferem Herausarbeiten der schneidenden Kontraste und intensiverer Betonung des exotischen Klangreizes gehört. Dr. Muck könnte man nach dem Konservativen Gerade höchstens einen Freikonservativen des Taktstocks nennen.

Für die Vorführung der beiden Weber'schen Ouverturen, zu „Oberon" und zu „Freischütz", war kein ersichtlicher Grund vorhanden. Man wartete vergebens auf neue Schlaglichter oder selbst nur neue Nüancen, aber sie kamen nicht. Die beiden Stücke wurden, wie bei den Bostonern selbstverständlich, tonschön abgespielt, aber der Dirigent konnte etwas Akademisches und wenig Belebtes, namentlich infolge der seltsam gedehnten Tempi, nicht vermeiden. Es scheint auf Grund der bisherigen Proben, als ob Dr. Muck sich als Konzert-Dirigent im hellen Scheine des Klassicismus oder in der grellen Scheinwerfer-Beleuchtung der Modernen besser fühle als im Dämmerlicht des Romanticismus. Carnegie Hall war fast ausverkauft, der Beifall namentlich nach der Brahms'schen Symphonie ein demonstrativ warmer und herzlicher.

Und dann gab knapp 6 Stunden später Herr Walter Damrosch das Signal zu demselben Werke von Brahms. Zufall oder Absicht, um Vergleiche herauszufordern? Herr Damrosch ging mit großem Eifer in's Zeug und brachte es namentlich im zweiten Satz und im Finale zu schönen Wirkungen. Der erste Satz erschien etwas überhastet und verworren und der dritte hätte größere Feinheit, namentlich im Tonlichen, vertragen, aber der Feuerstrom des Triumphgesanges des Finales schloß die Vorführung mit großem Effekt. Technisch und klanglich stand das Bostoner Orchester höher, das braucht nicht erst bewiesen zu werden, aber das Damrosch-Orchester hat unleugbar große Fortschritte gemacht und steht gegenwärtig auf recht hoher Stufe der Leistungsfähigkeit. Dies bewies auch die farbenprächtige Wiedergabe der Grieg'schen „Symphonischen Tänze".

Als Solistin des Abends erschien Frau Schumann-Heink, deren herrliches Organ, offenbar infolge der Strapazen einer zeigte, was namentlich beim Ansatz exponirter hoher Töne bemerkbar war. Aber wer vermag die machtvolle Feierlichkeit des Rezitativs und den Silberfluß der Kantilene der Arie der Vitellia aus Mozart's „Titus" so zu meistern, als diese begnadete Künstlerin! Schubert's „Erlkönig" litt unter der Indisposition, wogegen „Der Tod und das Mädchen" ergreifende Accente fand. An dem begeisterten Beifall ließ die Künstlerin mit einem ihrer reizvollen Einfälle den Klarinettisten Herrn Leroy, der prächtig begleitet hatte, theilnehmen.

Hierauf erschien der aus Paris importirte Flötist des Damrosch-Orchester, Herr George Barrère, mit der Bach'schen „Suite für Flöte und Streich-Instrumente" in H-Moll. Er gab die krausen Figurationen der Bach'schen Musik virtuos wieder. Sein Ton ist nicht groß, aber süß und edel, mitunter etwas weichlich. Leider war der behende Franzose der Begleitung gewöhnlich voraus. Hätte man en famille nicht besser proben können?

Der Saal zeigte leider beträchtliche Lücken, doch waren die oberen Ränge gut besetzt. Reicher Beifall lohnte die Mitwirkenden.

NEW YORK PRESS
NOV 11 1906

IN THE REA

Muck Interprets Brahms Nobly.

If Dr. Karl Muck, who appeared yesterday afternoon for the second time in Carnegie Hall at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had given as much satisfaction in every number on the programme of the concert as he did in the opening one—Brahms's nobly beautiful Symphony in C minor (No. 1)—the burden of one's enthusiasm would have become well-nigh irksome. On Thursday night the new leader had stood successfully the test of Beethoven and Wagner—had given a most moving interpretation of the older master's fifth symphony and a delightfully poetic reading of the later master's "Siegfried Idyll." Yesterday, as the first contribution of the Boston orchestra's first matinee of the season, he gave to a large and enthusiastic audience a performance of the Brahms work which seldom, if ever,, has been approached in New York in breadth and nobility of outline, sublimity and poetic fervor. What would have been one's feelings if, besides looming up as an excellent interpreter of these three great masters, Muck had been found an ideal leader in music of Weber and Richard Strauss? As things turned out he was somewhat disappointing in Weber's "Oberon" and "Freischuetz" overtures, and still more so in Strauss's "Don Juan" tone poem, but only in comparison with the rest of his work. In the Weber overtures, particularly in the one to "Freischuetz," there was not enough of that exultation and intense enthusiasm which the great German composer knew so inimitably how to express. Muck, it seemed to us, took his tempi too quietly. Strauss's "Don Juan" suffered similarly. As treated by Muck it was not fire-brand music, wild, full of stress and passion. It was still beautiful to be sure, and in the quieter moments exquisite, but it had not sufficient energy, propulsive vigor and feverish thrill. Muck worked out many details with great care, and, with the aid of his band, exposed the polyphonic web of the work wonderfully; but his very attention to detail was sometimes not only superfluous, but injurious to the spirit of the composition.

All the conductor's repose, however, his insight, sense of nuance and poetic grasp—not to mention his fine understanding of the orchestra—carried immense weight in the Brahms symphony. Muck is a great conductor of Brahms—infinitely superior to his predecessor Gericke. Calm on the surface, yet glowing within, he seems to be fitted by nature for the interpretation of that composer. He has the breadth of conception and grasp, the quiet reserve force to proclaim eloquently the remote grandeur of Brahms's style, so wonderfully expressed in this symphony. He has the emotional power to bring out in Brahms's music that which, his detractors notwithstanding, "throbs with humanity, with the rich red blood of mankind." He has the poetry and refinement of feeling to reveal with irresistible charm that which is intimate, gracious, gently appealing and tender. The Andante of the symphony, as Muck took it yesterday, seemed perhaps a little too slow. Had it been taken by the average conductor at that pace it would certainly have been too slow. In every other respect, however, Muck's interpretation seemed flawless. The final movement was worked up to a truly imposing climax, and the audience was not slow in feeling the rare beauty of the performance. Such enthusiastic applause as that which greeted the conductor and the orchestra upon finishing that work is seldom heard at matinee concerts. Muck bowed his thanks in a most modest manner. He shook hands with Willy Hess, the concert-master, and, after several recalls, asked the players to rise in acknowledgment of their share of the success.

per Cutting Bureau in the World.
BA
K COMMERCIAL SQUARE
N.Y. Globe
NOV 12 1906

AGLE
NOV 12 1906

NEW YORK SYMPHONY SOCIETY.

Years ago a race was run between Dr. Damrosch and Theodore Thomas to see which should get the score of Brahms' first symphony. There seems to be a like rivalry in these later days, for Dr. Damrosch's son played the same symphony on Saturday night, after the Boston Orchestra had played it in the same hall on Saturday afternoon. He gave a bold, strong, sympathetic reading of it, and his orchestra was heard to almost equal advantage in the wonderfully spirited, quaint Norwegian symphonic dances by Grieg. The nearly forgotten flute was introduced as a solo instrument by George Barrere, who played Bach's B Minor Suite blithely—so blithely, indeed, that the accompaniment lagged systematically—brilliantly, and with taste. The performance was a novelty and was appreciated. The other soloist was Mme. Schumann-Heink, who gave a dramatic performance of the air from Handel's "Titus," and sang two songs by Schubert—"The Erl King," with Berlioz's orchestration, and "Death and the Maiden," orchestrated by Mottl. These she gave with feeling, with wonderful vocal depth, and with a keen sense of their poetry and picturesqueness.

DR. MUCK AGAIN.

At the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Muck proved more conclusively his quality as a conductor than he did on Thursday night. He had no longer the inevitable nervousness of a first appearance to conquer. No doubt he was surer of his audience and of himself. He was evidently more in the mood for great things.

In Brahms's C minor symphony, which led the programme, he accomplished them. The "operatic" quality noted in his readings on Thursday night was here, paradoxical as it may seem, of inestimable value. Thanks to his sure eye for points and his skill in making them tell, his exposition of this complicated and often abstruse music had a definiteness and an authority of interpretation that came to many of his hearers like a revelation. Nor was his effectiveness limited to the intricate first and last movements. The second movement was broadly and sympathetically read in a mood of sober meditative beauty, and if the third movement did not escape seeming arid and a little trivial, the fault was not with Dr. Muck or his men. Together they did all that lies in human power to make the desert blossom like the rose. After the truly magnificent performance of the noble finale Dr. Muck was deservedly recalled again and again.

No less admirable was the performance of Richard Strauss's "Don Juan." Here, too, was most illuminating exposition, and in a piece of typical modern "programme music." Never has the story told in this tone-poem been so clearly set forth, and yet at no sacrifice of warmth and impetus in the telling. Gorgeous were the shifting orchestral hues, superb the climaxes at the [illegible]

By a curious contradiction Dr. Muck was less successful in the operatic music that he presented—the overtures to Weber's "Oberon" and "Freischütz." Crashing indeed was the famous "Oberon" chord, but the allegro did not leap from it with the impetuosity of a flood bursting its barriers. Again, the introduction to the "Freischütz" overture was taken too slowly. The horns had difficulty in sustaining their part, and the character of the music suffered change. It was as if Weber had foreseen that Protestant churches would make a pompous hymn tune out of his simple woodland melody. Both overtures have often been more effectively performed here.

The playing of the orchestra was throughout splendid in its vigor, its brilliance, its coloring, but now and then one missed something of the faultless precision, the ultimate polish that distinguished it under Mr. Gericke. One could not but fear that when Dr. Muck lays down the baton the orchestra will have lost to a perceptible degree that perfection of ensemble for which no novel fire could ever quite atone.

[67]

N. Y. TRIBUNE
rom
ddress
NOV 11 1906
ate

MUSIC.

TWO ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its first visit for the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, and the New York Symphony Orchestra gave its second evening concert at the same place in the evening. Two concerts of orchestral music of the highest order in a single day, emphasized by the performance at each of Brahms's first symphony! The circumstance might amply serve as a text for critical discourse to a considerable extent; yet there was another added to it which is not uninteresting in view of the prospect of bewildering richness presented by the season before the serious music lovers of New York. At the afternoon concert there was no solo performer, unless the conductor might be looked upon as such. Considering the extraordinary interest manifested by the public in the concerts of Thursday evening and yesterday, this seems clearly to be the case. In the evening there was an extremely popular singer to lend glamour to the occasion. Dr. Muck sufficed for the afternoon, and his achievement in the symphony was such as to obliterate all thought of a solo performer. He and his orchestra were one, and this one was an interpreter of the thoughts of the creator, Brahms. There was an audience of superb appearance in the afternoon, which filled the vast music room; there was an audience less than three-quarters the size in the evening, which gave out only conventional approval to offset the excited enthusiasm which filled the afternoon listeners. Yet it was Mme. Schumann-Heink who invoked the plaudits of the evening listeners. There was no departure from old custom in her participation in the concert, nor was there in her choice of pieces. Like the familiar figure at all the symphony concerts she sang an air which she has sung before, and which indeed she has made her battle horse. Not since the lamentable death of Mme. Fursch-Madi have we had a concert singer of the large and dramatic manner whose repertory has extended beyond the tiny list which she and her colleagues have made tiresomely hackneyed. Being a contralto, Mme. Schumann-Heink spares us the familiar arias from "Tannhäuser," "Freischütz," "Oberon" and "Fidelio"; but in lieu she offers us only the second of Vitellia's scenes from Mozart's "La Clemenza da Tito"—that beginning "Ecco ill punto." After this last night she sang Schubert's "Erlkönig" and "Der Tod und das Mädchen," with orchestral accompaniment, arranged respectively by Berlioz and Mottl; but, no matter how these masterpieces be tricked out, they belong to the recital room not in the symphony hall, and, although Mr. Walter Damrosch and his fine orchestra deserved much better of the public than they received yesterday, there was yet satisfaction for the lovers of symmetry, consistency and dignity in musical entertainments in the contemplation of the fact that the staider and more austere of yesterday's schemes met with the greater popular approval.

It was a day of generous offerings, yet the dominant note of enjoyment was that elicited by the Brahms symphony in the afternoon. Dr. Muck had made a fine impression on Thursday evening, but it was one that left open occasions for discussion in the minds of the judicious. His Beethoven symphony was a highly gratifying performance—lucid, organically well knit, eloquent, and, on the whole, reverential and proper—in respect of style; his Brahms symphony was—if one wishes to use a hackneyed phrase—a revelation. Not of the splendid prowess of the Boston musicians; that we knew. Neither of the superb and aspiring beauty of the composition itself, for that has held the recognition of the world for decades in spite of the nibbling of the critical mice who think it too austere and learned to be sensuously alluring and emotionally compelling. It was a revelation of what a master mind could do to give new interest to utterances that had become too familiar to hold always the sublimated attention of which they are worthy. Here was dignity; here heaven-kissing loveliness; here the sweep of a prophetic vision; here an emotionalized intellectuality which held faculties and senses in thrall; here a continuity, consistency and eloquence of proclamation which not only held one to the thread of the discourse, but made one eager to follow it, as Theseus was to follow the saving strand of Ariadne. Such a climax as that which Dr. Muck worked up in the last moment, with deliberation that spoke of affectionate regard for each progressive detail, was never before heard by our public, familiar with many fine performances. It was both ear-filling and soul-satisfying, and made one regret that the concert could not end then and there. Truly, what followed was an anticlimax, particularly so because of the phenomenal performance, though it would have been under ordinary circumstances. A singular programme: after the Brahms symphony, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" sandwiched between two Weber overtures—"Oberon" and "Freischütz." Ordinarily it is possible to imagine the reasons of a conductor in compiling a programme; this time no explanation could be thought of which was worthy of the man and the occasion. Nor did it help that the overtures were brilliantly played (though that to "Der Freischütz" was obsessed by the sluggish demon that has chosen it for his own since the so-called Wagnerian ideas achieved authority) and the Strauss work had its compelling charm enhanced by a marvellously lucid exposition of its contents. Logical sequence and development were overlooked when this scheme was put together.

Zwei Symphonie-Konzerte.

Das war gestern ein kritischer Tag erster Ordnung für den Musik-Kritiker, der doch auch ein Mensch ist, sozusagen. Ein Symphonie-Konzert birgt viel des Schönen und Guten, zwei Symphonie-Konzerte an einem Tage bedeuten aber des Guten entschieden schon zu viel, und das war gestern der Fall. Nachmittags Carnegie Hall, Abends Carnegie Hall, zuerst Dr. Muck mit den Bostonern, dann Walter Damrosch mit dem New Yorker Symphonie-Konzert, und auf beiden Programmen bildete die Pièce de Résistance die erste Symphonie von Brahms, also schwere Kost. Brahms hüben und Brahms drüben. Es giebt Thierschutzvereine, weshalb keinen Kritiker-Schutzverein.

Dr. Muck hat durch seine gestrige Wiedergabe der Brahms'schen C-Moll-Symphonie den vortrefflichen Eindruck, den er anläßlich seines Debuts hervorgerufen hatte, gewaltig erhöht. Es wäre deshalb voreilig, zu behaupten, daß er Brahms besser dirigirt, als Beethoven, aber sicher ist es, daß das Beethoven'sche Tongemälde "per aspera ad astra" (die fünfte Symphonie) ihm weniger gut „liegt", als das Brahms'sche Seitenstück zu dieser Idee. Er dirigirte das gewaltige Werk des großen Epigonen mit einer Fülle von Empfindung und meisterhafter Gestaltungskraft. Dr. Muck hat gestern gezeigt, daß er aus seiner selbstauferlegten Reserve auch heraustreten kann; er wurde ordentlich warm und brachte herrliche Wirkungen zu Wege. Es war eine großzügige Darstellung und feine künstlerische Abtönung im Einzelnen. Wie klar und durchsichtig er aus den vier im ersten Satz nach einander wie widerwillig auftretenden Motiven das Hauptthema bildete. Innig, mit bezauberndem Klangreiz kam das andante sostenuto des zweiten Satzes heraus, es war wirklich eine musica sacra. Mit bezwingender Anmuth und reizvoller Mannigfaltigkeit brachte er den dritten Satz, um im Finale nach dem deprimirenden Pessimismus in eine dithyrambische Jubelhymne auszuklingen. Das war alles sicher und mit den einfachsten Mitteln durchgeführt

Das Bostoner Orchester hat sich gestern wieder einmal selbst übertroffen. Es fang die lyrischen Lichtpunkte mit dem ihm eigenen Tonzauber und edlen Verve. Die Instrumentalgruppen vereinigten sich zu einem einheitlichen Ganzen, dem der Charakter absoluter Vornehmheit stets gewahrt blieb. Das Zwiegespräch zwischen Horn und Klarinette im ersten Satz, die süße Melodie im zweiten, Horn mit Violine und Horn allein (wobei die Solovioline von Herrn Willy Heß meisterlich gespielt wurde), die Hornmelodie im Andante des Finales — um nur einige Details herauszugreifen — klangen wie Offenbarung.

Auch der Strauß'schen Tondichtung „Don Juan" lieh der Dirigent seine ganze reife Kunst; er meisterte die polyphone Kontrapunktik und fand auch mannigfaltige Nuancen für die gluthvolle Leidenschaft. Allerdings haben wir dieses geniale Werk schon wiederholt mit viel schärferem Herausarbeiten der schneidenden Kontraste und intensiverer Betonung des exotischen Klangreizes gehört. Dr. Muck könnte man nach dem Konservativen Gericke höchstens einen Freikonservativen des Taktstocks nennen.

Für die Vorführung der beiden Weber'schen Ouverturen, zu „Oberon" und zu „Freischütz", war kein ersichtlicher Grund vorhanden. Man wartete vergebens auf neue Schlaglichter oder selbst nur neue Nüancen, aber sie kamen nicht. Die beiden Stücke wurden, wie bei den Bostonern selbstverständlich, tonschön abgespielt, aber der Dirigent konnte etwas Akademisches und wenig Belebtes, namentlich infolge der seltsam gedehnten Tempi, nicht vermeiden. Es scheint auf Grund der bisherigen Proben, als ob Dr. Muck sich als Konzert-Dirigent im hellen Scheine des Klassicismus oder in der grellen Scheinwerfer-Beleuchtung der Modernen besser fühle als im Dämmerlicht des Romanticismus. Carnegie Hall war fast ausverkauft, der Beifall namentlich nach der Brahms'schen Symphonie ein demonstrativ warmer und herzlicher.

Und dann gab knapp 6 Stunden später Herr Walter Damrosch das Signal zu demselben Werke von Brahms. Zufall oder Absicht, um Vergleiche herauszufordern? Herr Damrosch ging mit großem Eifer in's Zeug und brachte es namentlich im zweiten Satz und im Finale zu schönen Wirkungen. Der erste Satz erschien etwas überhastet und verworren und der dritte hätte größere Feinheit, namentlich im Tonlichen, vertragen, aber der Feuerstrom des Triumphgesanges des Finales schloß die Vorführung mit großem Effekt. Technisch und klanglich stand das Bostoner Orchester höher, das braucht nicht erst bewiesen zu werden, aber das Damrosch-Orchester hat unleugbar große Fortschritte gemacht und steht gegenwärtig auf recht hoher Stufe der Leistungsfähigkeit. Dies bewies auch die farbenprächtige Wiedergabe der Grieg'schen „Symphonischen Tänze".

Als Solistin des Abends erschien Frau Schumann-Heinck, deren herrliches Organ, offenbar infolge der Strapazen einer zeigte, was namentlich beim Ansatz exponirter hoher Töne bemerkbar war. Aber wer vermag die machtvolle Feierlichkeit des Rezitativs und den Silberfluß der Kantilene der Arie der Vitellia aus Mozart's „Titus" so zu meistern, als diese begnadete Künstlerin! Schubert's „Erlkönig" litt unter der Indisposition, wogegen „Der Tod und das Mädchen" ergreifende Accente fand. An dem begeisterten Beifall ließ die Künstlerin mit einem ihrer reizvollen Einfälle den Klarinettisten Herrn Leroy, der prächtig begleitet hatte, theilnehmen.

Hierauf erschien der aus Paris importirte Flötist des Damrosch-Orchester, Herr George Barrère, mit der Bach'schen „Suite für Flöte und Streich-Instrumente" in H-Moll. Er gab die krausen Figurationen der Bach'schen Musik virtuos wieder. Sein Ton ist nicht groß, aber süß und edel, mitunter etwas weichlich. Leider war der behende Franzose der Begleitung gewöhnlich voraus. Hätte man en famille nicht besser proben können?

Der Saal zeigte leider beträchtliche Lücken, doch waren die oberen Ränge gut besetzt. Reicher Beifall lohnte die Mitwirkenden.

per Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK SYMPHONY SOCIETY.

Years ago a race was run between Dr. Damrosch and Theodore Thomas to see which should get the score of Brahms' first symphony. There seems to be a like rivalry in these later days, for Dr. Damrosch's son played the same symphony on Saturday night, after the Boston Orchestra had played it in the same hall on Saturday afternoon. He gave a bold, strong, sympathetic reading of it, and his orchestra was heard to almost equal advantage in the wonderfully spirited, quaint Norwegian symphonic dances by Grieg. The nearly forgotten flute was introduced as a solo instrument by George Barrere, who played Bach's B Minor Suite blithely—so blithely, indeed, that the acompaniment lagged systematically—brilliantly, and with taste. The performance was a novelty and was appreciated. The other soloist was Mme. Schumann-Heink, who gave a dramatic performance of the air from Handel's "Titus," and sang two songs by Schubert—"The Erl King," with Berlioz's orchestration, and "Death and the Maiden," orchestrated by Mottl. These she gave with feeling, with wonderful vocal depth, and with a keen sense of their poetry and picturesqueness.

DR. MUCK AGAIN.

At the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Muck proved more conclusively his quality as a conductor than he did on Thursday night. He had no longer the inevitable nervousness of a first appearance to conquer. No doubt he was surer of his audience and of himself. He was evidently more in the mood for great things.

In Brahms's C minor symphony, which led the programme, he accomplished them. The "operatic" quality noted in his readings on Thursday night was here, paradoxical as it may seem, of inestimable value. Thanks to his sure eye for points and his skill in making them tell, his exposition of this complicated and often abstruse music had a definiteness and an authority of interpretation that came to many of his hearers like a revelation. Nor was his effectiveness limited to the intricate first and last movements. The second movement was broadly and sympathetically read in a mood of sober meditative beauty, and if the third movement did not escape seeming arid and a little trivial, the fault was not with Dr. Muck or his men. Together they did all that lies in human power to make the desert blossom like the rose. After the truly magnificent performance of the noble finale Dr. Muck was deservedly recalled again and again.

No less admirable was the performance of Richard Strauss's "Don Juan." Here, too, was most illuminating exposition, and in a piece of typical modern "programme music." Never has the story told in this tone-poem been so clearly set forth, and yet at no sacrifice of warmth and impetus in the telling. Gorgeous were the shifting orchestral hues, superb the climax at the close.

By a curious contradiction Dr. Muck was less successful in the operatic music that he presented—the overtures to Weber's "Oberon" and "Freischütz." Crashing indeed was the famous "Oberon" chord, but the allegro did not leap from it with the impetuosity of a flood bursting its barriers. Again, the introduction to the "Freischütz" overture was taken too slowly. The horns had difficulty in sustaining their part, and the character of the music suffered change. It was as if Weber had foreseen that Protestant churches would make a pompous hymn tune out of his simple woodland melody. Both overtures have often been more effectively performed here.

The playing of the orchestra was throughout splendid in its vigor, its brilliance, its coloring, but now and then one missed something of the faultless precision, the ultimate polish that distinguished it under Mr. Gericke. One could not but fear that when Dr. Muck lays down the baton the orchestra will have lost to a perceptible degree that perfection of ensemble for which no novel fire could ever quite atone.

EW YORK PRESS
NOV 11 1906

IN THE REA

Muck Interprets Brahms Nobly.

If Dr. Karl Muck, who appeared yesterday afternoon for the second time in Carnegie Hall at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had given as much satisfaction in every number on the programme of the concert as he did in the opening one—Brahms's nobly beautiful Symphony in C minor (No. 1)—the burden of one's enthusiasm would have become well-nigh irksome. On Thursday night the new leader had stood successfully the test of Beethoven and Wagner—had given a most moving interpretation of the older master's fifth symphony and a delightfully poetic reading of the later master's "Siegfried Idyll." Yesterday, as the first contribution of the Boston orchestra's first matinee of the season, he gave to a large and enthusiastic audience a performance of the Brahms work which seldom, if ever,, has been approached in New York in breadth and nobility of outline, sublimity and poetic fervor. What would have been one's feelings if, besides looming up as an excellent interpreter of these three great masters, Muck had been found an ideal leader in music of Weber and Richard Strauss? As things turned out he was somewhat disappointing in Weber's "Oberon" and "Freischuetz" overtures, and still more so in Strauss's "Don Juan" tone poem; but only in comparison with the rest of his work. In the Weber overtures, particularly in the one to "Freischuetz," there was not enough of that exultation and intense enthusiasm which the great German composer knew so inimitably how to express. Muck, it seemed to us, took his tempi too quietly. Strauss's "Don Juan" suffered similarly. As treated by Muck it was not fire-brand music, wild, full of stress and passion. It was still beautiful to be sure, and in the quieter moments exquisite, but it had not sufficient energy, propulsive vigor and feverish thrill. Muck worked out many details with great care, and, with the aid of his band, exposed the polyphonic web of the work wonderfully; but his very attention to detail was sometimes not only superfluous, but injurious to the spirit of the composition.

All the conductor's repose, however, his insight, sense of nuance and poetic grasp—not to mention his fine understanding of the orchestra—carried immense weight in the Brahms symphony. Muck is a great conductor of Brahms—infinitely superior to his predecessor, Gericke. Calm on the surface, yet glowing within, he seems to be fitted by nature for the interpretation of that composer. He has the breadth of conception and grasp, the quiet reserve force to proclaim eloquently the remote grandeur of Brahms's style, so wonderfully expressed in this symphony. He has the emotional power to bring out in Brahms's music that which, his detractors notwithstanding, "throbs with humanity, with the rich red blood of mankind." He has the poetry and refinement of feeling to reveal with irresistible charm that which is intimate, gracious, gently appealing and tender. The Andante of the symphony, as Muck took it yesterday, seemed perhaps a little too slow. Had it been taken by the average conductor at that pace it would certainly have been too slow. In every other respect, however, Muck's interpretation seemed flawless. The final movement was worked up to a truly imposing climax, and the audience was not slow in feeling the rare beauty of the performance. Such enthusiastic applause as that which greeted the conductor and the orchestra upon finishing that work is seldom heard at matinee concerts. Muck bowed his thanks in a most modest manner. He shook hands with Willy Hess, the concertmaster, and, after several recalls, asked the players to rise in acknowledgment of their share of the success.

per Cutting Bureau in the World
V YORK PRESS
NOV 12 1906

SONGS AND SINGERS.

Dr. Karl Muck's first appearance here as the leader of Boston's Symphony Orchestra was the most absorbing musical incident last week. Thousands of persons had been looking forward to it. The musical air was filled with the electricity of excitement. Under such circumstances, with the public on tiptoe of expectation, the first plunge into the notice of a new community is not easy. Muck, coming forward with a quiet self-assurance that had no suggestion of arrogance or vanity, made the plunge far more successfully than there had been reason to expect. It required only one movement of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony to show the calibre of the leader; after that he had, we believe, the great majority of his audience in a sympathetic mood. As to the critics, it was all they could do to follow the rules of the clan and refrain from spontaneous applause. This successful entry into this city's musical world was accomplished without a trace of playing to the gallery, without tricks or mannerisms, conscious or unconscious, which might have been construed by any one looking for an opening in Muck's armor of excellence as attempts to stir the feminine soul. Muck walked to the front in the most unassuming manner, his big eyeglasses perched well forward on his eagle nose, giving to his haggard countenance an almost grotesquely studious appearance. He bowed his acknowledgment of the inevitable applause with a sort of impersonal bow, a nominal bow, as it were, made in obedience to custom rather than as a personal acknowledgment of the friendly reception. That duty accomplished, he turned his back to the audience with a quiet movement—as, indeed, are all his movements, except at times when the exigencies of leading the orchestra demand rapid gestures—and took up the reins of leadership.

In wielding the baton Muck comports himself much as does Weingartner. But while Weingartner's condensation of motion seems premeditated Muck's seems spontaneous and natural. In other words, he appears to have exceedingly little of the poseur in his make-up, whereas Weingartner has a great quantity of it, in spite of his reserved movements. Muck's vanity, if he has any, is not apparent, while Weingartner's hardly can escape any person of discernment. Both conductors have an unusually fine sense of rhythm, a quality so essential it would seem superfluous to mention it, yet which is developed in varying degrees among ever great leaders. The beats of the two are short and extremely decisive, and the listener is conscious in the work of both of an irresistible oscillation, a life-giving pulsation—like the strong ebb and flow of a sturdy heart. This steady propulsive swing is developed more strongly in Weingartner than in Muck, and the lift and fall of Weingartner's baton is, on the average, of briefer duration than that of Muck. It is one of the principal distinctions between the men that one conceives his interpretations in almost every case in slower time than does the other. But if Weingartner's musical pulse is felt more distinctly than Muck's, his conception of division of time is not as accurate and his sense of fine distinctions of tempo not as acute. In this respect Muck is truly remarkable. In last week's concerts he showed an unusual feeling for variations of tempo, for those slight ritardandos and accelerandos, those momentary changes of movement—so slight sometimes they cannot be measured—without which music becomes monotonous to modern ears.

But with all his elasticity of tempo Muck never loses his grip on the predominating rhythm of the movement, nor does he vacillate in the least from the underlying tempo he has once adopted. With open-eyed (or should we say open-eared?) astonishment we took careful note of this phase of his directorial art. We even went so far as to make metronomical records of his tempo. No matter how far he wandered (and always with the best reason) from the rate originally adopted, he came back to his first tempo, when the inherent character of the music so demanded, with almost mathematical precision. This, of course, was not the result of dry scholastic calculation. No man could return to a given rate of progress without the aid of a metronome unless he were gifted with a keen sense of rhythm and a fine conception of duration of time. Muck has those qualities in abundance, and he seems to be a man of such even and reliable temperament that one may rely upon him to live always up to his best. We now can appreciate fully the significance of what Dr. Neitzel wrote from Bayreuth. "'Parsifal,'" said that keen critic, now familiar to New Yorkers, "requires in all the portions devoted to the Grail cult a strict rhythmical line, something of the 'slow measured step' we feel in the dramas of the Greek tragedians. . . . Dr. Muck's rhythmical decisiveness, which, however, was more like an inner pulse beat than an exact division of small portions of time, was wholly compatible with elasticity of tempo and did not prevent the display of the most supple choregraphic skill in Klingsor's magic garden."

on a programme with the New York Symphony Orchestra last season? Those were the numbers Muck chose for the first three of his four contributions on last Thursday night in Carnegie Hall. Of course, this arrangement may have been purely a coincidence. There are many such in New York's musical life—for instance, the appearance of Brahms's C minor symphony on two programmes on last Saturday. Whatever prompted the choice of Muck's first programme it certainly gave an opportunity for comparison, and one that was distinctly favorable to the new Boston conductor, for it was only in Wagner's "Faust" music, where tremendous energy stood the leader in fine stead, that we preferred Weingartner's reading to Muck's. Weingartner, without departing greatly from the customary reading of the Beethoven symphony, gave it an intensely dramatic performance by means of significant phrasing, poignant accentuation and incisiveness of rhythm; but his tempi were not altogether satisfying. On the whole they seemed a little too fast, too relentless. If anything Muck erred on the other side. He did not give the symphony as dramatic a reading as Weingartner; but it was a beautifully felt interpretation, saturated with poetic feeling—an interpretation which foreshadowed the unprecedented success he won on the following Saturday in Brahms's C minor symphony. As to his performance of the "Siegfried Idyll," it differed from Weingartner's as a natural flower differs from an artificial one, as the true bloom of health differs from the simulation produced by cosmetics. Weingartner took this little poetic masterpiece altogether too fast, robbing it of much of its idyllic charm and ingratiating tenderness. Muck gave an interpretation that brought Seidl vividly to mind. He treated the music quietly, lovingly, gently. He gave every phrase the sympathetic attention it deserved. In other words, Muck devoted all the powers at his command to expressing the intrinsic beauties of the work. It seemed to him a labor of love—a tribute paid to the master of Bayreuth.

MAX SMITH.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK EV'G POST
n
ress
NOV 12 1906
e

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Brahms, Strauss; Strauss, Brahms! So the sequence ran with Mr. Gericke, and so it bids fair to be with Dr. Muck. Are there no other modern composers worthy of a hearing? Bruckner, Sibelius, Grieg, MacDowell, Paine—how often do these names find a place on a programme? As Dr. Muck is an apostle of Bruckner, we may hope for some of the works of that undeservedly neglected composer later; but the beginning is far from auspicious. Perhaps Dr. Muck is "educating us up to it." If so, spare us the pedagogic training!

The Boston Orchestra's programme on Saturday afternoon contained the First Symphony of Brahms, which was played as beautifully as we are accustomed to hear it by the Boston men. If there was no special display of temperament, that was not the conductor's fault, for the latter quality is not called for by that symphony. After it came Weber's "Oberon" overture; the melodious romanticism of Weber following the austerity of Brahms was like listening to a dogmatic sermon and then going out into the fragrant woods. A similar sensation was produced by the final number, the overture to "Der Freischütz" following Strauss's "Don Juan," only this time, instead of a sermon, it was a tropical hothouse. The playing of the Weber overtures was delightful—in addition to the smooth performance by the company of virtuosi, there was a poetic charm that placed Weber's genius in a bright light. No wonder Wagner was so enthusiastic about him! The audience showed more spontaneous enthusiasm over the "Oberon" overture than over any other number. In the long run, the public is right, and not the pedants.

N. Y. EVG. TELEGRAM
NOV 12

The Second Boston Symphony Concert at Carnegie Hall.

IN Carnegie Hall, on Saturday last, the Boston Symphony Orchestra demonstrated again its complete mastery over the science and the art of music. The attendant public of this city, limited only by the building's capacity, is ennobled by the occasional presence of this organization.

The programme stood as follows:—First symphony of Brahms, overture to "Der Freischütz," "Don Juan," symphonic poem by Richard Strauss; overture to "Oberon," by Von Weber.

It was a bit curious that these two overtures, as similar in pattern and content, should have been played together, yet both are merely variations of musical perfection.

The first symphony of the Viennese master is a test for any orchestra. Whether viewed from the standpoint of intricate detail, solemn prophecy, sweeping climax or poetic polyphony, this work generally taxes both player and listener. But this performance of Saturday's was a delight to the ear, a stimulation to the mind, a satisfaction to the soul. Of its technical exposition one may broadly say it was flawless. Dr. Muck's tempo was a trifle slower than customary, but it served only to add dignity to the development, portentous weight to the music's message. Individually the choirs vied with each other for sheer supremacy of tonal glory.

One moment's beauty beggared by comparison its fellow. Each in itself was perfection. The exposition of the final theme was transcendent. It will long remain the high water mark of symphonic interpretation.

Then followed two of the world's rarest moments. The exquisite finesse of Weber's overtures was attracted by the stillness of the great hall. Such exalted moments rarely come.

The enormous difficulties and intricacies of the "Don Juan" score were tossed off with abandon. This work has never before, in ready recollection, sounded so transparently clear, the component parts never so relatively balanced.

A word as to Dr. Muck. Much surprise has generally been stated as to his quiet demeanor, his dignified, scholarly bearing. While appreciated, it was not expected. One scarcely sees the cause. Why expect, even, a performing, silhouetted marionette? A true conductor, like a true critic, should direct attention to the work of his chosen author, not use another's house on which to fly his own colors. To be an individual does not necessarily mean to stand out of the picture. It may merely mean to form a finely blended, suitable background on occasion for another's more timely, more appropriate pose. And so with Dr. Muck's fine, authentic conducting.

Says Dr. Crothers:—"If a person can't be original without making a mess of it, why be original at all?" A man need not be lack-lustre. He may possess, as does this eminent conductor, the passive personality.

"What most people relish is hardly music; it is rather a drowsy revery, relieved by nervous thrills." Such a view, as expressed by Professor Santayana, could never be held of the readings of this wisely clairvoyant scholar, lately among us.

NEW YORK MAIL
NOV 12 1906

BRAHMS PLAYED BY MASTER HANDS

Dr. Karl Muck and Walter Damrosch Both Conduct the C Minor Symphony.

Whatever else Dr. Karl Muck may do as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, his performance of the Brahms C minor symphony Saturday afternoon at Carnegie hall will long be enshrined in the memory of those that heard it.

If it were true, as some temperate admirers of Brahms would have it, that the composer needs a more than ordinary power of interpretation to reach the hearts and minds of listeners, and that his music in fact depends upon the actual addition of a great personality as a factor in performance—if this were true, then no Brahmsite or simple music lover could have asked or imagined a truer cooperative spirit than that of Dr. Muck.

Not in recent years has New York heard a more eloquent, more inspired reading of this master work. The opening movement might have portrayed the gods in meditation, over the chaos of some primal world. The second—if one chooses to call the symphony "The Creation"—suggested their foreknowledge of a world's sorrow. In the third one could feel the hushed brooding that preceded the elemental stir and animation of the finale—for with the Beethoven-like theme of the last allegro, a world is veritably launched, full powered, upon its orbit.

Very beautiful was Dr. Muck's proportioning of this noble symphonic structure, very admirable his shaping of every detail in its relation to the whole. The Boston orchestra has rarely put to its credit a better piece of work. And the audience was deeply stirred, so that Dr. Muck won delighted and unreserved applause, and many recalls.

TRANSCRIPT, NOVEMBER 12, 1906

Dr. Muck's Second Concert in New York

Dr. Muck conducted for the second time in New York on Saturday afternoon, and his programme was nearly that of the third pair of Symphony concerts here—Brahms's symphony in C-minor, Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan," Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz," and also his overture to "Oberon," which was substituted for the three fragments from "The Damnation of Faust," which completed the list in Boston. Again the audience filled the hall, and again it was most enthusiastic, recalling Dr. Muck six times at the end of the symphony. Nearly all the reviewers are as warm in praise, and Mr. Henderson's article in the Sun of yesterday is worth quoting, for the keen perception of Dr. Muck, as we in Boston know him from longer acquaintance, that it discloses:

"Dr. Muck made a stronger impression than he did on Thursday night. He seemed to feel surer of himself and his hearers. He had learned the temper of New York music lovers and he reached out after emotions, which had to meet him more than half-way at the evening concert. What will be the probable change in the style of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under him was indicated in the Brahms symphony. There was nothing startling in Dr. Muck's reading. Tempi and nuances were those established by the clear indications of the score. But where under Mr. Gericke all was subdued and exquisitely polished, under Dr. Muck some of the Ciceronian nicety was swept away. The new conductor even permitted his men in one or two places to slip from that military precision of attack and that machine-like unanimity which were inseparable from every performance under the inexorable baton of his predecessor. These were but momentary failings, however, and for the most part the orchestra maintained its traditions of finish. But in muscularity, incisiveness, brilliancy and power it far outshone anything it has done in recent seasons. The performance of the magnificent last movement of the symphony was one of the most eloquent ever given in this city. It was inspiring to hear. The audience felt the inspiration of the performance and rewarded the conductor with six recalls. These recalls really meant something, for conductors, unlike pianists, do not play encore numbers.

"The other compositions on the programme were Weber's 'Oberon' overture; Richard Strauss's 'Don Juan' and Weber's 'Der Freischütz' overture. It was a formidable test for the music of Weber, but none the less triumphant. The florid old overtures stood their own handsomely in the presence of the philosophizing of the arch-realist of Munich. It seems that Weber was really a composer of talent. The Strauss music was superbly played yesterday. Dr. Muck conducted it con amore, for he and Strauss are associates in artistic labor. If the first two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were fairly prophetic of what is to come, we shall probably have less perfection of tonal smoothness, less elegance and repose in performance and less conservatism in idea. In their places we may expect more boldness, more spirit, more of the golden thunders of the trumpet, more of the cymbal's martial clang. In short, the hand that was shod in kid has given way to bared fingers, with polished skin, indeed, but with sinews of steel underneath."

The Times adds, as justly and discriminatingly: "The concert deepened and strengthened the confidence in Dr. Muck as a conductor of strong musical gifts and high technical acquirement. It was an altogether noble and beautiful performance of Brahms's symphony and thoroughly deserving of the prolonged outburst of enthusiasm it caused. It was one that brought out every detail, every touch of color, every contrasting phrase and point of imitation in the work; one that composed all its parts in their proper relation, and that built up the symmetrical and nobly proportioned whole. It was quickened with imagination and touched everywhere with life and enthusiasm. So magnificent and altogether imposing a climax as he secured in the last movement is most rarely to be heard in a symphonic performance. . . . Strauss's tone-poem was played with dazzling brilliancy and irresistible energy; and here again the careful exposition of the thematic structure, even in all the welter of sound, contributed greatly to the impression made. Dr. Muck's reading of the two Weber overtures was equally brilliant."

per Cutting Bureau in the World
N YORK TIMES
NOV 12 1906

SONGS AND SINGERS.

Dr. Karl Muck's first appearance here as the leader of Boston's Symphony Orchestra was the most absorbing musical incident last week. Thousands of persons had been looking forward to it. The musical air was filled with the electricity of excitement. Under such circumstances, with the public on tiptoe of expectation, the first plunge into the notice of a new community is not easy. Muck, coming forward with a quiet self-assurance that had no suggestion of arrogance or vanity, made the plunge far more successfully than there had been reason to expect. It required only one movement of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony to show the calibre of the leader; after that he had, we believe, the great majority of his audience in a sympathetic mood. As to the critics, it was all they could do to follow the rules of the clan and refrain from spontaneous applause. This successful entry into this city's musical world was accomplished without a trace of playing to the gallery, without tricks or mannerisms, conscious or unconscious, which might have been construed by any one looking for an opening in Muck's armor of excellence as attempts to stir the feminine soul. Muck walked to the front in the most unassuming manner, his big eyeglasses perched well forward on his eagle nose, giving to his haggard countenance an almost grotesquely studious appearance. He bowed his acknowledgment of the inevitable applause with a sort of impersonal bow, a nominal bow, as it were, made in obedience to custom rather than as a personal acknowledgment of the friendly reception. That duty accomplished, he turned his back to the audience with a quiet movement—as, indeed, are all his movements, except at times when the exigencies of leading the orchestra demand rapid gestures—and took up the reins of leadership.

In wielding the baton Muck comports himself much as does Weingartner. But while Weingartner's condensation of motion seems premeditated Muck's seems spontaneous and natural. In other words, he appears to have exceedingly little of the poseur in his make-up, whereas Weingartner has a great quantity of it, in spite of his reserved movements. Muck's vanity, if he has any, is not apparent, while Weingartner's hardly can escape any person of discernment. Both conductors have an unusually fine sense of rhythm, a quality so essential it would seem superfluous to mention it, yet which is developed in varying degrees among even great leaders. The beats of the two are short and extremely decisive, and the listener is conscious in the work of both of an irresistible oscillation, a life-giving pulsation—like the strong ebb and flow of a sturdy heart. This steady propulsive swing is developed more strongly in Weingartner than in Muck, and the lift and fall of Weingartner's baton is, on the average, of briefer duration than that of Muck. It is one of the principal distinctions between the men that one conceives his interpretations in almost every case in slower time than does the other. But if Weingartner's musical pulse is felt more distinctly than Muck's, his conception of division of time is not as accurate and his sense of fine distinctions of tempo not as acute. In this respect Muck is truly remarkable. In last week's concerts he showed an unusual feeling for variations of tempo, for those slight ritardandos and accelerandos, those momentary changes of movement—so slight sometimes they cannot be measured—without which music becomes monotonous to modern ears.

But with all his elasticity of tempo Muck never loses his grip on the predominating rhythm of the movement, nor does he vacillate in the least from the underlying tempo he has once adopted. With open-eyed (or should we say open-eared?) astonishment we took careful note of this phase of his directorial art. We even went so far as to make metronomical records of his tempo. No matter how far he wandered (and always with the best reason) from the rate originally adopted, he came back to his first tempo, when the inherent character of the music so demanded, with almost mathematical precision. This, of course, was not the result of dry scholastic calculation. No man could return to a given rate of progress without the aid of a metronome unless he were gifted with a keen sense of rhythm and a fine conception of duration of time. Muck has those qualities in abundance, and he seems to be a man of such even and reliable temperament that one may rely upon him to live always up to his best. We now can appreciate fully the significance of what Dr. Neitzel wrote from Bayreuth. "'Parsifal,'" said that keen critic, now familiar to New Yorkers, "requires in all the portions devoted to the Grail cult a strict rhythmical line, something of the 'slow measured step' we feel in the dramas of the Greek tragedians. . . . Dr. Muck's rhythmical decisiveness, which, however, was more like an inner pulse beat than an exact division of small portions of time, was wholly compatible with elasticity of tempo and did not prevent the display of the most supple choregraphic skill in Klingsor's magic garden."

It seems almost as if Muck had challenged comparison with Weingartner, for did not the latter conductor have Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Wagner's "Eine Faust Overture" and the "Siegfried Idyll" on a programme with the New York Symphony Orchestra last season? Those were the numbers Muck chose for the first three of his four contributions on last Thursday night in Carnegie Hall. Of course, this arrangement may have been purely a coincidence. There are many such in New York's musical life—for instance, the appearance of Brahms's C minor symphony on two programmes on last Saturday. Whatever prompted the choice of Muck's first programme it certainly gave an opportunity for comparison, and one that was distinctly favorable to the new Boston conductor, for it was only in Wagner's "Faust" music, where tremendous energy stood the leader in fine stead, that we preferred Weingartner's reading to Muck's. Weingartner, without departing greatly from the customary reading of the Beethoven symphony, gave it an intensely dramatic performance by means of significant phrasing, poignant accentuation and incisiveness of rhythm; but his tempi were not altogether satisfying. On the whole they seemed a little too fast, too relentless. If anything Muck erred on the other side. He did not give the symphony as dramatic a reading as Weingartner; but it was a beautifully felt interpretation, saturated with poetic feeling—an interpretation which foreshadowed the unprecedented success he won on the following Saturday in Brahms's C minor symphony. As to his performance of the "Siegfried Idyll," it differed from Weingartner's as a natural flower differs from an artificial one, as the true bloom of health differs from the simulation produced by cosmetics. Weingartner took this little poetic masterpiece altogether too fast, robbing it of much of its idyllic charm and ingratiating tenderness. Muck gave an interpretation that brought Seidl vividly to mind. He treated the music quietly, lovingly, gently. He gave every phrase the sympathetic attention it deserved. In other words, Muck devoted all the powers at his command to expressing the intrinsic beauties of the work. It seemed to him a labor of love—a tribute paid to the master of Bayreuth.

MAX SMITH.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n ress
e

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Brahms, Strauss; Strauss, Brahms! So the sequence ran with Mr. Gericke, and so it bids fair to be with Dr. Muck. Are there no other modern composers worthy of a hearing? Bruckner, Sibelius, Grieg, MacDowell, Paine—how often do these names find a place on a programme? As Dr. Muck is an apostle of Bruckner, we may hope for some of the works of that undeservedly neglected composer later; but the beginning is far from auspicious. Perhaps Dr. Muck is "educating us up to it." If so, spare us the pedagogic training!

The Boston Orchestra's programme on Saturday afternoon contained the First Symphony of Brahms, which was played as beautifully as we are accustomed to hear it by the Boston men. If there was no special display of temperament, that was not the conductor's fault, for the latter quality is not called for by that symphony. After it came Weber's "Oberon" overture; the melodious romanticism of Weber following the austerity of Brahms was like listening to a dogmatic sermon and then going out into the fragrant woods. A similar sensation was produced by the final number, the overture to "Der Freischütz" following Strauss's "Don Juan," only this time, instead of a sermon, it was a tropical hothouse. The playing of the Weber overtures was delightful—in addition to the smooth performance by the company of virtuosi, there was a poetic charm that placed Weber's genius in a bright light. No wonder Wagner was so enthusiastic about him! The audience showed more spontaneous enthusiasm over the "Oberon" overture than over any other number. In the long run, the public is right, and not the pedants.

EVG. TELEGRAM
s
NOV 12 1906

The Second Boston Symphony Concert at Carnegie Hall.

IN Carnegie Hall, on Saturday last, the Boston Symphony Orchestra demonstrated again its complete mastery over the science and the art of music. The attendant public of this city, limited only by the building's capacity, is ennobled by the occasional presence of this organization.

The programme stood as follows:—First symphony of Brahms, overture to "Der Freischütz, "Don Juan," symphonic poem by Richard Strauss; overture to "Oberon," by Von Weber.

It was a bit curious that these two overtures, as similar in pattern and content, should have been played together, yet both are merely variations of musical perfection.

The first symphony of the Viennese master is a test for any orchestra. Whether viewed from the standpoint of intricate detail, solemn prophecy, sweeping climax or poetic polyphony, this work generally taxes both player and listener. But this performance of Saturday's was a delight to the ear, a stimulation to the mind, a satisfaction to the soul. Of its technical exposition one may broadly say it was flawless. Dr. Muck's tempo was a trifle slower than customary, but it served only to add dignity to the development, portentous weight to the music's message. Individually the choirs vied with each other for sheer supremacy of tonal glory.

One moment's beauty beggared by comparison its fellow. Each in itself was perfection. The exposition of the final theme was transcendent. It will long remain the high water mark of symphonic interpretation.

Then followed two of the world's rarest moments. The exquisite finesse of Weber's overtures was attracted by the stillness of the great hall. Such exalted moments rarely come.

The enormous difficulties and intricacies of the "Don Juan" score were tossed off with abandon. This work has never before, in ready recollection, sounded so transparently clear, the component parts never so relatively balanced.

A word as to Dr. Muck. Much surprise has generally been stated as to his quiet demeanor, his dignified, scholarly bearing. While appreciated, it was not expected. One scarcely sees the cause. Why expect, even, a performing, silhouetted marionette? A true conductor, like a true critic, should direct attention to the work of his chosen author, not use another's house on which to fly his own colors. To be an individual does not necessarily mean to stand out of the picture. It may merely mean to form a finely blended, suitable background on occasion for another's more timely, more appropriate pose. And so with Dr. Muck's fine, authentic conducting.

Says Dr. Crothers:—"If a person can't be original without making a mess of it, why be original at all?" A man need not be lack-lustre. He may possess, as does this eminent conductor, the passive personality.

"What most people relish is hardly music; it is rather a drowsy revery, relieved by nervous thrills." Such a view, as expressed by Professor Santayana, could never be held of the readings of this wisely clairvoyant scholar, lately among us.

ss

BRAHMS PLAYED BY MASTER HANDS

Dr. Karl Muck and Walter Damrosch Both Conduct the C Minor Symphony.

Whatever else Dr. Karl Muck may do as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, his performance of the Brahms C minor symphony Saturday afternoon at Carnegie hall will long be enshrined in the memory of those that heard it.

If it were true, as some temperate admirers of Brahms would have it, that the composer needs a more than ordinary power of interpretation to reach the hearts and minds of listeners, and that his music in fact depends upon the actual addition of a great personality as a factor in performance—if this were true, then no Brahmsite or simple music lover could have asked or imagined a truer cooperative spirit than that of Dr. Muck.

Not in recent years has New York heard a more eloquent, more inspired reading of this master work. The opening movement might have portrayed the gods in meditation, over the chaos of some primal world. The second—if one chooses to call the symphony "The Creation"—suggested their foreknowledge of a world's sorrow. In the third one could feel the hushed brooding that preceded the elemental stir and animation of the finale—for with the Beethoven-like theme of the last allegro, a world is veritably launched, full powered, upon its orbit.

Very beautiful was Dr. Muck's proportioning of this noble symphonic structure, very admirable his shaping of every detail in its relation to the whole. The Boston orchestra has rarely put to its credit a better piece of work. And the audience was deeply stirred, so that Dr. Muck won delighted and unreserved applause, and many recalls.

TRANSCRIPT, NOVEMBER 12, 1906

Dr. Muck's Second Concert in New York

Dr. Muck conducted for the second time in New York on Saturday afternoon, and his programme was nearly that of the third pair of Symphony concerts here—Brahms's symphony in C-minor, Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan," Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz," and also his overture to "Oberon," which was substituted for the three fragments from "The Damnation of Faust," which completed the list in Boston. Again the audience filled the hall, and again it was most enthusiastic, recalling Dr. Much six times at the end of the symphony. Nearly all the reviewers are as warm in praise, and Mr. Henderson's article in the Sun of yesterday is worth quoting, for the keen perception of Dr. Muck, as we in Boston know him from longer acquaintance, that it discloses:

"Dr. Muck made a stronger impression than he did on Thursday night. He seemed to feel surer of himself and his hearers. He had learned the temper of New York music lovers and he reached out after emotions, which had to meet him more than half-way at the evening concert. What will be the probable change in the style of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under him was indicated in the Brahms symphony. There was nothing startling in Dr. Muck's reading. Tempi and nuances were those established by the clear indications of the score. But where under Mr. Gericke all was subdued and exquisitely polished, under Dr. Muck some of the Ciceronian nicety was swept away. The new conductor even permitted his men in one or two places to slip from that military precision of attack and that machine-like unanimity which were inseparable from every performance under the inexorable baton of his predecessor. These were but momentary failings, however, and for the most part the orchestra maintained its traditions of finish. But in muscularity, incisiveness, brilliancy and power it far outshone anything it has done in recent seasons. The performance of the magnificent last movement of the symphony was one of the most eloquent ever given in this city. It was inspiring to hear. The audience felt the inspiration of the performance and rewarded the conductor with six recalls. These recalls really meant something, for conductors, unlike pianists, do not play encore numbers.

"The other compositions on the programme were Weber's 'Oberon' overture; Richard Strauss's 'Don Juan' and Weber's 'Der Freischütz' overture. It was a formidable test for the music of Weber, but none the less triumphant. The florid old overtures stood their own handsomely in the presence of the philosophizing of the arch-realist of Munich. It seems that Weber was really a composer of talent. The Strauss music was superbly played yesterday. Dr. Muck conducted it con amore, for he and Strauss are associates in artistic labor. If the first two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were fairly prophetic of what is to come, we shall probably have less perfection of tonal smoothness, less elegance and repose in performance and less conservatism in idea. In their places we may expect more boldness, more spirit, more of the golden thunders of the trumpet, more of the cymbal's martial clang. In short, the hand that was shod in kid has given way to bared fingers, with polished skin, indeed, but with sinews of steel underneath."

The Times adds, as justly and discriminatingly: "The concert deepened and strengthened the confidence in Dr. Muck as a conductor of strong musical gifts and high technical acquirement. It was an altogether noble and beautiful performance of Brahms's symphony and thoroughly deserving of the prolonged outburst of enthusiasm it caused. It was one that brought out every detail, every touch of color, every contrasting phrase and point of imitation in the work; one that composed all its parts in their proper relation, and that built up the symmetrical and nobly proportioned whole. It was quickened with imagination and touched everywhere with life and enthusiasm. So magnificent and altogether imposing a climax as he secured in the last movement is most rarely to be heard in a symphonic performance. . . . Strauss's tone-poem was played with dazzling brilliancy and irresistible energy; and here again the careful exposition of the thematic structure, even in all the welter of sound, contributed greatly to the impression made. Dr. Muck's reading of the two Weber overtures was equally brilliant."

Y. EV'G WORLD
NOV 12 1906

Rival Orchestras Play Brahms's First Symphony

Musical Season Made Interesting by a Merry War of Conductors.

NOT the least interesting phase of the great kaleidoscopic season of music that is just unfolding for the edification of New Yorkers is that presented by the rival conductors of leading orchestras. It is idle to talk of the bad taste of comparisons. They are inevitable. Every listener will form an opinion. How may a reviewer avoid expressing a judgment?

Dr. Karl Muck, in his first two concerts as the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has shown his mettle sufficiently to reconcile most people to the loss of their old favorite, William Gericke. Walter Damrosch, with the New York Symphony Orchestra, has already demonstrated the growth of himself and his men in artistic stature. This week Modest Altschuler, with the Russian Symphony Orchestra, the youngest of our institutions, and Safonoff, the masterful Russian directing the Philharmonic—the oldest of our organizations—will enter the lists. Let the merry war go on!

It was a bit hard on Walter Damrosch that he should have to lead the New York Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday night, through Brahms's first symphony in C minor, which Dr. Muck, with that matchless band from the Hub had interpreted in the same place in the afternoon, to the delight of a crowded house. But he did it manfully. The performance was highly creditable to himself and to his men. Mr. Damrosch's leading was searching and illuminative, and the composition was played with a breadth and fervor that were uplifting.

HE MORNING TELEGRAPH
NEW YORK CITY.
NOV 12 1906

Dr. Karl Muck Is Not Only a Great Musician, but He Is a Great Man.

We pause to congratulate our German visitor, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—not because he is a musician of the first class but because he is a man of human sympathies and breadth of mind. His own fame is secure, and he realized that it will not suffer if he concede that his triumphs are due in part at least to the men who labor with him.

The matinee concert at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon was a notable event—notable because of the attendance and more notable still because of the almost inspired interpretation Dr. Muck gave to the symphonies. And again it was notable for the incident which moves us to congratulate him. As we have said, his professional fame is secure, and he doesn't need to be praised for what he does in a professional way. At the conclusion of the concert Dr. Muck thanked his players and bade them rise and accept the applause of the audience standing.

This is not usual, but it is gratifying. Too many stars seem to be of the opinion that there is not enough glory to go around, and they diligently keep their associates out of the "spotlight." These associates are deserving frequently, if less talented than the principal. The German conductor has set an example that others well might follow without offending the public.

m
dress
te

PAST CONCERTS

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Muck, gave the opening concerts of its New York season at Carnegie Hall, 8 and 10 November.

Dr. Muck received a magnificent welcome on each occasion. The programmes were as follows:

No. 1
Symphony in C minor, No. 5 ..... Beethoven
Eine Faust Overture ..... Wagner
Siegfried Idyll ..... "
Prelude to Die Meistersinger ..... "

No. 2
Symphony in C Minor, No. 1 ..... Brahms
Overture to Oberon ..... Weber
Tone Poem, Don Juan ..... R. Strauss
Overture to Der Freischütz ..... Weber

Miss Edna Richolson, pianist, assisted by the N. Y. Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch conductor, gave an interesting concert at Carnegie Hall, Friday evening, 9 November. Programme:

Overture, Mignon ..... Thomas
Orchestra
Concerto for piano, F minor, Op. 21 ..... Chopin
Miss Richolson
Ballet Music from Coppelia ..... Delibes a Festival Dance and Waltz of the Hours
b Notturno
c Dance of the Automaton
Orchestra
Concerto for piano, E flat, No. 1 ..... Liszt
Miss Richolson

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON TRAVELER NOVEMBER 15, 1906.

BOSTON'S now famous, and deservedly so, Longy Club ushered in its seventh season, last evening, in Potter Hall, with a programme that will long be remembered by those fortunate enough to be present. That programme included a quintet in E major by H. Woolett for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon; Handel's Air Varie, Weber's Menuet, and four Greig selections all for flute, oboe, two clarinets and two bassoons; Bach, Schumann and Godard numbers for oboe and piano; and Beethoven's octet in E flat major for two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.

A more delightful concert from every point of view this great organization has not given. All four movements in the Woolett selection were treats, particularly the third and fourth, and well merited the enthusiastic recognition accorded them. The Handel, Weber and Greig compositions did not seem to take quite as well, although all were exquisitely played. Whatever they lacked, however, in the way of stirring the musical nerve was more than made up in the selections following for oboe and piano played by Mr. Longy and Mr. DeVoto, each a thorough artist and never heard to better advantage. The Beethoven octet sounded just a bit tame after the remarkable playing of these artists. The club's second concert will be given on Wednesday evening, Jan. 16.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
N. Y. EV'G SUN
ess
NOV 16 1906

Fates decreed yesterday that the two bands most eagerly rivalling Boston Symphony and Philharmonic standards should together defy one of the gala days of our "barbarous" climate. But the New York Symphony presented the more fleeting guest, while the Russian Symphony is shortly to be heard again, in December, with so distinguished a newcomer as the Russian composer Scriabine.

Mr. Altschuler planned his opening of a fourth season here with Petschnikoff as soloist and with a piece of orchestra music that New Yorkers turn out in any weather to hear, the Tschaikowsky "Symphony Pathétique." This he plays on Sunday, as already told.

ess

The first adverse criticism of Dr. Muck's work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not yet been heard. He has won full respect wherever he has appeared, and he has won it without managerial boosting. Dr. Muck always offers his best with such modesty that were it not conspicuously good he would attract little appreciation. There is nothing theatrical about the man, and he would not permit such inartistic announcements as are employed in booming many visiting professionals.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AT HARTFORD.

A Fine Concert Under the New Conductor, Dr Muck.

At the concert of the Boston symphony orchestra in Hartford last evening popular interest centered in the appearance of the new conductor, Dr Karl Muck. Readers of the daily newspapers can hardly fail to be familiar with his name and face and with the favorable comments which his conducting has elicited in Boston and New York. All this had aroused a curiosity to see Mr Gericke's successor and to hear the orchestra under his direction, which accounted for the unusually large audience. The program was made up of only three numbers, two of which formed a part of Dr Muck's opening concert in Boston and this country, Wagner's overture to "Die Meistersinger" and Beethoven's fifth symphony. The other number was Spohr's ninth concerto for violin, played by Prof Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra.

Dr Muck's entrance upon the stage, looking like the current portraits of himself intensified, was the signal for a hearty greeting from the audience, which he acknowledged with a dignified and yet cordial manner. His quick walk, his tall, slender figure, his grasp of the baton, all betoken a high strung, nervous temperament. That he has this well in hand, however, was seen by his quiet, controled motions in directing. He employed no unnecessary gyrations, no useless pounding of the desk, no wild waving in the air as if to make himself the center of observation. In regard to the externals of conducting he showed no eccentricity whatsoever.

Nor in the interpretation of the works at last night's concert was there anything startling, nothing which overthrew cherished traditions. A different tempo here, a motive emphasized there, a climax intensified in one place or another, such things as these could be noted. In the overture to "Die Meistersinger" the operatic conductor was perceived, as would be expected. The dramatic contrasts were observed and the magnificent climax at the close was not repressed.

In taking Beethoven's fifth symphony for his initial concerts in this country Dr Muck has done a popular and a tactful thing. Probably no other Beethoven symphony is so widely known and so generally beloved as the C minor. Thus a basis of comparison between conductors is found for those who must make comparisons, and for others there is the delight of hearing a familiar and favorite composition. Part of this popularity is no doubt due to the easily grasped motive with which the symphony begins, and to the often-quoted remark of Beethoven, "Thus fate knocks at the door," but more is to be attributed to the universal appeal which it makes to the soul. The struggle in the first movement can be felt by all, and that without any extravagant reading on the part of the conductor. Dr Muck took no unusual liberties with the score. He read the music as it was written, with no exaggerated extremes of tempo, but with elasticity enough to make it sound spontaneous.

In the ideally beautiful andante the romantic bent of the conductor had a chance to reveal itself. The tempo chosen was somewhat slower than that of many conductors, but gave no suggestion of dragging or over-sentimentality. Exquisite shading and a sense of proportion made the interpretation of this movement a thing to linger long in the memory. The audience plainly appreciated this, for they gave added applause. In the scherzo the fateful atmosphere of the symphony was preserved; it was not too gay and trivial. Even the elephantine gambols of the basses in the trio were more dignified than usual. The last movement was carried out with all the breadth and sonorousness which it requires. The juxtaposition of the overture to "Die Meistersinger" brought out very clearly the resemblance between the marchlike themes of both.

Mr Hess as a violin soloist is still something of a novelty in this vicinity, though he has speedily become an established favorite in Boston. The Spohr concerto is an effective work of the classical type. Spohr knew his instrument and wrote for it melodies of beautiful contour and brilliant passages with consummate skill. The first movement affords the greatest depth and variety of content, the second is of lyric beauty, and the third is of a showy virtuosity. In all of these Mr Hess shone like the accomplished artist he is. His full tone, firm, easy bowing and brilliant technique served as a means of a masterly interpretation. Mr Hess, upon being recalled, bowed a gracious acknowledgment.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK DAILY NEWS
n ress
e
NOV 16

DR. KARL MUCK CONSERVATIVE

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is broadly conservative in music. He claims that we find little inspiration in the music written to-day, which is of criticism and analysis, and not of creation. He believes that absolute music reached its greatest beauty in Beethoven and operatic music in the operas of Mozart and the music dramas of Richard Wagner. He finds much that is interesting in the works of the modern Russians, who, although often bizarre and brutal, are sincere, and that they write as they feel. He likes the strong national note in their music, and envies the Russians their rich store of folk material. The modern Frenchmen are interesting, although theirs is too often the music of the head instead of the heart. He admires Richard Strauss and Mahler, but in Reger can find neither beauty nor coherency.

[69]

MUSIC AND DRAMA

NEW AND OLD MUSIC BY THE LONGY CLUB

Some Interesting Comparisons—A Weighty Appeal for Edward MacDowell—Mme Nazimoff, the Russian, Acts in English—News of the Day In and Out of Boston

The Longy Club of players upon wind instruments, from the Symphony Orchestra, gave its first concert for the current season, in Potter Hall, last evening, before an audience that rewarded its virtuosity with inteligent appreciation. The programme was:

Woollett: Quintet in E major on French popular themes for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon. (New.)
Händel: Air Varié (Suite V.)
Weber: Menuetto.
Grieg: Four Small Pieces.
For flute, oboe, two clarinets and two bassoons.
Bach: Allegro from Sonata No. 2, in E-flat major.
Schumann: Romance.
Godard: Highlanders' March (from "Scotch Scenes").
For oboe and piano.
Beethoven: Octet (Op. 103) in E-flat major for two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.

A few French composers still write chamber music for wind instruments, and so uphold an honorable convention of French music and cultivate a field where their lightness and neatness of touch, their grace of bizarre or poetic fancy, their delicacy of taste and polished elegance of expression find agreeable conditions. Unlike most other composers of our time, they write it not as a trifling pastime or as an amiable tour de force, but from innate aptitude and sincere inclination. They believe that such music may still have vitality, and that there is no need to crib it in old forms or to clothe it with archaic utterance. It may be quite as interesting, they say, and much more alive when it is written in the newest and freest of ultra-modern fashions. In this way, Mr. Woollett wrote the quintet that the Longy Club played for the first time here. His form is free and individual, even to a finale which is no rippling allegro or whirling presto, but a simple, deeply felt and earnestly modulated song. His harmonies are as individual and imaginative. Fancy shapes them and feeling for the delicate differences of his instrumental voices colors them. His modulations are often fascinating and his combinations piquant. Yet through all the music runs a sense of effort, and no instruments more need to sing and to speak spontaneously than a wind choir. Mr. Woollett puts a scherzo into his quintet. He wills it; therefor he writes it; but it is deliberate labor and little else. Ingenious and fanciful harmonies and the charm of one or two episodes brighten his opening allegro, but do not hide the toiling diligence with rather uninteresting melodies. It is only in the slow movements that his imagination warms him and his hand goes free. Yet even there is this ultra-modern speech quite the natural voice of wind instruments? Does Mr. Woollett at his best quite justify his faith in new fashions for them?

Not so fully, as it seemed to us, as Händel, Weber, Bach, Schumann and Beethoven justified the older way and the older speech in the music that followed. True Händel's varied air and Weber's minuet were only transcriptions for choir, but it spoke the bright and fluent charm, the little rhythmic fancies, the air of elegant caprice, the feeling for a glorified ballroom that are in Weber when he writes music of the dance. In the minuet, as in Händel's courtly variations—you could almost see the bow that went with each one to the eighteenth-century salon of "noble patrons"—there was a plain suitability between the musical ideas and form and the musical means that uttered them. With Bach's allegro, Schumann's romance, and Beethoven's octet, this sense of assimilation of substance, form and medium went further, until it brought nearly the fusion of all three in which music approaches its ideal. Take Schumann's little romance, played as exquisitely as Mr. Longy played it, and the oboe becomes the perfect voice of wistful grace and gentle musing. The sympathetic union of thought, mood and utterance could hardly be more complete. Take, again, Beethoven's octet. Listen especially to the slow movement and to the minuet. There is suave and tender song in the one, gracious and wooing in melody, warm in spontaneous expression, and so rich and varied in its coloring that the listener forgets for the moment that here are only oboes, clarinets, horns and bassoons, and in another instant realizes that only these could give such felicitious tints. In the scherzo, similarly, there is apt instrumental humor. The different voices speak a little tonal comedy that is all brightness and gayety. The blending in both of matter, manner and speech is nearly perfect. The listener questioned Mr. Woollett's music. He yielded unquestioningly to Beethoven's, Schumann's and Weber's. H. T. P.

Y. EVG WORLD
1 3 1906

Rival Orchestras Play Brahms's First Symphony

Musical Season Made Interesting by a Merry War of Conductors.

NOT the least interesting phase of the great kaleidoscopic season of music that is just unfolding for the edification of New Yorkers is that presented by the rival conductors of leading orchestras. It is idle to talk of the bad taste of comparisons. They are inevitable. Every listener will form an opinion. How may a reviewer avoid expressing a judgment?

Dr. Karl Muck, in his first two concerts as the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has shown his mettle sufficiently to reconcile most people to the loss of their old favorite, William Gericke. Walter Damrosch, with the New York Symphony Orchestra, has already demonstrated the growth of himself and his men in artistic stature. This week Modest Altschuler, with the Russian Symphony Orchestra, the youngest of our institutions, and Safonoff, the masterful Russian directing the Philharmonic—the oldest of our organizations—will enter the lists. Let the merry war go on!

It was a bit hard on Walter Damrosch that he should have to lead the New York Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday night, through Brahms's first symphony in C minor, which Dr. Muck, with that matchless band from the Hub had interpreted in the same place in the afternoon, to the delight of a crowded house. But he did it manfully. The performance was highly creditable to himself and to his men. Mr. Damrosch's leading was searching and illuminative, and the composition was played with a breadth and fervor that were uplifting.

E MORNING TELEGRAPH
2 1906

Dr. Karl Muck Is Not Only a Great Musician, but He Is a Great Man.

We pause to congratulate our German visitor, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—not because he is a musician of the first class but because he is a man of human sympathies and breadth of mind. His own fame is secure, and he realized that it will not suffer if he concede that his triumphs are due in part at least to the men who labor with him.

The matinee concert at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon was a notable event—notable because of the attendance and more notable still because of the almost inspired interpretation Dr. Muck gave to the symphonies. And again it was notable for the incident which moves us to congratulate him. As we have said, his professional fame is secure, and he doesn't need to be praised for what he does in a professional way. At the conclusion of the concert Dr. Muck thanked his players and bade them rise and accept the applause of the audience standing.

This is not usual, but it is gratifying. Too many stars seem to be of the opinion that there is not enough glory to go around, and they diligently keep their associates out of the "spotlight." These associates are deserving frequently, if less talented than the principal. The German conductor has set an example that others well might follow without offending the public.

om

dress

te

PAST CONCERTS

THe Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Muck, gave the opening concerts of its New York season at Carnegie Hall, 8 and 10 November.

Dr. Muck received a magnificent welcome on each occasion. The programmes were as follows:

No. 1

Symphony in C minor, No. 5 ..... Beethoven
Eine Faust Overture ..... Wagner
Siegfried Idyll ..... "
Prelude to Die Meistersinger ..... "

No. 2

Symphony in C Minor, No. 1 ..... Brahms
Overture to Oberon ..... Weber
Tone Poem, Don Juan ..... R. Strauss
Overture to Der Freischütz ..... Weber

Miss Edna Richolson, pianist, assisted by the N. Y. Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch conductor, gave an interesting concert at Carnegie Hall, Friday evening, 9 November. Programme:

Overture, Mignon ..... Thomas
Orchestra
Concerto for piano, F minor, Op. 21 ..... Chopin
Miss Richolson
Ballet Music from Coppelia ..... Delibes a Festival Dance and Waltz of the Hours
b Notturno
c Dance of the Automaton
Orchestra
Concerto for piano, E flat, No. 1 ..... Liszt
Miss Richolson

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess

The first adverse criticism of Dr. Muck's work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not yet been heard. He has won full respect wherever he has appeared, and he has won it without managerial boosting. Dr. Muck always offers his best with such modesty that were it not conspicuously good he would attract little appreciation. There is nothing theatrical about the man, and he would not permit such inartistic announcements as are employed in booming many visiting professionals.

BOSTON TRAVELER NOVEMBER 15, 1906.

BOSTON'S now famous, and deservedly so, Longy Club ushered in its seventh season, last evening, in Potter Hall, with a programme that will long be remembered by those fortunate enough to be present. That programme included a quintet in E major by H. Woolett for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon; Handel's Air Varie, Weber's Menuet, and four Greig selections all for flute, oboe, two clarinets and two bassoons; Bach, Schumann and Godard numbers for oboe and piano; and Beethoven's octet in E flat major for two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.

A more delightful concert from every point of view this great organization has not given. All four movements in the Woolett selection were treats, particularly the third and fourth, and well merited the enthusiastic recognition accorded them. The Handel, Weber and Greig compositions did not seem to take quite as well, although all were exquisitely played. Whatever they lacked, however, in the way of stirring the musical nerve was more than made up in the selections following for oboe and piano played by Mr. Longy and Mr. DeVoto, each a thorough artist and never heard to better advantage. The Beethoven octet sounded just a bit tame after the remarkable playing of these artists. The club's second concert will be given on Wednesday evening, Jan. 16.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Fates decreed yesterday that the two bands most eagerly rivalling Boston Symphony and Philharmonic standards should together defy one of the gala days of our "barbarous" climate. But the New York Symphony presented the more fleeting guest, while the Russian Symphony is shortly to be heard again, in December, with so distinguished a newcomer as the Russian composer Scriabine.

Mr. Altsch ler planned his opening of a fourth season here with Petschnikoff as soloist and with a piece of orchestra music that New Yorkers turn out in any weather to hear, the Tschaikowsky "Symphony Pathétique." This he plays on Sunday, as already told.

[69]

THE SPRINGFIELD DAILY REPUBLICAN
NOVEMBER 14, 1906

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AT HARTFORD

A Fine Concert Under the New Conductor, Dr Muck.

At the concert of the Boston symphony orchestra in Hartford last evening popular interest centered in the appearance of the new conductor, Dr Karl Muck. Readers of the daily newspapers can hardly fail to be familiar with his name and face and with the favorable comments which his conducting has elicited in Boston and New York. All this had aroused a curiosity to see Mr Gericke's successor and to hear the orchestra under his direction, which accounted for the unusually large audience. The program was made up of only three numbers, two of which formed a part of Dr Muck's opening concert in Boston and this country, Wagner's overture to "Die Meistersinger" and Beethoven's fifth symphony. The other number was Spohr's ninth concerto for violin, played by Prof Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra.

Dr Muck's entrance upon the stage, looking like the current portraits of himself intensified, was the signal for a hearty greeting from the audience, which he acknowledged with a dignified and yet cordial manner. His quick walk, his tall, slender figure, his grasp of the baton, all betoken a high strung, nervous temperament. That he has this well in hand, however, was seen by his quiet, controled motions in directing. He employed no unnecessary gyrations, no useless pounding of the desk, no wild waving in the air as if to make himself the center of observation. In regard to the externals of conducting he showed no eccentricity whatsoever.

Nor in the interpretation of the works at last night's concert was there anything startling, nothing which overthrew cherished traditions. A different tempo here, a motive emphasized there, a climax intensified in one place or another, such things as these could be noted. In the overture to "Die Meistersinger" the operatic conductor was perceived, as would be expected. The dramatic contrasts were observed and the magnificent climax at the close was not repressed.

In taking Beethoven's fifth symphony for his initial concerts in this country Dr Muck has done a popular and a tactful thing. Probably no other Beethoven symphony is so widely known and so generally beloved as the C minor. Thus a basis of comparison between conductors is found for those who must make comparisons, and for others there is the delight of hearing a familiar and favorite composition. Part of this popularity is no doubt due to the easily grasped motive with which the symphony begins, and to the often-quoted remark of Beethoven, "Thus fate knocks at the door," but more is to be attributed to the universal appeal which it makes to the soul. The struggle in the first movement can be felt by all, and that without any extravagant reading on the part of the conductor. Dr Muck took no unusual liberties with the score. He read the music as it was written, with no exaggerated extremes of tempo, but with elasticity enough to make it sound spontaneous.

In the ideally beautiful andante the romantic bent of the conductor had a chance to reveal itself. The tempo chosen was somewhat slower than that of many conductors, but gave no suggestion of dragging or over-sentimentality. Exquisite shading and a sense of proportion made the interpretation of this movement a thing to linger long in the memory. The audience plainly appreciated this, for they gave added applause. In the scherzo the fateful atmosphere of the symphony was preserved; it was not too gay and trivial. Even the elephantine gambols of the basses in the trio were more dignified than usual. The last movement was carried out with all the breadth and sonorousness which it requires. The juxtaposition of the overture to "Die Meistersinger" brought out very clearly the resemblance between the march-like themes of both.

Mr Hess as a violin soloist is still something of a novelty in this vicinity, though he has speedily become an established favorite in Boston. The Spohr concerto is an effective work of the classical type. Spohr knew his instrument and wrote for it melodies of beautiful contour and brilliant passages with consummate skill. The first movement affords the greatest depth and variety of content, the second is of lyric beauty, and the third is of a showy virtuosity. In all of these Mr Hess shone like the accomplished artist he is. His full tone, firm, easy bowing and brilliant technique served as a means of a masterly interpretation. Mr Hess, upon being recalled, bowed a gracious acknowledgment.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK DAILY NEWS

n

ress

e

DR. KARL MUCK CONSERVATIVE

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is broadly conservative in music. He claims that we find little inspiration in the music written to-day, which is of criticism and analysis, and not of creation. He believes that absolute music reached its greatest beauty in Beethoven and operatic music in the operas of Mozart and the music dramas of Richard Wagner. He finds much that is interesting in the works of the modern Russians, who, although often bizarre and brutal, are sincere, and that they write as they feel. He likes the strong national note in their music, and envies the Russians their rich store of folk material. The modern Frenchmen are interesting, although theirs is too often the music of the head instead of the heart. He admires Richard Strauss and Mahler, but in Roger can find neither beauty nor coherence.

Boston Evening Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1906

MUSIC AND DRAMA

NEW AND OLD MUSIC BY THE LONGY CLUB

Some Interesting Comparisons—A Weighty Appeal for Edward MacDowell—Mme Nasimoff, the Russian, Acts in English—News of the Day In and Out of Boston

The Longy Club of players upon wind instruments, from the Symphony Orchestra, gave its first concert for the current season, in Potter Hall, last evening, before an audience that rewarded its virtuosity with intelligent appreciation. The programme was:

Woollett: Quintet in E major on French popular themes for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon. (New.)

Händel: Air Varié (Suite V.)
Weber: Menuetto.
Grieg: Four Small Pieces.
For flute, oboe, two clarinets and two bassoons.

Bach: Allegro from Sonata No. 2, in E-flat major.
Schumann: Romance.
Godard: Highlanders' March (from "Scotch Scenes").
For oboe and piano.

Beethoven: Octet (Op. 103) in E-flat major for two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons.

A few French composers still write chamber music for wind instruments, and so uphold an honorable convention of French music and cultivate a field where their lightness and neatness of touch, their grace of bizarre or poetic fancy, their delicacy of taste and polished elegance of expression find agreeable conditions. Unlike most other composers of our time, they write it not as a trifling pastime or as an amiable tour de force, but from innate aptitude and sincere inclination. They believe that such music may still have vitality, and that there is no need to crib it in old forms or to clothe it with archaic utterance. It may be quite as interesting, they say, and much more alive when it is written in the newest and freest of ultra-modern fashions. In this way, Mr. Woollett wrote the quintet that the Longy Club played for the first time here. His form is free and individual, even to a finale which is no rippling allegro or whirling presto, but a simple, deeply felt and earnestly modulated song. His harmonies are as individual and imaginative. Fancy shapes them and feeling for the delicate differences of his instrumental voices colors them. His modulations are often fascinating and his combinations piquant. Yet through all the music runs a sense of effort, and no instruments more need to sing and to speak spontaneously than a wind choir. Mr. Woollett puts a scherzo into his quintet. He wills it; therefor he writes it; but it is deliberate labor and little else. Ingenious and fanciful harmonies and the charm of one or two episodes brighten his opening allegro, but do not hide the toiling diligence with rather uninteresting melodies. It is only in the slow movements that his imagination warms him and his hand goes free. Yet even there is this ultra-modern speech quite the natural voice of wind instruments? Does Mr. Woollett at his best quite justify his faith in new fashions for them?

Not so fully, as it seemed to us, as Händel, Weber, Bach, Schumann and Beethoven justified the older way and the older speech in the music that followed. True Händel's varied air and Weber's minuet were only transcriptions for choir, but it spoke the bright and fluent charm, the little rhythmic fancies, the air of elegant caprice, the feeling for a glorified ballroom that are in Weber when he writes music of the dance. In the minuet, as in Händel's courtly variations—you could almost see the bow that went with each one to the eighteenth-century salon of "noble patrons"—there was a plain suitability between the musical ideas and form and the musical means that uttered them. With Bach's allegro, Schumann's romance, and Beethoven's octet, this sense of assimilation of substance, form and medium went further, until it brought nearly the fusion of all three in which music approaches its ideal. Take Schumann's little romance, played as exquisitely as Mr. Longy played it, and the oboe becomes the perfect voice of wistful grace and gentle musing. The sympathetic union of thought, mood and utterance could hardly be more complete. Take, again, Beethoven's octet. Listen especially to the slow movement and to the minuet. There is suave and tender song in the one, gracious and wooing in melody, warm in spontaneous expression, and so rich and varied in its coloring that the listener forgets for the moment that here are only oboes, clarinets, horns and bassoons, and in another instant realizes that only these could give such felicitious tints. In the scherzo, similarly, there is apt instrumental humor. The different voices speak a little tonal comedy that is all brightness and gayety. The blending in both of matter, manner and speech is nearly perfect. The listener questioned Mr. Woollett's music. He yielded unquestioningly to Beethoven's, Schumann's and Weber's.

H. T. P.

Issued Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXX., No. 138.
THURSDAY, NOV. 15, 1906.

FIRST CONCERT OF LONGY CLUB

New Quintet by Woollett Is a Feature—Fine Artistry of Mr. Longy.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The Longy Club (Messrs. D. Maquarre and Brooke, Longy and Lenon, Griess and Mimart, Hain and Lorbeer, Sadony and Heilebers, and De Voto) gave the first concert of its seventh season last night in Potter Hall. The programme included H. Woollett's quintet in E major on French popular themes for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon; Handel's varied air (suite V), menuetto by Weber, four small pieces by Grieg for flute, oboe, two clarinets and two bassoons; Bach's allegro from Sonata No. 2 in E flat major, Schumann's Romance, and Godard's Highlander's March for oboe and piano; Beethoven's octet, op. 103, for wind instruments.

It will be seen that the programme was well varied. It included an unfamiliar quintet of the modern French school, a set of transcriptions of piano pieces, solos for Mr. Longy and the octet of Beethoven, which, entitled originally a "Parthia" and written in his early years at Bonn, was not published until after his death, but he turned it into the string quintet op. 4. The sonata for piano, violin, and violoncello op. 87 is another arrangement.

The quintet by Woollett is modern, but not steadily ultra-modern in form or harmonic thought. The opening movement is logically developed, but it interests by its poetic episodes rather than by the treatment of the chief theme. The second movement, an andante, is a fine example of romantic melancholy and it has genuine beauty. The scherzo is labored in its lightness, and the contrasting section has more musical worth. The finale, moderato, is an agreeable relief from the conventional ending of suites for wind instruments, in which fuss and fury generally predominate. Throughout the work the instruments are treated by the composer with freedom and with an intimate knowledge of their resources in obtaining effects of color and in establishing moods.

The transcriptions were not so effective. Handel's air and variations seemed stiff and stupid. The menuetto lacked brilliance and the peculiar chivalric spirit so characteristic of the composer that it often became a mere external mannerism. The "Young Bird" of Grieg was at times broken-winged and hoarse-throated, and the "Elves" of the same composer were leaden-heeled in their dance. "In My Fatherland" and "Lonely Traveller" stood the test of transcription much better.

Mr. Longy played with consummate artistry the group of three solo pieces, and his rare skill and taste were displayed in the classic allegro of Bach, in the intimate expression of Schumann's sentiment, and in Godard's bravura. Excellent, too, was the performance of the club in all that pertains to true ensemble.

There were appreciative musicians in the audience and the applause was hearty, but there were many vacant seats. Mr. Longy and his comrades might say to Bostonians, in the words of the children sitting in the market place: "We have piped unto you and ye have not danced." It is a pity that these admirable concerts are not better attended in a city that has long plumed itself on being "a musical centre."

The second concert will be given on Wednesday evening, Jan. 16.

Boston Transcript
November 16, 1906

Musical News

It is a pity that we in Boston are not to hear Mr. Saint-Saëns as a pianist when he gives his concert here with the Symphony Orchestra a week from Monday. True, he will conduct, and he does that nowhere else in the course of his American tour. One may not conduct, especially when one is seventy-two, and then go to the piano with a supple wrist and fingers. Yesterday, however, in New York, Mr. Saint-Saëns played the piano part in his concerto in G minor, that almost every distinguished pianist, and many that are undistinguished, have played at one time or another, and all the reviewers write warmly today of the performance. Mr. Aldrich in the Times speaks for them: "It would be unfair to compare this performance with that of a young man in the plenitude of his strength, for Dr. Saint-Saëns is seventy-two years old, and has no longer the power to produce a tone upon the piano to cope with that of the orchestra. Under the circumstances it was a remarkable performance. It was remarkable in the clearness and cogency with which he expounded the themes of the first movement even though he did not reveal fully the grandeur of the opening improvisation in the manner of Bach; for there is a power in restraint, and the sense of just proportion which he has and which not all the virtuoso interpreters of the concerto have been able to realize. It was remarkable also in the clearness and sparkle and vivacity of much of his playing of the brilliant passage work of the last two movements. He seemed at times to be carried away by the impetuosity of the music; the phrasing was now and again slighted, to the detriment of the rhythm, yet the grace of those captivating themes has not often been more persuasively presented. Small [illegible] undoubtedly, and so was the [illegible] ballet music, but [illegible] an ex- [illegible] melodies of

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

WEBER, CHOPIN AND SINDING MAKE THE PROGRAMME

Three Sorts of Romantic Feeling, and Dr. Muck's Skill in Contrasting Them—A New Week of Many Concerts—Other Concerts to Come—The Plans of the Hoffmann Quartet

Dr. Muck's programme for the fifth Symphony concert, yesterday afternoon, lacked the clarity and certainty of scheme that has distinguished its predecessors. Again, it was a romantic programme, but three sorts of romanticism divided it—the highly colored, declamatory, and dramatic romanticism of Weber's overture to his opera of "Oberon"; the subtly tinted, reticent and musing romanticism of Chopin's piano concerto in E-minor; and the sombre, deep-voiced and passionate romanticism of Sinding's symphony in D-minor. Sixty years in time separated the overture and the concerto from the symphony, and the interval in imaginative and emotional content is far wider. German though Weber was, his romanticism in the overtures to "Der Freischütz" and to "Oberon" and in the "concert piece" for piano and orchestra that Mr. Reisenauer played last autumn, is of the sort that Théophile Gautier symbolized when he put on his flaming red waistcoat for the first performance of Victor Hugo's "Hernani" in Paris. It is romanticism with a flourish. "Allegro con fuoco" Weber scrawled in the score after the crashing chord that ends the soft mystery of the introduction and begins the main body of the overture.

. . . "Monts d'Aragon! Galice! Estramadoure!
Oh! je porte malheur à tout ce qui m'entoure!"

cries Hernani to Dona Sol at one of the crises in Hugo's play. There is the same flourish in the music and the verse—Hugo ought really to have made a libretto for Weber—the same loud, clear note of chivalry, the same voice of high-pitched and warmly colored romance. "Il tutto pianissimo possibile" is Weber's direction at the beginning of the overture; in imagination he must have heard, and yesterday he could in fact have heard, Oberon's horn call in the purest of tones; "presto con fuoco" goes the instruction further on; again there is warm-hued brilliance and again full-voiced musical speech. In a word, everything must tend to its extreme (as musical extremes went eighty years ago); everything must be declamatory; everything must be sharp-set in dramatic contrast to what precedes and follows it. Weber, in the "concert piece," could not help dramatizing the little story of the returning Crusader. In the overtures he is almost melodramatic. The orchestra must declaim in them as the actors do in their Hugo.

Delicate and super-delicate in immediate comparison seemed the romanticism of Chopin's concerto. Much of the overture was fiery inspiration; as much of the concerto, rather languorous meditation. It is easy to call the long and tedious "working-out" of the first movement mere adroit technical exercise. Perhaps it is quite as much gentle musing over the melodic material Chopin had already devised. It is sweet in the first movement; it becomes sweeter in the larghetto; it is little more than animated sweetness in the finale. Weber put into the overture the high emotions, the vivid sounds, the dramatic moods that Romance spoke in his ears. Chopin in the concerto heard only a gentle call, repeated as he mused upon it, and he answered it as gently. Weber's Romance trod the stage; Chopin's in the concerto was a gossamer vision, a thing of sweetness and of tender light. He could not make her voice too sweet, her step too graceful; and little cared he whether his concerto would sound thin and pale in a modern concert-room with a modern piano and a modern orchestra. Weber saw and cried his visions. Chopin dreamt in this particular concerto and barely spoke out. His is the loveliness of romance, the brightness of its little things.

Probably the audiences that were hearing "Oberon" and the concerto in E minor in the thirties would not have called Sinding's symphony romance at all. They would have heard it as some of us first heard "Thus Spake Zarathustra," or "A Hero's Life," as almost savage music. They would have recoiled at its incessant sonority, its sombre coloring, its insistent restlessness and striving, its bareness and boldness of idea and expression. Yet here, as truly as the romanticism of Weber and of Chopin is of their time and temperament, is another romanticism of ours, touched, indeed, by Sinding's own individuality, but still of his whole generation. Weber's romantic feeling saw glorious or darksome visions—knights sweeping up through the forest to the castle gate; or Oberon and his fairy court; or Samiel's haunted glen. "It is intended to convey beautiful memories, moonlit impressions," wrote Chopin as he dreamed of the soft song of his slow movement, and akin is the grace that dances in his rondo. For Sinding there are no implicit visions or moonlit impressions to put into tones. Romance has lost her brightness and her gentleness. Her robes are dark, and her voice deep. She fills her devotees with a passionate and sombre striving. They pursue her, as Sinding pursues her through the passionate sonorities of his first movement, now with a grim intensity, now with bold impetuosity. She calls to sombre meditation, to restless longing, to the bare, bleak song with which he fills his slow movement. She drives them to the shadowed gayety of his scherzo. And then he and they turn and pursue her again imperiously, almost savagely. "Her face is far from this our war, our call and counter-cry," but still she stirs the passion of men to reconquer her in all her brightness and gentleness. Strive they will, though it desolate their hearts and darken their pleasures, and it is this passionate eagerness and restlessness that Sinding puts into his music. They [illegible] did. They will conquer her as seeming would conquer her. His is the romance of a dark and troubled yet bold imagination, speaking with passionate utterance. Later, perhaps, he was to hold her captive and bright again in his "Chivalric Episodes."

There has been no better evidence of the acute intelligence, the imaginative discrimination and the clear emotional responsiveness of Dr. Muck's conducting than the skill and the vividness with which he differentiated Weber's, Chopin's and Sinding's music. Each composer seemed for the moment to be having his will. It was with the utmost of pianissimos that the overture to "Oberon" began; the horn calls haunted, and then the music leapt on its fiery way. The glow of romance burnt again in the overture. Familiar as every dramatic device is in it, the vitality remained. The orchestral part of Chopin's concerto, thin and scanty as it is, kept its characteristic note of gentle and musing swiftness. Then came the passionate sonorities, the endless restlessness, the bare bold tonal coloring of Sinding's symphony. Dr. Muck's vigor answered its largeness; his elasticity served its restlessness; he gave it a kind of bleak tonal color like yellow wintry lights piercing gray clouds. He brought the insistent and striving passion of it to full utterance, and he gave it a singular dramatic quality. Mr. d'Indy used to imply that a kind of dramatic action underlay and was in his mind as he wrote his second symphony. Sinding's symphony carries the same suggestion as though it were playing out the grim tragedy—here, and everywhere, in this time of ours—of the pursuit of romance.

H. T. P.

Concerts Next Week

The sixth pair of Symphony concerts, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, is altogether Russian. Dr. Muck has taken his music from three Russian composers, and the soloist, Mr. Petschnikoff, the violinist, is also Russian. One, moreover, of these Russian compositions is new to Boston—Glazounoff's fifth symphony, in B-flat major, first played in America some years ago under Anton Seidl, and since repeated by the Chicago Orchestra. Glazounoff's music in general has long been familiar on the programmes of the Symphony concerts, but this particular piece belongs to the time when his musical invention was freer and more individual than it is now. Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Betrothed of the Tsar," begins the concert, and between it and the symphony comes Tschaikowski's second concerto for violin with Mr. Petschnikoff to play the solo part. Only yesterday we were noting his reappearance in New York and quoting Mr. Henderson's praise of his nervous vigor and brilliance of [illegible]

On Monday evening, at eight, in Chickering Hall, the Symphony Quartet gives the second concert of its current series, with Mr. H. G. Tucker assisting as pianist. Two string quartets—Beethoven's in F minor (opus 95) and Hugo Kaun's in D-major (opus 41, No. 2) and Dvorák's quartet in E-flat major (opus 87) for piano, violin, viola and 'cello make the programme. Mr. Kaun's quartet is certainly new to Boston and probably to America. German by birth, he lived for some years in the West, where he became a protegé of Theodore Thomas, and his music has been played often at the concerts of the Chicago Orchestra. In Berlin, where he now lives, it is making its way, and one at least of his compositions in the larger forms has been played at the Symphony concerts. His later music has had the graces of melody and brevity.

BOSTON TRAVELER
NOVEMBER 17, 1906.

DR. MUCK'S sixth programme of the season will be devoted entirely to modern Russian music, and in this programme will come the first novelty of the season, Glazounoff's Symphony No. 5, in B-flat major. Two symphonies by this brilliant young composer have been played here, the fourth and the sixth, the latter having been played for the first time in the fall of '99 and the former in the fall of 1903. As Dr. Muck is confessedly an admirer of the Russians, this concert promises to be one of the most interesting of the season. The soloist will be the distinguished Russian violinist, Alexander Petschnikoff, who will play Tschaikowsky's concerto in D major.

The Boston Symphony Quartet will give its second concert in Chickering Hall, Monday evening, at 8 o'clock. The assisting artist will be Hiram G. Tucker of this city. What Prof. Hess promises to be one of the most interesting novelties of the season will be played in this programme. It is a Quartet in D major by Hugo Kaun. This quartet, so far as can be learned, has never been played in America.

The sale of seats for the postponed Saint-Saens concert is proceeding steadily at the box office of Symphony Hall. While it is always a disappointment to have to postpone a concert, the fact that M. Saint-Saens was not able to appear on the date first announced seems to have made little difference in the interest created by his coming to this city, as very few of the large number of mail orders received last month have been revoked. M. Saint-Saens will appear at Symphony Hall Monday evening, Nov. 26.

[illegible]ER 17, 1906

THE SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The Boston Symphony Quartet will give its second concert in Chickering Hall, Monday evening, at 8 o'clock. The assisting artist will be Hiram G. Tucker of this city. What Professor Hess promises to be one of the most interesting novelties of the season will be played in this program. It is a Quartet in D major by Hugo Kaun. This quartet, so far as can be learned has never been played in America. It is brilliantly melodious and short. The full program is as follows:

String quartet in F minor, Op. 95, Beethoven.
String quartet, D major, Op. 41, No. 2 (First time).....Hugo Kaun
Piano quartet, E-flat major, Op. 87.....Dvorak

SAINT-SAENS CONCERT.

The sale of seats for the postponed Saint-Saens concert, to be held Monday evening, Nov. 26, is proceeding steadily at the box office of Symphony Hall. While it is always a disappointment to have to postpone a concert, the fact that M. Saint-Saens was not able to appear on the date first announced seems to have made little difference in the interest created by his coming to this city, as very few of the large number of mail orders received last month have been revoked. M. Saint-Saens received a most enthusiastic welcome in New York, and so great was the desire to see him that two extra concerts have been announced for that city. He is looking forward with much interest to conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he has heard so much. The program will consist entirely of music by this famous French composer.

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHON[illegible]

Dr. Muck's sixth program of the season will be devoted entirely to modern Russian music, and in this program will come the first novelty of the season, Glazounoff's Symphony No. 5, in B flat major. The soloist will be the distinguished Russian violinist, Alexander Petschnikoff, who will play Tschaikowsky's violin concerto in D major. Following is the program:

Rimsky-Karsakoff, Overture, "The Betrothed of the Tsar"
Tschaikowsky, Concerto for violin in D major, No. 2
Glazounoff..Symphony No. 5, in B flat, op. 5[illegible] (First time)

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813
NOVEMBER 17, 1906.

Dr. Muck's sixth programme of the season will be devoted entirely to modern Russian music, and in this programme will come the first novelty of the season, Glazounoff's Symphony No. 5, in B-flat major. The soloist will be the distinguished Russian violinist, Alexander Petschnikoff, who will play Tschaikowsky's violin concerto in D-major.

[illegible] Quartette will give its second concert in Chickering hall Monday at 8 p.m. The assisting artist will be Hiram G. Tucker of this city. What Prof. Hess promises to be one of the most interesting novelties of the season will be played in this programme. It is a Quartet in D major by Hugo Kaun.

The sale of seats for the postponed Saint-Saens concert is proceeding steadily at the box office of Symphony hall. The programme will consist entirely of music by this famous French composer.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau [illegible]

[illegible]om.....

[illegible]dress.....

[illegible]te.....

According to W. E. Walter of Boston, Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, must be classed among the broad conservatives in music. He confesses that he finds little inspiration in the music which is being written today. In our search for beauty, we must still go back to the masters of the nineteenth century. The music of to-day, he thinks, reflects the spirit of the times, which is of criticism and analysis, not of creation. He believes that absolute music reached its greatest beauty in Beethoven and operatic music in the operas of Mozart and the music dramas of Richard Wagner. He finds much that is interesting in the modern Russians, who, although often bizarre and often brutal, are sincere and write as they feel. He likes the strong national note in their music, and envies the Russians their rich store of folk material. The modern Frenchmen are interesting, although theirs is too often the music of the head instead of the heart. He admires Richard Strauss and Mahler, but in Reger can find no beauty nor coherency.

At the close of a recent concert in London the singer—a lady—received from an admirer a basket filled with grapes and pineapples, instead of flowers. In some cases a basket of sandwiches would be still more acceptable, for many a foolish girl wastes her last cent in giving a concert in the vain hope of taking the musical world by storm.

[70]

BOSTON HERALD
Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL. CXX., No. 138.
THURSDAY, NOV. 15, 1906.

FIRST CONCERT OF LONGY CLUB

New Quintet by Woollett Is a Feature—Fine Artistry of Mr. Longy.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The Longy Club (Messrs. D. Maquarre and Brooke, Longy and Lenon, Grisez and Mimart, Hain and Lorbeer, Sadony and Helleberg, and De Voto) gave the first concert of its seventh season last night in Potter Hall. The programme included H. Woollett's quintet in E major on French popular themes for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon; Handel's varied air (suite V), menuetto by Weber, four small pieces by Grieg for flute, oboe, two clarinets and two bassoons; Bach's allegro from Sonata No. 2 in E flat major, Schumann's Romance, and Godard's Highlander's March for oboe and piano; Beethoven's octet, op. 103, for wind instruments.

It will be seen that the programme was well varied. It included an unfamiliar quintet of the modern French school, a set of transcriptions of piano pieces, solos for Mr. Longy and the octet of Beethoven, which, entitled originally a "Parthia" and written in his early years at Bonn, was not published until after his death, but he turned it into the string quintet op. 4. The sonata for piano, violin, and violoncello op. 63 is another arrangement.

The quintet by Woollett is modern, but not steadily ultra-modern in form or harmonic thought. The opening movement is logically developed, but it interests by its poetic episodes rather than by the treatment of the chief theme. The second movement, an andante, is a fine example of romantic melancholy and it has genuine beauty. The scherzo is labored in its lightness, and the contrasting section has more musical worth. The finale, moderato, is an agreeable relief from the conventional ending of suites for wind instruments, in which fuss and fury generally predominate. Throughout the work the instruments are treated by the composer with freedom and with an intimate knowledge of their resources in obtaining effects of color and in establishing moods.

The transcriptions were not so effective. Handel's air and variations seemed stiff and stupid. The menuetto lacked brilliance and the peculiar chivalric spirit so characteristic of the composer that it often became a mere external mannerism. The "Young Bird" of Grieg was at times broken-winged and hoarse-throated, and the "Elves" of the same composer were leaden-heeled in their dance. "In My Fatherland" and "Lonely Traveller" stood the test of transcription much better.

Mr. Longy played with consummate artistry the group of three solo pieces, and his rare skill and taste were displayed in the classic allegro of Bach in the intimate expression of Schumann's sentiment, and in Godard's bravura. Excellent, too, was the performance of the club in all that pertains to true ensemble.

There were appreciative musicians in the audience and the applause was hearty, but there were many vacant seats. Mr. Longy and his comrades might say to Bostonians, in the words of the children sitting in the market place: "We have piped unto you and ye have not danced." It is a pity that these admirable concerts are not better attended in a city that has long plumed itself on being "a musical centre."

The second concert will be given on Wednesday evening, Jan. 16.

Musical News

It is a pity that we in Boston are not to hear Mr. Saint-Saëns as a pianist when he gives his concert here with the Symphony Orchestra a week from Monday. True, he will conduct, and he does that nowhere else in the course of his American tour. One may not conduct, especially when one is seventy-two, and then go to the piano with a supple wrist and fingers. Yesterday, however, in New York, Mr. Saint-Saëns played the piano part in his concerto in G minor, that almost every distinguished pianist, and many that are undistinguished, have played at one time or another, and all the reviewers write warmly today of the performance. Mr. Aldrich in the Times speaks for them: "It would be unfair to compare this performance with that of a young man in the plenitude of his strength, for Dr. Saint-Saëns is seventy-two years old, and has no longer the power to produce a tone upon the piano to cope with that of the orchestra. Under the circumstances it was a remarkable performance. It was remarkable in the clearness and cogency with which he expounded the themes of the first movement even though he did not reveal fully the grandeur of the opening improvisation in the manner of Bach; for there is a power in restraint, and the sense of just proportion which he has and which not all the virtuoso interpreters of the concerto have been able to realize. It was remarkable also in the clearness and sparkle and vivacity of much of his playing of the brilliant passage work of the last two movements. He seemed at times to be carried away by the impetuosity of the music; the phrasing was now and again slighted, to the detriment of the rhythm, yet the grace of those captivating themes has not often been more persuasively presented. Small in scale it was, undoubtedly, and so was the caprice on the "Alceste" ballet music, but how charmingly, and with what an exquisite sense of color were the melodies of those airs sung upon the piano!"

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, NOVEMBER 17, 1906

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

WEBER, CHOPIN AND SINDING MAKE THE PROGRAMME

Three Sorts of Romantic Feeling, and Dr. Muck's Skill in Contrasting Them—A New Week of Many Concerts—Other Concerts to Come—The Plans of the Hoffmann Quartet

Dr. Muck's programme for the fifth Symphony concert, yesterday afternoon, lacked the clarity and certainty of scheme that has distinguished its predecessors. Again, it was a romantic programme, but three sorts of romanticism divided it—the highly colored, declamatory, and dramatic romanticism of Weber's overture to his opera of "Oberon"; the subtly tinted, reticent and musing romanticism of Chopin's piano concerto in E-minor; and the sombre, deep-voiced and passionate romanticism of Sinding's symphony in D-minor. Sixty years in time separated the overture and the concerto from the symphony, and the interval in imaginative and emotional content is far wider. German though Weber was, his romanticism in the overtures to "Der Freischütz" and to "Oberon" and in the "concert piece" for piano and orchestra that Mr. Reisenauer played last autumn, is of the sort that Théophile Gautier symbolized when he put on his flaming red waistcoat for the first performance of Victor Hugo's "Hernani" in Paris. It is romanticism with a flourish. "Allegro con fuoco" Weber scrawled in the score after the crashing chord that ends the soft mystery of the introduction and begins the main body of the overture.

. . . "Monts d'Aragon! Galice! Estramadoure!
Oh! je porte malheur à tout ce qui m'entoure!"

cries Hernani to Dona Sol at one of the crises in Hugo's play. There is the same flourish in the music and the verse—Hugo ought really to have made a libretto for Weber—the same loud, clear note of chivalry, the same voice of high-pitched and warmly colored romance. "Il tutto pianissimo possibile" is Weber's direction at the beginning of the overture; in imagination he must have heard, and yesterday he could in fact have heard, Oberon's horn call in the purest of tones; "presto con fuoco" goes the instruction further on; again there is warm-hued brilliance and again full-voiced musical speech. In a word, everything must tend to its extreme (as musical extremes went eighty years ago); everything must be declamatory; everything must be sharp-set in dramatic contrast to what precedes and follows it. Weber, in the "concert piece," could not help dramatizing the little story of the returning Crusader. In the overtures he is almost melodramatic. The orchestra must declaim in them as the actors do in their Hugo.

Delicate and super-delicate in immediate comparison seemed the romanticism of Chopin's concerto. Much of the overture was fiery inspiration; as much of the concerto, rather languorous meditation. It is easy to call the long and tedious "working-out" of the first movement mere adroit technical exercise. Perhaps it is quite as much gentle musing over the melodic material Chopin had already devised. It is sweet in the first movement; it becomes sweeter in the larghetto; it is little more than animated sweetness in the finale. Weber put into the overture the high emotions, the vivid sounds, the dramatic moods that Romance spoke in his ears. Chopin in the concerto heard only a gentle call, repeated as he mused upon it, and he answered it as gently. Weber's Romance trod the stage; Chopin's in the concerto was a gossamer vision, a thing of sweetness and of tender light. He could not make her voice too sweet, her step too graceful; and little cared he whether his concerto would sound thin and pale in a modern concert-room with a modern piano and a modern orchestra. Weber saw and cried his visions. Chopin dreamt in this particular concerto and barely spoke out. His is the loveliness of romance, the brightness of its little things.

Probably the audiences that were hearing "Oberon" and the concerto in E minor in the thirties would not have called Sinding's symphony romance at all. They would have heard it as some of us first heard "Thus Spake Zarathustra," or "A Hero's Life," as almost savage music. They would have recoiled at its incessant sonority, its sombre coloring, its insistent restlessness and striving, its bareness and boldness of idea and expression. Yet here, as truly as the romanticism of Weber and of Chopin is of their time and temperament, is another romanticism of ours, touched, indeed, by Sinding's own individuality, but still of his whole generation. Weber's romantic feeling saw glorious or darksome visions—knights sweeping up through the forest to the castle gate; or Oberon and his fairy court; or Samiel's haunted glen. "It is intended to convey beautiful memories, moonlit impressions," wrote Chopin as he dreamed of the soft song of his slow movement, and akin is the grace that dances in his rondo. For Sinding there are no implicit visions or moonlit impressions to put into tones. Romance has lost her brightness and her gentleness. Her robes are dark, and her voice deep. She fills her devotees with a passionate and sombre striving. They pursue her, as Sinding pursues her through the passionate sonorities of his first movement, now with a grim intensity, now with bold impetuosity. She calls to sombre meditation, to restless longing, to the bare, bleak song with which he fills his slow movement. She drives them to the shadowed gayety of his scherzo. And then he and they turn and pursue her again imperiously, almost savagely. "Her face is far from this our war, our call and counter-cry," but still she stirs the passion of men to reconquer her in all her brightness and gentleness. Strive they will, though it desolate their hearts and darken their pleasures, and it is this passionate eagerness and restlessness that Sinding puts into his music. They will not woo her as Chopin, for example, did. They will conquer her as Sinding would conquer her. His is the romance of a dark and troubled yet bold imagination, speaking with passionate utterance. Later, perhaps, he was to hold her captive and bright again in his "Chivalric Episodes."

There has been no better evidence of the acute intelligence, the imaginative discrimination and the clear emotional responsiveness of Dr. Muck's conducting than the skill and the vividness with which he differentiated Weber's, Chopin's and Sinding's music. Each composer seemed for the moment to be having his will. It was with the utmost of pianissimos that the overture to "Oberon" began; the horn calls haunted, and then the music leapt on its fiery way. The glow of romance burnt again in the overture. Familiar as every dramatic device is in it, the vitality remained. The orchestral part of Chopin's concerto, thin and scanty as it is, kept its characteristic note of gentle and musing swiftness. Then came the passionate sonorities, the endless restlessness, the bare bold tonal coloring of Sinding's symphony. Dr. Muck's vigor answered its largeness; his elasticity served its restlessness; he gave it a kind of bleak tonal color like yellow wintry lights piercing gray clouds. He brought the insistent and striving passion of it to full utterance, and he gave it a singular dramatic quality. Mr. d'Indy used to imply that a kind of dramatic action underlay and was in his mind as he wrote his second symphony. Sinding's symphony carries the same suggestion as though it were playing out the grim tragedy—here, and everywhere, in this time of ours—of the pursuit of romance.

H. T. P.

Concerts Next Week

The sixth pair of Symphony concerts, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, is altogether Russian. Dr. Muck has taken his music from three Russian composers, and the soloist, Mr. Petschnikoff, the violinist, is also Russian. One, moreover, of these Russian compositions is new to Boston—Glazounoff's fifth symphony, in B-flat major, first played in America some years ago under Anton Seidl, and since repeated by the Chicago Orchestra. Glazounoff's music in general has long been familiar on the programmes of the Symphony concerts, but this particular piece belongs to the time when his musical invention was freer and more individual than it is now. Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Betrothed of the Tsar," begins the concert, and between it and the symphony comes Tschaikowski's second concerto for violin with Mr. Petschnikoff to play the solo part. Only yesterday we were noting his reappearance in New York and quoting Mr. Henderson's praise of his nervous vigor and brilliance of tone.

On Monday evening, at eight, in Chickering Hall, the Symphony Quartet gives the second concert of its current series, with Mr. H. G. Tucker assisting as pianist. Two string quartets—Beethoven's in F-minor (opus 95) and Hugo Kaun's in D-major (opus 41, No. 2) and Dvorák's quartet in E-flat major (opus 87) for piano, violin, viola and 'cello make the programme. Mr. Kaun's quartet is certainly new to Boston and probably to America. German by birth, he lived for some years in the West, where he became a protegé of Theodore Thomas, and his music has been played often at the concerts of the Chicago Orchestra. In Berlin, where he now lives, it is making its way, and one at least of his compositions in the larger forms has been played at the Symphony concerts. His later music has had the graces of melody and brevity.

BOSTON TRAVELER
NOVEMBER 17, 1906.

DR. MUCK'S sixth programme of the season will be devoted entirely to modern Russian music, and in this programme will come the first novelty of the season, Glazounoff's Symphony No. 5, in B-flat major. Two symphonies by this brilliant young composer have been played here, the fourth and the sixth, the latter having been played for the first time in the fall of '99 and the former in the fall of 1903. As Dr. Muck is confessedly an admirer of the Russians, this concert promises to be one of the most interesting of the season. The soloist will be the distinguished Russian violinist, Alexander Petschnikoff, who will play Tschaikowsky's concerto in D major.

The Boston Symphony Quartet will give its second concert in Chickering Hall, Monday evening, at 8 o'clock. The assisting artist will be Hiram G. Tucker of this city. What Prof. Hess promises to be one of the most interesting novelties of the season will be played in this programme. It is a Quartet in D major by Hugo Kaun. This quartet, so far as can be learned, has never been played in America.

The sale of seats for the postponed Saint-Saens concert is proceeding steadily at the box office of Symphony Hall. While it is always a disappointment to have to postpone a concert, the fact that M. Saint-Saens was not able to appear on the date first announced seems to have made little difference in the interest created by his coming to this city, as very few of the large number of mail orders received last month have been revoked. M. Saint-Saens will appear at Symphony Hall Monday evening, Nov. 26.

BOSTON JOURNAL
NOVEMBER 17, 1906.

THE SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The Boston Symphony Quartet will give its second concert in Chickering Hall, Monday evening, at 8 o'clock. The assisting artist will be Hiram G. Tucker of this city. What Professor Hess promises to be one of the most interesting novelties of the season will be played in this program. It is a Quartet in D major by Hugo Kaun. This quartet, so far as can be learned, has never been played in America. It is brilliantly melodious and short. The full program is as follows:

String quartet in F minor, Op. 95, Beethoven
String quartet, D major, Op. 41, No. 2 (First time) ..... Hugo Kaun
Piano-quartet, E-flat major, Op. 87 ..... Dvorak

SAINT-SAENS CONCERT.

The sale of seats for the postponed Saint-Saens concert, to be held Monday evening, Nov. 26, is proceeding steadily at the box office of Symphony Hall. While it is always a disappointment to have to postpone a concert, the fact that M. Saint-Saens was not able to appear on the date first announced seems to have made little difference in the interest created by his coming to this city, as very few of the large number of mail orders received last month have been revoked. M. Saint-Saens received a most enthusiastic welcome in New York, and so great was the desire to see him that two extra concerts have been announced for that city. He is looking forward with much interest to conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he has heard so much. The program will consist entirely of music by this famous French composer.

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY.

Dr. Muck's sixth program of the season will be devoted entirely to modern Russian music, and in this program will come the first novelty of the season, Glazounoff's Symphony No. 5, in B flat major. The soloist will be the distinguished Russian violinist, Alexander Petschnikoff, who will play Tschaikowsky's violin concerto in D major. Following is the program:

Rimsky-Karsakoff, Overture, "The Betrothed of the Tsar"
Tschaikowsky, Concerto for violin in D major, No. 2
Glazounoff..Symphony No. 5, in B flat, op. 55 (First time)

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813
NOVEMBER 17, 1906.

Dr. Muck's sixth programme of the season will be devoted entirely to modern Russian music, and in this programme will come the first novelty of the season, Glazounoff's Symphony No. 5, in B-flat major. The soloist will be the distinguished Russian violinist, Alexander Petschnikoff, who will play Tschaikowsky's violin concerto in D-major.

[illegible] Quartette will give its second concert in Chickering hall Monday at 8 p.m. The assisting artist will be Hiram G. Tucker of this city. What Prof. Hess promises to be one of the most interesting novelties of the season will be played in this programme. It is a Quartet in D major by Hugo Kaun.

The sale of seats for the postponed Saint-Saens concert is proceeding steadily at the box office of Symphony hall. The programme will consist entirely of music by this famous French composer.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau [illegible]
om .....
Gress .....
te .....

According to W. E. Walter of Boston, Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, must be classed among the broad conservatives in music. He confesses that he finds little inspiration in the music which is being written today. In our search for beauty, we must still go back to the masters of the nineteenth century. The music of to-day, he thinks, reflects the spirit of the times, which is of criticism and analysis, not of creation. He believes that absolute music reached its greatest beauty in Beethoven and operatic music in the operas of Mozart and the music dramas of Richard Wagner. He finds much that is interesting in the modern Russians, who, although often bizarre and often brutal, are sincere and write as they feel. He likes the strong national note in their music, and envies the Russians their rich store of folk material. The modern Frenchmen are interesting, although theirs is too often the music of the head instead of the heart. He admires Richard Strauss and Mahler, but in Reger can find no beauty nor coherency.

At the close of a recent concert in London the singer—a lady—received from an admirer a basket filled with grapes and pineapples, instead of flowers. In some cases a basket of sandwiches would be still more acceptable, for many a foolish girl wastes her last cent in giving a concert in the vain hope of taking the musical world by storm.

[70]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From NEW YORK EV'G POST
Address
Date NOV 17

COLLEGE.

AMHERST, Mass., November 16.—The next concert in the musical course will be given in College Hall Monday evening. The "Longy Club," composed of ten members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play. Madame Schumann-Heink has been engaged to sing in the course on February 1. A letter received from President Harris last week announces that he and Mrs. Harris will spend the winter in Paris. The subjects for the Kent essays for the Kent prize in English literature of $100 are as follows: The Place of Poe in American Literature; Shelley as a Poet of Nature; The Poetry of Swinburne.

A mathematics club has been organized for the purpose of encouraging closer relations among the teachers and students of mathematics and for the presentation and discussion of papers on subjects of general mathematical interest. The first steps in organizing an historical club were taken last evening.

NEW YORK CITY
NOV 17 1906

Brahms' first symphony is a towering work and one that needs repeated hearings to lead to a full understanding of its beauties, nevertheless three performances in two days is a little too much, for the student needs time to ponder over such deep philosophy. It was of course entirely accidental that the Boston Symphony and New York Symphony orchestras placed it upon their programs for the same day, but it is a pleasure to be able to favorably review both the interpretations of Dr. Muck and Mr. Damrosch, though differing considerably. The magnificant playing of the New York orchestra should win for it the fullest support from the public. The concerts of this week will be devoted to Saint-Saens, while next week's pair will be all Wagner.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
New York Times
NOV 18 1906

MUSICAL NOTES.

There has been some comment on the conservative, some say old-fashioned, programmes that Dr. Karl Muck has been preparing for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Light on this matter is thrown by the following note from the office of the orchestra in Boston:

"Dr. Karl Muck confesses that he finds little inspiration in the music which is being written to-day. In our search for beauty we must still go back to the masters of the nineteenth century. The music of to-day, he thinks, reflects the spirit of the times, which is of criticism and analysis, not of creation. He believes that absolute music reached its greatest beauty in Beethoven and operatic music in the operas of Mozart and the music dramas of Richard Wagner. He finds much that is interesting in the modern Russians, who, although often bizarre and often brutal, are sincere and write as they feel. He likes the strong national note in their music, and envies the Russians their rich store of folk material. The modern Frenchmen are interesting, although theirs is too often the music of the head instead of the heart. He admires Richard Strauss and Mahler, but in Reger can find no beauty nor coherency."

—The first concert of chamber music for wind instruments was given Wednesday evening by the Longy club to an audience quite filling Potter hall. All the men who played are members of the Boston symphony orchestra, except Mr De Voto, who played the piano part to Mr Longy's oboe in selections from Bach, Schumann and Godard. Dr Muck, just back from his first appearance with the Symphony orchestra in New York, Washington and other cities, was with Mrs Muck; Mr Henry L. Higginson attended with his niece, Miss Barbara Higginson, who was attired in a dress of dark brown velvet, with touches of brown fur and a pointed collar at the bodice of white embroidered in Persian colors; Mr and Mrs O. G. Stevens, Mrs Stevens in pale gray crepe de chine with lace at her bodice, and wearing a long gray fur cloak; Miss Minor, Miss Fanny [illegible] in dark blue voile with lace at the bodice, and many others.

NEW YORK SUN
NOV 18 1906

It is authoritatively stated that Dr. Carl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is another of those who find it difficult to keep up with the advance of musical thought. He finds but little joy in the contemplation of most of the music which is produced in these early years of the twentieth century. He laments that the search for beauty must turn our steps backward to the nineteenth century. The music of the present hour is a direct product of the time. It lacks the creative spark. It is critical and analytical. It makes grave observations and comments on life and experience, but it does not embody their elemental emotions or impulses.

Dr. Muck believes that absolute music reached its greatest beauty in the symphonies and sonatas of Beethoven, and lyric music in the operas of Mozart and the music dramas of Richard Wagner. The modern Russians interest the Boston conductor. They speak often with inartistic frankness, and their dialect is frequently bizarre, but they are potently in earnest, and they write according to their feelings. Dr. Muck likes the strong national note in their music and envies them their rich store of folk material.

He has a certain admiration for the Frenchmen of to-day, but he finds that their music is too often of the head, not of the heart. Young Max Reger, who has created something of a pother in Germany and some of whose music has been produced here, impresses Dr. Muck as possessing neither beauty nor coherency. Gustave Mahler gives him larger satisfaction, and, like all other conductors, he admires Richard Strauss. No orchestral director has yet been able to suppress his emotion on gazing at one of Strauss's scores and finding piccolo parts written for bass tubas and horns called upon to cavort through the mazes of a clarinet's colorature.

W. L. Henderson.

The Boston Journal
NOVEMBER 19, 190

DR. MUCK SCORES ANOTHER TRIUMPH

Brings Out Unusual Power From Orchestra at Fifth Symphony Concert.

The program for the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra played Saturday night was short, and a great many persons were delighted at the brevity. Dr. Karl Muck led all three numbers. The list was made up of Weber's overture to "Oberon," Chopin's E minor concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, with Mme. Antoinette Szumowska at the piano, and Sinding's D minor symphony.

The overture is familiar and without doubt known backward by one-half the audience, but Dr. Muck displayed consummate skill in its performance, making the adagio a most exquisite scene. When the finale was finished the large audience realized they had really heard the overture for the first time.

The selection of Chopin's E minor concerto was unfortunate as a vehicle for the display of Mme. Szumowska's virtuosity, as the beautiful composition was not intended for performance in such a large hall. Except for a slight misunderstanding between orchestra and soloist and a tendency upon her part to unnecessary vigor, the concerto was admirably given.

Sinding's symphony has been heard before, but so long ago it was to all intents and purposes new. It was read under Mr. Gericke in January, 1899. It is somber and grim throughout, almost savage. Dr. Muck brought out new strength in the fortes and withal developed unexpected powers in the orchestra.

New York Times
NOV 18 1906

Dr. Muck Praises Boston Symphony Orchestra

Finds It the Equal of Any Organization of Its Kind In the World.

THAT America has an orchestra equal to any in the world is the opinion of Dr. Karl Muck, who for this season is conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck came to America only a few weeks ago, with perhaps a little trepidation, because he had heard opinions passed upon the development of American music that were not at all favorable. He will go back to Germany in the Spring with a report that will give many of his countrymen new ideas.

Dr. Muck is a quiet, unassuming man, with a strong face that has a quiet smile playing over it and serious eyes in which there is always a pleasant glint. One is struck on meeting him with his wonderful repose—a repose that cannot be stirred except under some strong feeling—which gives him the capacity to draw many ideas to himself, weigh them, and reject or accept as he pleases. It is hard to find his individuality, for the points which mark individuality have been smoothed so that casual contact would not show that there had ever been such things. One can see how he has striven to make himself the mirror which will catch and reflect the individualities of the composers he interprets—for he says he has developed the gift of interpretation. He has his own strong ideas, but they are ideas of interpretation.

A TIMES reporter called upon Dr. Muck during his recent visit to New York, when he had brought out the hidden beauties of the Brahms symphony in a way seldom known in a symphony concert. He was at ease after breakfast—and perfect ease.

"We are very fond of the Boston orchestra in America," was suggested to Dr. Muck. "What do you think of it in comparison to the European orchestras?"

"I should say it was equal to the best—to the orchestras of Vienna and Berlin and such organizations," said Dr. Muck, nodding his head and smiling. "The most fortunate thing about it is that the men have been accustomed to play together for so many years that they have been welded into a harmonious organization that would not be possible under any other system. Such a condition is to be found only in our largest orchestras abroad. In most of them the membership changes so frequently as to prevent the thorough understanding so necessary to harmony.

"The selection of the Boston Orchestra has also been made with the greatest wisdom. The men for the various instruments have been taken from the best. Thus we find most of the wood instruments are played by Frenchmen, many of the brass instruments by Germans, and many of the string instruments by Austrians and Americans. It was a very wise selection."

"Did you have any difficulty in getting acquainted with the men?"

Dr. Muck smiled broadly. "Not in the least," he said. "We understood each other from the first moment. I no sooner addressed myself to the men than I saw that I was completely understood, and from that time forward there has been the utmost harmony. It is delightful to work with such an orchestra. It is scarcely necessary to explain things to them; they are such splendid artists. Sometimes with an orchestra it is necessary to waste many words, and then not be understood. With this one it is often necessary to say just one word, and what is wanted is done instantly."

Dr. Muck was asked what it was that he wished most to express in his work.

"There is only one thing for the conductor to do," he said decisively, "that is to make beautiful music, true music. When he has done that he has done everything that is to be expected of him. In giving compositions he should not sound the personal note. His own personality has nothing whatever to do with it. To attempt to give an individual interpretation of the work of a composer is often to give exactly what the composer did not mean. The only way is to find the meaning of the composer and give his works as nearly as possible in the real and true style."

"Is that to be done intellectually or by feeling?"

Dr. Muck shrugged his shoulders and raised his hands.

"How can I say?" he replied. "I could not tell how it is done. It all lies in the gift of interpretation. If one has that he will know the truth when he has found it. That is all there is to it. I learn the truth according to my gift of interpretation and present it. That is all. And I am glad to see that the critics in America and the people with whom I have talked have been so quick to understand that that is what I am trying to do. They did not need to be told. It has been surprising how quickly they have taken the idea."

"And the American audiences?"

Dr. Muck smiled again. "I like the American audiences," he said. "In fact I do not hesitate to say that they will compare favorably with the best German audiences. I find them to be warm, attentive, enthusiastic. They recognize good music instantly. I know that there is an impression in Germany that the Americans have not a high standard of music and do not recognize the best and understand the best. But I shall carry back an entirely different idea. I am certain that they appreciate the first artists. I am not certain how far I am able to judge, as perhaps I have had the good fortune to come in contact only with the best of the American music lovers, but if these are representative of a great class I should say that America is intensely interested in music and has fine taste."

"There is a great work to be done in America," was suggested. "Do you think you will be able to take part in it after this season?"

"No; I am here for a year only," said Dr. Muck firmly.

"And could not be persuaded to remain?"

"It does not lie with me," he said. "It lies with the Royal Opera, with the Emperor. I am pleased to say that I am well liked by the Emperor, and he does not wish me to be away from the Royal Opera, and of course I would not wish to be away under such conditions. It was difficult to get my leave of absence for a year as it was, and I got it only on the promise that I would not ask for another for a long time to come. Even under such conditions I doubt whether it would have been given had it not been for the interest the Emperor has in America. As you know, he is very fond of the Americans, and he is particularly fond of Harvard University. It was the connection of Major Higginson with Harvard that enabled him to get the ear of the Emperor."

Asked if he had any particular plans for the season, Dr. Muck said that he intended before departing to introduce some of the very newest compositions if possible.

"I find that America is kept well informed on the new music," he said, "and that therefore there is little to introduce of the compositions of recent times. But I have instructed the editors in Berlin and Paris to keep me in touch with their publications of the very newest works, and should any of them be suitable I shall introduce them before my return. I have hope to be able to put several novelties before the American public."

Dr. and Mrs. Muck are very anxious to see the wonders of America before their return. They intend at least to visit the Yellowstone Park, and if possible go on to the Yosemite Valley. If the Grand Cañon of the Colorado is not too far out of their way they will also see that great gorge.

"It is peculiar," Mrs. Muck remarked, with Dr. Muck agreeing, "that Americans whom we meet in Europe know so little of the wonders of their own country and care so little to see them. Some that we have met have traveled all over Europe, but have never seen the Yellowstone Park or the Yosemite, and have not taken the trouble to go to the Grand Cañon, which Baedeker tells us is unsurpassed as a natural wonder."

It had been the intention of Dr. and Mrs. Muck to travel around the world when they were through with their American engagements, but they do not believe it will be possible.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

AMHERST COLLEGE.

AMHERST, Mass., November 16.—The first concert in the musical course will be held in College Hall Monday evening. The "Longy Club," composed of ten members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play. Madame Schumann-Heink has been engaged to sing in the course on February 18. A letter received from President Harris last week announces that he and Mrs. Harris will spend the winter in Paris. The subjects for the Kent essays for the Kent prize in English literature of $100 are as follows: The Place of Poe in American Literature; Shelley as a Poet of Nature; The Poetry of Swinburne.

A mathematics club has been organized for the purpose of encouraging closer relations among the teachers and students of mathematics and for the presentation and discussion of papers on subjects of general mathematical interest. The first steps in organizing an historical club were taken last evening.

ess

Brahms' first symphony is a tovering work and one that needs repeated hearings to lead to a full understanding of its beauties, nevertheless three performances in two days is a little too much, for the student needs time to ponder over such deep philosophy. It was of course entirely accidental that the Boston Symphony and New York Symphony orchestras placed it upon their programs for the same day, but it is a pleasure to be able to favorably review both the interpretations of Dr. Muck and Mr. Damrosch, though differing considerably. The magnificant playing of the New York orchestra should win for it the fullest support from the public. The concerts of this week will be devoted to Saint-Saens, while next week's pair will be all Wagner.

The First Established ...
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

s

MUSICAL NOTES.

There has been some comment on the conservative, some say old-fashioned, programmes that Dr. Karl Muck has been preparing for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Light on this matter is thrown by the following note from the office of the orchestra in Boston:

"Dr. Karl Muck confesses that he finds little inspiration in the music which is being written to-day. In our search for beauty we must still go back to the masters of the nineteenth century. The music of to-day, he thinks, reflects the spirit of the times, which is of criticism and analysis, not of creation. He believes that absolute music reached its greatest beauty in Beethoven and operatic music in the operas of Mozart and the music dramas of Richard Wagner. He finds much that is interesting in the modern Russians, who, although often bizarre and often brutal, are sincere and write as they feel. He likes the strong national note in their music, and envies the Russians their rich store of folk material. The modern Frenchmen are interesting, although theirs is too often the music of the head instead of the heart. He admires Richard Strauss and Mahler, but in Reger can find no beauty nor coherency."

***

—The first concert of chamber music for wind instruments was given Wednesday evening by the Longy club to an audience quite filling Potter hall. All the men who played are members of the Boston symphony orchestra, except Mr De Voto, who played the piano part to Mr Longy's oboe in selections from Bach, Schumann and Godard. Dr Muck, just back from his first appearance with the Symphony orchestra in New York, Washington and other cities, was with Mrs Muck; Mr Henry L. Higginson attended with his niece, Miss Barbara Higginson, who was attired in a dress of dark brown velvet, with touches of brown fur and a pointed collar at the bodice of white embroidered in Persian colors; Mr and Mrs O. G. Stevens, Mrs Stevens in pale gray crepe de chine with lace at her bodice, and wearing a long gray fur cloak; Miss Minor, Miss Fanny Mason in dark blue voile with lace at the bodice, and many others.

...ESS SUN

It is authoritatively stated that Dr. Carl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is another of those who find it difficult to keep up with the advance of musical thought. He finds but little joy in the contemplation of most of the music which is produced in these early years of the twentieth century. He laments that the search for beauty must turn our steps backward to the nineteenth century. The music of the present hour is a direct product of the time. It lacks the creative spark. It is critical and analytical. It makes grave observations and comments on life and experience, but it does not embody their elemental emotions or impulses.

Dr. Muck believes that absolute music reached its greatest beauty in the symphonies and sonatas of Beethoven, and lyric music in the operas of Mozart and the music dramas of Richard Wagner. The modern Russians interest the Boston conductor. They speak often with inartistic frankness, and their dialect is frequently bizarre, but they are potently in earnest, and they write according to their feelings. Dr. Muck likes the strong national note in their music and envies them their rich store of folk material.

He has a certain admiration for the Frenchmen of to-day, but he finds that their music is too often of the head, not of the heart. Young Max Reger, who has created something of a pother in Germany and some of whose music has been produced here, impresses Dr. Muck as possessing neither beauty nor coherency. Gustave Mahler gives him larger satisfaction, and, like all other conductors, he admires Richard Strauss. No orchestral director has yet been able to suppress his emotion on gazing at one of Strauss's scores and finding piccolo parts written for bass tubas and horns called upon to cavort through the mazes of a clarinet's colorature.

W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Journal
NOVEMBER 19, 19(

DR. MUCK SCORES ANOTHER TRIUMPH

Brings Out Unusual Power From Orchestra at Fifth Symphony Concert.

The program for the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra played Saturday night was short, and a great many persons were delighted at the brevity. Dr. Karl Muck led all three numbers. The list was made up of Weber's overture to "Oberon," Chopin's E minor concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, with Mme. Antoinette Szumowska at the piano, and Sinding's D minor symphony.

The overture is familiar and without doubt known backward by one-half the audience, but Dr. Muck displayed consummate skill in its performance, making the adagio a most exquisite scene. When the finale was finished the large audience realized they had really heard the overture for the first time.

The selection of Chopin's E minor concerto was unfortunate as a vehicle for the display of Mme. Szumowska's virtuosity, as the beautiful composition was not intended for performance in such a large hall. Except for a slight misunderstanding between orchestra and soloist and a tendency upon her part to unnecessary vigor, the concerto was admirably given.

Sinding's symphony has been heard before, but so long ago it was to all intents and purposes new. It was read under Mr. Gericke in January, 1899. It is somber and grim throughout, almost savage. Dr. Muck brought out new strength in the fortes and withal developed unexpected powers in the orchestra.

New York Times

906

Dr. Muck Praises Boston Symphony Orchestra

Finds It the Equal of Any Organization of Its Kind In the World.

THAT America has an orchestra equal to any in the world is the opinion of Dr. Karl Muck, who for this season is conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Muck came to America only a few weeks ago, with perhaps a little trepidation, because he had heard opinions passed upon the development of American music that were not at all favorable. He will go back to Germany in the Spring with a report that will give many of his countrymen new ideas.

Dr. Muck is a quiet, unassuming man, with a strong face that has a quiet smile playing over it and serious eyes in which there is always a pleasant glint. One is struck on meeting him with his wonderful repose—a repose that cannot be stirred except under some strong feeling—which gives him the capacity to draw many ideas to himself, weigh them, and reject or accept as he pleases. It is hard to find his individuality, for the points which mark individuality have been smoothed so that casual contact would not show that there had ever been such things. One can see how he has striven to make himself the mirror which will catch and reflect the individualities of the composers he interprets—for he says he has developed the gift of interpretation. He has his own strong ideas, but they are ideas of interpretation.

A TIMES reporter called upon Dr. Muck during his recent visit to New York, when he had brought out the hidden beauties of the Brahms symphony in a way seldom known in a symphony concert. He was at ease after breakfast—and perfect ease.

"We are very fond of the Boston orchestra in America," was suggested to Dr. Muck. "What do you think of it in comparison to the European orchestras?"

"I should say it was equal to the best—to the orchestras of Vienna and Berlin and such organizations," said Dr. Muck, nodding his head and smiling. "The most fortunate thing about it is that the men have been accustomed to play together for so many years that they have been welded into a harmonious organization that would not be possible under any other system. Such a condition is to be found only in our largest orchestras abroad. In most of them the membership changes so frequently as to prevent the thorough understanding so necessary to harmony.

"The selection of the Boston Orchestra has also been made with the greatest wisdom. The men for the various instruments have been taken from the best. Thus we find most of the wood instruments are played by Frenchmen, many of the brass instruments by Germans, and many of the string instruments by Austrians and Americans. It was a very wise selection."

"Did you have any difficulty in getting acquainted with the men?"

Dr. Muck smiled broadly. "Not in the least," he said. "We understood each other from the first moment. I no sooner addressed myself to the men than I saw that I was completely understood, and from that time forward there has been the utmost harmony. It is delightful to work with such an orchestra. It is scarcely necessary to explain things to them; they are such splendid artists. Sometimes with an orchestra it is necessary to waste many words, and then not be understood. With this one it is often necessary to say just one word, and what is wanted is done instantly."

Dr. Muck was asked what it was that he wished most to express in his work.

"There is only one thing for the conductor to do," he said decisively, "that is to make beautiful music, true music. When he has done that he has done everything that is to be expected of him. In giving compositions he should not sound the personal note. His own personality has nothing whatever to do with it. To attempt to give an individual interpretation of the work of a composer is often to give exactly what the composer did not mean. The only way is to find the meaning of the composer and give his works as nearly as possible in the real and true style."

"Is that to be done intellectually or by feeling?"

Dr. Muck shrugged his shoulders and raised his hands.

"How can I say?" he replied. "I could not tell how it is done. It all lies in the gift of interpretation. If one has that he will know the truth when he has found it. That is all there is to it. I learn the truth according to my gift of interpretation and present it. That is all. And I am glad to see that the critics in America and the people with whom I have talked have been so quick to understand that that is what I am trying to do. They did not need to be told. It has been surprising how quickly they have taken the idea."

"And the American audiences?"

Dr. Muck smiled again. "I like the American audiences," he said. "In fact I do not hesitate to say that they will compare favorably with the best German audiences. I find them to be warm, attentive, enthusiastic. They recognize good music instantly. I know that there is an impression in Germany that the Americans have not a high standard of music and do not recognize the best and understand the best. But I shall carry back an entirely different idea. I am certain that they appreciate the first artists. I am not certain how far I am able to judge, as perhaps I have had the good fortune to come in contact only with the best of the American music lovers, but if these are representative of a great class I should say that America is intensely interested in music and has fine taste."

"There is a great work to be done in America," was suggested. "Do you think you will be able to take part in it after this season?"

"No; I am here for a year only," said Dr. Muck firmly.

"And could not be persuaded to remain?"

"It does not lie with me," he said. "It lies with the Royal Opera, with the Emperor. I am pleased to say that I am well liked by the Emperor, and he does not wish me to be away from the Royal Opera, and of course I would not wish to be away under such conditions. It was difficult to get my leave of absence for a year as it was, and I got it only on the promise that I would not ask for another for a long time to come. Even under such conditions I doubt whether it would have been given had it not been for the interest the Emperor has in America. As you know, he is very fond of the Americans, and he is particularly fond of Harvard University. It was the connection of Major Higginson with Harvard that enabled him to get the ear of the Emperor."

Asked if he had any particular plans for the season, Dr. Muck said that he intended before departing to introduce some of the very newest compositions if possible.

"I find that America is kept well informed on the new music," he said, "and that therefore there is little to introduce of the compositions of recent times. But I have instructed the editors in Berlin and Paris to keep me in touch with their publications of the very newest works, and should any of them be suitable I shall introduce them before my return. I have hope to be able to put several novelties before the American public."

Dr. and Mrs. Muck are very anxious to see the wonders of America before their return. They intend at least to visit the Yellowstone Park, and if possible go on to the Yosemite Valley. If the Grand Cañon of the Colorado is not too far out of their way they will also see that great gorge.

"It is peculiar," Mrs. Muck remarked, with Dr. Muck agreeing, "that Americans whom we meet in Europe know so little of the wonders of their own country and care so little to see them. Some that we have met have traveled all over Europe, but have never seen the Yellowstone Park or the Yosemite, and have not taken the trouble to go to the Grand Cañon, which Baedeker tells us is unsurpassed as a natural wonder."

It had been the intention of Dr. and Mrs. Muck to travel around the world when they were through with their American engagements, but they do not believe it will be possible.

Established 1872

NOVEMBER 19, 1906

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

PROGRAMME.

Weber—Oberon Overture.
Chopin—Piano Concerto in E minor.
Soloist, Mme. Antoinette Szumowska.
Sinding—Symphony in D minor.

It looked like a short programme, but the length of the symphony carried matters near to 10 p.m. We scarcely feel at liberty to reveal anything about the first part of the "Oberon" overture, for Dr. Muck whispered it to the audience in the strictest confidence. But we may intimate that things become very difficult for the horns when their passages are taken so very slowly. On this occasion they flatted perceptibly. The end of the overture, however, was effective and inspiring, and Dr. Muck has warrant enough for the tempo and shading of the first part also—although we prefer the less crawling speed that we have been accustomed to.

The Chopin Concerto was not very exciting. It is possible that the work would make its best effect in a smaller hall. Liszt did not think the two concertos were among Chopin's most inspired compositions, in spite of the fact that the Larghetto of this work may be considered as a love-letter to the singer Constantia Gladkowska. That the concertre is melloic in to its credit, for it is refreshing to turn occasionally from "Life's endless toil and endeavor" as represented in the ambitious compositions, and rest in a tuneful nook.

That excellent artist, Mme. Szumowska, erred a little, as Joseffy has done, on the side of delicacy. There was much fluency in her interpretation, but also some lack of force. She gave some beautiful touches, however, in the Larghetto and in the finale, and at the end she was recalled twice and received floral tributes.

Dr. Muck las a man of surprises. The concert had been somewhat languid up to this point, but now the conductor suddenly caused the audience to sit up. From the very first measure there was virility and power in Sinding's symphony. Every point was brought out with mastery. Yet there was no such wild enthusiasm on the part of the public such as followed the wonderful reading of the Brahms symphony, three weeks before. The Sinding symphony is a great work, but it is an unequal one, and it is at times prolix. It is too earnest and grave to become popular. Yet we predict that each successive hearing would reveal new beauties; it is a symphony that would grow upon acquaintance.

The Andante, for example, pictures brooding and loneliness in a more graphic manner than we can recall in any other symphony, and the impressive reiteration of the moving organ-point, a "basso ostinato," is wonderful. Horn and clarinette deserve credit for their work in this, and the bassoon was very effective in the finale. The ferocity of the bass tuba is a marked feature in the ending, and the entire finale has a Vinking brutality that is not always attractive but is original and by no means ineffective.

Everywhere there is full control of the orchestra displayed. If the work of sombre it is deliberately so, the composer knows what he wants to say and speaks his thought with attractive individuality. The wood-wind is used a la Tschaikowsky, chiefly in the depths, and the brasses have some remarkable passages against pizzicato strings. Nor is contrapuntal skill lacking, for there are some effective canonic passages in the finale.

But the prolixity of the finale must be considered a fault. Here there is a leaning towards bombast and grandiloquence which is too long-continued. To us the second movement seems the gem of the work and is full of the loftiest beauty.

Dr. Muck deserves the highest praise for the careful manner in which this work was read. It was as praiseworthy as the Brahms revelation already alluded to. And we can imagine that it was a much less grateful task than the interpretation of the C minor symphony, for even with the best possible performance this symphony of fjord and mountain, of Viking and Saga, was bound to be somewhat removed from popular comprehension and appreciation. Next Saturday we return to Muscovy. "Die Russen kommen!"

Louis C. Elson.

DR. MUCK'S PRAISE.

(From a New York Interview.)

"We are very fond of the Boston Orchestra in America," was suggested to Dr. Muck. "What do you think of it in comparison to the European orchestras?"

"I should say it was equal to the best—to the orchestras of Vienna and Berlin and such organizations," said Dr. Muck, nodding his head and smiling. "The most fortunate thing about it is that the men have been accustomed to play together for so many years that they have been welded into a harmonious organization that would not be possible under any other system. Such a condition is to be found only in our largest orchestras abroad. In most of them the membership changes so frequently as to prevent the thorough understanding so necessary to harmony.

"The selection of the Boston Orchestra has also been made with the greatest wisdom. The men for the various instruments have been taken from the best. Thus we find most of the wood instruments are played by Frenchmen, many of the brass instruments by Germans, and many of the string instruments by Austrians and Americans. It was a very wise selection."

"Did you have any difficulty in getting acquainted with the men?"

Dr. Muck smiled broadly. "Not in the least," he said. "We understood each other from the first moment. I no sooner addressed myself to the men than I saw that I was completely understood, and from that time forward there has been the utmost harmony. It is delightful to work with such an orchestra. It is scarcely necessary to explain things to them; they are such splendid artists. Sometimes with an orchestra it is necessary to waste many words, and then not be understood. With this one it is often necessary to say just one word, and what is wanted is done instantly."

HERALD
NOVEMBER 18, 1906

Granitic and Inexorable Music—Chopin Piece by Szumowska.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Piano concerto in E minor.....Chopin
Mme. Szumowska.
Symphony in D minor.....Sinding

The carefully considered and brilliant performance of the overture to "Oberon" was followed by one of Chopin's concerto in E minor that was on the whole ineffective, although Mme. Szumowska played the Romanze with poetic feeling. The concerto itself, beautiful as it is, is not a work for a large hall. Its dreamy character, its intimate melancholy, are as nought when there is no close relationship between pianist and hearer. The accompaniment was subdued and Mme. Szumowska had every opportunity for the display of her skill, but the hall was still too large, and the perfume of Chopin quickly evaporated.

Nor are the bravura passages any more than the purely melodic thoughts effective in Symphony Hall. It must also be said that both in the first movement and in the rondo the pianist's rhythm was not always sharply defined and in the working out section of the opening allegro the pianist and the orchestra were not in full sympathy. Mme. Szumowska was too well acquainted with the traditions to force tone in this concerto or to gain extraneous effects by converting a long reverie into a stump-speech. On the other hand there was a lack of delicate brilliance in the quick movements and more than once there was evident labor where there should have been graceful fleetness.

Sinding's symphony had been played here only once before last night, and to many in the audience it was unknown. Mr. Gericke produced it here early in 1899. It is a rugged work and there is little euphony in it, but the composer's voice, though generally raucous, is his own and it is impressive. It is a Scandinavian work, for it is charged with the Scandinavian spirit of the sagas and the old religious books. There is the grimness of the Vikings, there is the relentless clamor of the sea wolves. Even in the moments of comparative quiet in the first movement, ominous voices are heard, "ancestral voices prophesying war." The andante is a dirge without hope even of mead poured eternally for the brave. The scherzo, which at first suggests a native dance, becomes a savage orgie. Some no doubt looked eagerly for the close of the finale—"when the hurly-burly's done"—yet in this finale there are strongly conceived passages.

This symphony is wholly without sensuous charm. If there be thought of landscape or seascape, the hearer is reminded only of that which is forbidding in Norwegian scenery. But here is a composer who apparently disdained all easy ways of winning popular favor and said his say without regard for a public. He spoke forcibly, and at times he roared in speech. His rough eloquence was occasionally softened a little by fleeting remembrances of Wagner's language, but he quickly sought again his own native tongue.

Whether you like or dislike the symphony, its savage intensity and its stern expression of inexorable conviction are not to be denied or at once forgotten. No orchestral music written by Sinding since this symphony has the same force. The symphony in D minor expresses what Mr. Busoni tried vainly to say in his "Gehaernischte" suite.

The Boston Post

NOVEMBER 18, 1906. NO. 7; VOL. 42

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mme. Antoinette Szumowska, pia[nist] was the soloist of the Symphony conce[rt] last evening, and the programme was as follows:

Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Concerto for pianoforte, Op. 11.....Chopin
Symphony No. 1.....Sinding

The Sinding symphony was played once before several years since under Mr. Gericke. The work has many pages of interest, although as a whole it is uneven and often labored, being evidently not a work of lasting value. Dr. Muck conducted with evident intent to bring out all the merit that there was in the work and succeeded remarkably well. The familiar "Oberon" overture proved most acceptable. Mme. Szumowska played the Chopin concerto in a highly finished manner, but the interpretation was generally without depth or poetic sense. It was pleasing but not authoritative. The pianist was liberally applauded and recalled.

A "Russian" programme by Glazounoff and Rimsky-Korsakoff is promised for this coming week, with a Russian violinist, Alexander Petschnikoff, as the soloist in the Tschaikowsky concerto.

The Boston Symphony Quartet will give its second concert in Chickering Hall tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock. The assisting artist will be Mr. Hiram G. Tucker of this city. What Professor Hess promises to be one of the most interesting novelties of the season will be played in this programme. It is a quartet in D major by Hugo Kaun. Mr. Kaun is a German having been born in Berlin in 1863. He was a resident for several years of Milwaukee, having gone there in 1887, and while there his abilities as a composer were discovered by the late Theodore Thomas, who played many of his orchestral works at the concerts of the Chicago orchestra.

* * * *

The sale of seats for the postponed Saint-Saens concert is proceeding steadily at the box office of Symphony Hall. While it is always a disappointment to have to defer a concert, the fact that M. Saint-Saens was not able to appear on the date first announced seems to have made little difference in the interest created by his coming to this city, as very few of the large number of mail orders received last month have been revoked. M. Saint-Saens received an enthusiastic welcome in New York and so great was the desire to see him that two extra concerts have been announced in that city. He is looking forward with much interest to conducting the Boston Symphony orchestra on the evening of Nov. 26, in Symphony hall.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Mme Szumowska at Symphony Concert.

Symphony Quartet—Felix Fox Recital—Apollo Club.

Other Coming Events of Timely Interest.

The overture to Weber's "Oberon," Chopin's E minor piano concerto and Sinding's D minor symphony made up the fifth Symphony program last week. Mme Szumowska was the soloist. The romantic spirit of the Weber overture was charmingly illustrated by Dr Muck's men, the horn figurations being given with clarity of tone and precision, the crashing "Oberon" chord sounding sufficiently vigorous and all the tripping elf-like measures by the strings swinging along in a dainty and harmonious ensemble that was delightful to the ear. The appreciation of this number was expressed in a marked manner. Chopin's E minor concerto has such a modest orchestral background that it is admirably suited to Mme Szumowska's style of interpretation, and as the score makes but slight demands upon the artist's physical ability, her performance proved to be thoroughly satisfying.

Mme Szumowska's work is particularly enjoyable in compositions of a gentle and romantic nature, and she played the concerto with all the grace, finger dexterity and tonal beauty which has always characterized her interpretations. In the muted string accompaniment of the second movement the perfect accord of piano and orchestra made the adagio specially interesting, the crisp staccato ornamentations by the solo instrument calling for high commendation. In the finale Mme Szumowska's work was brilliant, the runs and arpeggios were executed clearly and rapidly, and only in the more vigorous passages did this popular artist show lack of power to properly set forth the composer's ideas. Her greeting was very cordial, and at the close of her performance the applause was spontaneous and long continued.

The symphony of the Russian composer, Sinding, who is said to be a fiery fellow by nature, shows undoubted power of a grim sort, for the score contains many startling effects and strange instrumental combinations, allied with great technical skill, which here and there develops some beautiful but brief melodic measures. The general impression of the work is that it lacks contrasts and is savage, aggressive and melancholy in nearly all its moods. The scoring is so full as to be noisy at times. Conductor Muck led his forces through the musical labyrinth with considerable vigor and they responded nobly to all the demands of composer and director.

This week's program will be devoted to modern Russian music. The soloist will be the Russian violinist, Alexander Petschnikoff, who will play Tschaikowsky's D major violin concerto. The other program numbers will be the overture, "Betrothed of the Tsar," by Rimsky-Karsakoff, and for the first time here Glazounoff's fifth symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

[quartet] will give its second concert in Chickering hall tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock. The assisting artist will be Hiram G. Tucker. Prof Hess promises one of the most interesting novelties of the season, a quartet in D major by Hugo Kaun. Mr Kaun was born in Berlin in 1863. He was a resident for several years of Milwaukee, having gone there in 1887, and while there his abilities as a composer were discovered by the late Theodore Thomas, who played many of his orchestral works at the concerts of the Chicago orchestra. His name has appeared at least once on our own Symphony programs. Several years ago Mr Kaun returned to Berlin, where he now lives.

This quartet, so far as can be learned, has never been played in America. Tomorrow evening's program is as follows: Beethoven, string quartet, F minor, opus 95; Hugo Kaun, string quartet, D major, opus 41, No. 2 (first time); Dvorak, piano quartet, E flat major, opus 87.

SAINT-SAENS' CONCERT.

While it is always a disappointment to have to postpone a concert, the fact that M Saint-Saens was not able to appear at Symphony hall on the date first announced seems to have made little difference in the interest created by his coming to this city, as very few of the large number of mail orders received last month have been revoked. M Saint-Saens received an enthusiastic welcome in New York and so great was the desire to see him that two extra concerts have been announced in that city. He is looking forward with much interest to conducting the Boston Symphony orchestra on the evening of Nov 26, in Symphony hall.

BOSTON OPERATIC [CO.]

The Bost[on] announces the following cast for its performances of "Robin Hood" in Jordan hall Dec [4] and 5: Maid Marian, Miss Helen D. Mahler; Anabel, Miss Sophie Barnard; Alan-A-Dale, Miss Louise Senton; Dame Durden, Miss Emma Eckar; Sheriff, D. E. Bowen; Friar Tuck, George B. Bigelow; Little John, A. R. Marshall; Robin Hood, Walter Wingfield; Will Scarlet, Charles Long, and Sir Guy, William Wilson. The chorus numbers 60 voices, and will be heard to great advantage in the many bright numbers with which the opera abounds.

MR FOX AND HOFFMAN QUARTET.

The first of a series of recitals by Mr Felix Fox, pianist, the Hoffman quartet assisting, will be given in Steinert hall next Tuesday afternoon. The program is as follows: Brahms' quintet for piano and strings; D'Indy's quartet for piano and strings; and four pianofore pieces, the first movement from Glazounow's [illegible] fourth [illegible]

[NEW YORK CITY]
NOV 15 1906

DR. MUCK AND THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The interest in orchestral concerts is growing in New York city. The Philharmonic Society has had an advance sale of season tickets exceeding by several thousand dollars that of any of the other sixty-four years of its existence. Walter Damrosch has felt called upon to give four Saint-Saëns concerts (with the coöperation of that composer) instead of two; and when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first Carnegie Hall concert, last Thursday, not only was every seat taken, but there was a brisk demand for more tickets than could be supplied. This state of affairs was the more significant inasmuch as there was no singer, pianist, or violinist to give the variety and popular interest commonly supposed to be essential to a successful orchestral concert.

The soloist's place was usurped by Dr. Muck, Boston's new musical pilot. Would he prove to be a man of mere polish and precision, like Gericke; or of excessive energy and misplaced accent, like Paur; or a true poet and interpreter, like Nikisch? Inasmuch as only two composers were represented on the programme, a decisive answer to such questions would be premature. Still, Dr. Muck's way of interpreting Beethoven's fifth symphony and three Wagner numbers—the "Faust Overture," "Siegfried Idyll," and "Meistersinger" prelude—probably gave a fair measure of his artistic stature and traits. It cannot be denied that Beethoven's symphonies have become somewhat faded through excessive repetition. To freshen the interest in them we need strongly individual interpretations. From this point of view, Dr. Muck proved disappointing. While not strictly metronomic, he is, on the whole, conventional, and if he nevertheless succeeded in making the music sound bright, this was owing chiefly to an animation which seems to be his chief trait, and which he is able to impart to his players. In the Wagner numbers the new conductor proved a great improvement on his predecessor. For once the brass players were allowed to make themselves heard where the music is marked fortissimo. Yet climax-building is not Dr. Muck's strong point. The "Meistersinger" Vorspiel left much on that score to be desired. In the "Siegfried Idyll" one missed the subtle contrasts and miniature climaxes, so to speak, with the aid of which Seidl used to make this sinfonietta domestica seem so beautiful. At the Saturday afternoon concert Dr. Muck proved himself an excellent Brahms conductor, and there was more poetry in his interpretation of Weber's "Oberon" and "Freischütz" overtures than in any of his performances at the first concert.

BOSTON AMERICAN
NOVEMBER 20, 1906

SAINT-SAENS WILL PLAY OWN CONCERTO

An important change has been made in the program of the Saint-Saens concert in Symphony Hall next Monday evening, November 26. Instead of the famous composer conducting the orchestra and playing an organ solo, as originally planned, Dr. Muck will conduct the whole concert, and M. Saint-Saens will appear as piano soloist, playing his concerto in [illegible] minor, No. 3, and a group of solo pieces. This change is due to the general demand in Boston to hear Saint-Saens as a pianist, and to the composer's desire to have the orchestra conducted by Dr. Muck.

BOSTON GLOBE
NOVEMBER 20, 1906

Saint-Saens Concert.

A change has been made in the program of the Saint-Saens concert which is to be given in Symphony hall next Monday evening. Since it was first announced that the distinguished composer was to come to Boston innumerable requests have been made that he play one of his piano concertos. When it was announced that he was to play only the organ great disappointment was expressed. The fact is that he cannot play the piano and conduct in the same evening.

The general desire to hear him play the piano led the management to ask Dr Muck if he would conduct this extra concert. It was asking a good deal, for just at this time the orchestra is hard at work on some unfamiliar music. Dr Muck, however, said that he would be glad to help make the Saint-Saens concert a success, and yesterday it was settled that the composer would not conduct or play the organ.

He will play his concerto in G minor, the most popular of the works he has written for the piano, and a group of solo pieces. The orchestral numbers will probably be his overture to the opera, "Les Barbares," and [illegible]

[72]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813
NOVEMBER 19, 1906

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

PROGRAMME.

Weber—Oberon Overture.
Chopin—Piano Concerto in E minor.
Soloist, Mme. Antoinette Szumowska.
Sinding—Symphony in D minor.

It looked like a short programme, but the length of the symphony carried matters near to 10 p.m. We scarcely feel at liberty to reveal anything about the first part of the "Oberon" overture, for Dr. Muck whispered it to the audience in the strictest confidence. But we may intimate that things become very difficult for the horns when their passages are taken so very slowly. On this occasion they flatted perceptibly. The end of the overture, however, was effective and inspiring, and Dr. Muck has warrant enough for the tempo and shading of the first part also—although we prefer the less crawling speed that we have been accustomed to.

The Chopin Concerto was not very exciting. It is possible that the work would make its best effect in a smaller hall. Liszt did not think the two concertos were among Chopin's most inspired compositions, in spite of the fact that the Larghetto of this work may be considered as a love-letter to the singer Constantia Gladkowska. That the concertro is melioic in to its credit, for it is refreshing to turn occasionally from "Life's endless toil and endeavor" as represented in the ambitious compositions, and rest in a tuneful nook.

That excellent artist, Mme. Szumowska, erred a little, as Joseffy has done, on the side of delicacy. There was much fluency in her interpretation, but also some lack of force. She gave some beautiful touches, however, in the Larghetto and in the finale, and at the end she was recalled twice and received floral tributes.

Dr. Muck las a man of surprises. The concert had been somewhat languid up to this point, but now the conductor suddenly caused the audience to sit up. From the very first measure there was virility and power in Sinding's symphony. Every point was brought out with mastery. Yet there was no such wild enthusiasm on the part of the public such as followed the wonderful reading of the Brahms symphony, three weeks before. The Sinding symphony is a great work, but it is an unequal one, and it is at times prolix. It is too earnest and grave to become popular. Yet we predict that each successive hearing would reveal new beauties; it is a symphony that would grow upon acquaintance.

The Andante, for example, pictures brooding and loneliness in a more graphic manner than we can recall in any other symphony, and the impressive reiteration of the moving organ-point, a "basso ostinato," is wonderful. Horn and clarinette deserve credit for their work in this, and the bassoon was very effective in the finale. The ferocity of the bass tuba is a marked feature in the ending, and the entire finale has a Viking brutality that is not always attractive but is original and by no means ineffective.

Everywhere there is full control of the orchestra displayed. If the work of sombre it is deliberately so, the composer knows what he wants to say and speaks his thought with attractive individuality. The wood-wind is used a la Tschaikowsky, chiefly in the depths, and the brasses have some remarkable passages against pizzicato strings. Nor is contrapuntal skill lacking, for there are some effective canonic passages in the finale.

But the prolixity of the finale must be considered a fault. Here there is a leaning towards bombast and grandiloquence which is too long-continued. To us the second movement seems the gem of the work and is full of the loftiest beauty.

Dr. Muck deserves the highest praise for the careful manner in which this work was read. It was as praiseworthy as the Brahms revelation already alluded to. And we can imagine that it was a much less grateful task than the interpretation of the C minor symphony, for even with the best possible performance this symphony of fjord and mountain, of Viking and Saga, was bound to be somewhat removed from popular comprehension and appreciation. Next Saturday we return to Muscovy. "Die Russen kommen!" Louis C. Elson.

DR. MUCK'S PRAISE.

(From a New York Interview.)

"We are very fond of the Boston Orchestra in America," was suggested to Dr. Muck. "What do you think of it in comparison to the European orchestras?"

"I should say it was equal to the best—to the orchestras of Vienna and Berlin and such organizations," said Dr. Muck, nodding his head and smiling. "The most fortunate thing about it is that the men have been accustomed to play together for so many years that they have been welded into a harmonious organization that would not be possible under any other system. Such a condition is to be found only in our largest orchestras abroad. In most of them the membership changes so frequently as to prevent the thorough understanding so necessary to harmony.

"The selection of the Boston Orchestra has also been made with the greatest wisdom. The men for the various instruments have been taken from the best. Thus we find most of the wood instruments are played by Frenchmen, many of the brass instruments by Germans, and many of the string instruments by Austrians and Americans. It was a very wise selection."

"Did you have any difficulty in getting acquainted with the men?"

Dr. Muck smiled broadly. "Not in the least," he said. "We understood each other from the first moment. I no sooner addressed myself to the men than I saw that I was completely understood, and from that time forward there has been the utmost harmony. It is delightful to work with such an orchestra. It is scarcely necessary to explain things to them; they are such splendid artists. Sometimes with an orchestra it is necessary to waste many words, and then not be understood. With this one it is often necessary to say just one word, and what is wanted is done instantly."

SUNDAY HERALD
NOVEMBER 18, 1906

Granitic and Inexorable Music—Chopin Piece by Szumowska.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Piano concerto in E minor.....Chopin
Mme. Szumowska.
Symphony in D minor.....Sinding

The carefully considered and brilliant performance of the overture to "Oberon" was followed by one of Chopin's concerto in E minor that was on the whole ineffective, although Mme. Szumowska played the Romanze with poetic feeling. The concerto itself, beautiful as it is, is not a work for a large hall. Its dreamy character, its intimate melancholy, are as nought when there is no close relationship between pianist and hearer. The accompaniment was subdued and Mme. Szumowska had every opportunity for the display of her skill, but the hall was still too large, and the perfume of Chopin quickly evaporated.

Nor are the bravura passages any more than the purely melodic thoughts effective in Symphony Hall. It must also be said that both in the first movement and in the rondo the pianist's rhythm was not always sharply defined and in the working out section of the opening allegro the pianist and the orchestra were not in full sympathy. Mme. Szumowska was too well acquainted with the traditions to force tone in this concerto or to gain extraneous effects by converting a long reverie into a stump-speech. On the other hand there was a lack of delicate brilliance in the quick movements and more than once there was evident labor where there should have been graceful fleetness.

Sinding's symphony had been played here only once before last night, and to many in the audience it was unknown. Mr. Gericke produced it here early in 1899. It is a rugged work and there is little euphony in it, but the composer's voice, though generally raucous, is his own and it is impressive. It is a Scandinavian work, for it is charged with the Scandinavian spirit of the sagas and the old religious books. There is the grimness of the Vikings, there is the relentless clamor of the sea wolves. Even in the moments of comparative quiet in the first movement, ominous voices are heard, "ancestral voices prophesying war." The andante is a dirge without hope even of mead poured eternally for the brave. The scherzo, which at first suggests a native dance, becomes a savage orgie. Some no doubt looked eagerly for the close of the finale—"when the hurly-burly's done"—yet in this finale there are strongly conceived passages.

This symphony is wholly without sensuous charm. If there be thought of landscape or seascape, the hearer is reminded only of that which is forbidding in Norwegian scenery. But here is a composer who apparently disdained all easy ways of winning popular favor and said his say without regard for a public. He spoke forcibly, and at times he roared in speech. His rough eloquence was occasionally softened a little by fleeting remembrances of Wagner's language, but he quickly sought again his own native tongue.

Whether you like or dislike the symphony, its savage intensity and its stern expression of inexorable conviction are not to be denied or at once forgotten. No orchestral music written by Sinding since this symphony has the same force. The symphony in D minor expresses what Mr. Busoni tried vainly to say in his "Gehaernischte" suite.

The Boston Post
NOVEMBER 18, 1906. NO. 7; VOL. 42

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mme. Antoinette Szumowska, pianist, was the soloist of the Symphony concert last evening, and the programme was as follows:

Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Concerto for pianoforte, Op. 11.....Chopin
Symphony No. 1.....Sinding

The Sinding symphony was played once before several years since under Mr. Gericke. The work has many pages of interest, although as a whole it is uneven and often labored, being evidently not a work of lasting value. Dr. Muck conducted with evident intent to bring out all the merit that there was in the work and succeeded remarkably well. The familiar "Oberon" overture proved most acceptable. Mme. Szumowska played the Chopin concerto in a highly finished manner, but the interpretation was generally without depth or poetic sense. It was pleasing but not authoritative. The pianist was liberally applauded and recalled.

A "Russian" programme by Glazounoff and Rimsky-Korsakoff is promised for this coming week, with a Russian violinist, Alexander Petschnikoff, as the soloist in the Tschaikowsky concerto.

The Boston Symphony Quartet will give its second concert in Chickering Hall tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock. The assisting artist will be Mr. Hiram G. Tucker of this city. What Professor Hess promises to be one of the most interesting novelties of the season will be played in this programme. It is a quartet in D major by Hugo Kaun. Mr. Kaun is a German, having been born in Berlin in 1863. He was a resident for several years of Milwaukee, having gone there in 1887, and while there his abilities as a composer were discovered. [illegible] who played many of his orchestral works at the concerts of the Chicago orchestra.

* * * *

The sale of seats for the postponed Saint-Saens concert is proceeding steadily at the box office of Symphony Hall. While it is always a disappointment to have to defer a concert, the fact that M. Saint-Saens was not able to appear on the date first announced seems to have made little difference in the interest created by his coming to this city, as very few of the large number of mail orders received last month have been revoked. The programme will consist entirely of music by this famous French composer.

NOVEMBER 18, 1906

MUSICAL MATTERS

Mme Szumowska at Symphony Concert.

Symphony Quartet—Felix Fox Recital—Apollo Club.

Other Coming Events of Timely Interest.

The overture to Weber's "Oberon," Chopin's E minor piano concerto and Sinding's D minor symphony made up the fifth Symphony program last week. Mme Szumowska was the soloist. The romantic spirit of the Weber overture was charmingly illustrated by Dr Muck's men, the horn figurations being given with clarity of tone and precision, the crashing "Oberon" chord sounding sufficiently vigorous and all the tripping elf-like measures by the strings swinging along in a dainty and harmonious ensemble that was delightful to the ear. The appreciation of this number was expressed in a marked manner. Chopin's E minor concerto has such a modest orchestral background that it is admirably suited to Mme Szumowska's style of interpretation, and as the score makes but slight demands upon the artist's physical ability, her performance proved to be thoroughly satisfying.

Mme Szumowska's work is particularly enjoyable in compositions of a gentle and romantic nature, and she played the concerto with all the grace, finger dexterity and tonal beauty which has always characterized her interpretations. In the muted string accompaniment of the second movement the perfect accord of piano and orchestra made the adagio specially interesting, the crisp staccato ornamentations by the solo instrument calling for high commendation. In the finale Mme Szumowska's work was brilliant, the runs and arpeggios were executed clearly and rapidly, and only in the more vigorous passages did this popular artist show lack of power to properly set forth the composer's ideas. Her greeting was very cordial, and at the close of her performance the applause was spontaneous and long continued.

The symphony of the Russian composer, Sinding, who is said to be a fiery fellow by nature, shows undoubted power of a grim sort, for the score contains many startling effects and strange instrumental combinations, allied with great technical skill, which here and there develops some beautiful but brief melodic measures. The general impression of the work is that it lacks contrasts and is savage, aggressive and melancholy in nearly all its moods. The scoring is so full as to be noisy at times. Conductor Muck led his forces through the musical labyrinth with considerable vigor and they responded nobly to all the demands of composer and director.

This week's program will be devoted to modern Russian music. The soloist will be the Russian violinist, Alexander Petschnikoff, who will play Tschaikowsky's D major violin concerto. The other program numbers will be the overture, "Betrothed of the Tsar," by Rimsky-Karsakoff, and for the first time here Glazounoff's fifth symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY [illegible]TET.

[illegible]phony quartet will give its second concert in Chickering hall tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock. The assisting artist will be Hiram G. Tucker. Prof Hess promises one of the most interesting novelties of the season, a quartet in D major by Hugo Kaun. Mr Kaun was born in Berlin in 1863. He was a resident for several years of Milwaukee, having gone there in 1887, and while there his abilities as a composer were discovered by the late Theodore Thomas, who played many of his orchestral works at the concerts of the Chicago orchestra. His name has appeared at least once on our own Symphony programs. Several years ago Mr Kaun returned to Berlin, where he now lives.

This quartet, so far as can be learned, has never been played in America. Tomorrow evening's program is as follows: Beethoven, string quartet, F minor, opus 95; Hugo Kaun, string quartet, D major, opus 41, No. 2 (first time); Dvorak, piano quartet, E flat major, opus 87.

SAINT-SAENS' CONCERT.

While it is always a disappointment to have to postpone a concert, the fact that M Saint-Saens was not able to appear at Symphony hall on the date first announced seems to have made little difference in the interest created by his coming to this city, as very few of the large number of mail orders received last month have been revoked. M Saint-Saens received an enthusiastic welcome in New York and so great was the desire to see him that two extra concerts have been announced in that city. He is looking forward with much interest to conducting the Boston Symphony orchestra on the evening of Nov 26, in Symphony hall.

BOSTON OPERATIC SOC[illegible]

The Boston [illegible] Society announces the following cast for its performances of "Robin Hood" in Jordan hall Dec 4 and 5: Maid Marian, Miss Helen D. Mahler; Anabel, Miss Sophie Barnard; Alan-A-Dale, Miss Louise Senton; Dame Durden, Miss Emma Eckar; Sheriff, D. E. Bowen; Friar Tuck, George B. Bigelow; Little John, A. R. Marshall; Robin Hood, Walter Wingald; Will Scarlet, Charles Long, and Sir Guy, William Wilson. The chorus numbers 60 voices, and will be heard to great advantage in the many bright numbers with which the opera abounds.

MR FOX AND HOFFMAN QUARTET.

The first of a series of recitals by Mr Felix Fox, pianist, the Hoffman quartet assisting, will be given in Steinert hall next Tuesday afternoon. The program is as follows: Brahms' quintet for piano and strings; D'Indy's quartet for piano and strings; and four pianofore pieces, the first movement from Glazounow's second sonata, the fourth impromptu and a romance, Faure, and a Saint-Saens toccata.

[illegible]
[illegible] YORK [illegible]
[illegible] 3 1906

DR. MUCK AND THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The interest in orchestral concerts is growing in New York city. The Philharmonic Society has had an advance sale of season tickets exceeding by several thousand dollars that of any of the other sixty-four years of its existence. Walter Damrosch has felt called upon to give four Saint-Saëns concerts (with the coöperation of that composer) instead of two; and when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first Carnegie Hall concert, last Thursday, not only was every seat taken, but there was a brisk demand for more tickets than could be supplied. This state of affairs was the more significant inasmuch as there was no singer, pianist, or violinist to give the variety and popular interest commonly supposed to be essential to a successful orchestral concert.

The soloist's place was usurped by Dr. Muck, Boston's new musical pilot. Would he prove to be a man of mere polish and precision, like Gericke; or of excessive energy and misplaced accent, like Paur; or a true poet and interpreter, like Nikisch? Inasmuch as only two composers were represented on the programme, a decisive answer to such questions would be premature. Still, Dr. Muck's way of interpreting Beethoven's fifth symphony and three Wagner numbers—the "Faust Overture," "Siegfried Idyll," and "Meistersinger" prelude—probably gave a fair measure of his artistic stature and traits. It cannot be denied that Beethoven's symphonies have become somewhat faded through excessive repetition. To freshen the interest in them we need strongly individual interpretations. From this point of view Dr. Muck proved disappointing. While not strictly metronomic, he is, on the whole, conventional, and if he nevertheless succeeded in making the music sound bright, this was owing chiefly to an animation which seems to be his chief trait, and which he is able to impart to his players. In the Wagner numbers the new conductor proved a great improvement on his predecessor. For once the brass players were allowed to make themselves heard where the music is marked fortissimo. Yet climax-building is not Dr. Muck's strong point. The "Meistersinger" Vorspiel left much on that score to be desired. In the "Siegfried Idyll" one missed the subtle contrasts and miniature climaxes, so to speak, with the aid of which Seidl used to make this sinfonietta domestica seem so beautiful. At the Saturday afternoon concert Dr. Muck proved himself an excellent Brahms conductor, and there was more poetry in his interpretation of Weber's "Oberon" and "Freischütz" overtures than in any of his performances at the first concert.

BOSTON AMERICAN
NOVEMBER 20, 1906

SAINT-SAENS WILL PLAY OWN CONCERTO

An important change has been made in the program of the Saint-Saens concert in Symphony Hall next Monday evening, November 26. Instead of the famous composer conducting the orchestra and playing an organ solo, as originally planned, Dr. Muck will conduct the whole concert, and M. Saint-Saens will appear as piano soloist, playing his concerto in [illegible] minor, No. 3, and a group of solo pieces. This change is due to the general demand in Boston to hear Saint-Saens as a pianist, and to the composer's desire to have the orchestra conducted by Dr. Muck.

BOSTON GLOBE
NOVEMBER 20. 1906

Saint-Saens Concert.

A change has been made in the program of the Saint-Saens concert which is to be given in Symphony hall next Monday evening. Since it was first announced that the distinguished composer was to come to Boston innumerable requests have been made that he play one of his piano concertos. When it was announced that he was to play only the organ great disappointment was expressed. The fact is that he cannot play the piano and conduct in the same evening.

The general desire to hear him play the piano led the management to ask Dr Muck if he would conduct this extra concert. It was asking a good deal, for just at this time the orchestra is hard at work on some unfamiliar music. Dr Muck, however, said that he would be glad to help make the Saint-Saens concert a success, and yesterday it was settled that the composer would not conduct or play the organ.

He will play his concerto in G minor, the most popular of the works he has written for the piano, and a group of solo pieces. The orchestral numbers will probably be his overture to the opera, "Les Barbares," and [illegible]

[illegible]

[72]

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1906

TO CORRESPONDENTS: The Transcript will not be responsible for unsolicited manuscripts offered for publication. Stamps must be inclosed for return postage with all literary matter sent on approval.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

DR. MUCK TALKS OF HIS ORCHESTRA AND AUD[illegible]CES

[illegible]abrilowitsch at Chickering [illegible]—The Symphony Concert—Saint-Saens's [illegible]e-tirement—Francis Wilson as Playwrigh[illegible] —News of the Day

In Boston, before he began his work with the Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck talked of his anticipations of it. In New York, ten days ago, after he had given his first concerts there, he talked of the impressions the band, his audiences and our musical conditions generally had made upon him, and added a little about his plans for the future. A reporter of the New York Times noted some of these things as follows:

"I should say the Boston Orchestra was equal to the best," began Dr. Muck, "to the orchestras of Vienna and Berlin and such organizations. The most fortunate thing about it is that the men have been accustomed to play together for so many years that they have been welded into a harmonious organization that would not be possible under any other system. Such a condition is to be found only in our largest orchestras abroad. In most of them the membership changes so frequently as to prevent the thorough understanding so necessary to harmony. The selection of the Boston Orchestra has also been made with the greatest wisdom. The men for the various instruments have been taken from the best. Thus we find most of the wood instruments are played by Frenchmen, many of the brass instruments by Germans, and many of the string instruments by Austrians and Americans. It was a very wise selection.

"We understood each other from the first moment. I no sooner addressed myself to the men than I saw that I was completely understood, and from that time forward there has been the utmost harmony. It is delightful to work with such an orchestra. It is scarcely necessary to explain things to them; they are such splendid artists. Sometimes with an orchestra it is necessary to waste many words, and then not be understood. With this one it is often necessary to say just one word, and what is wanted is done instantly."

"And the American audiences?" Dr. Muck smiled again. "I like the American audiences," he said. "In fact, I do not hesitate to say that they will compare favorably with the best German audiences. I find them to be warm, attentive, enthusiastic. They recognize good music instantly. I know that there is an impression in Germany that the Americans have not a high standard of music and do not recognize the best and understand the best. But I shall carry back an entirely different idea. I am certain that they appreciate the first artists. I am not certain how far I am able to judge, as perhaps I have had the good fortune to come in contact only with the best of the American music lovers, but if these are representative of a great class I should say that America is intensely interested in music and has fine taste. I find that America is kept well informed on the new music, and that, therefore, there is little to introduce of the compositions of recent times. But I have instructed the editors in Berlin and Paris to keep me in touch with their publications of the very newest works, and should any of them be suitable I shall introduce them before my return. I have hope to be able to put several novelties before the American public.

"I am here for a year only," said Dr. Muck, "and the question of remaining does not lie with me only. It lies with the Royal Opera, with the emperor. I am pleased to say that I am well liked by the emperor, and he does not wish me to be away from the Royal Opera, and, of course, I would not wish to be away under such conditions. It was difficult to get my leave of absence for a year as it was, and I got it only on the promise that I would not ask for another for a long time to come. Even under such conditions I doubt whether it would have been given had it not been for the interest the emperor has in America. As you know, he is very fond of the Americans and he is particularly fond of Harvard University. It was the connection of Major Higginson with Harvard that enabled him to get the ear of the emperor."

The Symphony Concert

Sinding's music confirmed and heightened, at the Symphony concert on Saturday, the impression that it had made on Friday, and to all intents it was new music. Seven years ago Mr. Gericke played the symphony at a pair of concerts, but never afterward revived it, and the musical memories were long that could bridge so wide an interval. Moreover, the symphony has chiefly its passion, power and largeness to commend it, and these are not the readiest means to warm liking. It is careless of the minor graces of music; it disdains, except in a few rare moments, any sensuous appeal. Its clangor sometimes deafens emotions by a too incessant insistence. Yet that over-insistence is born of the grim intensity with which Sinding fills the music. In spite of the symphonic form, it is dramatic music—some fierce drama of pursuit and conquest, Scandinavian, as Sinding is, universal as the appeal of his symphony is, what the stirred listener will, but certainly a drama. In that drama is all the passion of pursuit that Sinding flings into the sonorities of his first movement and pours into the broad sweep of his finale. The slow movement is desolate with the pain and the fruitlessness of [illegible] the scherzo returns to the wild[illegible] of it. Sombre all the music is, [illegible] and bald, except when [illegible] are wailing voices [illegible] conquest finds voice in it and mightily, and it is a rare emotion. The utterance is as bold as the mood and spares not. Throughout the music is grandiose and Dr. Muck and his men so played it.

Only a very full-voiced pianist may make Chopin's concerto "sound" in a great hall with a grand pianoforte before him, and a great orchestra. Even then, he makes it "sound," as Rosenthal, for example, does, with qualities than are less of the music itself than of him who is playing it. Mme. Szumowska is not such a pianist, and she and Dr. Muck were at least steadily at one in their unwillingness to force the music. It and its fellow are the two intimate concertos of all their kind, and Mme. Szumowska used to be a pianist whose delicate traits shone most in intimacy. There can be no intimacy in Symphony Hall but even with allowance for such an obstacle, she played the concerto with more conscientous intelligence than distinction of style, fineness of imagination or charm of lyric fancy and lyric song.

H. T. P.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
NOVEMBER 20, 1906

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTETTE CONCERT.

Programme.

Beethoven. Quartette in F minor, Op. 95.
Hugo Kaun. Quartette in D major, Op. 41, No. 2. (First time.)
Dvorak. Piano Quartette in E-flat major, Op. 87.
Mr. Hiram G. Tucker, Pianist.

A programme in which the interest was sustained from first to last. Boston has always been the home of the string quartette even from the days of the old "Mendelssohn Quintette," but never have we had as good opportunities for comparison as at present. We have the Kneisel Quartette for perfection of ensemble and Chesterfieldian elegance, the Hoffman quartette for virility, and the Boston Symphony Quartette for fiery intensity, not to mention several lesser organizations.

The great strength of the Boston Symphony Quartette lies in its first violinist. In every quartette it is expected that the first violin will be the preponderating figure, but in this quartette Prof. Willy Hess is the soul of the work. What is thereby lost in ensemble is in some degree compensated for by the energy and vehemence which permeates the performance, for it would be impossible to play with him without catching some of his "verve" and assertiveness.

As he is a splendid Beethoven interpreter the performances of this master by the quartette are always sure to be interesting and satisfactory, even when not balanced to perfection.

In spite of the fact that Beethoven holds well to regular form in the first three movements of his quartette in F minor, the first being in sonata-form, and the next two in definite song-form, there is a broadening of form in the final movement, which practically becomes two distinct movements, the final "Allegro Molto" scarcely being a Coda to the preceding matter. Although the first movement is in regular form its individual divisions are remarkably free and developed.

The beauty of the second movement, with its melodic charm, was done full justice to and impressed us more than the fiery quality of the first and last movements. Altogether this Opus 95 is much more comprehensible than the last five string quartettes of the master, who became gradually too orchestral for any string quartette.

The quartette was liberally applauded for its work in this powerful composition.

Hugo Kaun is a coming composer and is almost an American. Although born in Berlin (March 21st, 1863), he came to Milwaukee when 24 years of age and resided there 14 years. He is now again in Berlin. He has written the best orchestral work on an American topic, in his "Hiawatha." Naturally his composition should excite especial interest in his adopted country, but they are also intrinsically important. His string quartette in D major is a shapely and classical work, although it has three, instead of four movements, and ends with a slow and serious theme.

It has some good canonic work in its first movement, and there is an easy leading of the voices almost everywhere. The violoncello might have been more aggressive in the second movement, but the ensemble was generally excellent. It was odd to observe that there was not a real allegro anywhere in this rather pensive composition.

The Dvorak piano quartette introduced Mr. H. G. Tucker as a chamber musician. Although constantly active as organist, director and manager (he has done much to advance music in Boston), he is not often heard in this capacity. His work in the Dvorak quartette was, therefore, a very pleasant surprise. He gave good attention to the ensemble, and the balance of parts was not disturbed, as it too often is in a piano-quartette, by the leading and most powerful instrument.

The Dvorak quartette was decidedly the juiciest part of the entire programme. The second movement was beautiful and much more easily comprehended than the preceding parts of the programme. Here the violoncello had some important work to do, and Mr. Warnke was at his very best.

There was a good-sized audience present and there were several recalls.

Louis C. Elson.

SAINT-SAENS CONCERT.

A most important change has been made in the programme of the Saint-Saens concert which is to be given in Symphony Hall next Monday evening.

He will play his concerto in G minor, the most popular of the works he has written for the piano, and one in which he has won most enthusiastic praise in New York. In addition to this, he will play a group of solo pieces. The orchestral numbers will probably be his overture to the opera "Les Barbares," and his symphony in C minor, No. 3. Dr. Muck will conduct all the numbers.

NOVEMBER 20, 1906
BOSTON JOURNAL

KAUN QUARTET PLAYED FIRST TIME IN BOSTON

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave its second concert of the season at Chickering Hall last evening, in the presence of a good-sized and fashionable audience. The program consisted of Beethoven's quartet in F minor, Op. 95; a quartet in D major, Op. 41, No. 2, by Hugo Kaun, and Dvorak's quartet for piano, violin, viola and 'cello, in E flat, Op. 87. The assisting artist was H. G. Tucker.

The Kaun quartet was awaited with much interest, as it had not before been performed in Boston, and probably not on this side of the water. It is in three movements, and the German description said that the first denoted extreme peacefulness and deep feeling, the second liveliness and sprightliness, with an undertone of happiness, while the third was calm and grave. Mr. Hess and his players did their very best, but could not prevent the first movement from being dull and dreary. The second movement had moments of beauty and there was considerable dignity in the third, but the quartet upon the whole is not particularly inspiring or inspired, and is not likely to figure frequently upon quartet programs.

The fine Dvorak quartet has seldom been better performed, and Mr. Tucker at the piano was keenly appreciative of what was required of him. The Beethoven number was excellently performed. The Symphony Quartet is steadily growing in favor and has a constantly increasing number of patrons.

SAINT-SAENS CONCERT.

A most important change has been made in the program of the Saint-Saens concert which is to be given in Symphony Hall on next Monday evening, Nov. 26. Since it was first announced that the distinguished composer was to come to Boston to play with the orchestra innumerable requests have been made that he play one of his piano concertos, and when it was announced that he was to play only the organ great disappointment was expressed on all sides. The fact is, however, that he cannot play the piano and conduct in the same evening. And now it turns out that he has been most anxious that Dr. Muck should conduct for him. Yesterday it was settled that the composer would not conduct or play the organ.

THE BOSTON GLOBE
NOVEMBER 20, 1906.

SYMPHONY QUARTET.

Prof Hess and Associate Players Give Second Concert of Their Season in Chickering Hall.

The Boston Symphony quartet, assisted by Mr Hiram Tucker at the piano, gave the second concert in this season's series last evening in Chickering hall, the program having one novelty number, Hugo Kaun's quartet for two violins, viola and cello. Beethoven's F minor quartet for the same instruments and Dvorka's quartet for piano, violin, viola and cello completed the selections. The individual ability of the members of the quartet is well known, and now in ensemble playing they are approaching that perfection which only results after long association with each other. Last evening a critical audience was in evidence and the means of appreciation bestowed upon Prof Hess and his fellow players were judiciously tempered, more on account of some of the selections than upon the work of the artists, which was admirable throughout the evening.

The quartet by Kaun impresses one at first hearing as being rather monotonous excepting perhaps in the finale, when the score at times takes on some brilliancy and relieves the general somberness of the work. The performance was smooth and especially effective in the closing movement, which evoked spontaneous applause.

The interpretation of the Beethoven number was thoroughly enjoyable, Prof Hess and his men evidently being not only very familiar with the composition, but also heartily in sympathy with its beautiful conception and development. In the vivacious allegro in the second part the first violin showed a splendid advantage. The Dvorak quartet, in which Mr Tucker assisted, is to be commended for the excellent relation maintained between the piano and the strings, the exquisite tone of the numerous detached phrases given to the cello in the first two parts and for the vigorous and harmonious exploitation of the first movement. Dec 21 is the date of the third concert.

NOVEMBER 20, 1906
BOSTON TRAVELER.

A MOST important change has been made in the programme of the Saint-Saens concert, which is to be given in Symphony Hall on next Monday evening, Nov. 26. Instead of the distinguished composer conducting the orchestra and playing an organ solo, as was originally announced, Dr. Muck will conduct the whole concert, and M. Saint-Saens will appear as piano soloist, playing his concerto in G minor, No. 3, the most popular of his works for the piano, and a group of solo pieces.

This change is due to two causes. The first is the general demand in Boston to hear Saint-Saens as a pianist. The second is the composer's desire to have the orchestra conducted by Dr. Muck.

M. Saint-Saens cannot conduct and play the piano in the same evening, and when the matter was placed before Dr. Muck yesterday afternoon he agreed readily to take on himself the task of getting up an extra programme, although the regular work of the orchestra at this time is exceedingly heavy, several important and unfamiliar works being in preparation.

The orchestral numbers will probably be the overture to "Les Barbares" and [illegible] symphony in C minor, although these [illegible]ks may be changed for others.

[73]

BOSTON HERALD

Published Every Day in the Year.
VOL CXX., NO. 143.
TUESDAY, NOV. 20, 1906.

Boston Symphony Quartet.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony quartet (Messrs. Hess, Roth, Ferir, Warnke) took place last night in Chickering Hall. The programme included Beethoven's quartet in F minor, op. 95, first performed in public at Vienna in 1814, and described in the autograph score as "Quartett Serioso, 1810"; Kaun's quartet in D major, op. 41, No. 2, and Dvorak's piano quartet in E flat major, op. 87 (Mr. H. G. Tucker, pianist).

Hugo Kaun's quartet was performed here for the first time. It excited applause at the Music Festival at Essen last May, but that performance was by no means the first. Kaun, a Berliner by berth, sojourned in Milwaukee from 1887 to 1900, when he returned to Berlin. This quartet was played in that city in October, 1900, and in Leipsic in October, 1901. Kaun is known in Boston chiefly by his symphonic poem "Minnehaha," which was performed at a Symphony concert Jan. 30, 1904.

This quartet, like the first of the set, is of an unusual form. The story goes that when Kaun had nearly completed the first the news came that the steamship Elbe had gone down, and the composer made his finale a dirge in memory of the captain. There is no story, as far as we know, about the second, yet the finale, contrary to custom, begins quietly and seriously, and its second theme is of a gentle and dreamy nature. Thus there are two quiet movements with an intervening scherzo.

The opening movement is short. It is in the form of a free fugue, which begins gently with deep sentiment, develops to a climax, and then closes peacefully. It is distinguished by the skilful employment of all the resources of double counterpoint. The scherzo that follows is broadly planned and with an ever quickening pace. The middle section of this scherzo is of a more placid, yet gently emotional nature. In the repetition of the chief section, there is a fugato on the first motive of the scherzo, and there are many interesting harmonic details. There is a somewhat long and stirring coda.

This work was well worth playing and hearing. The composer's skill was used musically and emotionally, not merely for a display of scholastic knowledge.

The last movement is the most suggestive of the three. The players showed keen sympathy with the emotional content of the work and the performance was often deeply moving.

The other works on the programme are familiar. Dvorak's quartet, although played with less general smoothness than the other numbers, charmed by its vivacity and rhythm. There was an appreciative audience of fair size.

The third concert of the series will take place Monday evening, Dec. 17.

Saint-Saens Concert.

A most important change has been made in the programme of the Saint-Saens concert, which is to be given in Symphony Hall next Monday evening, Nov. 26. Since it was first announced that the distinguished composer was to come to Boston to play with the orchestra, innumerable requests have been made that he play one of his piano concertos, and when it was announced that he was to play only the organ great disappointment was expressed on all sides.

The fact is, however, that he cannot play the piano and conduct in the same evening. It turns out that he has been most anxious that Dr. Muck should conduct for him. This fact, together with the general desire to hear him play the piano, led the management to ask Dr. Muck if he would conduct this extra concert. Dr. Muck, however, said he would be very glad to help make the Saint-Saens concert a success, and yesterday it was settled that the composer would not conduct or play the organ.

He will play his concerto in G minor and a group of solo pieces. The orchestral pieces will probably be his overture to the opera "Les Barbares" and his symphony in C minor, No. 3. Dr. Muck will conduct all the numbers.

The concert will not merely bring a very distinguished composer to this city in the most favorable manner, but will give Bostonians who are not subscribers to the Symphony concerts an unexpected opportunity to hear the orchestra under its new conductor.

Musical Notes.

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, must be classed among the broad conservatives in music. He confesses that he finds little inspiration in the music which is being written today. In our search for beauty we must still go back to the masters of the nineteenth century. The music of today, he thinks, reflects the spirit of the times, which is of criticism and analysis, not of creation. He believes that absolute music reached its greatest beauty in Beethoven, and operatic music in the operas of Mozart, and the music dramas of Richard Wagner. He finds much that is interesting in the modern Russians who, although often bizarre and often brutal, are sincere and write as they feel. He likes the strong national note in their music and envies the Russians their rich store of folk material. The modern Frenchmen are interesting, although theirs is too often the music of the head instead of the heart. He admired Richard Strauss and Mahler, but in Reger can find no beauty nor coherency.

Olga Samaroff, the brilliant young pianist, can, in a sense, trace her artistic descent from Beethoven, and it is this fact which gives her readings of Beethoven's sonatas such great authority. She studied these sonatas with Charles-Marie Widor, the great organist of St. Sulpice, Paris, and one of the leading composers of France. Widor was a pupil of a pupil of the great master and is thoroughly versed in the traditions which covers the [illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK CITY
NOV 22

Boston's New Conductor

With its concerts in Carnegie Hall on November 8 and 10 the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its twenty-first season in New York. These concerts were especially noteworthy, because they introduced to this public Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the orchestra, who has come from the Vienna Philharmonic and the Royal Opera at Berlin to lead the Boston music makers for one year.

Dr. Muck is tall, rather thin and angular; is dignified and reserved in manner. His strong, smooth face, almost ascetic in outline, impresses one at first glance with a sense of inexorable sternness. But one who watches him at close range sees presently that he has the saving grace of good humor. He takes keen delight in his work and he is ever ready to encourage the men under him by prompt recognition of their good work. From the moment he takes his stand before the orchestra he is all for the music in hand. The audience, apparently, is forgotten. His appeal is wholly to his players, and that appeal is direct, explicit, compelling. The effect upon the audience comes thru the ear alone. He knows the effect he wants, and he gets it. All that he does is marked by intellectual force and authority. He thinks about his art, and he analyzes every measure he plays; but he is not unmindful of the sensuous charm of music. If there are hidden beauties he is likely to find them. If there be eloquence, emotional fire, martial pomp, he will not be loath to give these things utterance. In place of the cherry-stone-carving niceties of his predecessor, we are likely to get from the unsurpassed Boston Orchestra all the dash and fire and spirit of which its members are capable when their enthusiasm is not too ruthlessly curbed. And the prospect is good.

Dr. Karl Muck was born at Würzburg on October 22d, 1859. He appeared in public as a pianist at the age of eleven, his father, an accomplished amateur musician, having given him his first lessons in violin and pianoforte playing and in counterpoint. He studied at the universities of Heidelberg and Leipsic, and received his degree of Ph. D. from Leipsic in 1880 for special studies in philosophy, classic philology and the history of music. In that year also, having continued his musical studies at the Leipsic Conservatory as a pupil of E. F. Richter and Karl Reinecke, he made his first appearance as a professional pianist. But he was determined to be a conductor, and within the year left Leipsic to be chorus director at the Stadt Theater in Zurich. Since that time he has held posts as conductor of opera and of symphony concerts at Salzburg, Brunn, Graz, Prague, Vienna and Berlin. He has appeared as guest conductor in many other European cities, has been since 1894 the conductor of the Silesian Music Festivals, and has conducted performances of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth since 1901. His absence this year from the Royal Opera at Berlin is thru the special permission of the Emperor William.

INDEPENDENT
NEW YORK CITY
NOV 22 1906

The Season's Promise

Between now and next May there will be in Manhattan Borough alone about two hundred orchestral concerts of the first class, given by local and visiting organizations. The veteran, but sturdy, New York Philharmonic Society will be led to new victories in this, its sixty-fifth, season by Vassili Safonoff, the fiery Russian, who in each of the last three seasons made a deeper impression than any other of the Philharmonic's visiting conductors from oversea. Mr. Safonoff has been engaged for three years, thruout which he will not be heard with any other orchestra. Mr. Sam Franko, who spent the summer in Europe, has returned with a new collection of antique gems of the music of other days of the kind his concerts with his American Symphony Orchestra have made popular here in recent seasons. Besides those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there will be visits from the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Fritz Scheel and the Pittsburg Orchestra under Mr. Emil Paur.

The soloists engaged to appear with these orchestras, and who also will be heard in concerts and recitals of their own, present an imposing array. Among the pianists Paderewski is announced, but, alas, for only one concert, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Moriz Rosenthal, who comes to make an extensive tour after an absence of eight years, has already begun to astound all hearers by his prodigious feats of technic; Josef Lhévinne, the brilliant young Russian pianist, who was the musical discovery of last year, has returned to spend the greater part of the winter here; Ossip Gabrilowitsch is another Russian pianist who is come to us again, and Rafael Joseffy, Mme. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler and others resident in America will be heard in the course of the season. A small army of violinists will be led by César Thomson, the Belgian, who has not visited America since 1895; Alexander Petschnikoff, Hugo Heerman and Miss Maud Powell. There will be other instrumental soloists in plenty, and scores of singers will interpret the songs of the lyric masters.

ss
4
When the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town the week after next, Dr. Muck will offer two unfamiliar symphonies—Bruckner's No. 7 in E flat major, and Glazounoff's fifth. Rosenthal and Adamowski are to be the soloists. ..., 1881; New York, 1

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...RK CITY

Dr. Karl Muck
THE NEW CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

That most perfect of musical instruments, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has a new conductor as successor to the impeccable and excellent Gericke: Dr. Karl Muck, of the Berlin Royal Opera, who comes to America with a commanding reputation achieved abroad. Later in the season there will be more favorable opportunities for considering, in adequate detail, Dr. Muck's performances at the head of the orchestra from Boston. There is space now to say merely that at the first of the orchestra's New York concerts he disclosed abilities of a remarkable order. We have had no more poetical conductor since the death of the incomparable Seidl—poetical, yet equably poised, unswervingly self-controlled. He is a brilliant and most welcome addition to the somewhat meagre list of gifted conductors whom we may claim as resident and active.

...STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1906

Chickering Hall: Boston Symphony Quartet

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave its second concert of the present season, in Chickering Hall, last night, before an enthusiastic audience. Mr. H. G. Tucker was the pianist. The programme:

Quartet, F-minor, Op. 95.....Beethoven
Quartet, D-major No. 2, Op. 41.....Hugo Kaun
Quartet, piano and strings, Op. 87.....Dvorak

The Beethoven quartet, which is somewhat infrequently performed, was played in a polished manner.

Hugo Kaun, whose quartet was played for the first time, has had a life of adventurous struggle, of plucky and continuous warfare against circumstance, in which he has emerged the victor. Born in Berlin in 1863, he had composed no less than one hundred and sixty pieces before he was fourteen. A student at the Royal High School for Music, he was a pupil of Karl and Oskar Raif in piano playing of Friedrich Kiel in composition. During his first efforts as a composer, he led a hand to mouth existence giving lessons at starvation prices. In 1884 (others say 1887) he came to try his luck in America. Here at first he fared worse if possible than in Berlin. Playing for dancing, composing dance music, solos for cornet, trombone or what not, doing the laborious hack work of a general "arranger," these ungrateful tasks were his. He became known gradually, however as a teacher, and as choral and orchestral leader. Theodore Thomas, always the friend of struggling musicians, took an interest in Kaun's work and played his orchestral pieces one by one. Of late years Kaun has lived in Berlin, where he is well known as a teacher. An industrious and prolific composer, he has ventured into many fields. Among his compositions are piano pieces, songs for single voice, for men's voices, "The Normans Farewell" for men's chorus, baritone solo and orchestra, "Evening Festival in Venice" for mixed chorus and orchestra; two trios; two string quartets; two quintets, one with piano; "Vineta" symphonic poem Op. 16, a suite Karnevalfest, a symphony "To the Fatherland," a Festival March introducing "The Star Spangled Banner" for the opening of the seventh season of the Chicago orchestra, two poems "Minnehaha" and "Hiawatha" after Longfellow, and finally a Humoresque "Falstaff." A piano concerto by Kaun has been played with success during the past year in Germany, also a symphonic prologue to Hebbel's "Marie Magdelena." He has written an opera "Oliver Brown or the Pietist"; a second "The Painter of Antwerp" is said to remain unfinished only on account of the unsatisfactory ending of the poem. The overture to this opera was given under Theodore Thomas.

The Kaun quartet, played last night, had the refreshing quality of novel form; a short fugue followed by a scherzo ending with a well-rounded slow movement. For this innovation alone one should be grateful to Mr. Kaun. The opening fugue was undeniably interesting, although somewhat too restricted in technical features; after the regular "entrances" mere inversions of the theme cannot long sustain the interest, even with the assistance of pedal points and phrases of the theme "in diminution." The fugue form hardly seems a medium for spontaneous expression with Mr. Kaun, although this specimen was euphonious as well as dignified and serious in sentiment. The scherzo, although in the main pleasing, was somewhat diffuse and occasionally ponderous; a slower episode was conspicuous for the beauty of its part-writing; there were passages of humorous and delicate fancy. The concluding slow movement contained the best music of the quartet, rising to a dramatic climax that just stopped short of true eloquence. There were, however, movements of distinct expressive beauty. In general this quartet, while not remarkable for striking individuality, or conspicuous mastery of expression, nevertheless gave indisputable pleasure on account of its unusual form, skilful workmanship and sincerely earnest thought. The performance was painstaking and excellent at all points.

It seems incredible that Dvorak could have produced so unworthy and dull a piano quartet so near to the beautiful quintet Op. 81, one of his best pieces of chamber music. The thematic material is for the most part commonplace or worse, relieved only by such brighter moments as the second theme in the first movement, also the coda, which is striking harmonically. The slow movement is suprisingly empty in spite of one of two passages of interest. The third movement, where one expects the Bohemian to surmount the classical restraint which was apt to sit heavily on Dvorak when he wrote chamber music, showed a touch of characteristic gayety, soon spoilt by absolute vulgarity. The final movement is also brilliantly tawdry. The humanity and charm of Schubert in a bourgeoise frame of mind often serves to endear him, but Dvorak in his less inspired moments can only be likened to the vacuity of the peasant mind. Mr. Tucker played the piano part with deference to the demands of ensemble, with excellent rhythm and with appropriate spirit. The performance of Mr. Hess and his associates did all that was humanly possible for the Dvorak; neither they nor Mr. Tucker, however, could raise it above its essential emptiness.

E. B. H.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
BALTIMORE, M...
NOV 24

NEXT BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Orchestra Will Give Second Concert On December Fifth.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 5. The soloist will be Mr. Timothee Adamowski, who will play for the first time in Baltimore a new violin concerto by Gustav Strube, in C ...

BOSTON JOURNAL—NOVEMBER 24, 1906.

The announcement made last Tuesday that it had been decided to have M. Saint-Saens appear as a pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the special concert Monday evening, instead of as conductor and organist, has been received with great satisfaction by the musical public of this city. Undoubtedly the concert will gain greatly in interest from the fact that Dr. Muck has kindly consented to be the conductor. His appearance at this special concert will give many who are not regular subscribers to the Symphony a chance to hear the orchestra under its new conductor. The program has necessarily been considerably changed. The works will all be by Saint-Saens. The purely orchestral numbers will be the overture to the opera "Les Barbares," and the Symphony in C minor, No. 3. M. Saint-Saens will play his concerto in G minor, No. 2, and a group of solo pieces for the piano.

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHON...

What is practically the second novelty of the season appears on the Symphony program for next week's concerts, Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 7, in E flat major. This work has been performed at the Symphony concerts but once and that was on Feb. 4 and 5, 1886, so that a majority of the patrons of the Symphony concerts have never heard it. Dr. Muck's name has been most closely identified with this work. While he was the conductor of the Styrian Musical Society in Graz in 1886, he conducted its performance in Berlin at one of the Royal Orchestra concerts in 1884. As soloist Moriz Rosenthal will make his first appearance in Boston in ... years. The program is as fol-

...OVEMBER 23, 1906.

FIRST CONCERT BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Excellent Programme Rendered in Infantry Hall, Providence, Last Night.

That splendid musical organization the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave the first concert of the winter's course last night in Infantry Hall, Providence, before a large audience and was accorded a most flattering reception.

Unusual interest was manifested in the appearance of the conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who has come to America on a year's leave of absence, especially granted to him by the German Emperor. Dr. Muck had a great European reputation before Boston or New York discovered him and that reputation has been more than justified by the work he has done since he arrived in this country early in October. While one does not care to go so far as to say that Dr. Muck is the greatest conductor that has ever come to America, there is safety in saying that none greater than he has ever visited us. One finds in Dr. Muck perfected scholarliness, finished musicianship, conscious sincerity and above all, poetry and imagination. A man of tremendous authority and master in his art, he yet possesses the genuine sentiment which is necessary to bring out the hidden beauties of music.

Under him the orchestra bids fair to become a more glorious tone-making instrument than it has ever been. It possesses all the perfection of the past and in addition to this, has a splendid freedom. The combination of qualities found in Dr. Muck is as valuable as it is rare. One seldom finds the accuracy of the scholar united with the fancy of the poet.

There is nothing in the least spectacular in the work of the conductor, but he demonstrates his marvellous control over the musicians in no uncertain manner. The programme last night was as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Beethoven; "A Faust Overture," Wagner; "Siefried Idyll," Wagner; prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner.

Beethoven sketched the motive of the sympony in C minor as early as 1800 and it was published in 1809. Of it Hector Berlioz wrote:

"The symphony * * * seems to come directly and solely from the genius of Beethoven; he develops in it his own intimate thought; his secret sorrows, his concentrated rage, his reveries charged with a dejection, oh so sad, his visions at night, his bursts of enthusiasm—these furnish him the subject; and the forms of melody, harmony, rythm and orchestration are displayed as essentially individual and new as they are powerful and noble."

The symphony was given a superb interpretation, as were the Wagner selections following, and Dr. Muck received a number of ovations.

The next concert will be given on the evening of Jan. 3.

Two unfamiliar symphonies will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 6, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 8. On Thursday evening the symphony will be Bruckner's in E-flat major, No. 7. It is this seventh symphony which finally gave Bruckner, after years of waiting, recognition as one of the important composers of his time. The symphony for Saturday is Glazounoff's No. 5. This work was first performed in New York at a concert of the Philharmonic Society under Anton Seidl in the spring of 1898, and it has since been performed at one of the concerts of the Russian Symphony Orchestra. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Moriz Rosenthal, and on Saturday afternoon Timothée Adamowski, who will play for the first time in New York a concerto by Gustav Strube, one of the first violins of the orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
BULLETIN
...LPHIA
NOV 24

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 3. An event of special interest will be the first appearance here in eight years of Moriz Rosenthal, the great pianist. The orchestra's chief offering is to be Brahms's symphony in C minor, No. 1.

...1881; New York,

[74]

Boston Transcript
324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.
TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1906

Chickering Hall: Boston Symphony Quartet

The Boston Symphony Quartet gave its second concert of the present season, in Chickering Hall, last night, before an enthusiastic audience. Mr. H. G. Tucker was the pianist. The programme:

Quartet, F-minor, Op. 95.....Beethoven
Quartet, D-major No. 2, Op. 41.....Hugo Kaun
Quartet, piano and strings, Op. 87.....Dvorak

The Beethoven quartet, which is somewhat infrequently performed, was played in a polished manner.

Hugo Kaun, whose quartet was played for the first time, has had a life of adventurous struggle, of plucky and continuous warfare against circumstance, in which he has emerged the victor. Born in Berlin in 1863, he had composed no less than one hundred and sixty pieces before he was fourteen. A student at the Royal High School for Music, he was a pupil of Karl and Oskar Raif in piano playing of Friedrich Kiel in composition. During his first efforts as a composer, he led a hand to mouth existence giving lessons at starvation prices. In 1884 (others say 1887) he came to try his luck in America. Here at first he fared worse if possible than in Berlin. Playing for dancing, composing dance music, solos for cornet, trombone or what not, doing the laborious hack work of a general "arranger," these ungrateful tasks were his. He became known gradually, however as a teacher, and as choral and orchestral leader. Theodore Thomas, always the friend of struggling musicians, took an interest in Kaun's work and played his orchestral pieces one by one. Of late years Kaun has lived in Berlin, where he is well known as a teacher. An industrious and prolific composer, he has ventured into many fields. Among his compositions are piano pieces, songs for single voice, for men's voices, "The Normans Farewell" for men's chorus, baritone solo and orchestra, "Evening Festival in Venice" for mixed chorus and orchestra; two trios; two string quartets; two quintets, one with piano; "Vineta" symphonic poem Op. 16, a suite Karnevalfest, a symphony "To the Fatherland," a Festival March introducing "The Star Spangled Banner" for the opening of the seventh season of the Chicago orchestra, two poems "Minnehaha" and "Hiawatha" after Longfellow, and finally a Humoresque "Falstaff." A piano concerto by Kaun has been played with success during the past year in Germany, also a symphonic prologue to Hebbel's "Marie Magdelena." He has written an opera "Oliver Brown or the Pietist"; a second "The Painter of Antwerp" is said to remain unfinished only on account of the unsatisfactory ending of the poem. The overture to this opera was given under Theodore Thomas.

The Kaun quartet, played last night, had the refreshing quality of novel form; a short fugue followed by a scherzo ending with a well-rounded slow movement. For this innovation alone one should be grateful to Mr. Kaun. The opening fugue was undeniably interesting, although somewhat too restricted in technical features; after the regular "entrances" mere inversions of the theme cannot long sustain the interest, even with the assistance of pedal points and phrases of the theme "in diminution." The fugue form hardly seems a medium for spontaneous expression with Mr. Kaun, although this specimen was euphonious as well as dignified and serious in sentiment. The scherzo, although in the main pleasing, was somewhat diffuse and occasionally ponderous; a slower episode was conspicuous for the beauty of its part-writing; there were passages of humorous and delicate fancy. The concluding slow movement contained the best music of the quartet, rising to a dramatic climax that just stopped short of true eloquence. There were, however, movements of distinct expressive beauty. In general this quartet, while not remarkable for striking individuality, or conspicuous mastery of expression, nevertheless gave indisputable pleasure on account of its unusual form, skilful workmanship and sincerely earnest thought. The performance was painstaking and excellent at all points.

It seems incredible that Dvorak could have produced so unworthy and dull a piano quartet so near to the beautiful quintet Op. 81, one of his best pieces of chamber music. The thematic material is for the most part commonplace or worse, relieved only by such brighter moments as the second theme in the first movement, also the coda, which is striking harmonically. The slow movement is suprisingly empty in spite of one of two passages of interest. The third movement, where one expects the Bohemian to surmount the classical restraint which was apt to sit heavily on Dvorak when he wrote chamber music, showed a touch of characteristic gayety, soon spoilt by absolute vulgarity. The final movement is also brilliantly tawdry. The humanity and charm of Schubert in a bourgeoise frame of mind often serves to endear him, but Dvorak in his less inspired moments can only be likened to the vacuity of the peasant mind. Mr. Tucker played the piano part with deference to the demands of ensemble, with excellent rhythm and with appropriate spirit. The performance of Mr. Hess and his associates did all that was humanly possible for the Dvorak; neither they nor Mr. Tucker, however, could raise it above its essential emptiness.

E. B. H.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m _____
ress _____

Boston's New Conductor

With its concerts in Carnegie Hall on November 8 and 10 the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its twenty-first season in New York. These concerts were especially noteworthy, because they introduced to this public Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the orchestra, who has come from the Vienna Philharmonic and the Royal Opera at Berlin to lead the Boston music makers for one year.

Dr. Muck is tall, rather thin and angular; is dignified and reserved in manner. His strong, smooth face, almost ascetic in outline, impresses one at first glance with a sense of inexorable sternness. But one who watches him at close range sees presently that he has the saving grace of good humor. He takes keen delight in his work and he is ever ready to encourage the men under him by prompt recognition of their good work. From the moment he takes his stand before the orchestra he is all for the music in hand. The audience, apparently, is forgotten. His appeal is wholly to his players, and that appeal is direct, explicit, compelling. The effect upon the audience comes thru the ear alone. He knows the effect he wants, and he gets it. All that he does is marked by intellectual force and authority. He thinks about his art, and he analyzes every measure he plays; but he is not unmindful of the sensuous charm of music. If there are hidden beauties he is likely to find them. If there be eloquence, emotional fire, martial pomp, he will not be loath to give these things utterance. In place of the cherry-stone-carving niceties of his predecessor, we are likely to get from the unsurpassed Boston Orchestra all the dash and fire and spirit of which its members are capable when their enthusiasm is not too ruthlessly curbed. And the prospect is good.

Dr. Karl Muck was born at Würzburg on October 22d, 1859. He appeared in public as a pianist at the age of eleven, his father, an accomplished amateur musician, having given him his first lessons in violin and pianoforte playing and in counterpoint. He studied at the universities of Heidelberg and Leipsic, and received his degree of Ph. D. from Leipsic in 1880 for special studies in philosophy, classic philology and the history of music. In that year also, having continued his musical studies at the Leipsic Conservatory as a pupil of E. F. Richter and Karl Reinecke, he made his first appearance as a professional pianist. But he was determined to be a conductor, and within the year left Leipsic to be chorus director at the Stadt Theater in Zurich. Since that time he has held posts as conductor of opera and of symphony concerts at Salzburg, Brunn, Graz, Prague, Vienna and Berlin. He has appeared as guest conductor in many other European cities, has been since 1894 the conductor of the Silesian Music Festivals, and has conducted performances of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth since 1901. His absence this year from the Royal Opera at Berlin is thru the special permission of the Emperor William.

BOSTON JOURNAL—NOVEMBER 24, 1906.

The announcement made last Tuesday—that it had been decided to have M. Saint-Saens appear as a pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the special concert Monday evening, instead of as conductor and organist, has been received with great satisfaction by the musical public of this city. Undoubtedly the concert will gain greatly in interest from the fact that Dr. Muck has kindly consented to be the conductor. His appearance at this special concert will give many who are not regular subscribers to the Symphony a chance to hear the orchestra under its new conductor. The program has necessarily been considerably changed. The works will all be by Saint-Saens. The purely orchestral numbers will be the overture to the opera "Les Barbares," and the Symphony in C minor, No. 3. M. Saint-Saens will play his concerto in G minor, No. 2, and a group of solo pieces for the piano.

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHON[Y]

What is practically the second novelty of the season appears on the Symphony program for next week's concerts, Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 7, in E flat major. This work has been performed at the Symphony concerts but once and that was on Feb. 4 and 5, 1886, so that a majority of the patrons of the Symphony concerts have never heard it. Dr. Muck's name has been most closely identified with this work. While he was the conductor of the Styrian Musical Society in Graz in 1886, he conducted its performance in Berlin at one of the Royal Orchestra concerts in 1894. As soloist Moriz Rosenthal will make his first appearance in Boston in eight years. The program is as fol-

[illegible] to "Leonora" No. 3.....Beethoven

[illegible]

The Season's Promise

Between now and next May there will be in Manhattan Borough alone about two hundred orchestral concerts of the first class, given by local and visiting organizations. The veteran, but sturdy, New York Philharmonic Society will be led to new victories in this, its sixty-fifth, season by Vassili Safonoff, the fiery Russian, who in each of the last three seasons made a deeper impression than any other of the Philharmonic's visiting conductors from oversea. Mr. Safonoff has been engaged for three years, thruout which he will not be heard with any other orchestra. Mr. Sam Franko, who spent the summer in Europe, has returned with a new collection of antique gems of the music of other days of the kind his concerts with his American Symphony Orchestra have made popular here in recent seasons. Besides those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there will be visits from the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Fritz Scheel and the Pittsburg Orchestra under Mr. Emil Paur.

The soloists engaged to appear with these orchestras, and who also will be heard in concerts and recitals of their own, present an imposing array. Among the pianists Paderewski is announced, but, alas, for only one concert, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Moriz Rosenthal, who comes to make an extensive tour after an absence of eight years, has already begun to astound all hearers by his prodigious feats of technic; Josef Lhévinne, the brilliant young Russian pianist, who was the musical discovery of last year, has returned to spend the greater part of the winter here; Ossip Gabrilowitsch is another Russian pianist who is come to us again, and Rafael Joseffy, Mme. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler and others resident in America will be heard in the course of the season. A small army of violinists will be led by César Thomson, the Belgian, who has not visited America since 1895; Alexander Petschnikoff, Hugo Heerman and Miss Maud Powell. There will be other instrumental soloists in plenty, and scores of singers will interpret the songs of the lyric masters.

ss _____

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town the week after next, Dr. Muck will offer two unfamiliar symphonies—Bruckner's No. 7 in E flat major, and Glazounoff's fifth. Rosenthal and Adamowski are to be the soloists.

[illegible], 1881; New York, 1

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Dr. Karl Muck
THE NEW CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

That most perfect of musical instruments, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has a new conductor as successor to the impeccable and excellent Gericke: Dr. Karl Muck, of the Berlin Royal Opera, who comes to America with a commanding reputation achieved abroad. Later in the season there will be more favorable opportunities for considering, in adequate detail, Dr. Muck's performances at the head of the orchestra from Boston. There is space now to say merely that at the first of the orchestra's New York concerts he disclosed abilities of a remarkable order. We have had no more poetical conductor since the death of the incomparable Seidl—poetical, yet equably poised, unswervingly self-controlled. He is a brilliant and most welcome addition to the somewhat meagre list of gifted conductors whom we may claim as resident and active.

EVENING TIMES.
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
NOVEMBER 23, 1906

FIRST CONCERT BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Excellent Programme Rendered in Infantry Hall, Providence, Last Night.

That splendid musical organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave the first concert of the winter's course last night in Infantry Hall, Providence, before a large audience and was accorded a most flattering reception.

Unusual interest was manifested in the appearance of the conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who has come to America on a year's leave of absence, especially granted to him by the German Emperor. Dr. Muck had a great European reputation before Boston or New York discovered him and that reputation has been more than justified by the work he has done since he arrived in this country early in October. While one does not care to go so far as to say that Dr. Muck is the greatest conductor that has ever come to America, there is safety in saying that none greater than he has ever visited us. One finds in Dr. Muck perfected scholarliness, finished musicianship, conscious sincerity and above all, poetry and imagination. A man of tremendous authority and master in his art, he yet possesses the genuine sentiment which is necessary to bring out the hidden beauties of music.

Under him the orchestra bids fair to become a more glorious tone-making instrument than it has ever been. It possesses all the perfection of the past and in addition to this, has a splendid freedom. The combination of qualities found in Dr. Muck is as valuable as it is rare. One seldom finds the accuracy of the scholar united with the fancy of the poet.

There is nothing in the least spectacular in the work of the conductor, but he demonstrates his marvelous control over the musicians in no uncertain manner. Tho programme last night was as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Beethoven; "A Faust Overture," Wagner; "Siefried Idyll," Wagner; prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner.

Beethoven sketched the motive of the sympony in C minor as early as 1800 and it was published in 1809. Of it Hector Berlioz wrote:

"The symphony * * * seems to come directly and solely from the genius of Beethoven; he develops in it his own intimate thought; his secret sorrows, his concentrated rage, his reveries charged with a dejection, oh, so sad, his visions at night, his bursts of enthusiasm—these furnish him the subject; and the forms of melody, harmony, rythm and orchestration are displayed as essentially individual and new as they are powerful and noble."

The symphony was given a superb interpretation, as were the Wagner selections following, and Dr. Muck received a number of ovations.

The next concert will be given on the evening of Jan. 3.

Two unfamiliar symphonies will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 6, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 8. On Thursday evening the symphony will be Bruckner's in E-flat major, No. 7. It is this seventh symphony which finally gave Bruckner, after years of waiting, recognition as one of the important composers of his time. The symphony for Saturday is Glazounoff's No. 5. This work was first performed in New York at a concert of the Philharmonic Society under Anton Seidl in the spring of 1898, and it has since been performed at one of the concerts of the Russian Symphony Orchestra. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Moriz Rosenthal, and on Saturday afternoon Timothée Adamowski, who will play for the first time in New York a concerto by Gustav Strube, one of the first violins of the orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n _____
ress _____
e _____

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 3. An event of special interest will be the first appearance here in eight years of Moriz Rosenthal, the great pianist. The orchestra's chief offering is to be Brahms's symphony in C minor, No. 1.

[illegible], 1901; New York,

BALTIMORE, [illegible]
s _____

NEXT BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Orchestra Will Give Second Concert On December Fifth.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 5. The soloist will be Mr. Timothee Adamowski, who will play for the first time in Baltimore a new violin concerto by Gustav Strube.

The Symphony will be Brahm's, in C minor, No. 1.

[74]

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NOV 25 190

Boston Symphony Quartet.

The Boston Symphony Quartet, whose three evenings of chamber music met with such instantaneous success in Washington last winter, is to give a series of three afternoon concerts this season in the ballroom of the New Willard. The first is scheduled on Wednesday, December 5, at 4 o'clock. Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is still the leader of the quartet, and other members are Otto Roth, second violin; Emil Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, violoncello. The assisting artist will be Hiram G. Tucker, of Boston, pianist, who, with members of the quartet, will play "Dvorak Quartet" in E flat major, Opus 87. Seats to be had of T. Arthur Smith at Sanders & Stayman's, 1327 F street.

POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NOV 5 1906

Boston Symphony Quartet.

It is seldom indeed that any organization for the performance of chamber music has met with such speedy and conclusive success in Washington as that which was the fortune last winter of the Boston Symphony Quartet. This year another series of three concerts is to be given, but in the afternoon instead of the evening. As last year, they will be given in the ball room of the New Willard Hotel, and the first is scheduled for Wednesday afternoono, December 5, at 4 o'clock. No change has been made in the personnel of the quartet this year, and Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is still the leader. The assisting artist will be Hiram G. Tucker, of Boston, pianist, who, with members of the quartet, will play the Dvorak quartet in E-flat major, Opus 87.

n
ress
e
NOV 5 1906

Lovers of music owe Dr. Muck a vote of thanks for his decision to perform Bruckner's seventh symphony (a work which has been heard here so seldom that it comes practically as a novelty) at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Thursday night concert next week. This great German composer has been lamentably neglected in America. It was his seventh symphony which brought him recognition after long years of toil and patient waiting, and Dr. Muck has the distinction of having been the first to bring the work to a hearing in Austria (while he was conductor of the Styrian Musical Society in Graz). He also introduced this noble composition at one of the royal concerts in Berlin in 1894. May he be successful in arousing an interest in Bruckner's music in this city. The soloist at Thursday night's concert will be Moritz Rosenthal. At the Saturday afternoon concert Glazounoff's symphony, No. 5, will be the chief contribution. Timothee Adamovski of the Boston Orchestra will be heard in a violin concerto by Gustav Strube, who is one of the first violins under Muck. This work will be a novelty in New York.

POST
n
WASHINGTON, D. C.
ess
NOV 25 190

Saint-Saens in Recital.

The quality of Dr. Camille Saint-Saens as a pianist, will come as a surprise to many, who, knowing and hearing of him as a wonderful composer of prodigious works, and as a conductor of rare quality, could scarcely believe him a pianist of the highest rank. He is far more in fact, because of his beautiful singing touch, his sparkling runs and trills, his wonderfully turned phrases—all the expression of a master, and not a virtuoso alone.

M. Saint-Saens will be assisted by M. Dethier, a young Belgian violinist, and Ysaye's first pupil, who has attained great success abroad, and comes to us with the stamp of approval of such great masters, as Joachim and Ysaye. This concert will take place at the Columbia Theater, Monday afternoon, December 10.

Saint-Saens With Boston Symphony.

Despite the many announcements concerning the coming to this country of Paderewski to be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts, it was only finally settled the other day that it would be impossible for him to keep his engagement. Paderewski was announced for the January concert of the orchestra in Washington and the management at once took steps to secure an adequate substitute for the great Polish pianist, and thus keep faith with its public. The outcome of this was the engagement of Camille Saint-Saens for the coming concert in Washington, on December 4. M. Saint-Saens has played four times so far in New York to overflowing houses. Despite his seventy-one years, he is to-day a pianist of extraordinary virtuosity and naturally of highest musicianship. His appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his first in Washington, and his only one with an orchestra in this city, and the occasion will have increased interest from the fact that he will play his own concerto in G minor, one of the most beautiful works ever written for the piano.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C.
ess

It is seldom that any organization for the performing of chamber music has met with such speedy and conclusive success in Washington as that last winter enjoyed by the Boston Symphony Quartet, which gave a series of three concerts in the ballroom of the New Willard Hotel. This year a series of three afternoons of chamber music is to be given. As last year, they will be held in the New Willard ballroom, and the first is scheduled for Wednesday, December 5, at 4 o'clock.

No change in the personnel of the quartet has been made this year. Prof. Willie Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is still the leader and first violin of the quartet, and the other members are Mr. Otto Roth, second violin; Emil Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, violoncello.

The assisting artist will be Mr. Hiram G. Tucker, of Boston, pianist, who, with members of the quartet, will play Dvorak Quartet in E flat major, opus 87.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
RECORD
HIA, P

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening of next week. This concert will mark the first appearance in eight years in Philadelphia of Moriz Rosenthal, the pianist, who has been astounding audiences by his marvelous technique.

It is interesting to learn that Dr. Muck has placed on this Philadelphia program Brahm's Symphony in C minor, No. 1. In his review of the New York concert, at which the Symphony was recently played, H. E. Krehbiel, of the New York Tribune, said:

It was a revelation of what a master mind could do to give new interest to utterances that had become too familiar to hold always the sublimated attention of what they are worth. Here was dignity; here heaven-kissing loveliness; here the sweep of a prophetic vision; here an emotionalized intellectuality which held faculties and senses in thrall; here a continuity, consistency and eloquence which not only held one to the thread of the discourse, but made one eager to follow it, as Theseus was to follow the saving strand of Ariadne. Such a climax as that which Dr. Muck worked up in the last moment, with deliberation that spoke of an affectionate regard for each progressive detail, was never before heard by our public, familiar with many fine performances.

s WASHINGTON, D. C.
NOV 25 1906

Boston Symphony Quartet.

It is seldom indeed that any organization for the performance of chamber music has met with such speedy and conclusive success in Washington as that which was the fortune last winter of the Boston Symphony Quartet, which gave three evenings of chamber music in the New Willard Hotel. Three unexpectedly large audiences welcomed these four gentlemen and seemed to enjoy their admirable playing to the full. This year another series of three concerts is to be given, but in the afternoon instead of the evening. As last year, they will be given in the ball room of the New Willard Hotel, and the first is scheduled for Wednesday afternoon, December 5, at 4 o'clock. No change has been made in the personnel of the quartet this year. Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is still the leader of the quartet, and the other members are Mr. Otto Roth, second violin; Emil Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, violoncello.

The assisting artist will be Mr. Hiram G. Tucker of Boston, pianist, who, with members of the quartet, will play Dvorak Quartet in E-flat major, opus 87.

...INGTON, D. C.
NOV 25 190

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been unable to secure Paderewski for its January concert, as advertised, and in the effort to secure a substitute for the great Polish pianist its management has been fortunate enough to secure Camille Saint-Saens, the greatest of living French composers. They announce him as soloist for the concert of December 4. They would, of course, have preferred him on the January date for which Paderewski had been announced, but M. Saint-Saens is only in this country for six weks, and they consider themselves fortunate in having been able to get him at all. Despite his seventy-one years, he is today a pianist of extraordinary virtuosity, and naturally of highest musicalship. His appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his first in Washington, and his only one with an orchestra in this city, and the occasion will have increased interest from the fact that he will play his own concerto in G minor, one of the most beautiful works ever written for the piano.

Star
Washington D.
ss
Nov. 25, 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Despite the many unofficial reports concerning the coming to this country of Paderewski, to be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts, it was only finally settled the other day that it would be impossible for him to keep his engagement with the orchestra, and the management at once took steps to secure an adequate substitute and by great est good luck the management has been able to secure Camille Saint-Saens, the greatest of living French composers, as soloist for the coming concert in Washington on December 4. M. Saint-Saens has played four times so far in New York to overflowing houses, and he has met with a reception which no pianist aside from Paderewski has ever received in that city. Despite his seventy-one years, he is today a pianist of extraordinary virtuosity and naturally of highest musicianship. His appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his first in Washington, and his only one with an orchestra in this city, and the occasion will have increased interest from the fact that he will play his own concerto in G minor, one of the most beautiful works ever written for the piano.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
AMERICAN
...RE, MI
NOV 25 190

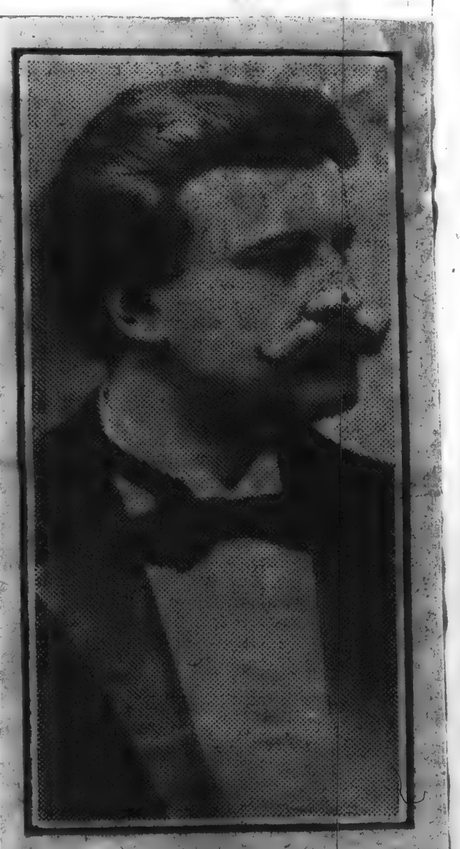
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 5. The soloist will be Mr. Timothee Adamowski, who will play for the first time in Baltimore a new violin concerto by Gustav Strube.

The symphony will be Brahms' in C minor No. 1, concerning the performance of which in New York on the 10th of this month Mr. H. E. Krehbiel, the eminent critic of the New York Tribune, spoke as follows:

"It was a revelation of what a master mind could do to give new interest to utterances that had become too familiar to hold always the sublimated attention of what they are worth. Here was dignity; here heaven-kissing loveliness; here the sweep of a prophetic vision; here an emotionalized intellectuality which held faculties and senses in thrall; here a continuity, consistency and eloquence which not only held one to the thread of the discourse, but made one eager to follow it as Theseus was to follow the saving strand of Ariadne. Such a climax as that which Dr. Muck worked up in the last movement, with deliberation that spoke of an affectionate regard for each progressive detail was never before heard by our public familiar with many fine performances."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
INQUIRER
...DELPHIA.



Copyright by Aime Dupont.

MORITS ROSENTHAL
To play with Boston Symphony.

which was produced in Paris in 1791, established his reputation; and "Les Deux Journees," known in Germany as "Der Wassertrager," placed him, in the estimation of Beethoven, at the head of all living composers of opera. Posterity has scarcely indorsed Beethoven's dictum, but it is impossible to ignore the beauty of Cherubini's work.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 3. This concert will mark the first appearance in eight years in Philadelphia of Moriz Rosenthal, the great pianist, who has been making a sensation in New York. Rosenthal was great when he was in this country eight years ago, and even on his first visit several years before that; but all accounts from New York agree that he has grown immeasurably since then, not merely in his technique, but in his purer, deeper and subtler musical qualities.

...N. Y. TRIBUNE.
n
ress
NOV 25 1906

Two unfamiliar symphonies will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 6, and Saturday afternoon, December 8. On Thursday evening the symphony will be Bruckner's in E flat major, No. 4. This work has had so few performances that it comes practically as a novelty. It is the seventh symphony which finally gave Bruckner, after long years of waiting, recognition. It will be particularly interesting to hear Dr. Muck's interpretation of it, because he not only is an admirer of Bruckner and his music, but he gave the first performances of this symphony in Austria while he was conductor of the Styrian Musical Society in Grätz in 1886, and in Berlin in 1894 at one of the royal concerts. The symphony for Saturday afternoon is Glazounoff's No. 5. This work was first performed in New York at a concert of the Philharmonic Society, under Anton Seidl, in the spring of 1898, and it has since been performed in one of the concerts of the Russian Orchestra.

The soloist on Thursday evening will be Moriz Rosenthal, and on Saturday afternoon Timothée Adamowski, who will play for the first time in New York a concerto by Gustav Strube, one of the first violins of the orchestra.

...RIC SUN
m lress
e
NOV 25 1906

Boston Will Hear Conried's Singers.

Charles Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, concluded yesterday with Mr. Conried an arrangement by which he will this year manage the engagement of the Conried Metropolitan Opera Company in Boston. This means that Mr. Ellis will guarantee the sum without which Mr. Conried has refused to go to Boston again. The company from the Metropolitan will sing there the last week in March and the first week in April. Boston is very anxious to hear Miss Farrar.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
...York Times
NOV 25

The annual routebook of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been issued, shows that a total of 109 concerts have already been arranged for the present season. Twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts will be given in Boston, ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, and Brooklyn; three each in Hartford, Providence, and Worcester, two in Portland, Me., and one each in Rochester, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Bridgeport, Springfield, Poughkeepsie, Fitchburg, and Northampton. It is probable that several more concerts will be arranged for the latter part of the season.

N. Y. EVG. TELEGRAM
NOV 29 190

That Paderewski is not coming to America this winter to play in a series of Boston Symphony concerts, as was announced last fall, is due entirely to the fact that he has not finished the new symphony which he was to have brought with him. It is now settled that Mr. Paderewski will bring the symphony to America when he comes, in October, 1907, and it will then be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During the season of 1907-1908 the great pianist will give about one hundred concerts in this country.

[75]

WASHINGTON, D. C.

New Willard—Boston Symphony Quartet.

The Boston Symphony Quartet, whose three evenings of chamber music met with such instantaneous success in Washington last winter, is to give a series of three afternoon concerts this season in the ballroom of the New Willard. The first is scheduled on Wednesday, December 5, at 4 o'clock. Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is still the leader of the quartet, and other members are Otto Roth, second violin; Emil Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, violoncello. The assisting artist will be Hiram G. Tucker, of Boston, pianist, who, with members of the quartet, will play "Dvorak Quartet" in E flat major, Opus 87. Seats to be had of T. Arthur Smith at Sanders & Stayman's, 1327 F street.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Boston Symphony Quartet.

It is seldom indeed that any organization for the performance of chamber music has met with such speedy and conclusive success in Washington as that which was the fortune last winter of the Boston Symphony Quartet. This year another series of three concerts is to be given, but in the afternoon instead of the evening. As last year, they will be given in the ball room of the New Willard Hotel, and the first is scheduled for Wednesday afternoono, December 5, at 4 o'clock. No change has been made in the personnel of the quartet this year, and Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is still the leader. The assisting artist will be Hiram G. Tucker, of Boston, pianist, who, with members of the quartet, will play the Dvorak quartet in E-flat major, Opus 87.

n

ress

e

Lovers of music owe Dr. Muck a vote of thanks for his decision to perform Bruckner's seventh symphony (a work which has been heard here so seldom that it comes practically as a novelty) at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Thursday night concert next week. This great German composer has been lamentably neglected in America. It was his seventh symphony which brought him recognition after long years of toil and patient waiting, and Dr. Muck has the distinction of having been the first to bring the work to a hearing in Austria (while he was conductor of the Styrian Musical Society in Graz). He also introduced this noble composition at one of the royal concerts in Berlin in 1894. May he be successful in arousing an interest in Bruckner's music in this city. The soloist at Thursday night's concert will be Moritz Rosenthal. At the Saturday afternoon concert Glazounoff's symphony, No. 5, will be the chief contribution. Timothee Adamovski of the Boston Orchestra will be heard in a violin concerto by Gustav Strube, who is one of the first violins under Muck. This work will be a novelty in New York.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

ess

Saint-Saens in Recital.

The quality of Dr. Camille Saint-Saens as a pianist, will come as a surprise to many, who, knowing and hearing of him as a wonderful composer of prodigious works, and as a conductor of rare quality, could scarcely believe him a pianist of the highest rank. He is far more in fact, because of his beautiful singing touch, his sparkling runs and trills, his wonderfully turned phrases—all the expression of a master, and not a virtuoso alone.

M. Saint-Saens will be assisted by M. Dethier, a young Belgian violinist, and Ysaye's first pupil, who has attained great success abroad, and comes to us with the stamp of approval of such great masters, as Joachim and Ysaye. This concert will take place at the Columbia Theater, Monday afternoon, December 10.

Saint-Saens With Boston Symphony.

Despite the many announcements concerning the coming to this country of Paderewski to be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts, it was only finally settled the other day that it would be impossible for him to keep his engagement. Paderewski was announced for the January concert of the orchestra in Washington and the management at once took steps to secure an adequate substitute for the great Polish pianist, and thus keep faith with its public. The outcome of this was the engagement of Camille Saint-Saens for the coming concert in Washington, on December 4. M. Saint-Saens has played four times so far in New York to overflowing houses. Despite his seventy-one years, he is to-day a pianist of extraordinary virtuosity and naturally of highest musicianship. His appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his first in Washington, and his only one with an orchestra in this city, and the occasion will have increased interest from the fact that he will play his own concerto in G minor, one of the most beautiful works ever written for the piano.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

WASHINGTON, D. C.

ess

e

It is seldom that any organization for the performing of chamber music has met with such speedy and conclusive success in Washington as that last winter enjoyed by the Boston Symphony Quartet, which gave a series of three concerts in the ballroom of the New Willard Hotel. This year a series of three afternoons of chamber music is to be given. As last year, they will be held in the New Willard ballroom, and the first is scheduled for Wednesday, December 5, at 4 o'clock.

No change in the personnel of the quartet has been made this year. Prof. Willie Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is still the leader and first violin of the quartet, and the other members are Mr. Otto Roth, second violin; Emil Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, violoncello.

The assisting artist will be Mr. Hiram G. Tucker, of Boston, pianist, who, with members of the quartet, will play Dvorak Quartet in E flat major, opus 87.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening of next week. This concert will mark the first appearance in eight years in Philadelphia of Moriz Rosenthal, the pianist, who has been astounding audiences by his marvelous technique.

It is interesting to learn that Dr. Muck has placed on this Philadelphia program Brahm's Symphony in C minor, No. 1. In his review of the New York concert, at which the Symphony was recently played, H. E. Krehbiel, of the New York Tribune, said:

It was a revelation of what a master mind could do to give new interest to utterances that had become too familiar to hold always the sublimated attention of what they are worth. Here was dignity; here heaven-kissing loveliness; here the sweep of a prophetic vision; here an emotionalized intellectuality which held faculties and senses in thrall; here a continuity, consistency and eloquence which not only held one to the thread of the discourse, but made one eager to follow it, as Theseus was to follow the saving strand of Ariadne. Such a climax as that which Dr. Muck worked up in the last moment, with deliberation that spoke of an affectionate regard for each progressive detail, was never before heard by our public, familiar with many fine performances.

s WASHINGTON, D. C.

Boston Symphony Quartet.

It is seldom indeed that any organization for the performance of chamber music has met with such speedy and conclusive success in Washington as that which was the fortune last winter of the Boston Symphony Quartet, which gave three evenings of chamber music in the New Willard Hotel. Three unexpectedly large audiences welcomed these four gentlemen and seemed to enjoy their admirable playing to the full. This year another series of three concerts is to be given, but in the afternoon instead of the evening. As last year, they will be given in the ball room of the New Willard Hotel, and the first is scheduled for Wednesday afternoon, December 5, at 4 o'clock. No change has been made in the personnel of the quartet this year. Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is still the leader of the quartet, and the other members are Mr. Otto Roth, second violin; Emil Ferir, viola, and Heinrich Warnke, violoncello.

The assisting artist will be Mr. Hiram G. Tucker of Boston, pianist, who, with members of the quartet, will play Dvorak Quartet in E-flat major, opus 87.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been unable to secure Paderewski for its January concert, as advertised, and in the effort to secure a substitute for the great Polish pianist its management has been fortunate enough to secure Camille Saint-Saens, the greatest of living French composers. They announce him as soloist for the concert of December 4. They would, of course, have preferred him on the January date for which Paderewski had been announced, but M. Saint-Saens is only in this country for six weks, and they consider themselves fortunate in having been able to get him at all. Despite his seventy-one years, he is today a pianist of extraordinary virtuosity, and naturally of highest musicalship. His appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his first in Washington, and his only one with an orchestra in this city, and the occasion will have increased interest from the fact that he will play his own concerto in G minor, one of the most beautiful works ever written for the piano.

[75]

Star
Washington D.
Dec 28 1902

ss

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Despite the many unofficial reports concerning the coming to this country of Paderewski, to be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts, it was only finally settled the other day that it would be impossible for him to keep his engagement with the orchestra, and the management at once took steps to secure an adequate substitute and by greatest good luck the management has been able to secure Camille Saint-Saens, the greatest of living French composers, as soloist for the coming concert in Washington on December 4. M. Saint-Saens has played four times so far in New York to overflowing houses, and he has met with a reception which no pianist aside from Paderewski has ever received in that city. Despite his seventy-one years, he is today a pianist of extraordinary virtuosity and naturally of highest musicianship. His appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be his first in Washington, and his only one with an orchestra in this city, and the occasion will have increased interest from the fact that he will play his own concerto in G minor, one of the most beautiful works ever written for the piano.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

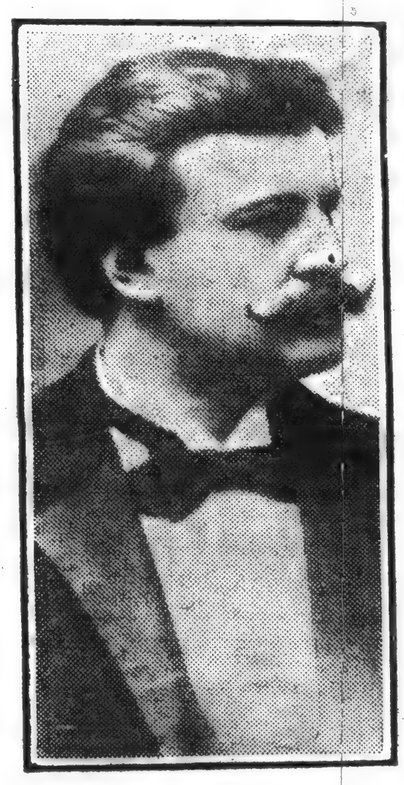
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 5. The soloist will be Mr. Timothee Adamowski, who will play for the first time in Baltimore a new violin concerto by Gustav Strube.

The symphony will be Brahms' in C minor No. 1, concerning the performance of which in New York on the 10th of this month Mr. H. E. Krehbiel, the eminent critic of the New York Tribune, spoke as follows:

"It was a revelation of what a master mind could do to give new interest to utterances that had become too familiar to hold always the sublimated attention of what they are worth. Here was dignity; here heaven-kissing loveliness; here the sweep of a prophetic vision; here an emotionalized intellectuality which held faculties and senses in thrall; here a continuity, consistency and eloquence which not only held one to the thread of the discourse, but made one eager to follow it as Theseus was to follow the saving strand of Ariadne. Such a climax as that which Dr. Muck worked up in the last movement, with deliberation that spoke of an affectionate regard for each progressive detail was never before heard by our public familiar with many fine performances."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World



Copyright by Aime Dupont.

MORITS ROSENTHAL
To play with Boston Symphony.

which was produced in Paris in 1791, established his reputation; and "Les Deux Journees," known in Germany as "Der Wassertrager," placed him, in the estimation of Beethoven, at the head of all living composers of opera. Posterity has scarcely indorsed Beethoven's dictum, but it is impossible to ignore the beauty of Cherubini's work.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 3. This concert will mark the first appearance in eight years in Philadelphia of Moriz Rosenthal, the great pianist, who has been making a sensation in New York. Rosenthal was great when he was in this country eight years ago, and even on his first visit several years before that; but all accounts from New York agree that he has grown immeasurably since then, not merely in his technique, but in his purer, deeper and subtler musical qualities. The symphony to be played is Brahms' in C minor, No. 1.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

ss

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 3. This concert will mark the first appearance in eight years in Philadelphia of Moriz Rosenthal, the great pianist, who has been making such a sensation in New York. Rosenthal was great when he was in this country eight years ago, and even on his first visit, several years before that. All accounts from New York agree that he has grown immeasurably since then, not merely in his wonderful technique, but also in his purer, deeper and subtler musical qualities.

Dr. Muck has placed on this Philadelphia programme, Brahms' symphony in C minor, No. 1. It was with this symphony that he created such extraordinary demonstration of enthusiasm in New York two weeks ago.

n

ress

Two unfamiliar symphonies will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 6, and Saturday afternoon, December 8. On Thursday evening the symphony will be Bruckner's in E flat major, No. 7. This work has had so few performances that it comes practically as a novelty. It is the seventh symphony which finally gave Bruckner, after long years of waiting, recognition. It will be particularly interesting to hear Dr. Muck's interpretation of it, because he not only is an admirer of Bruckner and his music, but he gave the first performances of this symphony in Austria while he was conductor of the Styrian Musical Society in Grätz in 1886, and in Berlin in 1894 at one of the royal concerts. The symphony for Saturday afternoon is Glazounoff's No. 5. This work was first performed in New York at a concert of the Philharmonic Society, under Anton Seidl, in the spring of 1898, and it has since been performed in one of the concerts of the Russian Orchestra.

The soloist on Thursday evening will be Moriz Rosenthal, and on Saturday afternoon Timothée Adamowski, who will play for the first time in New York a concerto by Gustav Strube, one of the first violins of the orchestra.

m

lress

e

Boston Will Hear Conried's Singers.

Charles Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, concluded yesterday with Mr. Conried an arrangement by which he will this year manage the engagement of the Conried Metropolitan Opera Company in Boston. This means that Mr. Ellis will guarantee the sum without which Mr. Conried has refused to go to Boston again. The company from the Metropolitan will sing there the last week in March and the first week in April. Boston is very anxious to hear Miss Farrar.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

The annual routebook of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been issued, shows that a total of 109 concerts have already been arranged for the present season. Twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts will be given in Boston, ten concerts in New York, six in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, and Brooklyn, three each in Hartford, Providence, and Worcester, two in Portland, Me., and one each in Rochester, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Bridgeport, Springfield, Poughkeepsie, Fitchburg, and Northampton. It is probable that several more concerts will be arranged for the latter part of the season.

That Paderewski is not coming to America this winter to play in a series of Boston Symphony concerts, as was announced last fall, is due entirely to the fact that he has not finished the new symphony which he was to have brought with him. It is now settled that Mr. Paderewski will bring the symphony to America when he comes, in October, 1907, and it will then be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During the season of 1907-1908 the great pianist will give about one hundred concerts in this country.

NEW YORK CITY

SS

NOV 25 1906

WAGNER CONCERT IN CARNEGIE HALL

Walter Damrosch and the Symphony Orchestra in an Excellent Programme.

By AUGUSTUS ST. JOHN-BRENON.

Richard Strauss, Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra united their forces last night at Carnegie Hall and the result was a most spirited, stimulating and artistic concert.

It is Mr. Damrosch's ambition that New York should have an orchestra as closely and historically associated and identified with New York as the Chicago Orchestra is with Chicago, or the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the Hub, and at the present time worthy of the highest musical and esthetic traditions of a city developed, as few cities in the world are, for music in its noblest manifestations. How such interpretations as I heard yesterday of the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the Vorspiel to "Tristan," for instance, go far toward establishing the claim of the New York Symphony Orchestra to such a dignity and such worthiness.

Mr. Damrosch's readings of these two deeply contrasted musical excerpts from contrasted works were marked with nervous strength, poetic and uplifted diction and a penetrative and persuasive eloquence. The poise of the orchestra was admirable, the attack firm. The same, though to a less extent, must be said of the "Sounding of the Forest," from "Siegfried" and the Prelude of Richard Wagner, which is invariably strongly favored. It is too delicate, too intimately woven with the situation and the dramatic action upon which it is a comment, to be torn bodily from the drama which it describes, poetizes and elevates.

The "Procession of the Knights" from "Parsifal" was too stiltedly and too formally given in mysticism. The tempi too deliberate.

Mme. Gadski was the soloist. She made three appearances during the evening. Her voice, unpretentious, ragged and uneven, platform presence of singular beauty and dignity did justice for a rendering of Wagner's "Mathilde Wesendonck's "Traume," sorrow, the tenderness and the sadness of which she either ignored or passed over in an attempt at strength and declamation.

Her mezza voce was euphonious, her low notes rich and powerful; but the high notes had the fatal fault of tremolo, quiver and vibrato. Madame Gadski should take herself in hand.

The concert ended with a lively rendering of "The Ride of the Valkyries."

NEW YORK AMERICAN

NOV 25 1906

Two unfamiliar symphonies will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 6, and Saturday afternoon, December 8. On Thursday evening the symphony will be Bruckner's in E-flat major, No. 7. This work has had so few performances that it comes practically as a novelty. It is the Seventh Symphony, which finally gave Bruckner, after long years of waiting, recognition as one of the great composers of his time. It will be particularly interesting to hear Dr. Muck's interpretation of it because he is not only an admirer of Bruckner and his music, but he gave the first performances in this symphony in Austria while he was conductor of the Styrian Society in Gratz, in 1886, and in Berlin in 1894 at one of the Royal concerts.

st Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.

PUBLIC LEDGER

PHILADELPHIA, PA

NOV 25 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra, on December 3, will afford a hearing of the Brahms Symphony in C minor which received warm praise in New York when it was played two weeks ago. Doctor Muck's reading of the work was variously commented upon by the critics, and this despite his late pronunciamento against the attempt on the part of orchestral leaders to read individual interpretations into the composition they present. Doctor Muck favored only an earnest search after the composer's own intentions and a loyal discipleship in presenting these to the audience. The announcement of the soloist is equally of importance, the concert marking the first appearance here in eight years of Moriz Rosenthal. Recognized as a very great pianist during his first visit to America, he is today acknowledged as an artist who has gained in subtle and deep musical qualities and a technical mastery that is remarkable, even in this era, when there are many pianists of concert rank to claim our attention.

PRESS

PHILADELPHIA, P

NOV 25 1906

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. This concert will be of especial interest because it will mark the first appearance in eight years in Philadelphia of Moriz Rosenthal, the great pianist, who has been making such a sensation in New York. Rosenthal was astoundingly great when he was in this country eight years ago and even on his first visit several years before that; but all accounts from New York agree that he has grown immeasurably since then, not merely in his gigantic technique, but in his purer, deeper and subtler musical qualities. This will be Rosenthal's first appearance in Philadelphia and much is expected of it. It is interesting to learn that Dr. Muck has placed on this Philadelphia program Brahms' Symphony in C minor, No. 1. It was with this symphony that he created such an extraordinary demonstration of enthusiasm in New York two weeks ago.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From NEW YORK SUN

Address

Two unfamiliar symphonies will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 6 and Saturday afternoon, December 8. On Thursday evening the symphony will be Bruckner's in E-flat major No. 7. This work has had so few performances that it comes practically as a novelty. The symphony for Saturday afternoon is Glazounoff's No. 5. This work was first performed in New York at a concert of the Philharmonic Society under Anton Seidl in the spring of 1898, and it has since been performed in one of the concerts of the Russian orchestra. The soloist on Thursday evening will be Moriz Rosenthal, and on Saturday afternoon Timothée Adamowski, who will play for the first time in New York a concerto by Gustav Strube, one of the first violins of the orchestra.

SUN

ALTIMORE

How Dr. Muck Conducts.

Dr. Muck slipped across the stage so quickly and quietly that the audience hardly detected his presence until Mr. Hess waved the orchestra to its feet. The buzz of discovery subsided in a little burst of welcoming applause; the new conductor bowed tautly and nervously to his men and to his audience, and for the first time the three were face to face. Neither photograph nor description had belied him. For the moment the face seemed unusually white and set, but mental acumen, nervous energy, resolution, entire self-control and concentration seemed to meet in it. There was similar nervous energy in his alert bearing and supple movements, but subject again to the same full self-mastery. A man could hardly seem more unaffectedly and quietly absorbed in his work and in the pleasure of it.

The beat and the whole manner of conducting were as characteristic. Since Theodore Thomas' time no familiar conductor has stood so still. Dr. Muck plunged at no group of players, beckoned none to their entrances, embraced none in sweeping gesture. Like Thomas, he reserves such muscular labors for rehearsals. His body does not even rise with a crescendo, or go taut with a climax. His score stands before him, his stick is in his hand in the old fashion, and the beat is unfailingly clear and unfalteringly precise. Hand and stick seem to move little, but there is a curious, quivering, nervous energy in their rise and fall. Now and then both arms, half extended, move to the rhythm or sharpen the accent. Rarely the lifted left hand modulates the volume of tone. Once at least, with both arms at ease, Dr. Muck left the band to go its own way. There are no vehemence or obvious emotional appeal or suggestion in any movement. At the rehearsals the conductor has disclosed and imposed his design, will and feeling. At the concert he seems to seek only the clear and exact fulfilment and expression of them. His conducting is lucid precision itself, but precision that is tense with nervous energy.—Boston Transcript.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.

NEW YORK COMMERCIAL

NOV 24 1906

DR. MUCK of the Boston Symphony Orchestra sticks to his own idea of what makes a programme. He has given Boston his eighteenth-century programme and his "romantic" programme (Weber, Schubert, and Schumann), and Cambridge his three symphonies in one evening (Haydn's G major, Mozart's "Jupiter," and Beethoven's C minor). This week in Boston he proposes to give a Russian concert, consisting of Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture to "The Betrothed of the Czar," Tschaikowsky's violin concerto (for Alexander Petschnikoff), and the new fifth symphony by Glazounoff. Some Boston concertgoers are already declaring their conversion to Dr. Muck's method. Dwellers in other towns may still be pardoned for preferring programmes of the kind that Theodore Thomas or Mr. Gericke used to make. The American conductor who now preserves best that elder tradition is undoubtedly Walter Damrosch.

NEW YORK EVENING POST

NOV 22 1906

Bruckner at Last!

Two unfamiliar symphonies will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 6, and Saturday afternoon, December 8. On Thursday evening the symphony will be Bruckner's in E-flat major No. 7. This work has had so few performances that it comes practically as a novelty. It is the Seventh Symphony, which finally gave Bruckner, after long years of waiting, recognition as one of the great composers of his time. It will be particularly interesting to hear Dr. Muck's interpretation of it because he is not only an admirer of Bruckner and his music, but he gave the first performances of this symphony in Austria while he was conductor of the Styrian Musical Society in Graz in 1886 and in Berlin in 1894 at one of the royal concerts. The Symphony for Saturday evening is Glazounoff's No. 5. This work was first performed in New York at a concert of the Philharmonic Society under Anton Seidl in the spring of 1898 and it has since been performed in one of the concerts of the Russian Orchestra.

The soloists on Thursday evening will be Moritz Rosenthal and on Saturday afternoon Timothée Adamowski, who will play for the first time in New York a concerto by Gustav Strube, one of the first violins of the orchestra.

BOSTON TRANSCRIPT

NOVEMBER 24, 1906

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

DR. MUCK MAKES AN "ALL-RUSSIAN" PROGRAMME

Rimsky-Korsakoff in an Overture, Tschaikovski in the Violin Concerto and Glazounoff in a New Symphony—Russian Music at Its Brightest—Mr. Gogorza's Song Recital—Concerts of Next Week and Weeks to Come—Musical News

Dr. Muck made a hazardous venture at the Symphony concert yesterday with a programme that consisted wholly of music by Russian composers—Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture to his opera "The Betrothed of the Tsar"; Tschaikovski's concerto for violin, played by Mr. Petschnikoff, and Glazounoff's fifth symphony, in B-flat major, heard for the first time in Boston. No one of the three is of notable distinction as Russian music goes; no one represents the composer at his best and fullest, and each discloses rather transparently the characteristic virtues and shortcomings of Russian music. By this last token there is a measure of similarity in the three pieces; for, the "new" Russian music as we of the West hear it, is cut to the same last, even as are the operas of the "new" Italians, and the work of the "new" Frenchmen, if they have happened to be pupils of César Franck. There was a kindred brightness of instrumental color, for example, in Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, and in many parts of Glazounoff's symphony. The cantilena of Tschaikovski's concerto and the cantilena of Glazounoff's slow movement, different in many respects as they are, still kept, so to say, a family resemblance, discernible in their melodic outline rather than in their melodic contents. The turbulent finale of the concerto and of the symphony beginning abruptly, rising and falling sharply, is one of the earmarks of the whole Russian school.

So equally with less obvious resemblances. Note, for example, the aptitude of all three composers for instrumentation. Their ears and their imaginations are sensitive to very delicate distinctions of instrumental color, and their skill with the orchestra brings these distinctions to expression. Their instrumentation can be as exquisitely delicate and suggestive as it can be rudely powerful. They think in instruments; they imagine in them. How, for example, what seems merely passage-work for the display of the violinist's dexterity in Tschaikovski's concerto is really a searching of the heart of the instrument. Contrast the subtle lightness of Glazounoff's scherzo with the flamboyant tumult of his finale. Note, too, the ease of invention which all three men seem to enjoy, but do not listen too closely, lest that invention shall seem oftener an adroit transformation or a very slightly disguised repetition of catch phrases or of a musical idea already fully expressed. Consider, too, a certain gleaming quality in all three of the compositions played yesterday. First and last they were highly decorative music. The peril of an "all-Russian" programme is that this brilliance may ultimately cloy and pall, and that it may sometimes only illuminate—and much too brightly—a certain emptiness behind. The peril was the greater yesterday since all the music was comparatively light. Naturally in a violin concerto Tschaikovski does not mount the heights or plunge into the depths of passionate expression. Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture is decorative preluding to his opera without the gorgeous pictorial quality of his "Scheherazade" or the dramatic power of his "Antar." As for Glazounoff's symphony, it was the first piece of musical entertainment that the audience has had in the six concerts of the year, and it testified its pleasure in heartier applause than a new symphony or almost any new composition has received for long.

Narrow as the Russian composers sometimes seem, there are many sorts of Russian music—glowing Oriental fantasies like Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," tone-poems of Russian legend like the same composer's "Sadko" or Glazounoff's own "Stenka Razine"; "tone-pictures" like Ippolitoff-Ivanoff's "The Cliff," or Glazounoff's "Kremlin"; ballets that glorify the dance and transfigure with tones the material things of the theatre; and symphonies like the fifth and the sixth of Tschaikovski that traverse primitive passions at intense play. These are the sorts of Russian music that our concerts ordinarily make known to us. There was curiously little of any of these qualities in the Russian music of which Dr. Muck made his programme yesterday. There was no touch of the neighboring Orient; no tone-poems or tone-pictures; and no play of primitive passion. It was the brightness of Russian music, the peculiar kaleidoscopic quality of it, and of its instrumental coloring above all, that programme, conductor and band seemed most to disclose. Perhaps they disclosed as well, though least in the concerto, the facility of it, that makes much of it, have shimmer rather than depth and leave little impression when the exhilaration of the moment has passed.

Tschaikovski's and Glazounoff's cantilena wheedles the listener. The fantastic grace, the light tonal imagery, the invariable instrumental felicity of Glazounoff's scherzo is exquisite pleasure as one hears. There is no resisting at the moment the sonorous and pliant energy of his allegro, the tumult of his finale. Tschaikovski and Mr. Petschnikoff searched the secrets of the violin or leapt into the relief of their turbulent finale. Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture is all brightness. The concerto has become one of the stalking horses of the virtuosi of the violin. It has been long with us and it will remain. There is no escaping it or forgetting it. But how completely has recollection of Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture passed though it has been twice played at our symphony concerts! And will Glazounoff's symphony be easy to recall a year hence, except, perhaps, the scherzo? The Russian music that lasts is the music of primitive passion, or of folk-legend or folk-tune; or of the mysterious Orient or of the bare steppes. Yesterday Glazounoff and Rimsky-Korsakoff were of Petersburg, the urban, when the Nevsky Prospekt and the restaurants in the islands of the river are at their gayest on a bright winter afternoon. H. T. P.

+ + +

Concerts Next Week

The Symphony Orchestra gives an extra concert in Symphony Hall on Monday evening at eight o'clock in honor of Camille Saint-Saëns, the eminent French composer, who is now paying his first visit to America and about whom several articles have appeared recently in these columns. The programme consists entirely of Saint-Saëns's music, but the composer himself will appear only as a pianist, playing the pianoforte part in his concerto in G-minor, and a group of short pieces. The overture to one of his later operas, "The Barbarians," begins the concert, and for ending comes his symphony in C-minor, notable for the skill in instrumentation and the fertility in the development and modulation of what is practically a single melody, that is displays, and unusual by its addition of a piano and an organ to the orchestra. In these and in the concerto Dr. Muck will conduct, while in the symphony Mr. Zach takes the piano and Mr. Goodrich the organ.

At the regular Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next in Symphony Hall, Moriz Rosenthal, one of the most distinguished of living pianists, about whom there is an article in another column, reappears in Boston after an absence of eight years, playing the pianoforte part in Liszt's concerto in E-flat major. As notable is the appearance of a symphony by Bruckner on the programme—the seventh, in E-flat major, which has been played only once before in Boston, and then twenty years ago. Thus it is virtually new music, and in it Dr. Muck will give the first proof of the admiration in which he holds Bruckner's work. In Germany and Austria he is barely beginning to come into his own, while in America his music is still almost unknown. The remaining number [illegible]

NEW YORK CITY

SS

TIMES

NOV 1 0

TWO events of unusual interest marked the opening of the musical season: the coming of Dr. Muck to lead the Boston Symphony and the appearance of M. Saint-Saëns for the first time in this country.

Dr. Muck made a most favorable impression at the first Symphony concerts as a musician of the highest order. His interpretations of Beethoven, Wagner and Brahms were sympathetic, scholarly and sincere, abstaining from any sensationalism. The orchestra and the public are to be congratulated on this leader.

As M. Saint-Saëns is the first of the modern French composers and well known in this country, his renderings of many favorite works at his recent concerts were interesting events. He was assisted by Mr. Damrosch's orchestra. While an excellent pianist, it is as a composer that he will be remembered.

[76]

ss

WAGNER CONCERT IN CARNEGIE HALL

Walter Damrosch and the Symphony Orchestra in an Excellent Programme.

By AUGUSTUS ST. JOHN-BRENON.

Richard Strauss, Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra united their forces last night at Carnegie Hall and the result was a most spirited, stimulating and artistic concert.

It is Mr. Damrosch's ambition that New York should have an orchestra as closely and artistically associated and identified with New York as the Chicago Orchestra is with Chicago, or the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the Hub, and at the present time worthy of the highest traditions and esthetic traditions of a city developed, as few cities in the world are, to music in its noblest manifestations. Now such interpretations as I heard yesterday of the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the Vorspiel to "Tristan," for instance, go far toward establishing the claim of the New York Symphony Orchestra to such a dignity and [illegible] worthiness.

Mr. Damrosch's readings of these two deeply [illegible] musical excerpts from contrasted works were [illegible] with nervous strength, poetical [illegible] uplifted diction and a penetrative [illegible] persuasive eloquence. The poise of the orchestra was admirable, the attack firm. The same, though to a less [illegible]ent, must be said of the "Sounds of the Forest," from "Siegfried," and [illegible] of Richard Wagner, which [illegible] invariably strongly favored [illegible], is too delicate, too intimately [illegible]oven with the situation and the [illegible] action upon which it is a comment, to be torn bodily from the drama which it describes, poetizes and [illegible]es.

The "Procession of the Knights" from "Parsifal" [illegible] too stiltedly and too formally [illegible]d in mysticism. The [illegible] too deliberate.

Mme. Gadski was the soloist. She made three appearances during the evening. Her voice, pretentious, ragged and uncertain, platform presence of singular beauty and dignity did [illegible]re for a rendering of Wagner's [illegible]childe Wesendonck's "[illegible]" Sorrow, the tenderness and [illegible]ness of which she either ignored or [illegible]ssed by in an attempt at [illegible] and declamation.

Her mezzo [illegible] euphonious, her low notes [illegible]rich and powerful; but [illegible] notes had the fatal fault of [illegible] quiver and vibrato. Madame [illegible]ski should take herself in hand.

The concert ended with a lively rendering of "The Ride of Valkyries."

Two unfamiliar symphonies will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 6, and Saturday afternoon, December 8. On Thursday evening the symphony will be Bruckner's in E-flat major, No. 7. This work has had so few performances that it comes practically as a novelty. It is the Seventh Symphony, which finally gave Bruckner, after long years of waiting, recognition as one of the great composers of his time. It will be particularly interesting to hear Dr. Muck's interpretation of it because he is not only an admirer of Bruckner and his music, but he gave the first performances in this symphony in Austria while he was conductor of the Styrian Society in Gratz, in 1886, and in Berlin in 1894 at one of the Royal concerts.

---

st Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

LIC. LEDGER

PHILADELPHIA, PA

NOV 25 1906

Boston Symphony Orchestra, on December 3, will afford a hearing of the Brahms Symphony in C minor which received warm praise in New York when it was played two weeks ago. Doctor Muck's reading of the work was variously commented upon by the critics, and this despite his late pronunciamento against the attempt on the part of orchestral leaders to read individual interpretations into the composition they present. Doctor Muck favored only an earnest search after the composer's own intentions and a loyal discipleship in presenting these to the audience. The announcement of the soloist is equally of importance, the concert marking the first appearance here in eight years of Moriz Rosenthal. Recognized as a very great pianist during his first visit to America, he is today acknowledged as an artist who has gained in subtle and deep musical qualities and a technical mastery that is remarkable, even in this era when there are many pianists of concert rank to claim our attention.

PRESS

PHILADELPHIA, PA

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. This concert will be of especial interest because it will mark the first appearance in eight years in Philadelphia of Moriz Rosenthal, the great pianist, who has been making such a sensation in New York. Rosenthal was astoundingly great when he was in this country eight years ago and even on his first visit several years before that; but all accounts from New York agree that he has grown immeasurably since then, not merely in his gigantic technique, but in his purer, deeper and subtler musical qualities. This will be Rosenthal's first appearance in Philadelphia and much is expected of it. It is interesting to learn that Dr. Muck has placed on this Philadelphia program Brahms' Symphony in C minor, No. 1. It was with this symphony that he created such an extraordinary demonstration of enthusiasm in New York two weeks ago.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Two unfamiliar symphonies will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 6 and Saturday afternoon, December 8. On Thursday evening the symphony will be Bruckner's in E-flat major No. 7. This work has had so few performances that it comes practically as a novelty. The symphony for Saturday afternoon is Glazounoff's No. 5. This work was first performed in New York at a concert of the Philharmonic Society under Anton Seidl in the spring of 1898, and it has since been performed in one of the concerts of the Russian orchestra. The soloist on Thursday evening wil be Moriz Rosenthal, and on Saturday afternoon Timothée Adamowski, who will play for the first time in New York a concerto by Gustav Strube, one of the first violins of the orchestra.

s

How Dr. Muck Conducts.

Dr. Muck slipped across the stage so quickly and quietly that the audience hardly detected his presence until Mr. Hess waved the orchestra to its feet. The buzz of discovery subsided in a little burst of welcoming applause; the new conductor bowed tautly and nervously to his men and to his audience, and for the first time the three were face to face. Neither photograph nor description had belied him. For the moment the face seemed unusually white and set, but mental acumen, nervous energy, resolution, entire self-control and concentration seemed to meet in it. There was similar nervous energy in his alert bearing and supple movements, but subject again to the same full self-mastery. A man could hardly seem more unaffectedly and quietly absorbed in his work and in the pleasure of it.

The beat and the whole manner of conducting were as characteristic. Since Theodore Thomas' time no familiar conductor has stood so still. Dr. Muck plunged at no group of players, beckoned none to their entrances, embraced none in sweeping gesture. Like Thomas, he reserves such muscular labors for rehearsals. His body does not even rise with a crescendo, or go taut with a climax. His score stands before him, his stick is in his hand in the old fashion, and the beat is unfailingly clear and unfalteringly precise. Hand and stick seem to move little, but there is a curious, quivering, nervous energy in their rise and fall. Now and then both arms, half extended, move to the rhythm or sharpen the accent. Rarely the lifted left hand modulates the volume of tone. Once at least, with both arms at ease, Dr. Muck left the band to go its own way. There are no vehemence or obvious emotional appeal or suggestion in any movement. At the rehearsals the conductor has disclosed and imposed his design, will and feeling. At the concert he seems to seek only the clear and exact fulfilment and expression of them. His conducting is lucid precision itself, but precision that is tense with nervous energy.—Boston Transcript.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

DR. MUCK of the Boston Symphony Orchestra sticks to his own idea of what makes a programme. He has given Boston his eighteenth-century programme and his "romantic" programme (Weber, Schubert, and Schumann), and Cambridge his three symphonies in one evening (Haydn's G major, Mozart's "Jupiter," and Beethoven's C minor). This week in Boston he proposes to give a Russian concert, consisting of Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture to "The Betrothed of the Czar," Tschaikowsky's violin concerto (for Alexander Petschnikoff), and the new fifth symphony by Glazounoff. Some Boston concertgoers are already declaring their conversion to Dr. Muck's method. Dwellers in other towns may still be pardoned for preferring programmes of the kind that Theodore Thomas or Mr. Gericke used to make. The American conductor who now preserves best that elder tradition is undoubtedly Walter Damrosch.

NEW YORK POST

Bruckner at Last!

